

M^R BAYLE's
Historical and Critical
DICTIONARY.

THE SECOND EDITION.

To which is prefixed,

THE LIFE OF THE AUTHOR,

BY

M^R DES MAIZEAUX,

Fellow of the Royal Society.

VOLUME THE FIRST.

A — Bi.

*Bælius hic ille est cujus dum scripta vigebunt
Lis erit, oblectent, erudiant ne magis.*

Jam. Smith Sculpsit 1733.

Bayle, Pierre

THE DICTIONARY
Historical and Critical
OF
M^R PETER BAYLE.

THE SECOND EDITION,

Carefully collated with the several Editions of the Original; in which many Passages are restored, and the whole greatly augmented, particularly with a Translation of the Quotations from eminent Writers in various Languages.

To which is prefixed,

THE LIFE OF THE AUTHOR,

REVISED, CORRECTED, AND ENLARGED,

BY

M^R DES MAIZEAUX,

Fellow of the Royal Society.

VOLUME THE FIRST.

A — Bi.

L O N D O N :

Printed for J. J. and P. KNAPTON; D. MIDWINTER; J. BROTHERTON; A. BETTESWORTH and C. HITCH; J. HAZARD; J. TONSON; W. INNYS and R. MANBY; J. OSBORNE and T. LONGMAN; T. WARD and E. WICKSTEED; W. MEADOWS; T. WOODWARD; B. MOTTE; W. HINCHLIFFE; J. WALTHOE, jun. E. SYMON; T. COX; A. WARD; D. BROWNE; S. BIRT; W. BICKERTON; T. ASTLEY; S. AUSTEN; L. GILLIVER; H. LINTOT; H. WHITRIDGE; R. WILLOCK.

M D C C X X X I.

T O

The Right Honourable

SIR ROBERT WALPOLE,

First Commissioner of the Treasury, Chancellor and Under-Treasurer of the Exchequer, One of His Majesty's Most Honourable Privy-Council, and Knight of the Most Noble Order of the Garter.

SIR, .

REAT Writers, who employ themselves for the instruction or entertainment of the World, naturally claim, what they seem naturally to merit, the favour and countenance of Great Men. Whosoever contributes, especially with success, to enlarge the Understandings of Men, and to mend their Hearts, is entitled to the Friendship and Protection of the Governors of Men, I mean of such as would truly answer the noble end of Government; who, if they pursue their duty, and consult the honour and improvement of human nature, will chearfully and generously promote whatever has that good tendency. And they who practise different Politics, by cramping the human Soul, possessing it with false awe, and debasing it through Darknes and Ignorance, do not deserve, but rather disgrace and forfeit, the glorious and endearing title of Magistrates and Protectors.

TRUE and extensive Knowledge never was, never can be, hurtful to the Peace of Society. It is Ignorance, or,
VOL. I. [A] which

DEDICATION.

which is worse than ignorance, false Knowledge, that is chiefly terrible to States. They are the furious, the ill taught, the blind and misguided, that are prone to be seized with groundless Fears, and unprovoked Resentment, to be roused by Incendiaries, and to rush desperately into Sedition and acts of Rage.

SUBJECTS that are most knowing and best informed, are ever most peaceable and loyal. Whereas the Loyalty and obedience of such, whose understandings extend not beyond Names and Sounds, will be always precarious, and can never be thoroughly relied upon, whilst any turbulent or artful men can, by din and clamour, and the continual application of those Sounds, intoxicate, and inflame them even to madness, can make them believe themselves undone though nothing hurts them, think they are oppressed when they are best protected, and can drive them into riots and rebellion, without the excuse of one real grievance. It will always be easy to raise a mist before eyes that are already dark: and it is a true observation, “that it is an easy work to govern Wise Men; but to govern Fools or Madmen, is a continual slavery.”

IT is from the blind zeal and stupidity cleaving to Superstition, 'tis from the Ignorance, Rashness, and Rage attending Faction, that so many, so mad, and so sanguinary evils have afflicted and destroyed Men, dissolved the best Governments, and thinned the greatest Nations. And as a people well instructed will certainly esteem the Blessings which they enjoy, and study public Peace, for their own sake, there is a great merit in instructing the people, and in cultivating their Understandings. They are certainly less credulous in proportion as they are more knowing, and consequently less liable to be the Dupes of Demagogues, and the property of Ambition. They are not then to be surprized with false cries, nor animated by imaginary Danger; and wherever the Understanding is well principled and informed, the Passions will be tame, and the Heart well disposed.

DEDICATION.

THEY therefore who communicate true Knowledge to their species, are true Friends to the World, Benefactors to Society, and deserve all encouragement from those, who preside over Society, with the applause and good wishes of all men. Such a public friend and benefactor was MR BAYLE. Truth and Knowledge were his mistress, and the pursuit of his life, and he studied to engage all men in that pursuit. A curious searcher of error he was, a constant champion against falshood, imposture, and all dishonest arts; zealous for public tranquillity, and a foe to all who disturbed it; wonderfully qualified for his great undertaking, by an acuteness and penetration never exceeded by any Writer ancient or modern, and with such an accumulation of various, curious, and solid Learning, as perhaps was never equalled by any Writer whatsoever; a great Philosopher, a great Linguist, an universal Historian and Critic, vastly skilled in Divinity and Controversy, and a nice reasoner upon transactions of States, and the arts of Statesmen.

MANY enemies it is true he had; and what other Great Man ever wanted such? their Greatness only is what often produces them. It was therefore no wonder that the outcry and clamour against him was so loud and many-mouthed, even for his most excellent performances. This comfort however attends his memory, and it is likely he foresaw it and enjoyed it in his lifetime; that all that clamour is now dead, and these excellent performances remain, and are likely for ever to remain. What his own admirable talents and many solid defences could not do, time and the infinite merit of his works, and the force of truth have done, silenced his adversaries, and almost made it forgot that he ever had any. This must be a pleasing reflection to all lovers of Truth and of great Merit greatly traduced, and spitefully used, to see such traducers sunk into oblivion, and such merit covered with lustre.

I could, Sir, with your leave and patience, illustrate the fate of MR BAYLE by similar instances; but that

DEDICATION.

that I would no more offend you with the appearance of Flattery, than I would provoke others to charge me with the imputation of designing, and you of encouraging it. Permit me only to say, that as this great and applauded Work is like to last, Posterity (for Posterity will judge without anger or envy) will not think it unnatural to see the name of SIR ROBERT WALPOLE prefixed to the GRAND DICTIONARY of MR BAYLE; and if by this way (this only way) I can purchase permanence to my own humble name, it is an Ambition which I hope merits pardon. The greatest that I have in the world is to be owned by you, Sir, as what I strictly am, with all Devotion and unbounded Respect,

SIR,

Your most Dutiful, and most Obedient

Humble Servant,

P. DES MAIZEAUX.

ADVERTISEMENT

CONCERNING

This Second Edition.

IF the repeated Editions of a voluminous book be a proof of the Approbation of the Public, we may affirm that no book has been more generally esteemed than Mr Bayle's Dictionary. Besides the editions of 1697 and 1702, which he published himself, it was printed at Geneva in 1715, at Rotterdam in 1720, at Amsterdam in 1730, and is just now reprinted in France: so that there have been six impressions of it in six and thirty years; an honour which perhaps was never done to any other book of such a bulk. To these editions may be added the English Translation, published in 1710: for the Translation of a book is in reality a new Edition of it in another dress; and does so much the more credit to the work, as it is the effect of the earnest desires of the curious and inquisitive, who do not understand the original.

That Translation was done from the edition of 1702, the most complete then extant: but Mr Bayle having left behind him several Articles, which he designed for a Supplement to his Dictionary, they were inserted in the new edition printed at Rotterdam in 1720. But this edition being full of errors of the press, and interpolated in many places, these defects were corrected in the Amsterdam edition of 1730, in which some learned men were employed. They also improved it in several other respects, of which they give us the following account.

I. " We have, say these Editors, collated it with the Editions of 1697
" and 1702, and particularly with Mr Bayle's own Copy of the edition
" 1702, in which are several additions and corrections written with VOL. I. [B] " his

Advertisement concerning this second Edition.

“ his own hand. By this means several expressions, and whole phrases “ have been restored which had been omitted, changed, or adulterated “ in the preceeding edition.

II. “ The Articles of the Supplement, or posthumous Additions, have “ been compared with Mr Bayle’s Original Manuscript; by the help of “ which the text has been restored to its purity, and all spurious infer-“ tions struck out.

III. “ The several quotations from celebrated Authors, in the Greek, “ Latin, and other languages, have been carefully revised and corrected.

IV. “ Some passages, or citations, which were wanting in the “ edition of 1720, and had been only referred to, have been supplied.

V. “ The Articles which were misplaced, or put at the end of the “ fourth volume, are placed in their proper order.

VI. “ Some Critical Remarks, which had been communicated to the “ Bookfellers, and printed at the end of the said fourth volume, have “ been inserted in the Articles they belonged to; but they are distin“ guished from Mr Bayle’s text, being preceeded by a Greek letter for “ a reference and by this mark §, and ending with the words, “ REM. CRIT.

VII. “ At the end of the fourth volume is added a piece printed at “ Paris in 1706, intituled Critical Remarks upon the new edition of Moreri’s “ Historical Dictionary, published in 1704. Mr Bayle reprinted this piece “ in Holland, and prefixed to it a long Preface, which contains excel“ lent instructions towards perfecting Moreri’s Dictionary. He likewise “ joined to it several historical and critical Observations, which are to the “ same purpose, and where he shews the errors in fact, and the false “ reasonings of the Author of these remarks. But though he saw that “ this Critic had taken almost all his remarks upon Moreri, from his Hi“ storical and Critical Dictionary, without citing it, he never reproaches “ him with this piece of Plagiarism, but contents himself with vindica“ ting some passages which this Cenfor had misunderstood, or had criti“ cized without reason. Mr Des Maizeaux has been less indulgent in the “ Observations which he has added to those of Mr Bayle: he has resto“ red to Mr Bayle all the critical remarks which this Critic had borrowed “ from his Dictionary, and had given as his own. Neither has he “ spared him for his boldness in advancing certain facts without proofs, as “ well as for his loose, equivocal, and sophistical manner of arguing.
“ But as the design of that small work is to contribute towards perfecting “ Moreri’s Dictionary, Mr Des Maizeaux had taken a particular care to “ point out the corrections that have been made in the late editions, of “ the passages censured by this Author. Future Editors will see at one

Advertisement concerning this second Edition.

“ view, what has been already corrected, and what still remains to be “ rectified with respect to those passages. It does not appear that the “ late Revisors of Moreri were acquainted with these Critical Remarks;
“ at least it is certain that they have not seen Mr Bayle's Preface and “ Notes. Mr Bayle would not put his name to them, which is the rea“ son why this piece has been hitherto so little known.

VIII. “ To this edition is prefixed the Life of Mr Bayle, by Mr Des “ Maizeaux.”

In this new English edition of Mr Bayle's Dictionary, we have followed the improved edition of the original, last mentioned ; which consequently contains all his posthumous Additions and Corrections. The Readers will also find in the last Volume the Critical Remarks upon Moreri's Dictionary, with Mr Bayle's Preface and Notes to it, and Mr Des Mai-zeaux's Observations : Also, Mr Bayle's Reflections on a Pamphlet, intitled, the Judgment of the Public concerning Mr Bayle's Critical Dictionary, (first inserted in the edition of 1720) : and an Historical Discourse concerning the Life of Gustavus Adolphus, King of Sweden. Mr Bayle designed to write a compleat History of that great Prince ; but has left the work unfinished ; however, as far as it goes, it is an excellent piece of history, and one may easily see that it comes from a masterly hand. It has been but lately published, and has not been yet inserted in any edition of Mr Bayle's Dictionary. We therefore presume the readers will be glad to see it at the end of the last Volume, where it may, in some measure, supply the want of the Article of the great GUSTAVUS, which is not to be found in the Dictionary.

Besides these Pieces, which were not in the first English edition, this second edition has several other advantages.

I. The Translation is much more exact and correct, and is carefully revised and compared with the original.

II. It has been collated with the original editions of 1697 and 1702, when any doubt has arisen concerning the genuine reading of a word, a date, &c.

III. Several errors of the press which had crept into the edition of 1730, especially in the passages of ancient Authors, have been corrected.

IV. The citations from eminent Writers in various languages, are translated into English, excepting when Mr Bayle himself has fully expressed the sense of them.

V. The

Advertisement concerning this second Edition.

V. The Life of Mr Bayle has been revised, corrected, and enlarged by the Author; and some of the Corrections and Additions are very considerable. As soon as this work came out, it was translated into High-Dutch by the learned Dr Kohl, and printed at Hamburgh in 1731, in 8vo: and it has been reprinted at Paris in 1733, in two Volumes in 12mo. But Mr Des Maizeaux was not concerned in these Editions, which however shew that the public entertained a very favourable opinion of that work. Some people may possibly imagine that Mr Des Maizeaux, has insisted too long on Mr Bayle's disputes, and could have wished that he had only given the particulars of his life: but indeed what is the History of the life of a Philosopher, but an account of his works, opinions, and disputes? These are the battles and bright actions of such Heroes. Besides, the knowledge of such books and pamphlets as do not seem to concern the English reader, will be found necessary for the better understanding of numberless passages of Mr Bayle's Dictionary, wherein they are mentioned or referred to; so that this part of his Life is, as it were, a key, or an explanatory introduction, to them.

P R E F A C E

P R E F A C E

T O T H E

First French Edition.

HAVE a thousand things to offer in this Preface ; but as I cannot do it without running into an exorbitant length, which would discourage the Readers, I rather chuse to give my self some constraint, than offend their niceness. I shall therefore confine my self to five or six particulars.

I declare first, that this work is not what I promised in the Project I published of a Critical Dictionary in the Year 1692. The objection I had best obviated and answered, is that which was chiefly insisted on, to condemn the plan I designed to pursue ; and perhaps it appeared very strong to a great many readers, for no other reason, but because they observed I very much enlarged on it's confutation. But let the cause be what it will, I did not think it prudent to oppose the general taste; and since it has been universally concluded, that the greatest part of the faults I mentioned in the articles of the Project were of little importance to the public, reason required I should give over my undertaking. My design was to compose a Dictionary of errors: the perfection of such a work consists in observing all mistakes, great or small; for doubtless it would be a perfection in a Geographical Dictionary, and in a Map, to specify every town and village. Seeing therefore the best way of executing my project must be the most exposed to the complaints of the public, as it would have multiplied insignificant observations, there was a necessity for me to alter my design; and I could not but believe, that according to the prevailing taste of the age, there was a real imperfection in the very plan of my enterprize, which could never be cured by the execution. If I contest any thing with those who say, that the greatest part of the errors I have censured in my Project are of no consequence, 'tis their supposing that they are not all of that nature; for I maintain, that none of them is important, and that though, generally speaking, they are like those that have been observed by great Critics (1), yet they can contribute nothing to the public good. The fate of mankind does not depend upon them. A narrative abounding with the grossest ignorance is as proper to move the passions, as historical exactness. Let ten thousand ignorant people hear you preach that Coriolanus's mother obtained of him, what " he refused " the sacred College of Cardinals and the Pope himself, who went to meet " him (2)," you will give them the same idea of the power of the Holy

I.
WHY this work is not formed upon the plan published in 1692. [See that Plan at the end of the last Volume.]

(1) If you consider Scaliger's remarks upon Eusebius's Chronicle, you will find that his corrections consist in shewing, that a time, a place, a man's name, &c. have been mistaken.

(2) 'Tis affirmed in the Recueil des bons contes & des bons mots, printed in the year 1633. p. 123. of the Dutch edition, that this was actually preached.

Virgin, as if this was no blunder. Tell them, " 'Tis strange, Christians, that you should not be moved to see our Saviour JESUS CHRIST hanging upon the cross, all bruised with blows, when the emperor Pompey was moved with compassion, upon seeing Pyrrhus's elephants pierced with arrows (3);" you will produce the same effect, as if what you say of Pompey was true. 'Tis therefore certain, that the discovery of errors (4) is not important or useful to the prosperity of the State, or of private persons. Observe now in what manner I have changed my plan, the better to hit the taste of the public. I have divided my composition into two parts: one is purely historical, and gives a succinct account of matters of fact: the other is a large commentary, a miscellany of proofs and discussions, wherein I have inserted a censure of many faults, and even sometimes a train of philosophical reflections; in a word, there is variety enough, to presume that all sorts of readers will find something or other that will please them.

(3) 'Tis affirmed in the Eurœtiana, fig. 127. of the Brussels edition that Furetiere heard this preached in Flanders.

(4) Only mean errors in point of fact, and I except those that concern religion. As to the former, I do not pretend to make any exception.

THIS new œconomy has broke all the measures I had taken; most of the materials I had collected were of no use to me, and I was forced to work upon a new foundation. My principal design was to observe the faults of Moreri, and of all other Dictionaries like his. In searching for proofs necessary to expose those faults, and rectify them, I found, that many authors, both ancient and modern had committed the same mistakes. And as Moreri is much more faulty in what concerns Mythology, and the Roman families than in modern history, I had particularly made collections upon the heathen gods and heroes, and the great men of ancient Rome. The work I proposed to publish, would have contained abundance of articles, like those of ACHILLES, BALBUS, and CRASSUS, in my Project. All these vast collections are become useless, because I was informed that these subjects pleased few people, and that a volume in folio, the greatest part of which should run only upon such things, would be left to grow mouldy in the booksellers ware houses. It will appear that I have had a regard to this information: but few articles of this kind will be found in my two Volumes; nor would they perhaps have been there, had they not been wholly composed before I was fully informed of the taste of the readers.

II.

WHY this work could not be composed in a little time.

This is one of the reasons that have retarded the publication of this work: many others have contributed to it. I resolved at first to say nothing that has been already said in other Dictionaries, or at least to avoid as much as possible the repetition of facts that are to be found in them; whereby I deprived myself of all the materials that were most easy to be collected, and employed. Nothing can be more easy for the authors of an Historical Dictionary, than to talk of Popes, Emperors, Kings, and Cardinals; or of the Fathers of the church, of Councils, and Heretics; or of great lords, cities, provinces, &c. 'Tis therefore a great disadvantage to lay aside those subjects, as one must do every moment, if he proposes to avoid the articles that are in Moreri's Dictionary. If you design to give the same articles, you must confine yourself to the things that he has omitted: the difficulty of separating them from others in the originals you consult is not small; but that of connecting them together, after the chasms occasioned by this separation, is much greater. Notwithstanding all these Difficulties, I resolved to give an account of most of the persons mentioned in the Bible; but I was informed that a particular Dictionary upon these subjects would quickly come out at Lyons (5). What remained to be done, was to collect what has been said by the Rabbis concerning those persons; but understanding that the late Mr d'Herbelot's Bibliothèque Orientale was printing at Paris, I gave over

(5) 'Tis intitled, Le Dictionnaire de la bible. 'Tis a Folio book printed, according to the title-page, in 1693, and written by M. Simon, priest, and doctor of divinity.

Preface to the first French Edition.

(3)

over this design (6). Notwithstanding the same difficulties, I would have composed the articles relating to church-history, had I not considered that Mr du Pin furnished the readers of Dictionaries, with all they could desire. His work is adapted both to the learned and unlearned. The Dutch editions have made it very common, and all the curious buy it and read it. I had not, therefore, been excusable, had I mentioned the same things that are to be found there: must one buy the same histories twice? I rather chose to abstain from so fruitful a subject, and easy to come by, than to repeat what may be more conveniently learned elsewhere.

(6) I had already composed the articles of ADAM, EVE, CAIN, ABEL, ABRAHAM, &c. which I give in this Work.

I found myself streightened in other respects. This work was hardly begun, when I heard an English translation of Moreri's Dictionary was printing at London, with abundance of Additions; and that a large supplement to the same work was preparing in Holland. Hereupon I thought myself obliged not to treat of the illustrious men of Great Britain: I concluded, that out of the English edition, they would be inserted in the said supplement, and that the same thing would be bought twice, unless I prevented it by depriving myself of so copious a matter, and so proper to recommend a Dictionary. For the same reason I laid aside my enquiry after the illustrious men who have flourished in the United Provinces (7); and said very little concerning the history or geography of this State. I did not doubt but the supplement, printed in Holland, would give a large and exact account of all these things, and likewise that it would fully treat of all the transactions of Europe in our days. This prevented my touching upon those modern histories. On the other hand, I heard that a new edition of Moreri's Dictionary was going to be published at Paris, with great additions. This made me resolve to suppress a great many things, and put a stop to my enquiry into many subjects, which I could handle but imperfectly, in comparison of those who were engaged in this new edition: they are upon the spot, and at hand to consult libraries, and learned men. I ought therefore to leave them this task entire, and not give them the displeasure of running lightly over a subject, that will be read more eagerly when set off by them in its full lustre, before others touch upon it.

(7) I have only mentioned some, whose Lives or Funerals Orations I had already by me.

But besides these new editions, and new supplements of Moreri's Dictionary, other things have much streightened me. Mr Chappuzeau has been a long time about an historical Dictionary in which we shall certainly find, amongst abundance of other subjects, what concerns the situation of nations, their manners, religion, government, and what concerns the royal families, and the genealogies of great men (8); and particularly you will find in it at large, all the electors, princes, and counts of the empire; their alliances, interests, and principal actions. And by that means, you will see the northern countries, and the rest of Protestant Europe. I thought, therefore, that I had better be silent upon those great subjects, than expose the reader to the disagreeable necessity of purchasing the same things twice. Nay, I have found myself confined with respect to the learned men of the XVIth century; for I knew that Mr Teissier was printing, with new additions, the commentaries he has so curiously compiled upon the Elogies taken from Thuanus (9). I was afraid, in speaking of those learned men, that the facts mentioned by me, would be the same with Mr Teissier's; and that thought has often determined me to suppress my collections.

(8) See the Plan of his Dictionary, which he published in the Year 1694.

(9) That second edition came out in 1696.

Preface to the first French Edition.

I do not enumerate these particulars, in order to enable my friends to make my apology against those who shall despise my Dictionary, and say, "was so much time to be consumed in the composition of such a Work? the faults of it might be excused, if the author had spent only a few months in making it: but so poor an effect of so long a labour deserves no indulgence. Slowness is never tolerable, but when it

(10) Diu par-ruit læna calulum, sed le-onem. The lion's goes long with young, but at length brings forth a lion.

(11) *Res ardua vetustis novitatem dare, novis au-thoritatem, ob-soletis nitorem, obscuris lucem, fastidi-tis gratiam,
dubis fidem.
It is a difficult matter to give the grace of novelty to things old, authority to things new, elegancy to things obsolete, light to things obscure, favour to things condemned, and credit to things doubtful. Plin.
in Præf. Nat.
Hist.*

(12) *I began this work in July, 1692,
and made an end of it in Octob. 1696.*

(13) *I quote
the pages, even when I refer to other places of my Dictionary.*

(14) Some persons have very obligingly lent me some books, for which I am very thankful. I would willingly publish here the names and merits of those, who have done me that favour, were I not afraid of offending their modesty.

"produces a master-piece (10)." My friends might answer, that the most diligent writers would be hard put to it, to make their compilations with greater speed, if they abstained from the most copious and easy subjects, and avoided mentioning what some have compiled, and what they foresee will be compiled by others. But I do not desire that these should be alledged in my favour. What I have said, is only designed to resolve such questions as these; "Why so many great men are wanting in my book? why it contains so many unknown persons, and obscure names? why it is so barren in some respects, and profuse in others? could the author be so mistaken, as to pretend to be able to do what Pliny thought extremely difficult? &c (11)." Let the querist be referred to the account I have given above, and he will find the solution of all these doubts.

I freely own, that laborious and diligent authors will have reason to look upon me as a slow Writer. I have spent above four years in the composition of these two volumes (12). Besides, they are intermixed with long Passages, which cost me no pains; nothing of what I have said of my own, bespeaks an author that revises his work, or corrects his first thoughts, and the first disposition of his words. And therefore, if any one thinks I have been too slow, I shall not wonder at it: I am sensible and ashamed of it, and I should be still more ashamed, were it not that my health frequently interrupted, requires some regard, and does not permit me to perform what strong and laborious men can do. I know, moreover, that the slavery of quoting, which I have submitted to (13), makes me lose much time; and that the prodigious scarcity of books, very necessary to my design, stopped my pen a hundred times a day. Such a work as this requires the most numerous library in the world; whereas I have very few books (14). Shall

I dare to own it? The stile is another cause of my slowness: it is very incorrect, and not free from expressions either improper, or which begin to be obsolete, or even from barbarisms. I confess I am, in these respects, without scruple: but, on the contrary, with regard to other things, which give more trouble (15), I am scrupulous, even to superstition. The greatest masters, the most illustrious members of the French Academy, dispense with these scruples, and we have but three or four writers, that are not cured of them. It is, therefore, a great mortification to me, not to be able to get above those niceties, which cost much time, and often spoil the lively and natural agreeableness of the expression, when it is corrected by this Rule.

I am so unable to shake off this heavy yoke, that in case this Dictionary be reprinted, it will certainly be my principal care to correct, according to the rigorous rules of our French Grammarians, all the inaccuracies in the language, which still remain in this edition (16). They are not a few; for during the first year I was employed in this Work, I did not so much mind scruples of this sort; so that there are a great many articles which offend the superstitious rules I have now mentioned: they were composed at that time, and I had not the leisure to new-mould them, when I was obliged to send them the press. Such like faults may be found all the work over,

occasioned

(15) As to avoid equivocal expressions, verbs, the use of particles in the same sentence which may refer to different parts of it, &c.

(16) *Note,
that I found it impossible to perform this promise in the second edition, the printers did not give me the necessary time to revise my first work, and to prepare the new, that is, the additions which have been very numerous.*

occasioned either by my being so attentive to other matters, that I have overlooked them in correcting the proofs; or by the printer's not being able to allow me the necessary time to mend what I did not like. The useful advices I have received from Mr DRELINCOURT (17), and his just and elegant corrections, which I have taken care to write in the margin of my copy, will be of infinite use to me in revising that edition.

This is what I had to represent to those who might think it strange that my Dictionary cost me so much time. But I must not neglect those, who might believe I have made too much haste. There are many who will be surprized to see two such great volumes in Folio, finished in less than five years. Many authors do not perfect a little book under a year, whether they look upon those thoughts and expressions as mean, which they produce without a long meditation; or whether their business calls them frequently from their studies; or whether a natural laziness, or too scrupulous an obedience to the precept they have learned at school, interpone tuis interdum gaudia curis, engage them often to interrupt their labour. Those gentlemen are easily prejudiced against a work that has not cost much time; and they think it has not, unless a hundred printed sheets have taken up three or four Years. They will apply to me, doubtless, the canis festinans cæcos edit catulos, and will be confirmed in their prejudice, by reading the particulars above-mentioned. They will abate from the labour spent upon things, all the time I have bestowed upon avoiding verses (18), and to the unity of relatives. They know it is a long and painful task, and that nothing requires more patience than a good series of citations. They will not allow, that under pretence of having inserted a great deal of foreign matter in this work, I may say I have enlarged it in a little time, without making much haste. For, will they say, a just application of vast numbers of passages is a more laborious work, than a long train of reasonings and reflexions (19). These passages must be sought out, they must be read with attention, they must be pertinently placed, and connected with your own thoughts, and with one another. It is impossible to make a quick progress, and do this perfectly well. I grant them this, but I intreat them not to apply to me the canis festinans, &c. before they have read my work. Prejudices are deceitful, and if they would have favourable ones, I will tell them that I remember Cato's Distich as well as they, interpone tuis interdum gaudia curis, &c. but that I very seldom make use of it. Diversions, collations, journies into the country, visits, and such other recreations, necessary to a great many studious men, as they say, are not my business: I lose no time in them. Nor do I spend it in domestic cares, making interest for preferments, solicitations, or other affairs. I have been happily delivered from a great many occupations not very suitable to my humour, and I have had the greatest and most charming leisure that a man of letters could desire. By this means an author makes a great progress in a few years; his work may receive considerable additions every day, and that without a negligent performance.

I doubt not but the method I have taken in quoting the passages of authors, will be censured. Many will say, I was resolved to compile a large book with little expence: I have often cited very long passages; sometimes I give the sense of them, and then I set them down in Greek and Latin. Is not this multiplying things without necessity? was it necessary to transcribe a long quotation of a modern book, which is to be had in every bookseller's shop? was it necessary to quote Amyot in his old French?

(17) Preface of Philosophy at Leyden. See what has been said of his perfect knowledge of the French tongue, in the article DRELINCOURT remark [C]. He has also furnished me with several learned observations. Observe, that for the reason alluded to in the preceding marginal note, I could make very little use of them, no more than of the others which I had marked in the margin.

(18) The French prose is full of verses, unless one takes an extraordinary care to avoid that fault.

(19) See the remark [D]. of the article EPICURUS.

III.
SOME Reasons for quoting authors as I have done.

to give a good answer to those critics, I do not think it necessary to deny that their objections are specious. I confess they are plausible, and they kept me in suspense a long while ; but at last more specious reasons determined me to the method I have taken. I considered that such a work as this was to be instead of a library to a great many people. Many, that are lovers of learning, have not wherewithal to purchase books ; others have not leisure to consult the fiftieth part of the volumes they buy. Those who have leisure enough, would be very unwilling to rise every moment, to seek out the information they are referred to. They had rather find in the book they have before them, the very words of the authors, that are brought as evidences. If a man wants the edition cited, he loses a great deal of time ; for it is not always easy to find in one's edition, the page that an author cites in his own. And therefore out of a regard to the readers who have no books, and to the occupations, or laziness of those that have libraries, I have taken care to shew them at once historical facts, and the proofs of them, with many discussions and circumstances, that their curiosity might be fully satisfied. And because many frauds are committed in the citations of authors, and those who honestly abridge a passage, do not always express the whole force of it, it is incredible how much judicious persons are grown mistrustful. I may justly say, that it is a sort of rashness on a thousand occasions, to believe what is attributed to authors when their own words are not quoted. For which reason I was willing to set the reader's mind at rest ; and to prevent his suspecting any fraud in my report, I make every witness speak in his native language ; and instead of imitating Castelvetro, who finished his citations with & cætera, even before he had transcribed the necessary passage, I have sometimes lengthened that passage both at the beginning and at the end, that the thing in question might be understood, or something else occasionally learnt. I know this would be absurd in a short moral treatise, in a piece of eloquence, or in an history ; but it is not so in such a compilation as this is, in which I propose to relate facts, and then to illustrate them with commentaries. Such a method would be blameable, if instead of one volume it made two ; or instead of a pocket-book, it produced a book in Folio or in Quarto. But the question being only, whether a volume in Folio shall be longer or shorter by some sheets, it is not worth the while to constrain one's self. Had it but 250 sheets, it would no more have the advantages of a little book, than if it contained 330 sheets ; for it must be well observed, that these large books are not made to be read page by page. They would cost somewhat less, if they contained but 200 sheets, will some say : I answer, that if a bookseller went upon such a rule, he would never print a work consisting of many volumes, though they contained nothing but solid thoughts without a syllable too much ; for they would still be too dear for those that are in low circumstances. The trouble of translating Amyot, or Vigenere, into new French, would have been of no service ; it suffices that my reader can understand the facts they relate.

WHY Brantome and such like authors are often quoted in this Dictionary.

Men of a grave and severe character will particularly blame the citations out of Brantome or Montaigne, that contain actions and reflexions too free and gallant. I must say a word or two to this. Some persons of merit, who were concerned for the interests of the bookseller, concluded, that so large a book as this, stuffed with Greek and Latin quotations in several places, and full of discussions little diverting, would frighten the readers who are not men of letters, and weary the learned ; that therefore it was to be feared the sale would quickly fall, if the curiosity of those who do not understand

Preface to the first French Edition.

(7)

understand Latin was not excited by some other things. I was made sensible, that a work, which is bought only by the learned, seldom pays the printer, and that if any profit is to be made by an impression, 'tis when a book can equally please the learned, and those that have no learning; that it was therefore necessary for the sake of my bookseller, sometimes to relate what authors who take some liberties have published; that the use of such materials is like the liberty a man takes to write his own life; in some persons, 'tis a sign of arrogance (20), in others a just confidence in their virtue (21); and that I might justly place myself in the number of the latter; lastly, that if I was too averse to comply with this advice, I should at least suffer others to furnish the bookseller with such memoirs, and even sometimes with dogmatical reflexions that might excite attention. I promised them to have some regard to those remonstrances, and added, that I had no right to oppose their supplements; that I had left to the bookseller a full authority to insert, even without consulting me, the memoirs his correspondents and friends should send him; and that I could wish they would do with respect to the whole book what they seemed to be willing to do in some places, that is, make such additions, leave out such things, and dispose of my compilations as they should think fit. 'Tis certain I always wished to have no other share in this work, than the care of compiling: I should have been glad if others would have taken the pains to give a form to the materials, and to enlarge and shorten them; and I was well pleased when the persons I speak of assured me they would remember our conversation, which is a thing I desire my readers to take notice of. As for the philosophical reflexions which sometimes have been carried pretty far, I think I need not make an excuse for them; for since they only tend to convince man, that the best use he can make of his reason, is to submit his understanding to the obedience of faith, they seem to deserve the thanks of the faculties of Divinity.

(20) Plerique suam ipsi vitam narrare fiduciam potius morum quam arrogantiam arbitrati sunt. M^{ss} people have been of opinion, that for a man to write his own life, is rather a mark of a just confidence in his virtue, than of his vanity. Tacit. in vita Agricolæ. cap. 1.

(21) See the remarks of the articles VAYER and VIRGIL.

I have but two or three words to say upon a thing which seems very important. I have related the errors of a great many persons somewhat freely. Is not this a rash and presumptuous attempt? The answer to this question would be very long, if I did not refer the readers to what I have said upon it in my project (22). I intreat them to have recourse to it. I only add, that without exceeding the bounds of humility, a man may observe some faults in the books of famous men, and yet have a profound admiration for them. When subaltern officers, or even common soldiers, say freely that their generals have committed some faults in the course of a campaign, they are sometimes in the right; but they do not pretend to be better qualified than they to command an army; they acknowledge themselves infinitely inferior in capacity as well as in rank (23). That is my case. I further add, that when the question is concerning a thing that is disadvantageous to the memory of a man, I do not warrant the truth of it; I only relate what others say, and I quote my authors. 'Tis therefore to them, and not to me, that a man's relations ought to address their complaints. A modern historian has declared in a preface, "That those who have prescribed the inviolable laws of history (24), must be applied to, to give an account of those laws, "if any one is dissatisfied with them; and not the historians, who ought "indispensably to obey; all the glory they can hope for consisting in the "execution of their orders." My cause is still more favourable, since I only transcribe the authors already printed. Of the two inviolable laws of history mentioned by that historian, I have religiously observed that which

IV. REMARKS on my being so bold as to criticize many authors.

(22) Numero 6.

(23) Consult this versè of Horace. Quam de se loquitur non ut majore reprehens. Sat. 10. lib. 1. v. 55.

(24) Ne quid veri non audeat, ne quid falsi audeat. Cicer. The words of Cicero, in his second book de Oratore, fol. m. 74. A, are Quis nescit primam esse historiz legem, ne quid falsi dicere audeat, deinde ne quid veri non audeat? Who does not know that the first law of history is, not to dare say any thing that is false, and to dare say every thing that is true.

commands to say nothing that is false; as for the other, which bids us venture to say all that is true, I cannot boast that I have always observed it. I believe it sometimes inconsistent, not only with prudence but also with reason.

I would not have it thought that I glory to have said nothing but truth.

I only can warrant my intention, and not my ignorance. I advance nothing as truth, when I am persuaded that it is a falsity (25); but how many things are there which I have not apprehended, or the ideas whereof have been confounded with one another during the composition? How often does it happen that our pen betrays our thoughts? We intend to put down a figure, or a man's name; and sometimes for want of attention, or even by too much attention to other things, we write another? And therefore I make no doubt, that besides my omissions, which are many, I have committed many faults. I shall think myself obliged to those, who will be so kind as to rectify me: and had I not relied upon the good advices of intelligent and equitable readers, I should have kept this work many years in my closet, according to the advice of the ancients (26), in order to correct it, and render it less unworthy of the public view: but considering I had materials left for two other large volumes, I hastened the publication of it. I easily understood that I should be more usefully and seasonably assisted, when the public should know what I want, and wherein I am wanting. I hope that with those helps the continuation of this work will be more perfect than otherwise it would have been. I shall immediately go about it whilst age will permit me (27). I see nothing wherein I can better and more pleasantly employ the leisure I am blest with, a leisure which seems to me preferable to all things (28), and which has always been earnestly wished for by the true lovers of study and learning; for how many men impatiently long for the time, in which they may say,

Me jam fata meis patiuntur ducere vitam
Auspicis, & sponte mea componere curas (29)?

*At last kind fate has such indulgence shown,
That now my life and labours are my own.*

Besides I think I may reasonably say, that what I am going upon will be more considerable, by the nature itself of the materials, than what I offer at present. Chance and surprize had a greater share in it than a deliberate choice: the thing is this. I put off as long as I could the composition of the articles that seemed the most curious and of the greatest importance. I daily hoped for more materials, and new helps, and in the mean time I was preparing other things; whereby it happened on one hand, that the articles I composed took up a great deal of room; and on the other, that the materials for those I had put off were hugely multiplied. I could not therefore insert them in these two volumes, without prodigiously spoiling the proportion that is to be observed betwixt the letters of the alphabet. This obliged me to keep them till another time; for I cannot prevail with myself to say but little upon a large subject, when I can say a great deal. Therefore I rather chuse to be silent altogether, than to enter upon it. The proportion I have observed betwixt the letters of the alphabet, has been the reason of my referring some articles from one letter to another. The preference was therefore to be given to the articles I had promised; which was the reason why the letter for which they were designed had it's complete

(25) This ought to be understood of what I advance of my own; and of the great care I have taken faithfully to relate what I think to be the true sense of the authors quoted by me.

(26) Nonumq; prematur in annum. Horat. de arte poet. Keep it long by you and improve it still. CREECH.

(27) Dum superest Lachesi quod torqueat, & pedibus me Porto meis nullo dextram subeunte bacillo, Juven. sat. 3. ver. 27. While I walk upright, and old age is green, And Lachesis has somewhat left to spin. DRYDEN.

(28) Nec otia divitiis Arabum liberima muto. Horat. Epist. 7. lib. 1. Nor would I sell my freedom and my ease, For rich Arabia or the richer seas. CREECH.

(29) See Virg. Æneid. lib. 4. ver. 340.

pleat extent, before those could be made ready, which were to be very long. I wish my Readers may call this to mind, if at any time they should wonder not to find an account of certain persons in this work.

Here I ought to declare what course I have taken, with respect to Moreri's Dictionary. I. There are many subjects that I have passed over in silence, because they are treated at large in his Dictionary. II. When I have given the same articles, I have been determined to it, either because he was short in his account, or because having by me the lives of some eminent persons, I was able to give a compleat narrative, or because out of many separate and curious things, I could make a pretty large Supplement. In each of these three cases, I have industriously avoided the facts he has mentioned: but it was impossible to do it so absolutely in the second, as in the other two; for in abridging an exact narrative of the life of a great man, it is necessary to give a series of his actions in order, and to make articles well connected, and in some sort all of a-piece. Was it possible to do so, if I had absolutely omitted every thing that has been already said of that person? Therefore in a very few articles of this kind, it will be possible to aver that Moreri's Dictionary had related something, that will be found intermixed with many new facts that I relate. But as this seldom happens, and that in inconsiderable points, I needed not have made this observation; and I only do it through a strong habit of avoiding universal propositions, and having a regard in some cases to the smallest exceptions: besides, there are some occasions in which a man can't be too cautious to prevent cavils. III. If I advance any fact that I have only from Moreri's compilation, I very carefully cite it. I mistrust it very much; and therefore I am resolved to run no risk upon such a security; I abandon it to the critics, it must answer for itself. IV. When I don't cite that writer, and yet I relate any thing that is to be found in his work, 'tis a certain proof I have it from another author. I could swear I have not stolen a word or a syllable from him: I quote him as often as I take the least word from him, which very seldom happens; and I never omit citing him, but when I have discovered the things by as painful searches as if he had never mentioned them. V. I refer the reader to him for facts that are in the least considerable. It would be an absurd thing to make references for the day of a birth, the name of a native place, &c. for such references would take up more room in a page than the things referred to, and would justly disgust the readers. VI. I have not pitched upon this method for fear of being accounted a plagiarist. This had been a pannic and a very ridiculous fear; for no one has hitherto carried his extravagance so far, as to accuse of plagiarism such as relate events that another has related, whilst they derive them from the fountain-head, and use neither the turn, nor the order, nor the expressions of another; nor is it likely that it should come into any one's head for the future, to give so absurd a definition of plagiarism; for it would lead us to this utmost point of impertinence, viz. that the most excellent historian, who should undertake to write the life of Charles V, would necessarily be the plagiarist of the most wretched chronicler, that collected rhapsodies upon the actions of this great prince. VII. I have put by themselves, in a Remark, the errors I have imputed to Moreri. VIII. I have not touch'd upon those that are found in the articles given by him, and not by me, though they are not less considerable, nor less frequent in these articles than in those I have given. IX. I have followed the edition of Lyons 1688, which is the fifth and last that was printed in France. I am not ignorant that the Dutch editions are much better;

V.
W H A T course I have taken with respect to Mo-reris Dictionary.

but I thought it necessary to proportion my corrections to that, for the sake of a great many people, who only make use of the editions printed in France, and who still seek and purchase them preferably to the sixth and seventh (30).

(30) These are violent Papists, who have been told that Moreri's zeal has often been check'd in the Dutch editions.

From all this it results, that my Dictionary is not designed to lessen the sale of the other; on the contrary it will increase it, and make the reading of it more useful.

For the sake of youth, who want to have their judgment formed, and to be made sensible of the most scrupulous exactness, I have taken notice of the least faults of Moreri in the subjects we both handle: as for the mistakes that are in other places, I don't meddle with them, as I have said before. I don't desire that the contempt this may create for his labour, should lessen the acknowledgment that is due to him. I am of Horace's opinion with respect to those who shew us the way (31): the first writers of Dictionaries have committed many faults, but they have done great services, and deserve a glory, of which they ought not to be deprived by their successors. Moreri took great pains, his performance has been of some use to every body, and afforded sufficient instructions to a great many. It has brought light into several places, where other books would never have done it, and where an exact knowledge of circumstances is not necessary. It continues to disperse it into all parts, and with greater purity since the two Dutch editions. They are infinitely better than those of France; for they have been revised by one of the ablest authors of our age: I mean M. LE CLERC, whose profound learning, supported with a just and penetrating wit, and an exquisite judgment, is admired by all Europe. He has corrected a vast number of faults and has made excellent additions; and no body could be better qualified to perfect this great work, if nobler and more important occupations would allow him to undertake that task. I can't bear the unjust caprices of those who complain of the frequent editions of Moreri, and look upon the Book-sellers that undertake them as public poisoners.

(31) Hoc erat, experto frustra Varrone Atacino, Atque quibuscum aliis, melius quod scribere possem, Inventore minor: neque ego illi detraxere ausim Hærentem capiti multa cum laude coronam. Horat. sat. 10. lib. 1. ver. 46.

In satyrs I which Varro try'd in vain. And others too may have a bappy strain, Yet then Lucilius left I freely own, I would not strive to blast his just renown. He wears and best deserves to wear the crown. CREECH. VI.

WHY the Author has prefixed his name to this work.

Those, who shall see my name in the title-page of this book, and who know that during the time it was printing, I said on all occasions I would not prefix it, deserve I should say something about it in this Preface. I have not only said this on an hundred occasions, but I have writ the same to several persons; and many people know that all my friends have strongly opposed my resolution, and that the innumerable arguments, which the fruitfulness of their genius, and their generous goodness suggested to them, could gain nothing upon me. I don't blame those who put their names to their works, but I have ever had a secret antipathy against it. There is no reason to be given of antipathies any more than of tastes; and yet I might say that reflection has confirmed this natural disposition. That wise indifference, so much celebrated by the ancient philosophy, has always pleased me. That illustrious man, who laboured more to be a good man than to be thought so (32), who was always concerned how to practise virtue, but never to be praised for it, seemed to me long ago an excellent model; and never any censure appeared more judicious to me, than that which was passed upon some Philosophers who put their names to those pieces in which they condemned the desire of praise (33). In effect, why do you blame those that run after reputation, if you proclaim to the publick that you don't condemn such a weakness? Pursuant to these notions, nothing seemed to me more noble than to shew in all the services that are done to the public, the same disinterestedness that the Gospel prescribes in works of charity. These were the maxims that moved me to suppress my name at the beginning of my Dictionary.

(32) Vir bonus esse quam videri malebat. He rather chose to be good than to be thought so.

See the remark [H] in the article AMPHARAUS and the remark [L] in the article CÆSAR.

(33) Cicero relates the thing, but is none of those who blame it. Ipse illi philosophi etiam in illis libellis quos de contemnenda gloria scribunt, nomen suum interibunt; in eo ipso in quo prædicationem nobilitatemque despiciunt, prædicari de se ac nominari volunt. Even these philosophers have put their names to the books which they wrote concerning the contempt of glory; and desire applause and fame by the very books wherein they pretend to despise both. Cicero pro Archia poëta fol. m. 164. D. See also Cicero. Tuscul. quæst. lib. 1. fol. 247. D. & Valerius Maximus. lib. 8. cap. 14. n. 3. in ext.

But

But I shall not be believed by Detracters; they will think that my scruples were grounded upon the little honour that is to be got by appearing at the head of a large compilation, which they will call A common store of Collections, a Rhapsody of a Transcriber, &c. Of all the employments, will they say, that can be had in the Common-wealth of Learning, there is none so contemptible as that of compilers: they are the drudges of great men. Indeed they are not useless: "Such people, said Scaliger (34), are the drudges of learned men, they bring us all our materials; it is a great help to us, such men are necessary". But are not the vilest professions necessary? and does their usefulness retrieve them from their sordidness? There is therefore more vanity than modesty, in declining the reputation of a drudging author, and endeavouring to get out of the class of those writers, whose productions are not so much the work of their minds, as the work of their bodies, and who carry their brains upon their shoulders. The detracters may believe what they please, there is no reasoning against them; and therefore I shall only say it is not through inconstancy, but in obedience to the supreme authority, that I have done what I have so often said I would not do. It was thought necessary, to compose the difference of some Booksellers, that I should name myself. Without this the Sieur Reinier Leers could not have obtained the licence which he thought he had an indispensable occasion for: I therefore pay a blind obedience; and for that reason should not fear even the rigorous tribunal of Cato the Cenfor himself (25).

I have few words to add concerning my Errata, and two or three other small matters.

I comprehend under the word Errata my Additions and Corrections. If it was compleat it would contain more pages than it does. I do not lay them all to the Printer's charge, how much soever they exercise our patience, especially when they do not correct all that has been marked in the margin of the proofs. I have had experience of that fatality which attends the trade, and I forget it as much as I am able, animus meminisse horret. I however take part of the blame myself, but I beg of those who shall criticize me, to look carefully over my Errata. I beg of them also, when they shall find any thing that is wrong, to see whether it be not in the authors quoted by me; for if my translations be not literal, they are at least faithful as to the sense: they must therefore contain an irregularity, when my authors have spoken or thought confusedly.

If any think they have been groundlessly criticized in this Dictionary, and if they publish any piece in their justification, wherein they shall use the right of reprisals, I presume they will not take it amiss, that instead of interrupting my work, to answer them, I take the resolution of referring all this to the continuation of this Dictionary. I shall ingenuously confess my errors, and retract them without having recourse to cavilling, as is the common practice. I am sometimes more positive than I should be: but at the bottom I then only propose doubts; and if I speak in another strain, it is that I may the better excite the learned to afford me their instructions, and concur more zealously in the illustration of things.

I have almost every where followed the orthography of the learned; but I have placed the letter y in the Articles as if it was i. This has not been done in the Index, but I perceived it too late.

(34) In Scaligeranis, voc du Maine, p. m. 148.

(25) Ποσειδωνος Ἀλκιονος, ἰσορίαν ἑλάνησι γυδαίαν, καὶ συγγράμην αὐτομένων, ἐπισκώσαν, εἰπὼν δὲ ὅτι οὗτοι εἶναι τὴν συγγράμην ἐς τῶν Ἀμφοίονων ἱερῶν ἀφιστάμενων ἀνακασθεὶς ὑπέμεινε τὸ ἔργον. Plut. in Catoe Majore. p. 343. B. He laughed at Posthumius Albinus, who wrote Histories in Greek, and desired his Readers to excuse his inaccuracies; saying, that he ought to be excused if he had been obliged to write in Greek by a decree of the Amphibolyons.

ADVERTISEMENT

CONCERNING THE

Second French Edition.

(1) In the preface of the first edition.

THE first thing I am to acquaint the Readers with, is, that most of the remarks they have seen above (1), suit with, and ought to be applied to this second edition.

I acquaint them in the second place, that I have been very sorry that a great many concurring circumstances, with which it would be to no purpose to acquaint them, have put me under a necessity of joining to what had already been published, the new articles I was preparing. I knew that this might offend those who have bought the first edition; but at last I hoped they would be so good as to accept of my excuses.

They had no reason to imagine that the second edition should be no ways preferable to the first; for they must needs believe that I would correct all the errors which I could observe, and that the additions and corrections which were at the end of each volume would be inserted in their proper places. That alone must give the preference to the second edition, and displease those who had bought the other. It was therefore impossible not to disoblige them in some degree. The question then in that respect was only concerning doing so more or less; but on the other hand we were to give an intire satisfaction to those who had not as yet purchased the book, but wanted to have it. They would have been very discontented if I had divided my work into two alphabets. One might probably presume that the number of the latter was greater than that of those who had already purchased the first edition. Long experience has taught us that alphabetic works of this sort are frequently reprinted, even when they are very defective. We were therefore reduced to this alternative, either not altogether to please a certain number of people, or to give intire satisfaction to a much greater number: reason then required that we should chuse the last.

There was a middle way we might have taken: to wit, to print the additions apart, and likewise to insert them in the second edition. They who had not as yet bought it, would by this means have had the whole work under one alphabet; and they who had purchased it before, would have only been obliged to procure the additions, and would have found the inconvenience of two alphabets more tolerable than paying twice for the same thing. I should have made choice of this expedient, if I had thought the additions would have been so large as they have proved; but when this second edition was begun, I fancied they could not amount to more than a very few sheets, and that it would not be worth the while to print them by themselves. It proved quite otherwise during the course of the impression; but the opportunity of taking that middle way was lost, before we had reason to think that the additions would be sufficient to fill a volume. More care shall be taken of this, if this second edition should be followed by any more; for in that case we shall take our measures, so that every one may have it in his power to buy separately what shall be added.

If this excuse is not sufficient I will give another. The public ought to be so accustomed to frequent editions of Dictionaries, corrected and enlarged in every impression, that it would be unreasonable to take it amiss that I have followed a custom authorized by so many examples. I might produce a great many, but I content myself with alledging Moreri's Dictionary, which has passed thro' nine editions in the space of twenty five years, always with new additions and corrections. The ninth will doubtless be followed by many more, on the same footing, both in France (2) and in Holland. I should not desire to be pardoned if I was guilty of so many relapses; but methinks the public ought to think me sufficiently justified this first time, especially since I have no design of doing so any more.

Let us say something concerning this second edition. It is not twice as large as the first, but it does not want much of it; and if it be not exempt from the faults of the first as much as it should be, and as much as I desired, it is however less faulty. As I was revising the first edition, I have found many mistakes that proceeded from the negligence of the Printers. They have been rectified, as also many others, most of which were occasioned by the authors quoted by me, whom I could not rectify, because I had not by me the books necessary for it. There are some faults which I should not have mended, had I not been informed of them; they will be easily discerned, for I have carefully mentioned the authors of the advices, illustrations, or supplements, that have been communicated to me (3). After all, I am not without great fears that there are more faults remaining than I have removed; 'tis the fate of Dictionaries to arrive slowly and by degree at perfection. Abundance of things are wanting to them when they first come out, which time gives them by slow degrees. Be it how it will, I have been so dissatisfied with my first edition, in bringing it to the test of examination, that I disown and disclaim it (4), and will be answerable only for the things I have caused to be reprinted out of it: I expect from the readers equity, that if they will reprove me, they will take care to observe whether the passage they think faulty is to be found in the second edition. I likewise earnestly desire them to examine whether the passage found fault with, be not corrected in the Errata, or in the Additions placed at the end of these three volumes.

There are some corrections that I have made, as it were ex officio, and in consequence of an engagement of which the public was informed (5). I have done it with all imaginable care, and with the strongest intention to satisfy the discontented. To this purpose I have struck out of the article of DAVID every thing that could give offence. This is the greatest suppression that has been necessary: the others are not considerable, either for their number, nor their length. We have been able to amend all the rest at the expence of some few words, or few lines; and chiefly by means of four Explanations which are at the end of this work.

I shall say but little of the Additions, not being willing to prepossess any body: let every one judge of them as they see cause. But I will not dissimble, that the trouble they have given me has not permitted me to cor-

(2) The Literary news from Paris acquaint us that Mr Vautier is employed in a new edition of Moreri's and not only designs to augment and correct it, but also to new mould it. He is very capable of succeeding in it. It was he who gave the edition of Paris 1699.

(3) Either in general, or by naming the persons, or placing asterisks or points instead of their names, when I knew or thought they would not be named. There are few exceptions to this.

(4) This ought particularly to be understood of the copies that were reprinted, the proofs whereof I did not revise. The Printers have committed great mistakes in those copies.

(5) In a Letter concerning what passed in the Consistory of the Walloon church of Rotterdam, in relation to the Critical Dictionary. That Letter is inserted in the Life of Mr Bayle, under the year 1698.

rect the articles of the first edition with all the severity and diligence I designed. It is very difficult for an author, whilst the press goes on without any interruption, to do these three things; to revise two large volumes in folio, to enlarge them above one third part, and to correct the proofs.

Some Additions require that many places should be mended and new moulded, to prevent contradicting one's self, and writing nonsense. To correct a Dictionary well, a man should never enlarge it; for it is with these works, as it is with towns and fruits. A town seldom receives a just symmetry and proportion, whilst greater care is taken to enlarge it, than to repair the old houses. Such an increase serves rather to shew it's disproportions, and irregularities, than to remove them. And as for fruits, it is well known they never ripen, 'till they cease to receive new juices. Such is the common fate of compilations. When they are reprinted, a greater care is taken to add new things, than to put the old ones in a better condition. An author is weary of the old ones he has read so often, and finds in the others the charms of novelty, which take up all his attention. This produces an ill effect; most of the old faults remain, and new ones are added to them.

Having been advised by several people not to suffer the Project or plan which I published in the year 1692, before some essays of this Dictionary, to be lost; I have reprinted it at the end of the dissertations which are in the last volume.

There are certain things of which I have said in sundry places, that I did acquaint my Readers with them once for all. It may happen that they will never light upon these passages, books of this kind not being usually read through, from the beginning to the end: I have therefore been advised to mark here the places where I give any general advertisements. For this purpose I believe it will be sufficient to refer to the following articles: ANAXAGORAS, in the text at the end; ARISTANDER, Remark [B]; BEME; CAMDEN, Remark [D]; CARNEADES, Remark [B]; GOMARUS, Remark [B]; GOURNAI, Remark [D]; HAILLAN; MAHOMET II; PRIOLO.

OBSERVATIONS
concerning the Index.

(6) Which I have done as often as I could, and always when I had a sufficient number of books.

Several people have desired me to place good Indexes at the end of the work. I agree that there are but few books where they are more necessary than in this. I had laid down pretty good plans, and perhaps I might say that there are few people more proper to execute them, than such as have laboured a long while in making vast compilations; for if they have been at the pains to verify the passages (6), they must have been obliged to turn to the indexes every moment; they have been disappointed there a thousand and a thousand times: they have thereby found their defects, and learned what is necessary in order to shun them. Possibly therefore I could have composed a good index; but I neither had the time, nor the patience, which so tedious and tiresome a task requires. Nay, I did not think it proper that the person, who was employed to make one, and who would have been able to have executed very exactly any plan that could have been laid down to him, should engage himself in the detail which some readers desired. They would have a particular index of authors cited, censured, or corrected, and so of an hundred things besides. I considered that such indexes would be so long, that they would disgust many people. I know by my own experience, and by that of many others, that articles of an index, filled with half pages of cyphers, are hardly of service to any body; for where are the people, who in order to find out one passage, will give themselves the trouble to consult twenty? in an index of SALMASIUS's (7), the article of PLINY contains above three columns of cyphers, that of STRABO two, and that of THEOPHRASTUS near three. Of what use can this be to a reader? will he be stupid enough to employ a whole day to try his chance in this incredible quantity of pages quoted? the way to remedy this, would be to take notice that Pliny is quoted for such and such a thing, but if you do not make a new alphabetical distribution, the sight of two or three pages, filled only with one name, will disgust every body. Now this alphabetical distribution, of what concerns each author that has been quoted, is a task for a gally-slave. Besides, do we not know that there are hardly four readers among an hundred, who mind whether the index is good or not? most people never look into it: we should therefore undertake a most fatiguing task, which would be of use only to very few. It is for these and many other reasons, that I thought it would be sufficient to give the index, which you will find at the end of this work, and to add only another index, which contains nothing but a list of the articles. Be pleased to observe, that the index doth not contain the names of all the authors which I have quoted; and when they are contained in it, all the passages where they are quoted, are not set down. People will therefore deceive themselves if they reason thus, a certain author does not appear in the index, or appears but thrice, therefore he has not been quoted, or he has been quoted only three times.

The chief reason which made me resolve not to execute all the plans of indexes which I had conceived, was, that I thought a word of advice would supply all defects. Let the few readers who make use of that part of a book, only observe what follows.

When they meet with any thing worth remembering, they need only see whether it be in the table; and if it be not, it is but marking it themselves in the margin of the table, under the word which they think most convenient, or on a paper by itself. It is the method that is taken by those who find the tables of books defective, and design to prevent the damage they might receive by them.

Having received too late the memoirs for the article of the town of ETAMPES, and for those of FEVRET, and the house MINUTOLI, which has afforded Cardinals, and many illustrious persons of all ranks, I could not make use of them. I have also received too late an article ready made, and very well drawn up, viz. that of RALPH Archbishop of Bourges, son of Ralph, Count and Lord of Turenne.

It would not have been proper, methinks, to place all these articles in the Addenda, which are at the end of each volume (8). Very few people read these sorts of Addenda, and no body approves that they should fill many pages. I am so much persuaded that they are but little consulted, that I here once more beg of my readers not to condemn me upon any account, before they have examined my Addenda, where many things are corrected. I desire them likewise, particularly to consult there the additions to the articles BRUN (9), and BUDÆUS, in which I mention the ancient nobility of these two families; the addition to the article FONTEVRAUD, and to the article LEO X (10), and the article VERSORIS, which I give entire in the Addenda to the last volume (11).

I have nothing to say to those, who complain that my work does not afford them a sufficient number of things that suit with their taste. It is the unavoidable fate of miscellaneous writings. Each reader finds in them too much of one thing, and too little of another. Those who love genealogies

(7) Salmasius in the Index of authors quoted in his Exercitationes Pliniane.

(8) These four articles have been inserted in their proper places in this new edition.

(9) The Plenipotentiary of Spain at the peace of Munster.

(10) I give there two Letters of this Pope, which were never printed, and are very curious.

(11) All these Additions have been inserted in their proper places in this edition.

(12) Compare what is said in the remark [F] of the article PO-QUELIN.

(13) Unde Seneca: non est, quod mireris, ex eadem materia suis quemque studiis apta colligere. In eodem prato bos herbam querit, canis leporem, ciconia lacertum.

Cum Cicero- nis libros de republica prehendit hinc philologus aliquis, hinc grammaticus, hinc philosophiæ deditus, alius alio suam curam mittit. Et Plinius cum dixisset multos esse, quos ea quibus nos capimur & ducimur, partim ut inepta, partim ut molestissima offendant: Drusus, inquit, alienis oblectationibus veniam ut nostris impetremus. Scioppius, E- lem. Philof. Stoicæ morali- cap. 152. fol. 147. Therefore Seneca says: You need not wonder that every man from the same matter chooses what most suits his own studies. In the same meadow the ox seeks for grass, the dog for a bone, and the hawk for a lizard. When a philologist, a grammarian, and a philosopher, take up each of them Cicero's Treatise on government, they all apply their attention different ways. And Pliny, after observing that many people look upon those things with which we are delighted, either as trifling or disagreeable, says, Let us excuse nealogies do not find enough of them: those who do not love them think there are too many. Those who delight in Philosophical reasonings, would have more of them; and those who do not like them, would not have so many. Some with I had not given the articles of so many Ministers; others wonder I have omitted so many. I desire them all to call to mind this saying of Pliny, "Let us forgive others their inclinations, that they may forgive ours (12)." I shall quote upon this, a fine Passage of Scioppius (13).

If I have spoken of one family, rather than of another equally or more considerable, it was without any respect of persons; the only reason of it was, that I had materials for some and not for others.

A particular answer is due to those who have found fault with me for speaking so little of great warriors: two things made me so barren in this respect; one is, as I have sufficiently said (14), that I have avoided falling in with the subjects of other Dictionaries, both as to the present and future editions. Most of the ancient and modern Generals of armies are to be found in Moreri; especially the Constables, Admirals, and Marshals of France, &c. These articles cost only the pains of transcribing Father Anselme. I was persuaded, that all the famous northern and German warriors, would appear at large in Mr Chappuzeau's Dictionary. I did not therefore think it necessary to turn my thoughts that way. But I had still a stronger reason, which was this: I did not find myself in a capacity to give the articles of great captains, such as I should have desired. Father Anselme's performance is a good and useful work, and required an incredible patience and very labourious enquiries, but it cannot satisfy the reader's curiosity. It is next to nothing to know that in such a year a general took or relieved a town, or won a battle, &c. The reader is besides willing to know what was his character; whether he excelled in courage, as Marcellus, or in prudence as Fabius Cunctator; whether he was better qualified to conquer, than to preserve his conquests; whether his fiery and quick temper dazzled him in a battle, or whether he remained sedate in the greatest danger; by what wise and happy expedient he gained a battle that was almost lost; by what fault he was overcome on such an occasion. The readers are also willing to know, whether in reality he got the victory, as the writers of his party affirm, or whether he lost it, as the Writers of the other side maintain. These disputes are innumerable (15). I should think myself obliged to discuss them, and to compare the relations of both sides, that by establishing as a principle, the facts in which they agree, whether in relation to the battle or to its consequences, we might there, by way of induction, arrive at some sort of certainty.

For example, if I spoke of the Marschal de Luxembourg, I would observe the character that distinguished him from other generals, and be particular upon the occasions in which he discovered what he excelled in, and in what his talents was but indifferent. I would avoid the mistakes and omissions which I find about him in Moreri's Dictionary. I would not say that he "defeated the armies of Holland near Bodegrave, in 1672," that he took Bodegrave (16) in 1673, that he raised the Siege of Charleroi in 1674. For the first of these three facts (17) is an inexcusable hyperbole, and the two others are wholly chimerical. I would not say, that in 1673 "he made his way through the enemy's army of seventy thousand men, though he had but twenty thousand:" it is an hyperbole that would not be excused in a poet. I would not say, that in 1678 other people's inclinations, that we may obtain excuse for our own.

(14) In the preface to the first edition.

(15) The original cause of it is frequently this: That for political reasons they use the name of Victory in the first relations of a battle, that are sold about the streets. This appellation takes root, tho' it should be only a transient one: it is like a Christian name, which remains to the last.

(16) Note, that Bodegrave is but a village.

(17) See the article BODEGRAVE.

" he beat the Dutch army at St Denys, near Mons ; but I would examine the question who won the battle. I would not say, that in 1692 " he took " the enemy's cannon and baggage, &c. at Steinkerke ;" it being a fact manifestly confuted by the very relation he gave of this battle, and which was immediately printed in France. I would not omit the rebellion he peristed in from the year 1649, to the Pyrenean treaty. I would not omit his campaign of Philipsburg (18), under pretence that he was mortified upon that account. I would not omit his imprisonment in the Bastille, and would endeavour to dive into the secrecy of the proceedings of the Chamber of the Arsenal against him. This is the more requisite for the honour of his memory, because there went strange and very ridiculous reports concerning his process. I would examine what so many people imagine, though perhaps without much reason, that he would have done greater services to France in his last campaigns, if he had not preferred his particular interest of keeping up the war to the public good, or if his orders had not been too limited. Those men pretend that he headed the army, just as the Pope's legates headed the Council of Trent ; that is, he was to wait every post for a new inspiration. Lastly, I would endeavour to find a true medium as to his morals, betwixt his funeral oration, and some pieces that have been printed (19).

Every body will be sensible, that since I am not in a capacity of filling up a plan of this nature, I am very excusable for not touching upon such articles.

I forgot to mention, in the preface of the first edition, one of the reasons why I quote long Latin passages ; which is, that many persons who read my book are but little acquainted with French, but they are well skilled in Latin, and so by the help of the citation they can perfectly understand my meaning.

Such as will give themselves the trouble to cast their eyes upon the margins of this Dictionary, are desired to remember, that the quotations I have marked with a figure, are those which I have found in the authors, whose passages I relate. I am not answerable for them.

(19) I do not mean all; for most of them are so silly and impertinent satires, and so plainly calumnious, that they ought not to be credited.

The 7th of December, 1701.

T H E
L I F E
O F
M^R B A Y L E.

B Y
Mr DES MAIZEAUX,
Fellow of the Royal Society.

A Letter from Mr DES MAIZEAUX to Mr DE LA MOTTE ; who engaged him to write the Life of Mr BAYLE, which was prefixed to the last edition of his Dictionary, printed at Amsterdam in the year 1730.

S I R,

LONDON, Dec. 13, 1729.

I Have at length finished the task you was pleased to prescribe me ; but I am very much afraid that the performance will discover the shortness of the time in which I was obliged to compose it, and that my zeal to obey your commands, has thrown me into a precipitation prejudicial to my desire of doing well. Tho' my materials were ready long ago, that was not enough ; it was necessary to range and reduce them into order, which was no small matter. I am fully persuaded that you are too much my friend, not to be satisfied with my endeavour, and that you will excuse the defects of this piece, on account of my eagerness to gratify your desire. But tho' a friend regards principally the good intention, the public considers only the performance. It is impossible but being so hurried, I must have sometimes too much contracted what ought to have been enlarged, and too much enlarged what ought to have been contracted. The stile likewise is very incorrect, and I do not even know but I have been guilty of some inconsistencies: for having sent you the sheets as fast as I composed them, I have not as yet seen the work entire, and consequently could not compare the several parts together. I could wish the public were apprized of this, which might incline the reader to excuse my faults: and since you are the occasion of the evil, you are in some sort obliged to apply the remedy. Be so good, therefore, as to join to it a short Advertisement, which may serve as an apology for me. But above all things, do not forget to take notice, that when you engaged me to write these Memoirs, the impression of the Dictionary was finished, and they had actually begun to print the Index.

But after having shown my performance in it's worst light, you may likewise set it off by showing it's fair side. However defective the form may be, you may, Sir, speak with assurance of the matter, since that is none of mine. I had very good materials to go upon. After the death of Mr BAYLE, the Earl of SHAFTSBURY, his friend, desired me to communicate to him all that I could gather concerning his life and writings. I addressed myself immediately to Mr BASNAGE, who furnished me with a great many particulars, which I inserted in the account my Lord SHAFTSBURY had desired of me, a very imperfect English translation of which was published in 1708. Mr BAÿZE acquainted me also with several circumstances relating to Mr BAYLE's youth. He was his relation. I might likewise name Mr DE LA RIVIERE, Mr ABBADIE, Mr HUET, &c. Mr BAYLE's Letters, which I have published, were of infinite service to me. Lastly, I had a sure guide to fix the dates of his journeys, of his studies, of the composition and impression of his works, and of the different circumstances he was in during the first forty years of his life. This guide is Mr BAYLE himself, who has left us an historical and chronological journal of his life, under the title of Calendarium Carlananum. For this journal I am obliged to Mr MARAIS, Advocate in the Parliament of Paris, who was pleased to send along with it such illustrations as I wanted. I am also indebted to him, for the Letters which relate to the Queen of Sweden, and for some other important pieces which you will find in this work.

I have joined to Mr BAYLE's Life three small pieces, which will serve for vouchers, and may be placed at the end by way of appendix. The first is the Calendarium Carlananum; the translation of it explains what is either expressed very briefly, or by abbreviations in the original. The second is the Ordonnance of Mr DE LA REYNIE, Lieutenant-General of the Police, at Paris, containing a condemnation of the Critique Generale de l'Histoire du Calvinisme de Mr MAIMBOURG; there is something very singular in it. The third contains the Acts of the Consistory of the Walloon Church of Rotterdam, concerning Mr Bayle's Dictionary; in which is to be found, the whole procedure of that consistory, together with Mr BAYLE's declarations: this piece has not as yet been published.

Out of all this, Sir, you may choose what you think proper for your advertisement. I think you cannot avoid naming the persons who have furnished me with memoirs. This is an acknowledgment which is due to them. But I can safely rely upon you in this matter, my interests cannot be in better hands. It therefore only remains, that I beg the continuance of your friendship, and that I assure you of the great devotion with which I shall always be,

S I R,

Your very humble and most obedient servant,

P. DES MAIZEAUX.

T H E L I F E

O F

Mr B A Y L E.

1647.

R (PETER) BAYLE, was born at Carla, a small town in the county of Foix, betwixt Pamiers and Rieux, on the 18th of November 1647. His Father, descended from a good family, originally of Montauban, was named JOHN. He was minister of Carla, and married Jane de Bruguere, whose mother was of the family of Ducasse; so that Messieurs Bayle were related to two families of distinction in the county of Foix, Ducasse, and Chalabre of which that of Bruguere is a branch. He had two brothers; one elder called JACOB, who was colleague to his father, and a younger, named JOSEPH, and surnamed du Peyrat, from an estate belonging to the family.

Mr Bayle discovered from his infancy, a subtle and lively genius, an easy and quick conception, and a very extraordinary memory; and all these were attended with another talent, absolutely necessary to the improvement of these excellent qualities, a strong desire after knowledge and instruction. He would frequently ask questions of his parents, and wait for their answers with the utmost eagerness and attention, and would not be satisfied with such as they gave him, 'till he fully comprehended them, and what he learned in this domestic school he never forgot. His father cultivated these happy dispositions with the utmost care. After having taught him Latin, he made him study the Greek language at the age of twelve years and a half (1), and for some years improved his knowledge of both these languages, by the reading of the best authors. But at last the functions of his ministry taking up a great deal of his Time, and finding his son capable of a greater progress than he could possibly make under him, he took the resolution of sending him to the Academy of Puylaurens. Mr Bayle arrived there in the month of February 1666 (2). He was then in his nineteenth year; but neither the passions which ordinarily have the sway at that age, nor his absence from his parents, could in the least weaken the strong passion he had for letters: he made even the hours that are given to recreation subservient to it; and while the other scholars were engaged in the amusements which are so dear to youth, he used to retire to his chamber, and there devote himself to the pleasures arising from study.

In the month of September following (3), he took the opportunity of the vacation to make a visit to his father. But even this season which is designed for diversion, was to him a time of labour: he applied himself so closely to his studies, that he fell sick; and hardly was he recovered, when giving himself up a-new to this favourite passion, he sickened again, and in this manner by frequent relapses he was detained at Carla, above eighteen months. After this he was sent to Saverdun (4), to the house of Mr Bayze, who had married his aunt Paula de Bruguere. The design of this journey was for the change of air, and to divert him from study, but unluckily he found books there. Mr Rival, minister of Saverdun, had a large collection of them, which was such a temptation to young Bayle, as almost cost him his Life. His continual study threw him into a dangerous fever, which held him a long time, and of which he with great difficulty recovered. As soon as he was in a condition to go abroad, they removed him to a country house of Mr Bayze's, situate upon the banks of the Aurige, which makes the place very agreeable. The remembrance of the happy moments he spent near that river, was the occasion of his consecrating an article to it in his Dictionary (5).

(1) June 29, 1660.

(2) Febr. 12, 1666.

(3) Sept. 9.

(4) May 29, 1668.

(5) See the Article AURIGE.

(6) Sept.
28.
(7) Nov.
5.

When he was perfectly recovered, he returned to Carla (6), and soon after to Puylaurens (7), to prosecute his studies. He resumed them with new vigour, and, together with his academical exercises, he read all sorts of books that came in his way, not even excepting books of controversy: but Plutarch and Montaigne were his favourite authors. The long stay he had made at home with his father, before he went to the academy, and his frequent indispositions afterwards, had so much retarded his studies, that he did not begin his Logic, 'till he was one and twenty. So that it is not without reason, that he complains in one of his books (8), that he begun his studies late.

(8) In a pamphlet intitled, Reflexions sur un imprimé qui a pour titre, Jugement du public sur le Dictionnaire Critique, &c. 19. p. 8. That is, Reflexions on a Pamphlet intitled, The Judgment of the Public, concerning the Critical Dictionary: which see at the end of the last volume.

He redoubled his application to make up the time he had lost; and the progress made at Puylaurens, not being in his apprehension sufficiently quick, he resolved to leave that academy in order to go to Toulouse, one of the most celebrated universities in France. He arrived there in the month of February 1669 (9); and taking lodgings in a private house, attended the philosophical lectures, which were read in the Jesuits college. There was nothing very extraordinary in this. The Protestants often sent their children to study under the Jesuits, though this had been forbidden by the synods. Mr Bayle's stay at Toulouse, however, had very melancholy consequences for his family, here he changed his religion. The books of controversy which he had read at Puylaurens, had already shaken him; and his doubts were increased at Toulouse, by some disputes he had with a priest, who lodged in the same house with him. He thought his opinions were false, because he could not answer all the arguments that were objected to him; and, a month after his arrival at Toulouse, he embraced the Roman Catholic religion (10). He was matriculated, and the next day resumed the study of Logic.

1669.

(9) Febr.
19.

(10) Mar.
19.

(11) Holding the child Jesus in her arms.

The news of his change was in the utmost degree afflicting to all his relations, and particularly to his father, who loved him tenderly. Mr Bertier, bishop of Rieux, rightly judging, that after this step young Bayle had no reason to expect any assistance from his relations, generously took upon himself the charge of his maintenance. Mr Bayle makes a grateful acknowledgment of it in a letter which he wrote in the year 1693, to Mr Pinson, Advocate of the Parliament of Paris [A].

They valued themselves very much at Toulouse upon this acquisition of a young man of so great hopes, and whose merit was heightened by his being son to a minister. When it came to his turn to defend Theses publicly, it was resolved that the solemnity should be performed in a splendid manner. The most distinguished persons, both of the clergy, parliament, and city, assisted there: there had never been seen in that university so august and numerous an audience. The theses were adorned with the picture of the Virgin (11), to whom they were dedicated, and this picture was accompanied with several emblematical figures, representing the conversion of the respondent. The perspicuity, the penetration, and the modesty, with which he answered his opponents, procured him an universal applause.

(12) To the Virgin Mother of God.

Mr Ros de Bruguere, one of his uncles by the mother's side, who was married to a Roman Catholic lady, being at Toulouse when Mr Bayle defended his theses, carried a copy of them to Carla, which Madam Ros de Bruguere hung up as an ornament in her chamber. Mr Bayle's father being come to visit Mr Ros de Bruguere, they acquainted him in what manner his son had distinguished himself in the public disputation, the honours which had been done him, and the applause he had received. The good man heard this with pleasure, and seemed for a moment to have forgot the grief with which his son's change of religion had afflicted him. But Madam Ros de Bruguere having shewed him the theses, as soon as he saw the figure of the Virgin, with these words, VIRGINI DEIPARÆ (12), he was seized with such indignation, that he made an effort to get near it; but was stopped lest he should

(a) This letter was never printed before.

[A] Mr Bayle makes a grateful acknowledgment of it in a letter he wrote to Mr Pinson in 1693. What follows had been published in the MENAGIANA: Mr Bayle is son to a minister. The bishop of Rieux, who had contributed to his conversion, made him study at Toulouse, at his own charges; but after he had finished his studies, he joined himself again to that sect which he had left. These expressions appeared too general to Mr Bayle. He complained of them to Mr Pinson. "The manner, says he (a), in which Mr Menage has spoke concerning me is a little too loose, and apt to give false ideas: every body, from these words, will imagine, that I went through all my studies under the protection, and by the liberality of the bishop of Rieux: the whole of the matter is this. After I had finished the studies of Grammar, Latin, and Rhetoric, partly under my father's care, partly at the academy of Puylaurens; I began to study Philosophy at that academy, and continued to do so only about four or five months. Afterwards I went to Toulouse full of doubts concerning my religion, occasioned by the reading of books of controversy. I chanced to lodge in the same house with a priest, who, by his disputes with me,

"increased them, and at last persuaded me that I professed a false religion. I separated from it, and continued the study of Philosophy in the Jesuits college at Toulouse. The bishop of Rieux, in whose diocese I was born, hearing of my change and the indignation of my family against me, and besides, that I was studious, of blameless morals, and had some measure of genius, honoured me with his protection, and gave me money to pay my board, for I received none from home because of my father's displeasure. Thus I finished my study of Philosophy: that is to say, I staid at Toulouse 18 months, after which the impressions of my education having regained the ascendant, I thought myself obliged to return to the religion in which I was born, and went to Geneva where I prosecuted my studies. I do not say this, as if I were ashamed of the favours of that great prelate, I still retain the remembrance of them with respect, and with the utmost gratitude. But still we are bound, both on our own account and that of the public, to prevent peoples forming false, extravagant, and hyperbolical ideas of things, &c."

1670. have tore it to pieces in the transport of his grief. He left the house with precipitation and shed a flood of tears, protesting that he would never return thither, while so ungrateful an object presented itself to his sight.

In the mean time, the catholics, not content with having gained young Bayle, formed a design of bringing over the whole family; and for this purpose they thought it proper to begin with the elder brother. The bishop of Ricux laid his commands on Mr Bayle to write to him, and at the same time assured him, that if he could only persuade him to come to Toulouse his conversion was sure. Mr Bayle believing sincerely that he had embraced the right side, and bearing a great affection to his brother, wrote him the following Letter (1).

My very dear Brother,

“THE great affection that I have for you, and the passionate desire I have for your happiness, won't permit me to omit any occasion of procuring your welfare. I find myself under a necessity of begging of you, in the most earnest manner, to come and pass a few days in this city, that I may have an opportunity of talking to you of several matters, which are of the utmost importance to you, both with regard to this life, and that which is to come. I persuade myself, that if I had the liberty of discovering to you the state of things as they really are, and the favourable disposition in which they are at present, I should be able to make some impression upon your mind, and make you confess that the supreme wisdom, which governs the world, has laboured in a very particular manner in directing the motion of so many springs; and that as it doth nothing that is not conducive to the advancement of it's own glory and our salvation, it has been pleased, by bringing together so many different things, which all seem to conspire for your advantage, to endeavour the most happy and glorious change, which can possibly be wrought in my father's mind, and in your's.

“You will without doubt say that all these are mysteries which you do not at all understand, that they are riddles to you; but I assure you that if I had but a little conversation with you on this subject, you would easily comprehend my design, and would see as clear as day, what good foundation I had for assuring you, that this disposition which has ordered such a number of things, in which you have a great concern, is so favourable to you, that there is all the reason in the world to hope something supernatural from it.

“I shall not explain myself more clearly upon this subject, because I hope that you will not refuse me the favour I desire of you of coming to see me as soon as possible, and then we shall have an opportunity of talking more at large about it, in the private conversations we shall have together. Come therefore, my dear brother, if it be possible, before the end of this week; come and satisfy the impatience of one who languishes for you, and ardently desires that you would put yourself in a condition of being happy. I assure you that you shall not repent your coming, what I have to say being of such a nature as is proper to satisfy a solid and reasonable mind such as your's.

“And surely I should wrong you, if I believed that you were sick of an incurable distemper, to such a degree too as to approve of nothing but what is agreeable to your own notions. I entertain a better opinion of you, and those who know you make no difficulty of believing, that a person of so good a natural disposition, and of such probity as you profess, may be brought to relish any reasonable opinion, however strange it may appear at first sight, and however strong your prejudices may be to the contrary. Upon this foundation I assure myself, that what I have to say to you will not displease you, nor startle you so far as to make you capable of altogether shutting your ear against whosoever shall desire to talk to you about it.

“If I had addressed myself to a great many people, and begged of them the favour of a hearing which I desire of you, it might indeed happen that they would presently suspect and distrust me, and condemn all I should be able to say to them: but as for you, I believe you are not capable of condemning me without hearing me; and if it was only out of curiosity, methinks you will be desirous to know what this matter may be, and that you will suspend your judgment 'till you know what it is: in which I can observe nothing in your mind but a disposition to do well.

“I should want no more, to give me a foundation for good hopes, than to be assured that you are resolved to form this conclusion, which is founded upon a truth confirmed in the most incontestable manner, by the experience of all ages; to wit, that in matters of religion, all innovations are most pernicious, and that a private person who pretends, by his own authority, to set himself up for a Reformer, can be thought no other than a factious person, a schismatic, a sower of tares, and, in short, a person filled with pride, obstinacy, and envy. And indeed what probability is there, that God should suffer the Christian Church to fall to ruin and desolation, that he should hide his light from it, and deprive it of his illumination; while, in the mean time, he invests a private person, with so extraordinary an abundance of his grace, that he

(1) This Letter is dated the 15th of April 1670. I have the original in my hands. The direction is To Mr Bayle, the son, Minister of Carla, at Carla.

“ shall become the restorer of truth, a light to guide into the right path those who “ go astray; and, in short, the chanel and vehicle, the base and pillar, of true faith;
 “ so that one might say of him, as the poet says of a young prince who seemed to “ be born for the glory of that age, 1670.

*Hunc saltem everso juvenem succurrere saclo
 Ne prohibete (1).*

(1) Virgil.
 Georg. lib.
 i. v. 500,
 501.

“ In truth we must be both rash, imprudent, and blind, to suffer ourselves to be “ persuaded of such chimera's. It is much more agreeable to the order of God's “ providence, and to the care which the Holy Ghost takes of the faithful, in go“ verning the church, by the communication of his divine assistance, which he be“ stows upon the vicegerents of the son of God upon earth, that the church should “ instruct, correct, and reform, private persons, and the abuses which they may have “ suffered to creep into their conduct, and cure them of their errors, rather than “ that private persons should reform the church and set it to rights again. For
 “ as it would be very foolish to maintain, that God, when he intended to preserve “ some persons from the waters of the flood by whom he might restore the human “ race, should drown those who were in the ark of Noah, and at the same time “ should raise up I don't know what person, who had saved himself and his wife “ in some cavern, or who had escaped the fury and inclemency of the waves in “ I don't know what inviolable sanctuaries: so it is as extravagant, and without “ foundation, to pretend that the Holy Spirit, in order to accomplish his design of pre“ serving always a little of the haven of faith from the ravages of infidels and heretics, “ has suffered the church, which is his spouse, to fall into idolatry, superstition, and error,
 “ and has drawn out Luther and Calvin from the obscurity of a cell, or the corner “ of a chapel, to propagate the faith, restore it to it's rights, and raise it up from “ under it's ruins.

“ Indeed one might think, tho' without the least appearance of reason or truth, “ that God would preserve these two men to propagate the gospel, during that “ general corruption which they suppose to have spread over the whole face of the “ church, because they had preserved themselves pure and clean from all those dis“ orders and pretended abominations; as he preserved Lot and Noah, as a reward “ for their not having polluted themselves with the vices of the ages in which they “ lived. But to entertain any such thought, one must be altogether ignorant of things
 “ the most universally known, since it is notorious, that these two great sticklers for “ Reformation were altogether abandoned and immersed in vice (2); not to observe “ that they set out in an extremely criminal manner, that is to say, that they began “ by violating those vows, of which both piety and justice required the strictest ob“ servance (3).

(2) See Mr
 Bayle's
 Critique
 Generale
 de l'Hi-stoire du Calvinisme.
 Lettre
 xi. § 8; and in the Critic.
 Diction.
 the Articles CAL-VIN and LUTHER, where you will find a defence of these two Reformers.

“ These, dear brother, are the reflexions with which I would have you fortified,
 “ when you shall come to this town, for assuredly you will thereby become more apt “ to receive instruction. Besides all this, the precarious and weak condition of your “ whole party, which exists in this kingdom only by toleration, and because the “ King is not in the humour of extirpating you, makes me fear on your account “ every time I think of it. And indeed to subsist only because the fancy of a prince, “ who may do whatever he pleases in this matter, doth not incline him to suspend “ his concurrence by which you are preserved, is it not to be exposed to destruction every “ hour of the day, since there is not one in which the humour of a prince may not “ pass from one extremity to another.

(3) See
 Critique
 Generale,
 &c. Lettre ix.

“ I have therefore great reason to wish, that you would imitate the Pharisees and “ Sadducees who came to John's baptism, of whom he asked who had persuaded them “ to fly from the wrath to come? I hope one day we shall be able, through the “ grace of the Holy Ghost and the blessing of God, to ask you a like question, which “ would be both very agreeable and advantageous for you. For this I pray to the “ sovereign Lord of all things, and would willingly bestow the last drop of my “ blood to procure your salvation. This I say not only on your account in parti“ cular; but likewise on the account of my father, mother, second brother, and all my “ relations: too happy, if, like another Joseph, I could be the instrument of saving “ all my family! Adieu, my dear Brother: reflect on what I have said to you, “ and come as soon as possible, to know what he would say to you who is your “ most humble, most obedient, and most affectionate servant. You will see the ac“ complishment of that which St Paul says, be who seeks after the kingdom of God and “ his righteousness, all other things shall be added unto it (4).”

(4) These words are not of St Paul, but of JESUS CHRIST; Gospel of St Mat. b.
 Chap. vi.
 ver. 33.

This letter made no great impression upon Mr Bayle's elder brother, with regard to religion. He was equally insensible to the flattering hopes it gave him, and to the common-places of controversy it opposed to him: but he was very much alarmed by some expressions, which made him fear least his brother, together with the Roman Catholic religion, had imbibed that sournels of spirit, with which it inspires it's devotees. His father, more indulgent, attributed them to some busy priest who had dictated

1670. dictated the letter. He said that he saw nothing of his son in it, and that he hoped to see him very soon return into the good way.

Mr Naudis de Bruguere, his cousin-german, a young gentleman of a great deal of wit and penetration, was at this time at Toulouse. He lodged in the same house with Mr Bayle. They disputed frequently about religion; and after warmly pushing the arguments of each side, they used to examine them coolly over again. Mr Naudis was well acquainted with his religion: the strict friendship that was betwixt them banished all bitterness from their debates, and rendered them more free and more impartial. These familiar disputes, which seemed to be entirely accidental, frequently embarrassed Mr Bayle, and made him suspect several opinions of the church of Rome, in so much that he sometimes inwardly condemned himself for having embraced them without being sufficiently acquainted with them. For he looked upon examination in matters of religion, to be an indispensable duty, being the only means to assure one's self of the truth, and consequently of knowing the will of God, and of putting one's self in a condition of following it. He was the more confirmed in these sentiments by observing, that whatever submission the church of Rome exacts, it was notwithstanding by the way of examination, that they thought fit to bring about his conversion.

About the same time Mr de Pradals de Larbon came to Toulouse. He was one of those men, who by their wit, gaiety, and manners, at first sight gain the affection of all who see them. Accordingly he was very much caressed by persons of the greatest distinction in that province. Mr Bayle, the father, had desired him to visit his son as oft as he went to Toulouse: he hoped that Mr Pradals would very soon gain the confidence of the young Bayle; and in fact he succeeded so well, that Mr Bayle one day confessed to him, that he believed he had been a little too hasty in the new party he had chosen, and that now he found several doctrines in the Romish religion, which appeared to him contrary both to reason and scripture. Mr de Pradals, charmed with this confession, presently communicated it to Mr Bayle's family, to their inexpressible satisfaction. They presently resolved to send his elder brother to him, and begged of Mr de Pradals to manage their interview. Mr Bayle's eldest brother being gone to Toulouse with Mr de Pradals, the latter invited young Bayle to dine with him, as it was his custom to do. After some discourse, when the servants had retired, Mr Bayle the elder, who was in a closet, came out and shewed himself to his brother. All that joy, grief, and surprise have most strong at once seized the young Bayle, so that he was not able to utter a word, he threw himself at his feet, and burst out into tears. Mr Bayle, the elder, could not restrain his, and raising him up he spoke to him in so tender a manner, that the young Bayle discovered the bottom of his heart to him, by telling him how impatient he was to leave Toulouse, and renounce the errors which had seduced him. In the mean time, as his escape would certainly incense, the bishop of Rieux and the Jesuits, they thought it necessary to take some precautions, which delayed Mr Bayle's departure for some days. It was in the month of August 1670, that he put this design in execution.

He departed secretly from Toulouse (1), where he had staid eighteen months, and retired to Mazeres in the Lauragais, to a country house of Mr du Vivie, six leagues from Toulouse, and three from Carla. His elder brother came there the day after, with certain ministers of the neighbourhood; and the next day (2), Mr Rival, Minister of Saverdun, received his abjuration in presence of his elder brother, of Mr Guillemat Minister of Mazeres, and of Mr Rival Minister of Calmont and nephew to the minister of Saverdun. The very same day they made him set out for Geneva [B].

[B] Mr Bayle has himself given us the history of his change of religion, and of his return to the protestant church.

"The truth of the matter is (a), that Mr Bayle, while he studied philosophy in the Academy at Puylaurens, did not confine himself so closely to what was dictated by his professor, as not likewise to read some books of controversy, not with the disposition with which most people do so, I mean to confirm himself in his preconceived notions, but to examine agreeably to the great Protestant principle, whether the doctrine he had been taught from his infancy was true or false: which requires that we should hear both parties. Upon this account he was curious to see the arguments of the Roman Catholics in their own writings. He found so specious arguments against the doctrine which denies that there is any living judge upon earth, to whose decisions private persons are obliged to submit, when there arise disputes about matters of religion, that not being able to answer these objections to himself, and much less to defend his principles against some subtle controversies with "whom he disputed at Toulouse, he thought himself a schismatic, and out of the way of salvation, and bound to join himself again to the flock, from which he looked upon the Protestant communions as branches lopped off. Being re-united to it he continued the study of philosophy (b), in the college of the Jesuits, as do almost all who study in Roman Catholic countries, of whatsoever quality and condition they be. But the excessive worship he observed was paid to creatures, appearing very doubtful to him, and philosophy having given him a more perfect knowledge of the impossibility of transubstantiation, he concluded that there must have been some sophistry in the objections, which had overcome him; and upon making a new examination of the two religions, he recovered that light of which he had lost sight, and followed it without regarding a thousand temporal advantages, of which he deprived himself, nor a thousand inconveniences which appeared to him inevitable in doing so."

(a) Chimere de la Cabale de Rotterdam démontrée p. 139. & suiv.

(b) He had not then studied above four or five months in philosophy. See la Chimere démontrée, p. 151. and the Letter to Mr Pinon, above, Rem. [A.]

- He arrived there the second of September; and resumed the course of his studies. 1670.
 He had been taught the peripatetic philosophy by the Jesuits, and as he understood it well he defended it with a good deal of warmth (1). Yet notwithstanding he thought himself obliged to examine the Cartesian philosophy, which was taught at Geneva; and it was not long before he preferred the reasonable principles of the new philosophy, to the vain subtilties of the followers of Aristotle. A person of Mr Bayle's merit could not fail of being soon distinguished at Geneva. The reputation he obtained there, made Mr de Normandie, Syndic of the Republic, desire him to take the charge of his childrens education (2). Mr Bafnage, who studied at that time in Geneva, lodged with Mr de Normandie, and it was there Mr Bayle became acquainted with him, and formed that union which continued to his death. Mr Bayle likewise contracted a friendship with Mr Minutoli, which he ever after cultivated by a correspondence, that neither the length of time, nor distance of place, ever made him neglect. He was likewise intimately acquainted with Messieurs Pictet and Leger, who have been Professors of Divinity in the Academy of Geneva; and acquired in a very particular manner the esteem and affection of many persons of eminence, both in the State and in the Church: such as Mr Fabry, the Syndic; Messieurs Turretin, Mestrezat, Bourlamachi, Sartoris, &c.
- Some time after the place of one of the regents of the College becoming vacant, they cast their eyes upon him to supply it. Upon this he set himself to look over the ancient Latin and Greek authors; but, after considering the matter maturely, he could not bring himself to a resolution of teaching a Form, and so he neglected this sort of establishment.
- (1) Chimere de la Cabale de Rotterdam de-montree, &c. pag. 144, 145.
 (2) He went to live with Mr Normandie, Nov. 21.
 (3) May 23, 1672.
 (4) July 24, 1712.
 (5) See in Mr Bayle's Letters, printed at Amsterdam in 1729; the letter to Mr Minutoli of the 27th of Feb. 1673. P. 24.
 (6) Letters to Mr Minutoli of Jan. 31, and of May 2, 1673. pag. 20, 25, 26. and of March 8, 1674. pag. 37, 38.
 (7) Letter to Mr Minutoli, of May 17, 1674. pag. 52.
 (8) Mr Manget, who has acquired a great reputation by several works relating to physic, which he has published.
 (9) Letter of March 17, 1675, pag. 66.
- Mr Bayle had not been two years at Geneva, when the Count de Dhona, Lord of Copet, a Barony in the Pays de Vaud, two leagues distant from Geneva, desired Mr Bafnage to find him out a tutor for his sons. Mr Bafnage named Mr Bayle to him as a person extremely fit for that business. At the same time, he spoke of it to Mr Bayle, who at first had some reluctance to undertake the task proposed to him. He could not resolve to quit the delights of Geneva, and bury himself in the country. However at last he went thither (3), and employed himself in the education of the young Counts de Dhona: Alexander, who was governor and afterwards minister of state to the King of Prussia; Frederic surnamed Ferrassieres, who was a lieutenant-general in the Dutch service, governor of Mons, and was killed in the action at Denain (4); and Christopher, who assisted on the part of the King of Prussia, as elector of Brandenburg, at the coronation of the Emperor Charles VI, and who has distinguished himself in many other offices both civil and military. He continued two years with this family, and during that time he endeavoured to divert himself in his solitude, by a commerce of letters, which he carried on with Mr Minutoli, and with Mr Constant who afterwards filled the highest stations in the Academy of Lausanne. The letters he wrote to them turned upon every thing that came to hand, philosophy, literature, or political news which he loved passionately (5): he owns that he wrote without attaching himself to any regular connexion of thoughts (6). This commerce however was not capable of hindering his being tired of Copet, so he resolved to leave that place. He informed Mr Bafnage, who had returned to France, of his design and begged his good offices. Mr Bafnage acquainted him, that a relation of his who was studying at Geneva, was ordered to return to Rouen; he desired Mr Bayle to accompany him, and flattered him with the hopes of procuring something advantageous for him in that city (7). Mr Bayle received this news with great satisfaction; the only difficulty was to find some pretext for leaving the Count de Dhona. He made use of the following, which could not fail to prevent the Count's opposing the loss he was a going to sustain; he told him that his father, who was dangerously ill, had laid his commands upon him to come to him without delay.
- Accordingly he left Copet, the twenty ninth of May 1674, after having provided his pupils with another person capable of instructing them (8). He made no longer stay at Geneva than was necessary to see his friends; and arrived at Rouen with Mr Bafnage's relation on the fifteenth of June. Soon after he was appointed tutor to a merchant's son, and lived in the house with him; this was the post which Mr Bafnage had provided for Mr Bayle. This merchant had a country-house near Rouen, where Mr Bayle was obliged to go and spend five or six months with his pupil. He found this retirement as disagreeable as that of Copet had been, and he had recourse to the same remedies; he wrote letters to his relations and friends, and even composed some small pieces. When Mr Minutoli pressed him to send them to him, he desired to be excused. "It is a sufficient satisfaction to me," says he in a letter which he wrote to him (9), "that you are not ignorant how constant a correspondent I was, during my solitude in Normandy: and this being a sufficient proof that you are always in my thoughts, I won't give you the trouble of reading a confused medley of indigested thoughts, which my chagrin has made me put in writing." Being returned to Rouen in the beginning of the winter, the sole advantage he found there, was the benefit of frequent conversations with Mr Bafnage the father, Mr Bigot, Mr de Larroque, and some other persons of distinguished learning and merit. He only passed the winter there, for for finding that his pupil had no disposition to Letters, he acquainted his relations with it, and left him.

1675. His utmost ambition was to be at Paris. The arts and sciences which flourished there, the great number of excellent libraries, the conferences which were weekly held on all sorts of subjects, in the houses of several learned men, where they with pleasure received all who desired to assist at them, were such powerful attractives to Mr Bayle, that he could not resist them. He desired his friends to procure for him some establishment there, to enable him to live in that great city. They proposed that he should take the charge of a young gentleman who was expected there from the country, and Mr Bayle left Rouen, the 1st of March 1675, in order to go to Paris. There he did not indeed find the young gentleman his friends had designed for him, but by the recommendation of the Marquis de Ruvigny, he was chosen tutor to Messieurs de Beringhen, brothers to Mr de Beringhen counsellor in the parliament of Paris, and to the Duches de la Force. He entered to this charge the 3d of April a month after his arrival at Paris.

While he was still in Normandy his mother had let him know, that she passionately desired to have his picture. He could not refuse her that satisfaction, and employed Ferdinand, a famous painter, whom a President of the Parliament, had at that time invited to Rouen. He sent her this picture after he came to Paris, and along with it a letter so tender, so full of respect, and which shows so well the disposition of his mind, that I think it well deserves a place in these Memoirs. It is as follows (1).

(1) This Letter is dated April 16, 1675. The direction is To Mademoiselle de Bayle at Carla.

Madam,

“ I Had resolv'd to send you at the same time a portrait of my heart, as well as of my face: but not being able to find words strong enough to express the greatness of my affection and respect for you, rather than my heart should suffer by my not being able to do it justice, I have chosen to send you the work of the painter alone. I flattered myself, that it would have been as easy for me to represent what passeth in my mind, as it has been to him to give a just representation of my features; I already fancied, that a thousand proper and significant words strove, which should first present themselves for that purpose. But when I came to try it, I found that my imagination was not able to furnish me with any thing that I wanted, and so I was oblig'd, much contrary to my inclination, to abandon my enterprize.

“ In order to supply this defect, fancy to yourself, my very good Mother, the thing on earth which is the most grateful, the most affectionate, and the most respectful, and you will have an idea of what I am with regard to you, and of what I am not able to express in words. It is a great satisfaction to me, that you have so much desired to have my picture, and it would be still a greater, if you would be persuaded that I am not to blame, that you have waited so long for it. If I cannot have yours, at least I shall have you always painted in my heart, on which you are impress'd as a signet.

“ May the good God, who has always display'd his mercies to us, still more and more favour our family, and grant to you, my much honoured Mother, a long life, free from cares, grief, and sickness; and to me such a share of his protection, as may make you taste those joys and pleasures, which usually arise from the happiness of persons who are dear to us.

“ I am indeed of a disposition neither to fear bad fortune, nor to have very ardent desires for good. Yet I lose this steadiness and indifference, when I reflect that your love to me makes you feel every thing that befalls me. It is therefore from the consideration that my misfortunes would be a torment to you, that I wish to be happy; and when I think that my happiness would be all your joy, I should be sorry my bad fortune should continue to persecute me; tho' as to my own particular interest, I dare promise to myself that I shall never be very much affected by it. I am with the most ardent affection, Madam my much honoured Mother, Your, &c.”

Mr Basnage was at this time at Sedan, where he finish'd the study of Divinity. Mr Bayle communicated to him all the literary news he could meet with, and Mr Basnage us'd to read his letters to Mr Jurieu, Minister, and Professor of Divinity in the Academy of Sedan. As Mr Jurieu will be mentioned more than once in these Memoirs, I shall begin here to give his character. He had a good deal of sagacity, a fruitful imagination, and wrote both well and with ease. Tho' in many things he departed from the sentiments of the Reformed, he did nevertheless set up for a rigorous defender of Orthodoxy [C]. Being presumptuous he would domineer every where, and his

VOL. I.

c

pride

[C] Tho' in many things, he departed from the sentiments of the Reformed, he did nevertheless, set up for a rigorous defender of Orthodoxy. He had published in the year 1670 an Answer to a book concerning the re-union of Christians, written by Mr Duiffseau,

Minister of Saumur: this answer was condemn'd by the synod of Saintonge, as containing heretical propositions. He afterwards compos'd a dissertation on the necessity of Baptism, wherein he defended one of the errors of the Church of Rome; and it was with much pride could not bear those, whose merit he looked upon as either capable of equalling or obscuring that which he thought himself possessed of. His attachment to his friends was measured by the deference they paid to him. To fail in that deference which he exacted, was sufficient to raise his indignation, and make him an implacable enemy. By this imperious and turbulent spirit he brought discord wherever he went, and rendered himself odious to all the world. It was upon this account he had been obliged to quit the churches of Mer and Vitry, and had brought upon himself a great many mortifications at Sedan, where notwithstanding he had a very considerable party.

At this time Mr Basnage having got notice, that the Academy of Sedan designed to appoint a successor to Mr Pitheois, one of their Professors of Philosophy aged eighty years, he acquainted Mr Bayle with it, and advised him to take advantage of that opportunity to procure to himself a lasting and honourable establishment. Mr Bayle made him the following answer, the same day on which he took the charge of Messieurs de Beringhen. "I never receive any of your letters, says he (1), without receiving "at the same time, proofs of your friendship, nay of a friendship always watchful "of every thing that can be of advantage to me. The great age of your Professor would be a favourable conjuncture, if I was in a condition of making use of "your good offices. But, dear Sir, I must acquaint you, that ever since I left Geneva "I have done nothing else but forget, and want of culture has so blunted my mind, "that I do not know if by a return to study, I should be able to set myself to rights "again. Without doubt that post is a hundred times better than this which I am "going to have, for after all, the character of preceptor is become so contemptible "almost every where, that no personal merit can save a man from that general esteem with which it is attended, therefore it is with the greatest reluctance that I "once more venture into that tiresome road. I do not know but I might have "brought Mr de Beringhen to allow me thirty pistoles if I had higgled with him: "but my natural modesty, my disinterestedness, and the advice of my friends, having "inclined me to leave myself entirely to his discretion, and to assure him that I "would be satisfied with whatever he should please to allow me, I shall only have "two hundred livres. I must be upon the watch, and had it not been for a troublesome delicacy, which obliged me not to depart from the laws of civility, I "might have retracted with considerable advantages towards repairing my bad fortune. I am a fool, you will say, for not having done so: I own it, and it is the "shame of appearing tickle, which has been the cause of my folly."

The disagreeable situation that Mr Bayle was in redoubled Mr Basnage's zeal, and made him act with more vigour in his favour. He desired Mr Jurieu to employ his interest for him, and Mr Jurieu promised to serve him to the utmost of his power. He found himself so much the more disposed to do so, that he was afraid least Mr Bazzi, who was the other Professor of Philosophy, and whom he hated, should have interest enough to get his son chosen in the place of Mr Pitheois. So that it was not so much from the esteem he had for Mr Bayle, as (2) "to flatter his "darling passion, which was the desire of domineering. His party in the Academy "was not so strong as he could have wished, and in case the opposite party had "succeeded in their design of giving the chair of Philosophy to Mr Bayle's competitor, Mr Jurieu foresaw nothing but sorrow and bitterness to himself, so that who "ever had chanced to have been recommended to him, he would have left no stone "unturned to establish him, in order to exclude a competitor of whom he was "afraid."

Mr Basnage having made sure of Mr Jurieu, represented to Mr Bayle how much what he proposed to him was preferable to his present condition, and pressed him to yield to the desires of his friends. But he continued still to excuse himself, as not being sufficiently qualified, and promised however to look over his Philosophy and see what progress he could make in five or six months study. "I admire "you continually, says he (3), you and that generous beneficent disposition of yours, "and that indefatigableness to serve those you love. I agree with you, that the "title of preceptor is unworthy of a gentleman, and that I ought to get rid of it "as quickly as possible. I know on the other hand, that the character of Professor "of Philosophy is much more honourable, and not ill suited to my fortune and "situation: your pressing me on that score therefore appears to me perfectly well "judged, and to flow from the most sincere friendship in the world. But, dear Sir, "the misfortune is, you lay your account to find me the same person you knew at "Geneva: then indeed I could dispute indifferently well; I came fresh from a "school, where I had been well instructed in all the scholastic chicanery, and I "may say, without vanity, that I was no bad proficient in it. But the matter is "quite altered now. You know, Sir, that the proposal of teaching a Class, which was

(1) Letter of April 3, 1675, p. 581, 582, of the fourth Volume of the Miscellaneous Works of Mr Bayle.

(2) Letter concerning the small books wrote against the Cabale Chimérique, pag. 4, 5.

(3) Letter of May 5, 1675, in his Works, last cited, p. 592, 593.

(4) This book was published in the year 1674.

much difficulty, he was persuaded to suppress that piece. They found it no less difficult to make him strike some heretical propositions out of his Apology for the Morals of the Reformed (a). Notwithstanding this, he combined with some other divines to persecute Mr Pajon, Minister of Orleans, who had a particular system concerning Grace, tho' at bottom it agreed with the doctrine of absolute predestination, and final perseverance, which was taught by the reformed churches in France (b).

(b) See Réponse à l'Analogie de Mr Jurieu, by Mr de Basnage, p. 104.

1675.

" was made me, sent me back once more to study the Classics, and that I began to neglect Philosophy, that I laid aside Mr Des Cartes for Homer and Virgil, and that by going to Copet I lost two years there, without studying either languages or any sort of science, but Philosophy less than any thing. I have continued on this footing ever since my return to France, and as I easily lose my ideas, I find myself reduced to such a condition at this present time that I write to you, that I do not so much as know the first elements of Logic. I know that a year employed in the manner I told you of in a former letter, in studying night and day, in disputing, defending theses, &c. would bring me in wind again, and give me courage to give defiance to all assailants. But here is the point. Where shall I find this year, and where shall I find the means to employ it so? in my present state, I cannot promise to have it in my power to study a quarter of an hour without a thousand interruptions. I have not one book of Philosophy, and it is impossible for me to make acquaintances, the few people I know are of so difficult access, that I call upon them three or four times without finding them, nay I do not so much as know if they have those books which will be necessary for me. In fine, dear Sir, my rivals cannot be so far behind in Philosophy, nor in so bad a situation to prepare themselves for the engagement, as I find myself in at present. I am vexed to the last degree, and am ready to curse my stars, that I am not able to answer the advances you made in my favour. I honour and admire Mr Jurieu, and should desire earnestly to be near him, that I may improve by his great and incomparable talents, and I find myself unable to express my gratitude, for his generous inclination to serve me, upon your recommendation. What shall I say more to you, dear Sir? I am going to look over my Philosophy, to buy or borrow some good system, and study as much as the noise and clamour of two foolish ungovernable boys, whom I have upon my hands from morning to night, will permit me to do; and according to the progress which I shall be able to make, I will resolve upon a journey to Sedan, with great pleasure, five or six months hence. If it was only to see Sedan, I would resolve to make this journey, for there can be no hurt in it. Dear Sir, I should die with grief, if you had engaged yourself for me, and I did not engage myself to disengage you. My friendship to you would make me run into any thing, rather than endure that you should not get out of this affair, in which you have involved yourself on my account. But once more, dear Sir, pray consider that you cannot depend much upon the progress which I shall make in Philosophy, by a study so interrupted, and attended with so many vexations and so disturbed as mine will be."

This letter surprized Mr Jurieu extremely; he considered Mr Bayle's excuses as mere shifts, and owned that he could not tell what to make of it. The truth was Mr Bayle had a secret reason, which made him averse from going to Sedan. He was afraid least his change of religion, which was a secret to every body in that country but Mr Basnage, should come to be discovered, and that occasion might be taken from the Arrêt against the Relapse [D], to give him trouble, and to distress the Reformed at Sedan. Mr Jurieu therefore suspecting that there was some other reason than that which Mr Bayle pretended in his letter, would needs know what it really was that kept him back; Mr Basnage could not help letting him into that affair, and Mr Jurieu was of opinion that this ought not to hinder his coming, since they two being the only persons who knew any thing of it, he ran no hazard. Whereupon Mr Basnage removed Mr Bayle's fears, and some time after having wrote to him that the election of a new Professor approached, and that there was no time to be lost, he set out from Paris the 22d of August in order to go to Sedan.

As soon as he arrived there (1), Mr Basnage procured him the acquaintance of several of his friends who were of the party which opposed Mr Jurieu, and particularly of Mr du Rondel, Professor of Eloquence. They promised to do him justice. Mr Bayle soon found the occasion he had for their protection. He had three competitors, and all possible means were used to set him aside, because he was a stranger and his competitors were natives of Sedan. But at last it was left to be determined

[D] The arrêt against the relapse. They called Relapse those of the Reformed, who after having embraced the Roman Catholic religion, abandoned it, and returned to the protestants. From the year 1657 they began to disturb some of the Reformed under pretence, that they were Relapse, but this was without any express order from court (a). The first declaration which appeared against them was given in the month of April 1663, importing that they should be punished according to the rigour of the Ordinances; an expression which properly speaking meant nothing, because no Ordinance had as yet defined the punishment of this new crime. They did not fail, notwithstanding, to take advantage of this declaration to distress the Reformed: they even pretended that it had a retroactive force; which having caused infinite disorders, the King found himself obliged to publish an Arrêt in the month of September 1664, forbidding the extending of it to any thing which had past before it was registered by the parliaments. In the mean time, that prince not being satisfied with the loose and indefinite terms of his first declaration, published another in the month of June 1665, in which he condemned the relapse to perpetual banishment. Mr Bayle came under this second declaration, which still appearing too moderate, was at last followed by a third in the month of May 1679, whereby it was declared, that the Relapses should be condemned to an amende honourable, be banished for ever out of the kingdom, and have their estates confiscated (b). The fear Mr Bayle was under of being known and punished as a relapse, made him desire his friends to change the spelling of his name in the directions of their letters, and to write Belle instead of Bayle (c).

(1) He arrived at Sedan August 31.

(b) See the same History Vol. iii. p. 520, 522. and the collection of Edicts, declarations, &c. which is at the end of that vol. p. 109, 151. And vol. iv. p. 18, 374. and the collection of Edicts, &c. of that vol. p. 7, 106.

(c) See the letters to Mr Minstrell of March 17, 1675, p. 78, and of Feb. 6, 1676, p. 103.

(a) See the History of the Edict of Nantz. Tom. iii. p. 66, 132, 230, 428.

determined by a dispute. The candidates agreed to make their Theses without books or preparation, betwixt sun rising and sun setting. The subject assigned them was Time. They shut themselves up upon the 28th of September, to compose them; and Mr Bayle defended his Theses publicly upon the 23d and 24th of October, in the afternoon. He disputed with such clearness, accuracy and force, that notwithstanding the interest and intrigues of his rivals, the moderators of the Academy adjudged him the victory. These particulars are to be found in the letters which he wrote to Messieurs Constant and Minutoli [E].

He was received Professor on the 2d of November: he took the usual oath upon the 4th, and began his public lectures upon the 11th.

Soon after he was informed that the Academy of Geneva had chosen Mr Minutoli Professor of History and Belles Lettres: it was Mr Minutoli himself who informed him of it, not omitting a detail of the examination he had undergone, and of the opposition he had met with. Mr Bayle made his compliments to him upon this new promotion, and thanked him for the particular account he had given him of it. "The circumstances, says he (1), of your glorious establishment, in the place of Professor, with which you have acquainted me, have been infinitely agreeable; for tho' I knew in general that you had given very distinguishing proofs, both of your genius and learning, and that I had from thence already conceived an incredible satisfaction yet the order and detail of it, which you have given me, have redoubled that pleasure: for we Philosophers love method in every thing, and without it nothing has charms for us. I say this, Sir, to give you hopes of not being henceforth exposed to my irregularities, and that I shall not any more overwhelm you with a confused heap of thoughts and words, as I have done formerly. My new degree inspires me with the spirit of method, and you will be sensible of it, or no body will. But who could have thought that you should have met with such opposition in your own country. No body was surprised here that all sort of means were used to set me aside from the Professor's chair, for I was a stranger and my antagonists were natives of the place; on the contrary, people were strangely surprised that I found any friends at all: but surely there is room for wonder, that all your country men did not without hesitation join in your promotion, which will be so advantageous and glorious to the Academy."

(1) Letter of April 4, 1676, p. 104.

Whatever opposition Mr Bayle found at his coming to Sedan, his merit soon engaged the love and esteem of every body. The Count de Guiscard, Governour of Sedan, invited him frequently to his house, that he might enjoy his conversation. Mr du Rondel who was afterwards Professor of the Belles Lettres at Maastricht, gave him his friendship, and continued it to his death. Even Mr Jurieu was so touched with Mr Bayle's fine qualities, and was so charmed with the sweetness of his temper, his modesty, and his integrity, that he opened his heart to him, perhaps more than he thought himself capable of to any one. He has acknowledged this publicly in 1691, at a time when he had shamefully broke with him, and was labouring to ruin him. "This man, says he (2), was recommended to us, to fill a chair of

(2) Apologie pour Mr Jurieu, p. 24. col. 1.

"Philosophy then vacant in the Academy of Sedan, where I had the honour to be Professor of Divinity, and one of the Moderators of the Academy. One of his friends gave him the character of a young man of great genius, good learning, and very capable of making those sciences flourish, which he should be called to cultivate. We were not deceived in this. He came and distinguished himself in all the public exercises of his examination. But his friend and he not thinking it proper to make a secret to me of his revolt and long stay among the Jesuits of Toulouse (3), I was embarrassed to the last degree because of the Arret against the Relapses. However as I, upon his protestations, believed that he was sincere in his return to us, we resolved to keep that matter secret and to proceed. He was several years in the Academy, behaving himself decently, and neither doing or saying any thing that gave offence. The beauty of his genius and

(3) Mr Bayle never lived with the Jesuits.

[E] These particulars are to be found in the letters which he wrote to Messieurs Constant and Minutoli.

(1) Letter of December 17 1675, p. 97. 98.

"It is about four months ago, says he to Mr Constant (a), since I left Paris, being invited to come hither, to be a Professor of Philosophy. Upon my arrival I found matters so embarrassed with little academical intrigues, that I was obliged to wave my Invitation, and submit to the hazard of a Dispute. I exposed my self to it, and God so assisted my ignorance, whether by strengthening my weakness, or by opposing antagonists to me no stronger than my self, that at last I gained the victory. I take the liberty of sending you the only remaining copy of my Theses, they are theses cooked up in haste, which we agreed to make, without books or preparation, betwixt sun rising and sun setting, to prevent the tricks which auxiliary troops might have play'd, if we had been allowed to compose them in our own chambers. Unluckily

"for us, the subject was very difficult." See how he speaks of the matter to Mr Minutoli. "Several reasons, (says he (b), having determined me to comply with an invitation, which was given me to accept of a Professor of Philosophy's place, I left Paris, about the end of August last, and came hither, where I have been obliged in a hurry, to rally my scattered ideas of Philosophy, and to enter the lists with three rivals, who had kept themselves always in wind. I leave it to you to judge of my anxiety upon that occasion. At last whether by good fortune or the ignorance of my competitors I have been received Professor; and am obliged to labour like a galley-slave, having a course to compose from day to day, besides giving five hours a day to my scholars. These are drudgeries which have stunned me, and it is only because one may be accustomed to any thing, that I now begin to breathe."

(b) Letter of Febr. 6, 1676, p. 100.

1675. "his honourable principles attached me so to him, that I loved him better than ever I did any person, I confess it."

The composition of his Course of Philosophy employed him during two years: it was an additional labour which filled up all the intervals of his Academical functions, and left him no time to write to his friends. "I have not been able, says he to 1677. "Mr Minutoli (1), to answer your fine letter of the 1st of April, otherwise than by a "line or two, because of the fatiguing business which has entirely taken me up these "two years, I mean the multitude of exercises I was obliged to make for my "scholars, and the composition of my Course. I am now, thank God, freed from "that terrible drudgery. I have finished my Course, my Theses for the Master of "Arts degree are defended, and now at last it is Vacation."

(1) Letter of the 29th of August, 1677. p. 8. 130.

But still a long time after this, the vacations were the only time, in which he could have any relaxation. The revival of his course, the additions which he made to it, together with his public and private lectures, left him no leisure. This is the account he gives to Mr Minutoli in another letter (2).

1679. Mr Ancillon, Minister of Mets, had made him a present of a book of Mr Poirer, printed at Amsterdam in 1677, intitled Cogitationes Rationales de Deo, Anima, & malo; and had defired him to make Remarks upon it. Mr Bayle in the year 1679, sent him a piece in latin, containing the difficulties which had occurred to him, in reading it through. He sent along with it, a Letter of thanks, wherein he excused himself that his affairs had not permitted him to comply with his desire sooner, nor to give that force and regularity to his objections, which he could have wished. Mr Ancillon communicated this piece to Mr Poirer, who wrote an answer to it, which he sent to Mr Ancillon, together with a Letter wherein he thanked him for exciting an adversary against him who showed so much accuracy, judgment, penetration and politeness. Mr Poirer inserted these objections of Mr Bayle's, together with his own answers to them, in a new edition of his book, printed at Amsterdam in 1685, and thereto joined the two letters, which I have now mentioned (3). This small piece shows that Mr Bayle was thoroughly acquainted with the most sublime points of Philosophy. Mr Poirer extricated himself but indifferently from some of his Objections (4).

(2) Letter of the 15th of Dec. 1678. p. 2. 140.

(3) Mr Bayle's letter is dated April 13, and Mr Poirer's August 14, 1679.

Mr Bayle took advantage of the harvest vacation to make a tour to Paris, and from thence he went to Rouen, to wait upon Mr Bafnage (5).

1680. The affair of the Duke of Luxembourg, at that time made a great noise. He had been accused before the Chamber of Poisons, of impieties, forcery, and poisonings, and had surrendered himself a prisoner: but he was declared innocent, and the process against him was suppressed. Mr Bayle who had learnt a great many particulars concerning this matter, when he was at Paris, diverted himself in composing an Harangue, wherein the Marechal pleads his cause before his Judges, and vindicates himself from having made a compact with the Devil, that he might, 1. enjoy all the women he had a mind to. 2. That he might always be successful in war. 3. That he might gain all his law suits. 4. That he might always enjoy the King's favour. The harangue is divided into these four points: it contains a very smart satire upon the Marechal, and several other persons. Mr Bayle afterwards composed under another name a criticism upon this harangue, still more satirical than the satire it self. He sent these two pieces to Mr Minutoli, and desired him to give him his opinion of them: and in order to engage him to do it with more freedom, he did not tell him who was the author of them. "I send you (says he) (6), a copy of a "Harangue, which some body has composed in the name of the Duke of Luxembourg, "to take an opportunity from thence to give us part of his Life. If I have "time, I will get copied for you a sort of criticism upon this harangue. You "will oblige me by giving me your opinion of both these pieces; for a friend of "mine at Paris, who is acquainted with the author of the second of them, "and who possibly out of prejudice in favour of his friend, inclines to think that "the harangue is good for nothing, has obliged me to promise to write him my "sentiments of both the one and the other. But as I have not leisure, and "besides as you are more capable than I to examine works of this nature, in "order to show their strong and weak side, I beg, Sir, that you will bestow a "few hours upon them. By this means I shall satisfy my friend's desire, and I am "sure he will sooner trust to your judgment, than to mine; for he knows "how to value things, and would much rather that I should pay him out of your "pocket that out of my own."

(4) See the letter to Mr Des Maizeaux of July 3, 1705. p. 1027.

(5) Letter to Mr Minutoli of the 1st of January, 1680. p. 153.

(6) Letter of the 24, of March 1680. p. 162, 163. See likewise the letter of the 1st of January 1681. p. 169.

(7) Sentimens de Mr Des Cartes touchant l'essence & les proprietiez du Corps, opposez à la Doctrine de l'Eglise, & conformes aux erreurs de Calvin sur le sujet de l'Eucharistie.

About this time, Father de Valois, a Jesuit of Caen, concealed under the name of Louis de la Ville, published a book at Paris, intitled, The Sentiments of Mr Des Cartes concerning the Essence and Properties of Body, repugnant to the doctrine of the Church, and agreeable to the errors of Calvin on the subject of the Eucharist (7). The author not satisfied with opposing the authority of the Council of Trent to the Cartesians, attacks them likewise by way of argument, and endeavours to confute the reasons made use of by Messieurs Clercelier, Rohault, and Father Malebranche, to prove that extension is the essence of matter. Mr Bayle read this work and found it very well done. He judged that the author had incontestably proved the point in question, to wit, that

(1) Letter of the 24 of March 1680, p. 165.

Mr Des Cartes's principles were contrary to the faith of the Church of Rome, and agreeable to the doctrine of Calvin; which at bottom, says Mr Bayle in a letter to Mr Minutoli, was no hard matter to do (1). As Mr Bayle had a mind to make his scholars defend philosophical Theſes, he composed a Dissertation on this subject, wherein he defended Mr Des Cartes's principle, and at the same time restored the arguments of these Philosophers which had been attacked by Father de Valois, to their full force, and destroyed all the exceptions and subtilities of that Father. He endeavours principally to prove that the penetrability of matter is impossible. 1680.

(2) See the Advertisment concerning the 3d Edition of the Pensées diverses, sur la Comete, &c.

In the month of December 1680, there appeared one of the largest Comets that was ever seen. People, that is to say almost every body, were seized with fright and astonishment. They had not as yet got the better of the ancient prejudice, that Comets are preſages of some fatal event. Mr Bayle, as he informs us himself (2), was incessantly teized with the questions of a great many people, who were alarmed at this pretended bad omen. He endeavoured to remove their fears as much as possible, but he found that he gained but little upon them by philosophical reasonings; they still made answer that God shows us these great Phænomena's, to give warning to sinners to prevent by their repentance the judgments which hang over their heads. He believed therefore that it would be to no purpose to reason any more with them, except he could find out some argument which would prove that it was inconsistent with God's attributes to appoint Comets for that purpose. Upon examining thoroughly that matter, he soon bethought himself of the following theological argument, to wit, That if Comets were preſages of evil, God must have performed miracles to confirm idolatry in the world. He did not remember to have met with this argument, either in books or conversation: so that the novelty of it made him think of writing a Letter on that subject, which might be inserted in the MERCURE GALANT. He began to write it upon the 11th of January 1681, and endeavoured to keep within the bounds of a Letter; but the abundance of matter would not allow him to be so short, he was therefore obliged to consider this letter as a work which must be printed by itself. After this he no longer affected brevity, but enlarged upon every thing as he found occasion; without losing sight however of Mr de Viſé, author of the MERCURE GALANT. He resolved to send this letter to him, and to desire him to give it to his printer, and obtain either a licence from Mr de la Reynie, Lieutenant-general of the Police, if that would be sufficient, or the King's Privilege, if nothing else would do. Accordingly he sent it to him the 27th of May. Mr de Viſé kept the manuscript some time without knowing the author's name; and when he was wrote to about it, he answered that he was told by a person to whom he had given it to read, that Mr de la Reynie would never take the consequences of printing it upon himself, and that it would be necessary to obtain the approbation of the Doctors, before a Royal Privilege could be applied for, which was a troublesome long and tedious task he had no leisure to engage in. The manuscript was got back, and Mr Bayle gave over all thoughts of printing his letter concerning Comets at Paris. But as he at first composed it with this view, he had assumed the stile of a Roman Catholic, and had imitated Mr de Viſé's manner and encomiums upon the administration of affairs. This conduct was then absolutely necessary to those who had a mind to print any thing at Paris, and he thought that to imitate the MERCURE GALANT in some things, would render it more easy to obtain either Mr de la Reynie's licence, or the Royal Privilege. It was upon this account likewise, that he feigns that the letter was wrote to a Doctor of the Sorbonne. 1681.

The Reformed in France were at this time in a melancholy situation. The Court had for a long time laboured their destruction. They stript them by little and little of all their privileges, and no year passed without some infringement of the Edict of Nants. At last they resolved to suppress their Academies. There was some reason to hope that they would spare the Academy of Sedan. The principality of Sedan had been a sovereign state until the year 1642. The Duke of Bouillon surrendered it to Lewis XIII, who agreed to leave all things there in the condition he found them. Lewis XIV confirmed this treaty, and it was a-new granted that the Protestant Religion should be maintained there with all the rights and privileges of which it was then possessed. But all these advantages could not save the Academy. Nay Lewis XIV ordered that it should be the first that should be dissolved. The Arrêt was passed on the 9th of July 1681, and notified the fourteenth of the same month.

(3) Chimere de la Cabale de Rotterdam démontrée. préface p. cxiij. c. lxiij.

There was at this time at Sedan a young gentleman from Rotterdam, named Mr Van Zoelen, a relation of Mr van Zoelen, who was afterwards Burgomaster of that city. This young gentleman (3) had lodged at Sedan with Mr Bayle, and had improved himself in his studies by frequent conversations with him. He had conceived so strong a friendship for his Professor, that upon the same day on which the Arrêt for the suppression of the Academy came there, he resolved to send a copy of it to Mr Paets, a relation of his, who was one of the Counsellors of the city of Rotterdam, a very learned man, and a patron of men of letters. He acquainted Mr Paets, at the same time that he sent him the Arrêt, that Mr Bayle was without employment; he gave a very good character of him, and received an answer wherein Mr Paets declared a very great inclination to serve him. Mr Bayle upon this wrote to Mr Paets a letter of thanks, for 1681. for the favourable sentiments he had of him, and begged the continuance of his favour. Mr Paets, together with a great deal of wit and penetration, had a strong passion for the sciences, particularly for Philosophy. His merit had acquired him a great authority, and would have gained him still more had it not been for the divisions which then prevailed in the Republic. He was considered as the head of the party which opposed the family of Orange (1); and upon this account he found some difficulty to get into the Magistracy again, after his return from being Ambassador extraordinary in Spain (2). He notwithstanding triumphed over their jealousy, and the Magistrates of Rotterdam had so great deference for his counsels, that they were guided in all their deliberations by him.

Mr Bayle at the same time endeavoured to procure an establishment at Rotterdam for Mr Jurieu, and engaged Mr van Zoelen to recommend him to Mr Paets. Mr van Zoelen left Sedan in order to solicit these matters in person at Rotterdam, and insisted so strenuously with Mr Paets, that he was pleased to use his interest likewise for Mr Jurieu (3).

Mr Bayle staid six or seven weeks at Sedan after the suppression of the Academy, waiting for letters from Holland. But at last not receiving any, he grew impatient and left Sedan the 2d of September, and arrived at Paris the 7th of the same month, uncertain as yet whither he should go to Rotterdam or to England, of if he should continue in France (4). Before his departure the Count de Guiscard used all his endeavours to persuade him to embrace the Popish religion. He proposed great advantages to him, but all to no purpose (5). At length when he was ready to set out for Rouen, and from thence to pass over to England, he received an answer from Mr Paets acquainting him that the city of Rotterdam had given him a salary with the right of teaching Philosophy. Mr Paets added that Mr Jurieu's business was in a fair way. Upon this he left Paris the eighth of October, and upon the thirtieth arrived at Rotterdam, where he was very kindly received by Mr van Zoelen's family, and by Mr Paets (6).

Mr Jurieu followed Mr Bayle very soon after; but before he was well settled at Rotterdam, he was guilty of some rash and blunt actions, which very much provoked Mr Paets against him, and which he pardoned only upon Mr Bayle's account (7). The town of Rotterdam erected an ILLUSTRIOUS SCHOOL in their favour; Mr Jurieu was appointed Professor of Divinity; and Mr Bayle Professor of Philosophy and History, with five hundred guilders of yearly appointments. Upon the 5th of December, he delivered his Inaugural Oration with universal applause; and on the 8th he read his first lecture of Philosophy to a great number of scholars.

1682. A little while after he gave his Letter concerning Comets to Mr Leers, a bookseller in Rotterdam, and a man of sense and merit, in order to have it printed. And as he took all manner of precautions not to be thought the author of it, he changed nothing either in the title of a Roman Catholic which he had assumed, nor in his imitation of the manner and panegyrics of the MERCURE GALANT. He thought that this strain would be very proper to prevent peoples thinking, that this Letter was wrote by one who had left France for his Religion. While they were printing it he added many things that were not in the copy which he had formerly sent to the author of the MERCURE GALANT (8). The impression was finished on the 11th of March 1682, and it appeared under the following title: A Letter to Mr L. A. D. C. Doctor of the Sorbone. Wherein it is proved by many arguments, both Philosophical and Theological, that Comets are not presages of evil. With several moral and political reflexions and historical observations. Together with a confutation of some vulgar errors. Printed at Cologne by Peter Marteau, MDC LXXXII (9).

To conceal himself the better, Mr Bayle prefixed to it a Preface or Advice to the Reader under the character of a person publishing this Letter without knowing the author of it. In this preface, after taking notice of several reasons which induced him to make it public, he adds likewise the following: "I have been confirmed in this design by a yet stronger reason than any of these. I have it from very good authority, that the Doctor of the Sorbone to whom this Letter was written, is preparing a very exact and elaborate answer to it, and there would be great reason to fear, considering his indifference for the character of an author, that he would content himself with writing only for his friends use, if we did not by publishing this Letter which he has received from him, engage him to impart to the public the learned and fine reflexions he no doubt has made upon several important subjects; such as the conduct of providence with regard to the ancient Heathens: the question, Whether God has wrought miracles among them, tho' he knew that they would thereby become more idolatrous: the question, Whether God has sometimes appointed presages among infidels: the question, Whether an effect purely natural can be a certain presage of a contingent event: the question, Whether Atheism be worse than Idolatry, and if it be necessarily the source of all sort of crimes: the question, Whether God would rather choose that men should be without any knowledge of a God, than that they should be engaged in the abominable worship of idols; and upon many others, concerning which so great and learned a divine may have very instructive thoughts, and which well deserve to be made public.

But

(1) He was brother-in-law to Cornelius de Witt.
(2) See London Gazette of the 4th of October 1675, article from the Hague of the 8th of October.
(3) Chimere démontre préface, p. cixiii and the following.
(4) Ibid. p. clxviii. and Letter to Mr Minuscule, of the 17th of September 1681 p. 172.
(5) Catala Chimérique, p. 172.
(6) Chimere démontre, préface p. clxix.
(7) Ibid. p. clxix, clxx.
(8) Preface to the 3d edition.
(9) Lettre à Mr L. A. D. C. Docteur de Sorbone. Où il est prouvé par plusieurs raisons tirées de la Philosophie & de la Théologie, que les Comètes ne sont point le présage d'aucun malheur. Avec plusieurs Reflexions Morales & Politiques, & plusieurs Observations Historiques; & la refutation de quelques erreurs populaires. A Cologne chez Pierre Marteau, 1682.

But notwithstanding all these disguises, it was very soon known that Mr Bayle 1682. was the author of the Letter concerning Comets. Mr Leers had shown the manuscript to Mr Paets, and told him from whom he had it; and Mr Paets made no secret of it to his friends (1); nay he thought he did the author a piece of service, by discovering him (2). Mr Jurieu by this means came likewise to know it, either immediately from them, or from others to whom they had told it, and having spoke of it to Mr Bayle, with a kind of reproach that other people knew this secret while he was ignorant of it; Mr Bayle told him how every thing had passed, and satisfy'd him as to some points in the book (3), Mr Jurieu spoke of it with applause (4): but at the bottom he bore with impatience, the honour that Mr Bayle acquired by it; jealous as he was of the honour done his friends.

(1) Chimere de montrée, preface p. clxxi.

(2) Cabale chimérique, pag. 206.

(3) Preface ubi supra, pag. clxxi.

(4) Chimere de montrée, pag. 207.

(5) Histoire du Calvinisme.

(6) Eloge de Mr Bayle by Mr de Bauval.

(7) It was a volume in 12° of 339 pages in a small character.

(8) Critique générale de l'Histoire du Calvinisme de Mr Maimbourg. A Ville Franche chez Pierre le Blanc. 1682.

(9) Letter xix p. 268, 269.

(10) This Sentence is to be found at the end of these Memoirs.

Madam Paets died at this time, and gave a proof of her esteem for Mr Bayle, by leaving him a legacy of two thousand guilders to buy books. Mr Bayle always preserved a grateful remembrance of this generous gift, as we will afterwards observe.

Mr Maimbourg had just published his History of Calvinism (5). This work treated of very important matters: a judgment was to be made concerning the spirit and conduct of the Reformed in France, from the time of their separation from the Church of Rome. Mr Maimbourg had employed all the art he was master of, to draw both the contempt and hatred of the Catholics upon them. Mr Bayle, full of indignation at the dissingenuity and pernicious design of this author, resolved to refute his History, and took the opportunity of Easter Vacation to set about it. He wrote his answer by way of Letters, but did not think it necessary to follow in adversary step by step. He was of opinion that in order to undeceive the public, and show how little Mr Maimbourg ought to be regarded, it was sufficient to make some general observations on his History, which even supposing the truth of the facts it relates, might discover his malice, violence, and the cruel and barbarous principles, with which he endeavours to inspire his readers. Mr Bayle diverted himself with several particulars of the life and disputes of this writer, and gave a very just tho' by no means advantageous picture of them (6). "It was not a four and morose criticism, but an ingenious sort of raillery, full notwithstanding of good sense and reason, and more proper to embarrass or confound an adversary, than grave and serious arguments."

He began to write these Letters on the 1st of May, and finished them on the 15th of the same month, so that this work tho' pretty bulky (7), was composed in the space of 15 days, as he himself acquaints us in the last Letter. He took all possible precautions to conceal his being the author of them. In the Advertisement prefixed to them, he makes the bookseller say, that this collection of letters having fallen into his hands, he thought himself bound to publish them without delay; and that he was desired to acquaint the reader, that they were really wrote by a country Gentleman of the Province of Maine, and sent to his friend according to their dates. He would not even have them printed at Rotterdam, and having occasion to go to see Amsterdam, he carried his manuscript along with him, and gave it to Abraham Wolfgang, a bookseller there, upon the 30th of May. This book appeared in the beginning of July, with the following title: A general Criticism on Mr Maimbourg's History of Calvinism. At Ville Franche by Peter le Blanc. M. DC. LXXXII (8). Mr Bayle received the copies of it, on the 11th of that same month.

This work was approved of, not only by the Reformed, who were so well defended in it from Mr Maimbourg's attacks, but even by the judicious and moderate among the Catholics. A great many copies of it found their way into France, and were eagerly sought after. The Prince of Condé, a prince who was very capable of judging of the merit of books, could never be tired with reading it. It is true indeed he did not love Mr Maimbourg. That historian to please the court, whose pensioner he was, had affected not to take any notice of his Highness, while he made panegyrics upon all his ancestors. Mr Bayle did not fail to expose him upon this account (9), and the Prince took it well. This work touched Mr Maimbourg to the quick: the general approbation with which it was received troubled him extremely. He applied several times to Mr de la Reynie, to procure a condemnation of it. But that magistrate having read it with pleasure, and not being displeased that Mr Maimbourg had been mortified, put him off from time to time. At last he addressed himself to the King, and obtained an order from his Majesty, directed to Mr de la Reynie, commanding the General Criticism on Mr Maimbourg's History of Calvinism, to be burnt by the hand of the hangman; and forbidding all printers and booksellers to print, sell, or publish that book on pain of death. Mr de la Reynie obeyed the order, and put in his Sentence whatever Mr Maimbourg pleased: one may easily discover in it the style of an author, and of an enraged author too (10): but to revenge himself against Mr Maimbourg, he got above 3000 copies of that sentence printed, and posted them up all over Paris, which incited the curiosity of the public to such a degree, that every body would needs have the criticism on Mr Maimbourg.

1682.

This work was sold off in Holland, almost as soon as it appeared; and in the month of August, Mr Bayle prepared a new edition of it. He enlarged it one half, and added a preface to it, wherein he again endeavours to deceive the reader and put him upon a wrong scent. This edition was printed off about the end of November, and he received copies of it, on the 29th of that month.

They sought for a long time in France, among the best pens of the Protestant party for the Author of the Criticism on Mr Maimbourg; and at last fixed upon Mr Claude, who at that time gloriously defended the cause of the Reformed. Even Mr Bayle's friends, who knew that he was the author of the Letter concerning Comets, never dreamt of ascribing this Criticism to him, because of the difference of the stile, and it was a mere accident which discovered it, as he tells us himself, to show that there is nothing more uncertain than conjectures drawn from the conformity or difference of stile, in order to discover the author of a book. "I know by experience, says he

(1) Cabale Chimérique, pag. 204, 205.

(2) L'Histoire du Calvinisme & celle du Papisme mises en parallèle; ou Apologie pour les Réformateurs, pour la Réformation, & pour les Réformez: divisée en quatre parties: contre un Libelle intitulé Histoire du Calvinisme par Mr Maimbourg. It was printed in two Volumes in 4^{to}, and in four in 12^o.

(3) Menagiana, Tom. ii. p. 22, 23, of the Paris Edition, 1694.

(4) See Mr de Bauquemau's Letter (sur les différens de Mr Jurieu & de Mr Bayle, pag. 1 and 2.

"(1), that all the Writings of a man do not resemble one another. The General Criticism of Father Maimbourg, was published soon after the Thoughts concerning Comets; yet no body seemed to suspect that these two books came from the same hand. The first edition of the Criticism was sold off, before any body so much as suspected the true author. And tho' the second edition possibly might have discovered him better, yet in all probability, if it had not been for a mere accident he had remained still unknown. The accident was this. The author having writ an answer to an Anonymous Letter which his bookseller had sent him, forgot to desire the bookseller not to deliver the original of the answer but a copy. "This Anonymous person being a friend of Mr Claude, the son, shewed him my Letter and asked if he knew the hand. Mr Claude having told him whose it was, there wanted no more to put the author under a necessity of making a secret of it no longer. The matter could never have been discovered by the conformity of stile. For although the author did not at all intend it, he wrote the Criticism on Maimbourg in a stile very different from that of the Thoughts concerning Comets."

Mr Jurieu likewise wrote an answer to Mr Maimbourg, but more full and circumstantial. It appeared in 1683, under the title of A Parallel between the History of Calvinism and that of Popery: Or an Apology for the Reformers, the Reformation, and the Reformed: in four parts: In answer to a Libel intituled, The History of Calvinism by Mr Maimbourg (2). This book was well written; the author refuted Mr Maimbourg with a great deal of force; but one could not find there that easy and natural turn, those lively and poignant reflexions, that manner of exposing the faults of an adversary without bitterness, and of treating matters of controversy without passion; which was the distinguishing character of the Critique Generale. Every one was presently sensible of this difference. Even the Catholics, notwithstanding the prejudices of their religion, could not help applauding Mr Bayle's book, while at the same time they affected to despise that of Mr Jurieu. "The Criticism on Father Maimbourg's History of Calvinism is a fine book, said Mr Menage (3) and he himself could not help esteeming it. He confessed this to me, tho' ordinarily he affected to speak of it as a book which he had not read. Excepting what relates to religion, I find every thing Mr Bayle says very lively and very judicious. I had a mind to read what Mr Jurieu has done on the same subject; there is a great difference betwixt them. "Mr Bayle writes like a gentleman, and Mr Jurieu like a bigotted old woman, "his book is nothing but a wretched repetition of the dullest things alledged by "du Moulin, and the rest of them against the Catholic religion." The different esteem showed to these two books, infinitely displeased Mr Jurieu. He looked upon Mr Bayle as his rival, and could not forgive him for carrying away all the suffrages. This accident sowed the seeds of hatred and jealousy in his mind (4).

Amongst the other men of Letters with whom Mr Bayle contracted a friendship at Sedan, we ought to number Mr Ferizon, a young Minister and a native of that town. He had left Sedan, and was gone to exercise his Ministry in Champagne, in Mr de Briquemau's family (5). He wrote to Mr Bayle that he had composed by way of dialogue an Apology for the Reformed, with regard to the civil wars of France. Mr Bayle desired to see the book, and Mr Ferizon sent it him, and dedicated it to Philareus, that is to Mr Bayle himself. Mr Bayle found that it deserved to be published and caused it to be printed (6). It appeared in the beginning of the year 1683, under this title; An Apology for the Reformed; wherein a just idea is given of the civil wars in France, and of the true foundations of the Edict of Nantz. Being a curious dialogue betwixt a Protestant and a Catholic (7). PATRICIUS, the Roman Catholic, alledges the strongest and most odious things that have been said against the Reformed with regard to the civil wars, and doth not forget the common accusation, that they are animated by a spirit of faction and rebellion; and that they maintain principles opposite to the absolute power of princes. EUSEBIUS, the Protestant, justifies them for taking up arms in defence of their religion, their lives, and the rights of the house of Bourbon; and shews, even by the testimony of Lewis XIII, that they have always been faithful to their lawful princes, and that their principles are so far from being opposite to the sovereign power of princes, that they tend to establish and

(5) Mr de Briquemau's estate situated upon the river of Aisne, was called St Loup. Mr de Briquemau being afterwards obliged to leave France upon account of his religion. The Elector of Brandenburg made him Governor of Liplads in the country of Cleves.

(6) At the Hague, by Abraham Arondeus, in 12^o.

(7) Apologie pour les Réformez, où on voit la juste idée des Guerres Civiles de France: & les vrais fondemens de l'Edit de Nantes. Entretiens curieux entre un Protestant & un Catholique.

confirm it; whereas, on the other hand, the Roman Catholics make that authority dependant on the people or on the Pope. 1682.

About the end of the year 1682 Mr Bayle was strongly sollicit to marry. The match propos'd to him was advantageous. She was a beautiful young lady, of very good sense, good nature and prudence, was entirely at her own disposal, and had at least fifteen thousand crowns (1). Mademoiselle du Moulin, grandchild of the famous Peter du Moulin, sister to Mrs Jurieu, and afterwards wife to Mr Basnage, had set this affair in motion, and had put it in so good a way, that there remained no difficulty except on Mr Bayle's side. He had always appeared very averse to marriage: the cares and troubles of a family did not seem to him to suit a man of letters, a Philosopher who makes all his happiness consist in study and meditation. Besides, as he contented himself with what was necessary, riches appeared to him rather an incumbrance than a happiness. Mademoiselle du Moulin spared no pains to make him change these sentiments, and to engage him to make use of these advantages, which in a manner offered themselves; but she was unsuccessful.

(1) Letter of Mademoiselle du Moulin to Mr Bayle, of the 12th of December 1682. In Mr Bayle's Letters, pag. 193.

The Year following Mr Bayle gave a new edition of his Letter concerning Comets, fuller and more exact than the first. The impression of it was finished the second of September 1683, and he received a hundred and twenty copies of it from the bookseller to send to his friends. He suppressed the title of the first edition, and substituted the following: Divers Thoughts written to a Doctor of the Sorbonne, upon occasion of the Comet which appeared in the month of December, 1680. At Rotterdam, by Reinier Leers, MDC LXXXIII (2). He likewise suppressed the long preface of the foregoing edition, and instead of it inserted an advertisement in the bookseller's name, pointing out the advantages of this second edition beyond the preceding.

(2) Pensées diverses, écrites à un Docteur de Sorbonne à l'occasion de la Comète qui parut au mois de Décembre 1680. A Rotterdam chez Reinier Leers, 1683.

(3) It is intitled, Lettre sur la dernière Assemblée du Clergé A. M. B. A. R. that is to say, à Mr Bayle à Rotterdam.

(4) Examen des Methodes proposées par Mess. de l'Assemblée du Clergé de France en l'Année 1682. It was printed at Rotterdam by Pierre de Graef, but the title bears à Cologne chez Pierre Marteau, in 12°.

About this time some of Mr Bayle's Friends sent him some pieces of controversy which they had compos'd, and desired him to get them printed if he thought proper. The first which he received was a Confutation of the Memorial drawn up by the Assembly of the Clergy of France in 1682, wherein they propos'd and approved of seventeen Methods, or different manners of disputing against the Reformed. This Confutation was wrote by Mr Basnage, at that time minister of Rouen. It was accompanied with a Letter to Mr Bayle, in the name of a friend to the author, which contained several curious particulars relating to that Assembly of the Clergy (3). This work came out under the title of An Examination of the Methods propos'd by the Assembly of the Clergy of France in the year 1682 (4). Mr Basnage had desired that the manuscript might be communicated to Mr Jurieu, and Mr Jurieu prefixed his approbation to the book. The other pieces which were sent to Mr Bayle, were in answer to a book of Mr Brueys Advocate of Montpellier. Mr Brueys had distinguished himself among the Reformed by a confutation of a book of Mr Bossuet, Bishop of Condom, and afterwards of Meaux, entituled An Exposition of the doctrine of the Catholic Church. But he afterwards changed his Religion, and according to the common practice of new converts, he wrote against the party which he had left. His book appeared in 1683 with the following title, The reasons which have given occasion to the separation of the Protestants, examined without prejudice, according to the Council of Trent, the Confessions of Faith of the Protestant Churches, and the holy Scripture (5). It was wrote in a mild and insinuating manner, and had an air of disinterestedness, very proper at first sight to catch weak and superficial minds: it was thought necessary that it should be answered. Mr Jurieu, who had written a Tract entituled, Préservatif contre le changement de Religion, in answer to the bishop of Meaux's book, published a continuation of it against this piece of Mr Brueys. Mr de Larroque, son to the Minister of Rouen, who had been received into the Ministry in one of the last Synods, did likewise enter the lists. He wrote an answer to Mr Brueys, and sent it to Mr Bayle, who presently put it to the press. The title of it is, The Proselyte abused: or Mr Brueys's false views in his examination of the separation of Protestants (6). It has an epistle dedicatory prefixed, To Mr  Professor of Philosophy and History at Rotterdam, wherein Mr Larroque gives an account of the composition, design, and plan of this work. Mr Bayle would not suffer his name to appear before the dedication, though it was easy to those who knew Holland, or had any commerce with men of Letters, to see that it was address'd to him. He has spoke very advantageously of Mr Larroque's book. "It is (says he (7), the first essay of a young author full of wit, who follows his adversary very close, and shows him that he has made gross blunders. "He sometimes makes use of raillery, which is somewhat strong indeed, yet at the same time delicate; and he acquits himself very well likewise in point of erudition." Mr Lenfant, who at that time studied Divinity at Geneva, wrote likewise against Mr Brueys. But being informed that several learned men were employed on the same subject, he would have suppress'd his answer, if Mr Bayle and Mr Jurieu had not press'd him to finish it, and make it public (8). After he had made some stay at Geneva, he went to Heidelberg, from whence he sent Mr Bayle his manuscript, and desired him to make what alterations in it he should think proper. Mr Lenfant did not choose to enter into the detail of the dispute, but contented himself

1683.

(5) Examen des raisons qui ont donné lieu à la séparation des Protestans, fait sans prévention sur le Concile de Trente, sur la Confession de l'oi des Eglises Protestantes, & sur l'Ecriture sainte.

(6) Le Prosélyte abusé: ou fausses vues de Mr Brueys dans l'examen de la séparation des Protestans. At Rotterdam for Reinier Leers, 1684, in 12°.

(7) Nouvelles de République des Lettres, Mar. b 1684, p. m. 101. See likewise the Letter to Mr Lenfant of the 26th of November 1683, pag. 204.

(8) See the Letters to Mr Lenfant of the 8th of September and 26th of November 1683, pag. 201, and the following.

1683. himself with reasoning upon general principles. His book appeared about the beginning of the year 1684, with this title, General considerations on Mr Brueys's book, intituled, An Examination of the reasons which have given occasion to the separation of Protestants, and occasionally upon all those of the same character (1). There was an advertisement added to it, wherein after showing how people might be deceived by Mr Brueys's book, and the necessity there was of answering it, they ascribed his change of Religion merely to worldly motives, and even attacked his Morals. This advertisement was followed by a long Letter of the Author to a friend, upon sending him his manuscript, that is to say, to Mr Bayle. Mr Lenfant there gave the character of Mr Brueys's book, and pointed out a great many weak places in it. This answer is written with a great deal of wit, judgment, and moderation, qualities which reign in all Mr Lenfant's writings.

1684. Mr Bayle was always very curious in gathering those sorts of pieces which are called Fugitives, because they disappear almost as soon as they come out. The only way to preserve them, is to gather as many of them together as will make a volume. This Mr Bayle did, with regard to several pieces relating to Des Cartes's Philosophy. He published them under the title of A collection of some curious pieces relating to Mr Des Cartes's Philosophy. At Amsterdam, by H. Desbordes, MDCLXXXIV (2). He wrote a preface to them, wherein he gave the history of these pieces, and lamented the slavery of the writers in France. "It would be a great misfortune for the whole Republic of Letters, says he, if they were every where as formal and captious with regard to the printing of books, as they have been in France for some time past, where the Inquisition, which they are establishing there apace, prevents the publication of many fine pieces, and discourages the best writers. And who would not be discouraged to see those people, who are appointed to license books, keep a manuscript for three or four years without looking into it, and then disapprove every thing there that discovers a mind elevated above slavery and vulgar opinions? What mortification for an author, who never thinks the press can go fast enough upon his works, after a delay of three or four years, to find himself commanded to suppress what he thinks is most valuable in his writings, if he would not rather chuse to see them condemned to eternal silence, by being refused the Royal Privilege?" This Collection contains, I. A sort of Concordat, entered into betwixt the Jesuits and the Fathers of the Oratory, by which these last oblige themselves neither to teach Des Cartes Philosophy, nor the doctrine of Janfenius. II. Remarks upon this concordat. III. An Explanation concerning Mr de la Ville, or rather Father de Valois's book (3). This piece was wrote by Mr Bernier, so well known by his Voyages, and his Abridgment of Gassendus's Philosophy. Father de Valois had placed him in the list of the new Philosophers, who destroy the doctrine of Transubstantiation, by maintaining that the essence of matter consists in extension. His book made a great noise in France, and alarmed all the Cartesians. Mr Regis, who held conferences at Paris, was obliged to give them over. Mr Bernier was afraid for himself, and published this explanation, wherein he endeavours to reconcile the principles of his own philosophy, with the decisions of the church. This collection likewise contains, IV. An answer of Father Malebranche to Father de Valois, who had shewed great animosity against him, and particularly endeavoured to raise suspicions of his orthodoxy. This answer was followed by a Memoir, explaining the possibility of Transubstantiation. V. The Theses which Mr Bayle had made his scholars recite, in 1680: Dissertatio in qua vindicantur à Peripateticorum exceptionibus rationes quibus aliqui Cartesiani probantur essentiam corporis sitam esse in extensione. Mr Bayle joined some Philosophical Theses to this Dissertation, where he maintains, among other things, that place, motion, and time, have not as yet been defined in an intelligible manner. VI. A piece which had been printed at Paris, under the title of Meditations concerning Metaphysics, by William Wander (4). The Abbé Lanion is the author of it (5). It contains the substance of the Cartesian Metaphysics, and the most valuable things in Des Cartes's Meditations. Nay every thing here seems even better digested, than in Des Cartes's book, and the author appears to have penetrated further than that Philosopher. This is Mr Bayle's judgment of it.

Mr Bernier's Explanation was refuted in a book printed at Paris in 1682, entitled, The Philosophy of Des Cartes repugnant to the faith of the Catholic church, together with a refutation of the pamphlet lately printed in defence of it (6). The pamphlet mentioned in this title, is Mr Bernier's performance. The author of this book says, that having seen Mr de la Ville's treatise, he found that the author had very successfully attacked the System of the Cartesians on the subject of the essence of matter, but that their opinion concerning it's accidents and qualities had not been refuted. So that he thought it necessary to handle this last point, and to add to it a new discussion of the first, to make the work complear. He divides his book into two parts. In the first he shows, "That if the essence of the body consists in actual extension, the body of JESUS CHRIST cannot be really and actually in the Eucharist, since a thing cannot exist without it's essence, but it must be there only figuratively, that is, purely in imagination and thought, or in imaginary apprehension, which makes us believe it present where it

(1) Considerations générales sur le livre de Mr Brueys, intitule, Examen des raisons qui ont donné lieu à la separation des Protestans, & par occasion sur ceux du meme caractère. At Rotterdam, for Reinier Leers, 1684.

(2) Recueil de quelques pieces curieuses concernant la philosophie de Mr Des-cartes. A Amsterdam chez Henry Desbordes, 1684.

(3) See above, pag. xiii.

(4) Meditations sur la Metaphysique, par Guillaume Wander.

(5) See Réponse aux Questions d'un Provincial, Tom. I. chap. xxvi. pag. 223, 224.

(6) La Philosophie de Mr Des-cartes contraire à la Foy Catholique. Avec la Refutation d'un Imprimé fait depuis peu pour sa défense.

" it is not : " and in the second, he proves " That by establishing, as Des Cartes doth, " that there is nothing in the substance but the substance itself, and that the qualities " and accidents which we fancy to exist in it, are only simple appearances that " abuse our senses, and make them believe that there is something really existing " in the substance, which doth not exist there, but only in our thoughts; we destroy " the doctrine of the Church, which teaches us that in the Eucharist, the substance " of the bread and wine being destroyed, and quite changed into the body and " blood of JESUS CHRIST, the accidents, which were in it, remain still, which " necessarily supposeth that the accidents are really distinct from the substance, and " can exist without it." This book is very little known. Mr Bayle doth not mention it, possibly because it never came to his knowledge, and I take notice of it here only because of the relation it has to this Collection which Mr Bayle had published.

The manner of acquainting the public by way of Journal, with what passeth in the Republic of Letters, is one of the finest undertakings of the last age. The honour of it is due to Mr de Sallo, Ecclesiastic Counsellor in the parliament of Paris, who published the Journal des Sçavans in the year 1665. This work was received every where with applause, and was imitated in Italy and in Germany. Mr Bayle was surprized to see that in Holland, where there were so many learned men, so many bookfellers, and so great a liberty of the press, no body had as yet thought of publishing a Literary Journal. He had been several times tempted to do it, but considering that a work of this kind requires a great deal of time and application, he had laid aside that design. In the mean while there appeared about the end

(1) Nouvelles Découvertes dans toutes les parties de la médecine.

(2) Chimie démontrée, préface, p. lxxvii.

(3) Nouvelles de la République des Lettres.

(4) In an advertisement which he published at the end of the Nouvelles for the month of May, of the first edition, and which he repeated on the reverse of the title page, in the following editions.

(5) See the Letter to Mr le Clerc of the 18th of June 1684. p. 213, and the following.

of the month of February 1684, a Journal printed at Amsterdam by Henry Desbordes, with the title of Mercure Sçavant du mois de Janvier 1684. This was an attempt of the Sieur de Blegny, a surgeon of Paris, a man fertile in projects, of which take the following instances. Having observed that several people held conferences on Philosophy, and other sciences, he would needs pretend to do the same, and erected an Academy of new discoveries in his own house. He read private lectures to the Surgeons apprentices, under the name of a Course of Surgery; and to the Apothecaries apprentices by the name of a Course of Pharmacy: he even undertook to give a Course of Periwigs for the Perwig-makers apprentices. Every body was admitted to them for a certain price. He meddled likewise in physic, and came at last to take the titles of " Counsellor, Physician, " Artist in ordinary to his Majesty and to the Dauphin, and overseer, by his " Majesty's command, of enquiries and examinations of new discoveries in Physic." In 1679 he undertook a sort of Journal, intitled, New Discoveries in all the parts of Physic (1). He published it monthly; but his abusive manner of treating several persons of merit, produced an Arrêt of the Council, which put a stop to it in 1682. The Sieur de Blegny not daring to print his Journal in France, turned his eyes towards Holland, and chose Mr Gautier, a physician of Niort who lived at Amsterdam, for his partner in this project, and furnished him with the materials. This new Journal contained no extracts of Books, but several small pieces generally on subjects relating to physic. It contained likewise songs set to music, poetry, and political news. And he was more abusive in it than he had formerly been in his Journal of Physic.

A work so ill conceived and so ill executed, piqued Mr Bayle and made him re-assume his former design of publishing a Journal. Mr Jurieu pressed him strongly to undertake it. He was glad to have a sure hand to write panegyrics on all the books he should publish (2). Mr Bayle yielded to his solicitations, and began to set about his Journal the 21st of March 1684. Upon the 4th of April he made an agreement with the Sieur Desbordes for the impression, and resolved to publish it once a month, under the title of News from the Republic of Letters (3); and to begin with the month of March. The Mercure Sçavant was published only for the months of January and February: whereupon several people fancied that Mr Bayle was the author of it; which obliged him to disown it in express terms (4). The News from the Republic of Letters, for the month of March, did not appear 'till the 27th of May, and those of the month of April 'till the 2d of June: but he laboured so hard, that the Journal of July was published in the beginning of August, and so on, the News of every month appearing in the beginning of the following. In the preface he gives an account of the plan which he had laid down, which did not differ much from that of the other Journalists. He divided every Journal into two parts; the first contained large extracts, and the second a catalogue of new books, accompanied with remarks. This last part of his plan gave him occasion to mention a much greater number of books, and to make a great many Pieces known to the public, of which he did not think it proper to give an extract. He embellished his extracts with a thousand curious and entertaining particulars concerning the history of authors, their works and controversies; and with many ingenious and delicate reflexions. He did not write only for the learned: he intended likewise to please and be of use to the polite world (5). In a word, every thing was lively and animated in his extracts; " he had the art of giving a gay turn 1684. "turn to all sorts of subjects, and of giving the readers a notion of a book in "very few words, without fatiguing them either with a bad choice, or with "dull and tiresome reflexions. He was wise and reserved in judging of the "merit of books, neither desiring to shock authors, nor to expose himself by pro-

(1) *Eloge
de Mr Bayle, by Mr de Bauval.*

(2) See the Advertisse-ment prefixed to the Month of August 1684.

(3) *See the Advertisse-
ment before the Addition to the divers Thoughts concerning Comets.*

(4) The 161b of May.

(5) *Letters to Mr. Mi-nucoli of the 9th of July,
1682, pag.
183; and of the 15th of July
1683 pag.
197, 198.*

(6) *See the Article
AU RI-EGE.*

(7) *See a Letter of the Count de Dbona to Mr Bayle, of the 28th
of September, 1684,
pag. 227,
228.*

"stituting his commendations (1)." People were of opinion that at first he praised too much, and this obliged him to be more sparing of his applause (2). He received advice with pleasure, and knew how to profit by it. This work was received with universal applause. Mr Bayle had flattered himself that it would not be prohibited in France, it was forbidden however, but this prohibition could not hinder a great many copies of it from passing there every month. Every body read it with eagerness.

The States of the Province of Friesland, to whom Mr Bayle was known by his Letter concerning Comets (3), on the 29th of March, appointed him to be Professor of Philosophy in the University of Franeker, with a salary of nine hundred gilders. This resolution was communicated to him by a letter of the 21st of April, which he received on the 9th of May. He wrote an answer to it next day, desiring to be allowed some time to consider of it; and upon the 9th of June wrote them a letter of thanks, but declined accepting that place, though the salary was near double what he had at Rotterdam.

While Mr Bayle was deliberating about this invitation to Franeker, he had an account (4) of the death of his brother Joseph, a young gentleman of great merit. After he had begun the study of Divinity at Puylaurens, he went to Geneva in 1682 to finish it, where he continued above a year. From thence he went to Paris, where he was invited (5) to be governour to Mr Duffon, son to the Marquis de Bonac (6). He died there the 9th of May 1684, regretted by all who knew him (7). He had a great deal of wit and penetration, together with a great share of piety and modesty. He was learned and laborious, and was likely to make a very considerable Figure in the Republic of Letters. Mr Bayle loved him tenderly, and was no less beloved by him. He was sensibly afflicted with his death. "I am "infinitely obliged to you (says he to Mr Lenfant (8), for the share you have taken "in the loss of my poor brother, every body wrote and spoke of him very ad"vantageously to me. I loved him dearly, and he loved me, if possible, still more.
"Praise be to God, who has been pleased to take him out of this world, and to "deprive me of the comfort I expected from him: you have lost a good friend "who had the utmost esteem for you; so that you have had some interest in la"menting his Death."

There appeared about this time a third edition of the General Criticism on the History of Calvinism. The second edition had been reprinted at Geneva, but notwithstanding this, it was very soon out of print. In the advertisement to this third edition Mr Bayle says, that being convinced that this would be the last time of printing that book, he would very willingly have brought it as near perfection as possible, by making some necessary additions and alterations; but that he durst not venture to do so, lest he should disoblige those, who had already bought the two former editions, who frequently complained of new editions revised, corrected, and augmented, because they disgust people at the former editions, and make them regret their having laid out their money upon them. Upon this account he had managed matters so, that this edition did not differ much from the preceding, and he acquainted all those who had the second, that they might be contented with it, and that this edition ought not to tempt them. Not that this (adds he) is not less faulty than the two former, but it is not so to such a degree as to deserve notice. But we must not understand this strictly: this third edition contains many considerable additions and alterations. He likewise made some change in the order of the Letters, but above all he was at particular pains to correct the stile, by striking out all ambiguous expressions and rhymes. He upon this occasion observes how difficult it is in writing French to avoid verses, jingling of words, and phrases wherein one word may relate to different parts of the sentence, and so cause double meanings.

1685. In the beginning of the year 1685, he published a continuation of the Critique Generale, under the title of New Letters of the author of the General Criticism on the History of Calvinism of Mr Maimbourg. Part I. wherein several passages which have been found fault with, as containing contradictions, false reasonings, and other mistakes of that sort are justified, and several curious matters relating to this subject are occasionally handled. At Ville Franche by Peter le Blanc, MDC LXXXV (9). To these New Letters a long preface, or advice to the readers, is prefixed, wherein Mr Bayle takes notice that after having, with much difficulty, consented to their being put to the press, he had been frequently tempted to put a stop to the impression, when he considered how rare it was for an author, who ventures to publish a continuation of a book which has been well received, not to miscarry. "These continuations (says he) make people almost always say, that the "author has not held out, that he ought to have rested where he was, that he "ought to have known his strength better, and that he was much in the wrong
"to run the hazard of lessening the opinion the public had conceived of him." He

(8) *Letter of the 8th
of August
1684. pag.
219, 220.*

(9) *Nouvelles Lettres de l'auteur de la Critique Générale de l'His-toire du Calvinisme de Mr Maimbourg.
Premiere partie, où en justi-fiant quelques en-droits qui ont semblé con-tenir des contra-dictions, de faux raisonnemens & autres méprises sembla-bles; on traite par occasion de plusieurs choses curieu-ses, qui ont du rapport à ces ma-tières. A Ville Franche chez Pierre le Blanc,
1685.*

shows that people are sometimes in the right in judging so, but that for the most part they are very much in the wrong, and that when the continuation of a book is less esteemed than what went before it, is not so much the fault of the author as of the readers. But since the misfortune is not the less upon this account, he concludes that excepting a few privileged authors, all others ought to be afraid of the comparison which people will make betwixt their works, if the first has had the good fortune to please. He adds that no body ever had more reason to be apprehensive of this comparison than himself, and takes notice of several circumstances which luckily concurred to procure a good reception to the General Criticism on the History of Calvinism, which did not now subsist in favour of these New Letters. But that at last he had suffered them to be made public, with a resolution of looking with perfect indifference upon the opinion the public might have concerning them. Mean while he acquaints the reader that he will find in the second Volume several passages which have not all the gravity, which possibly he may expect in that book; nay that he may possibly be of opinion, that some of them are too much a-kin to trifling. For this reason he declares that he doth not pretend here to write for the learned, but for a great many people who love reading, and not being deep scholars, want, properly speaking, only an innocent amusement whereby they may learn something, but with little trouble. They who would judge of this book, says he, ought to remember that this was the intention of the author. We have only the first part of this work: Mr Bayle intended to publish two parts more, and had even begun to compose them, but did not finish them. "It was originally intended (says he) that this first part should be followed by two others, the first of which was to have satisfied those who had said, that several things which deserved great consideration had been too briefly handled in the General Criticism, such as the Conference of Poissy, the first rising in Arms, the Version of the Psalms, &c. and the second was to have explained some difficulties in the controversy. But though something has been prepared a good while ago, for both the one and the other of these parts, yet in all appearance other business will hinder the author to finish them."

(1) Letter of the 2d of April, 1685, pag 237.

Mr Bayle sent a copy of this book to Mr Lenfant, and assured him that he might let him know the faults in it without fearing to displease him. "I desire (says he (1), you will accept of a copy of the Continuation of the Critique Generale. . . . I am not at all pleased with this last book, and you will oblige me if you will sincerely show me it's faults. Do not be afraid that you will in the least displease me by doing so. My friends cannot oblige me more than by telling me frankly the faults they find in my small productions. I have been tried in this matter, and I can say from experience that their censures do not in the least offend me."

(2) July 1685. Art. viii. p. m. 780, 781.

This Continuation had not the same success with the Critique Generale. All that Mr Bayle had said in the Preface, to show the difference betwixt these two pieces, and to give a just idea of this last, was to no purpose. No notice was taken of it. Neither would people understand what he had said in the ninth Letter concerning the rights of an erring Conscience, and concerning innocent Errors; though he had taken all possible precaution to explain himself fully on these heads. He complained of this six months after in the News from the Republic of Letters, upon occasion of some reflexions of Father Malebranche's concerning the carelessness of readers. "It must be confessed (says he (2), that the generality of readers are strange sort of people, one may take the trouble of acquainting them with a thousand things, one may commend this and the other thing to them in the most humble manner, they will nevertheless follow their own humour and custom. Good stories have been made concerning the useless precautions of mothers and husbands: I am surpris'd that no body has given us a history of the useless precautions of authors. I know one whose book has not been published above six months, who omitted nothing to secure himself from rash judgments; his preface had given very essential advices, and in those places where he distrusted his readers, he had expressly warned them that they would certainly mistake him, if they did not carefully examine the whole series of his reasoning; he had even carried his precautions so far as to print his real sentiments in large letters, and to threaten the readers in some sort, that if they committed any mistakes there, they should be inexcusable. All this signified nothing, he has been informed, that notwithstanding all his care, even people whose profession it was to know these things, have fallen into those mistakes which he had been at so much pains to warn them of."

(3) Par le Sieur B... Professeur en Philosophie & en Histoire à Rotterdam.

Mr Bayle began the second year of his News from the Republic of Letters, that is to say, the month of March 1685, by an addition to the title, which made it no longer an anonymous work; he added these words, By Mr B... Professor of Philosophy and History at Rotterdam (3). He added likewise an Advertisement, wherein he says that he thought himself obliged to let the public know distinctly the place where this Journal was composed, that they might see that the Magistrates of Rotterdam honour the Muses with their protection, and that this work was composed by one of the Professors whom they had settled in their New Illustrious School; and declares, that 1685. that though he doth not dedicate it in the ordinary forms, he doth nevertheless entirely consecrate it to them. He expressed himself in a still stronger manner, in an article of the month of March, where he is giving the extract from a book, wherein it was observed, that the town of Rotterdam had always favoured the Belles Letters. "What this city did three years ago, adds Mr Bayle (1), is a very (1) Art. viii, pag. m. 312. "evident proof of their love to the Sciences. It is easy to observe that I mean the ILLUSTRIOUS SCHOOL, which the honourable Magistrates of Rotterdam generously founded in 1681. If the public shall receive any instruction, or useful amusement from these News from the Republic of Letters, they will be obliged for it to those gentlemen, since it is to them that I owe the sweet tranquillity which enables me to support this laborious task. It is under the protection of this glorious Senate that these collections are composed, ille nobis hæc otia fecit, and I am very glad to find here so natural an occasion, of testifying my gratitude, and of declaring, that if the public has any good opinion of this work, I consecrate it entirely to the glory of this city."

Upon the eighth day of May, 1685, Mr Bayle was informed that his father died upon Saturday the 30th of the preceeding March. This was very afflicting news to him, but his grief was redoubled, when he heard that his elder brother was in prison upon account of religion. The Bishop of Rieux did not know what was become of Mr Bayle, till the time in which the General Criticism on the History of Calvinism made a noise in France, and it was known that he was the author of it.

This Book renewed their vexation for his escape from Toulouse, and his return to the Reformed Religion. They had endeavoured several times to revenge themselves upon his brother, but that minister, by his wife and prudent conduct, had still escaped the pursuits of his enemies. At last they applied to Mr de Louvois, a violent and revengeful man, who at this time was the author of unheard of cruelties against the Reformed in several provinces. Mr de Louvois had taken offence at several strokes in the General Criticism concerning the conduct of the French Court with regard to the Reformed, and so gave orders that Mr Bayle, the Minister of Carla should be seized. They sent a great number of public officers to his house, who dragged him out of his closet, and carried him to the prison of Pamiers, upon the 11th of June. From thence he was removed to Bourdeaux, on the 10th of July, to the Chateau Trompette, and confined in a stinking and infectious dungeon. They used all their efforts to make him change his religion, but neither their promises, their threats, nor their outrages, were capable to shake him. He showed a constancy and steadfastness which astonished his persecutors, and praised God who had called him to suffer for the truth. But the delicacy of his constitution could not bear such barbarous usage: he died the 12th of November, after five months imprisonment. In this manner he "crowned (2) (2) Cabale Chimerique, pag. 313. "that piety which he had shewed during the whole course of his life, by an heroic death, which was admired even by those who had done every thing in their power to make him die a Papist, and over whose attacks he triumphed gloriously." He was well versed in sacred and prophane history, and in the knowledge both of ancient and modern authors. His zeal for his religion was attended with mildness and wisdom. Although he had a very lively sense of the many injuries done to the Reformed, yet he still preserved an inviolable fidelity to the King's person, and a perfect submission to his commands, being persuaded that a Christian ought to oppose nothing to his sovereign, but supplications and tears (3).

Mr Paets was at this time in England, on the affairs of the States, and as the question about Toleration was then very much debated there, he wrote a Latin Letter, on the 12th of September, upon that subject to Mr Bayle, which Mr Bayle got printed at Rotterdam, under the following title: *H. V. P. ad B (4) de nuperis Angliæ motibus Epistola, in qua de diversorum à publica Religione circa divina sententiarum differtur Tolerantia. In this letter, Mr Paets begins with admiring that change, which had been made in the minds and opinions of the English, with regard to James II. He praised that prince for not dissembling his Religion at his accession to the crown; and hoped that he would faithfully observe the promise he had made to his Protestant subjects, of allowing them the peaceable enjoyment of their Religion. The rest of the Letter is employed in confuting those who maintain, that Princes ought not to suffer any Religion but one in their dominions, and that subjects ought not to submit to any Prince but of their own Religion. He shews that nothing is more opposite to the spirit of primitive Christianity, than a spirit of persecution, and after having examined the reasons adduced by Politicians and Divines against Toleration, he attacks the infallible authority arrogated by the Church of Rome. In a Postscript he clears up and confirms some things he had said in the Letter, and shews that it would be easy to reduce all the Sects among Protestants into one society. Mr Bayle being of opinion that this Letter was very fit to inspire sentiments of mildness and moderation, thought proper to translate it into French. This translation appeared in the month of

(3) See his Discoursje to Mr Da-guesseau, Intendant of the Generality of Montauban, and his answer to the Com-missary of Mazarres, in the Histoire de Mr Bayle & de ses Ouvrages, printed at Amsterdam 1716, pag. 98, and the following.

(4) That is, Hadrian Van Paets ad Bælium.

August.

August. It was likewise translated into Dutch. Mr Bayle gave an abstract of it in his Journal of the Month of October 1685; and Mr Paets being dead after the impression of that article, he in a new edition added a few words, by way of elogy upon that great man. "This is not the first time, (says he (1), that the illustrious Mr Paets, author of the Letter of which we have been speaking, has reasoned "strongly upon the subject of Toleration. There are some other Letters of his "upon this subject, in the Collection of the praestantium ac eruditiorum Virorum "Epistolae, printed first in Quarto, and reprinted in Folio at Amsterdam, in the "year 1684. These are beautiful monuments of his eloquence, and of the strength "of his judgment. He could have easily produced many more considerable than those, "if he had pleased to become an author, for he was a great Divine, a great Lawyer, "a great Politician, and a great Philosopher, he had a very happy conception "of things, and a surprizing penetration; never did man reason more strongly, "or give a greater air of dignity to what he said: but he was born for greater "employments than that of an author. The extraordinary embassy to Spain, which "he performed so advantageously for his country, at that time in a conternation "upon account of the great success of the French arms, shewed what he was capable of in affairs of State. What a loss is it to the public, that so great a man "did not live longer! hardly had he arrived to his 55th year, when he died "upon the 8th of October of the present year 1685; deserving all manner of "praise as much upon the account of his intrepidity, probity, generosity, integrity, "and all the other qualities of a gentleman, as upon the account of his great genius "and profound erudition. It is in quality of Journalist of the Republic of Letters, "that I am obliged to give this account of him. But what should I not be obliged "to say, if I were to speak agreeably to those sentiments of gratitude, which fill "my soul for the favours I have received from this illustrious person?"

Mr Bayle at this time was engaged in a dispute with Mr Arnauld, upon Father Malebranche's account. This Doctor in his Philosophical and Theological Reflexions on the New System of Nature and Grace of Father Malebranche, had vehemently opposed his opinion, viz. "That all pleasure is a good, and renders the person "who enjoys it actually happy." Mr Bayle, in making an extract of this work of Mr Arnauld, had declared himself for Father Malebranche. "There is nothing, (says he (2), more innocent, or more certain, than to say that all pleasure "renders the person happy who enjoys it, for the time in which he enjoys it, "and that notwithstanding this, we ought to shun those pleasures which attach us "to the body. . . . But some will say it is virtue, it is grace, it is the love of "God, or rather it is God alone who is our happiness. I agree that he is so in "quality of instrument or efficient cause, as the Philosophers speak; but in quality of "a formal cause, it is the pleasure, it is the satisfaction we enjoy, which constitutes our "happiness." He had observed before, that "those who had in any sort understood Father Malebranche's doctrine concerning the pleasure of the senses, would no "doubt be astonished that any body should find fault with him on that account; "and that if they did not remember that Mr Arnauld had made oath of his sincerity, in the preface to this last book, they would be ready to think that he "had only cavilled with his adversary, in order to render his morals suspected." Mr Arnauld who easily took fire, published a Piece intitled, An Advice to the Author of the News from the Republic of Letters (3), wherein he complained of this reflexion of Mr Bayle, and maintained that he had not only well understood, but likewise well confuted Father Malebranche's opinion. Mr Bayle gave the substance of this book in the Journal of December, and promised to make use of the vacation to examine it carefully. Accordingly he set about it, and the impression of his Answer was finished upon the 25th of February: it was intitled, An Answer of the Author of the News from the Republic of Letters, to an Advice which has been given him, concerning what he had said in favour of Father Malebranche about the pleasure of the senses (4). Mr Arnauld did not give up the point, he wrote a Reply under this title, A Dissertation concerning the pretended happiness arising from the pleasure of the senses, to serve for a Reply to an Answer which Mr Bayle has made to justify what he had said in his News from the Republic of Letters of September 1685, in favour of Father Malebranche against Mr Arnauld (5). Mr Bayle would have answered this Reply, if he had not been sick when it appeared, and he thought it would be too late to refute it when his health allowed him to write. However he afterwards did design to answer it, and fully to discuss that subject [F]. Notwithstanding he has only said a word or two about it in one of his works (6).

Mr Bayle

(1) Art. ii. p. 1093, 1394, of the third Edition.

(2) Nouvelles of the Month of August, 1685, Art. iii, pag. m. 876.

(3) Avis à l'Auteur des Nouvelles de la République des Lettres.

(4) Réponse de l'Auteur des Nouvelles de la République des Lettres à l'Avis qui lui a été donné sur ce qu'il a dit en faveur du P. Malebranche touchant le plaisir des sens, &c. at Rotterdam chez Pierre de Graef. 1685, in 12mo.

[F] Mr Bayle did afterwards design to answer Mr Arnauld, and to discuss that subject fully. This appears by a Letter published by the Abbé Archimbaud, in his New Collection of scarce pieces of History and Literature, &c (a). As this Letter was never printed except in that Collection (b), which is now pretty scarce, I thought it would not be unacceptable to the reader to find it here. It was wrote in the year 1694.

(b) Tom. iii. p. 64, & seq.

1685.

(5) Dissertation sur le prétendu bonheur du bon sens, pour servir de réplique à la Réponse qu'a faite Mr Bayle pour justifier ce qu'il a dit dans ses Nouvelles de la République de Lettres du mois de Septembre 1685, en faveur du P. Malebranche contre Mr Arnauld. Printed at Cologne (Rotterdam) 1687, in 8vo.

* He ought to have said du mois d'Aout.

(6) Critical Dictionary, Article ERICURUS, Rem. [G].

(c) L'Art de se connoître soy même, which they had reprinted at Lyons.

1685. Mr Bayle having observed in the Journal of September 1685 (1), that there were a great many errors in the Treatise concerning anonymous Authors, published by Mr Deckher, Advocate in the Imperial Chamber of Spire; Mr d'Almeveen, who designed to publish a new edition of this work, desired him to read it, and to point out to him the faults he should find in it. A learned man called Mr Vindingius had before this time wrote a letter to Mr Deckher, which had been printed with the second edition of this book, wherein he corrected some mistakes of the author, and furnished him with some supplements: but neither was this letter free from faults. Mr Bayle corrected both the one and the other, and added a discovery of several anonymous authors, in his answer to Mr d'Almeveen's letter. He concludes by saying that he could have furnished him with more ample and more curious remarks, if he had time to consult his papers and his friends, and if he had not been afraid of offending authors, who had a mind to be concealed. This letter was written upon the 6th and 7th of March 1686; and Mr d'Almeveen joined it to a new edition of Mr Deckher's book, printed at Amsterdam with this title: Jobannis Deckherii Doctoris & Imperialis Camerae Judicii Spirensis Advocati & Procuratoris, de Scriptis adscriptis, pseudepigraphis, & supposititiis Conjecturae. cum Additionibus Variorum. Editio Tertia altera parte auctior. Mr Bayle mentions it in his new Journal of April 1686 (2), and takes notice of some errors of the press in his letter.

(1) Art. 1.
Of the Catalogue of new Books, p.
m. 460.

1686. The cruel Persecution of the Reformed in France had very sensibly touched Mr Bayle, but he was quite overcome with grief, when he heard that in the month of October 1685, they had revoked the Edict of Nantes, which was the pledge and security of their rights and liberties; and that they had sent Dragoons into their houses, who lived there at discretion, and committed all sorts of disorders and violence to force them to embrace the Romish Religion. Some among them submitted outwardly, and others fled to foreign countries, that they might serve God there according to the dictates of their conscience. In the mean while the Missionaries and Popish writers, notwithstanding all this, impudently denied that any violence had been used towards them, and there was hardly two or three of them, who confessed the quartering of the troops upon them, which the Protestants called the Croisade Dragonne, the Conversions à la Dragonne, or simply the Dragonnade. Mr Bayle made several reflexions on this subject in his News from the Republic of Letters, with a great deal of wisdom and caution. But at last, the sight of so much injustice, so many cruelties and frauds, put him quite out of patience: being teized with an infinite number of books wherein nothing was talked of but the immortal Glory which Lewis the Great had acquired by destroying Heresy, and rendering France entirely Catholic, he published in the month of March 1686, a little book entitled, A Character of France entirely Catholic under the reign of Lewis le Grand (3). But that he might not be so much as suspected to be author of it, he feigned in the title that this book was printed at St Omer, and added an advertisement wherein the bookseller said that the manuscript had been given him by a Missionary lately returned from England, who had advised him to print it, being persuaded that it would be a proof of the rage of the Heretics.

(3) Ce que c'est que la France
toute Catholique sous le Regne de
Louis le
Grand.

This small piece is composed of three Letters. The second which makes the body of the book, is written to a Canon by a Refugee at London, who had been his friend. It is a very strong and severe censure of the conduct of France with regard to the Reformed. All the Catholics in France are here accused of having been concerned in the persecution: a hideous picture of the Church of Rome is here drawn; treachery and violence (says he) are its distinguishing characters: the pretended Converters are reproached with their ridiculous artifices, and their low and gross cheats: the injustice of the Arrêts is complained of, and particularly of that which allowed children of seven years of age to make choice of the Catholic Religion: the falsity of the reasons alledged in the Edict by which that of Nantes was revoked are shown: the dragooning is described in very lively colours: the oaths of Catholics, considered as such, are represented as a meer farce: their pretended zeal is ridiculed: the ruin of the Christian Religion is laid to the charge of the Catholic Clergy:

"It is an Answer to a Defence which I had published of an article of my News from the Republic of Letters, wherein I had sided with Father Mablebranche, against Mr Arnauld: I had maintained, that the pleasures of the senses are altogether spiritual and incorporeal beings or modifications, and that there is no pleasure, how gross soever or brutish, which in its own nature may not be a modification of the purest of all created substances. So that if some pleasures are at present criminal, it is only by accident, upon account of the occasions in which they are tasted, that is to say, because they are the consequences of an act of the will, which we know to be forbidden by God. But this doth not relate to the nature itself of the modifications of the mind, but is only an accidental relation, or ex institute, which arises from "the laws which God has revealed to man, either by his word, or by reason. From whence it follows, (and I think that I even took notice of this consequence), that the pleasures of taste, of sight, and of touch, may be communicated without the intervention of any corporeal organ, or that the eye may be indifferently the organ of the pleasures either of taste or of hearing, as it is ex institute of those of sight. I was sick when Mr Arnauld answered me, and before I recovered, the subject of our dispute was forgotten, so I have not to this day made any reply to him; but I will set about it when a proper occasion offers, and will show that it is impossible to maintain the spirituality of our souls, without admitting my principle."

Clergy : the conduct of the Converters is compared with that of the Pagan persecutors : 1686.
the Catholics are accused of having rendered Christianity odious to all other Religions ; and he maintains that the laws of humanity, and that general benevolence which we owe to all mankind, would oblige an honest man to inform the Emperor of China of what has lately past in France, and acquaint him that the Missionaries, who at first only desire a Toleration, did really intend to become masters, and that he could not rely on the fidelity of their Profelytes ; and concludes by saying that Priests and Monks carry discord, sedition, and cruelty, wherever they go. This is a general view of this Letter.

(1) Nouvelles of March 1686,
Art. iii. of New Books, p.
m. 346.

The reader will no doubt be glad to see Mr Bayle's judgment of it in his Journal.
“ They will possibly find (says he (1), too much fire here, and too great flights of “ fancy, but the beauty of the thoughts, and their solidity in the main, as to the “ facts, will very likely make them excuse what is excessive in it. Certainly there “ is enough said to the Converters in France to cover them with the highest “ confusion, if people of their trade could blush at any thing. The turn and vivacity “ which goes through the whole of it, will make few readers think it long, though “ it were really so.”

(2) Ce que c'est que la France toute Ca-
tholique,
pag. 125.

(3) Com-
mentaire philosophique sur ces paroles de Jesus-Christ, contrain-les d'entrer ; où l'on prouve par plusieurs raisons démonstratives, qu'il n'y a rien de plus abominable que de faire des Convertis-ons par la con-trainte, & où l'on refute tous les Sophis-
mes des Convertis-seurs à contrainte, & l'Apo-logie que St Augu-stin a faite des persecutions.
Traduit
de l'An-glois du Sieur Jean
Fox de Bruggs.
Par M. J. T.
A Cantorbery, chez Thomas Lit-
wel 1686.

In this manner Mr Bayle speaks of it, pretending not to know the author. The Canon being piqued by this letter, sends it to another Refugee at London, who was a friend of the author's, and desires him to give him his opinion of it. He assures him that he will give thanks to God, for having blest the gentle and charitable methods which had been used against a Religion which had rebelled both against God and the Church, and that he will strive by his prayers to obtain for him the grace of conversion. He afterwards desires him to read St Augustin's Letters, which (says he) show the injustice of the complaints of the Reformed, and unanswerably justify the means which had been used, in order to reclaim them. This Letter is the first of the three. In the third the Refugee answers to the Canon, with a great deal of mildness and moderation. He condemns the fallies and hyperbolical expressions of his friend, and confesses that there were an infinite number of good people in France, and even Priests and Monks, who had generously sympathized with the miseries of the Reformed, and had done them good offices ; and that his friend was to blame in saying, that he had not found one good man in France : but with regard to the Converters, he abandoned them to all the strokes of his friend's pen, and to the utmost extent of his invectives, together with all the Catholic Writers, who had denied that any violence had been used towards the Reformed. He asks some pretty lively questions on this subject, and says that having represented to his friend the great number of honest men they had found among the Catholics in France ; in answer to this he had maintained, that these honest men had acted in this matter not as Catholics, but as Frenchmen ; and that we ought to depend more upon a person, considered as having been instructed in the laws of civility and honour practised in France, than upon one considered as having been instructed in the Catechism of his Religion by his parish Priest. He adds, that he laughed at this distinction, but that his friend had shown him some sheets of a manuscript, translated from the English, containing the same thought. “ There “ is here, (says he (2), a learned Presbyterian and good Philosopher, who has “ wrote a Philosophical Commentary upon these words of the parable, compel “ them to come in, which is not as yet printed. They are at present translating “ it into our language. They have lent me some sheets of it, which I have “ read with great pleasure. The English have the most profound genius, and “ are the most given to meditation, of any people in the world. I do not “ believe that ever it was more strongly proved, that all constraint in religious “ matters is criminal and contrary both to reason and scripture. St Augustin, “ and the two Letters to which we are referred are here quite destroyed, and they “ shew him that if he had not argued better against the Heretics of his time, “ than he has done for the Persecutors, the Councils who have condemned Pela“ gius upon the report and opinion of St Augustin, must have been very easily “ satisfied or put out of humour. I will hasten the translation and impression of “ this Book, as much as possible. I am convinced that a great many Catho“ lics will approve of it, notwithstanding the prevailing spirit of those of your “ cloth.”

The book here promised is entitled, A Philosophical Commentary on these Words of JESUS CHRIST, compel them to come in. Wherein it is proved, by several invincible arguments, that there is nothing more abominable than to make converts by compulsion. With a confutation of all the sophisms of the advocates for constraint, as also of St Augustin's Apology for Persecution. Translated from the English of Mr John Fox de Bruggs. By M. I. T. At Canterbury, by Thomas Letwel, MDC LXXXVI (3). Mr Bayle inserted this title in his Journal of the Month of August 1686 (4), and added,
“ In the Journal of last March, pag. 345, we spoke of the piece entituled, Ce que “ c'est que la France toute Catholique, which is a small treatise wherein they promise
“ the publication of this Commentary. It will no doubt be a Commentary of a “ new kind. We had the title of it sent us from beyond sea two days ago, and they “ promise to send us the work itself very soon. We will then see whether it be so “ dreadful

1686. "dreadful a stroke to the whole Tribe of Converters, as they would make us believe in the letter of advice we have had about it." But all this was only a feint. The book was printing at Amsterdam for Wolligang, who had printed La France toute Catholique. The impression was finished in the month of October, and Mr Bayle mentions it in his Journal of the month of November (1).

This work is divided into three parts. In the first, Mr Bayle refutes the literal sense of these words Compel them to come in; and as this is not a theological or critical Commentary, but a philosophical one, that is to say, a work of pure reasoning, he lays it down in the beginning as a principle, "that natural reason, or the general principles of our knowledge, are the fundamental and original rule of all interpretation of scripture, especially in what regards to manners;" what comes to the same thing, that every particular doctrine, whether advanced as agreeable to Scripture, or proposed in any other manner, is false when it can be refuted by the clear and distinct notions of natural reason, especially if it regards morality: and he shews that all Divines, not even excepting the Roman Catholics, agree to this maxim. After having established and proved this principle, he shews that the literal sense of these words is false, I. Because it contradicts the most clear and distinct notions of our reason. II. Because it is contrary to the spirit of the Gospel. III. Because it totally overturns morality, both divine and human; confounds virtue and vice, and by that means opens a door to all imaginable confusion, and tends to the universal ruin of societies. IV. Because it furnisheth Infidels with a very lawful pretence of hindering the preachers of the Gospel to enter into their dominions, and of driving them out wherever they are found. V. Because it contains a general command, the execution of which must needs be attended with many crimes. VI. Because it takes away from the Christian Religion, a strong proof against false Religions, particularly against Mahometism, which was established by persecution. VII. Because it was unknown to the Fathers of the Church in the first three Centuries. VIII. Because it renders the complaints of the primitive Christians, against the Pagan persecutions, vain and ridiculous. IX. And lastly, because it would expose true Christians to continual oppression, without leaving them any thing to alledge, in order to put a stop to it, but the doctrines themselves in dispute betwixt the persecuted and persecutors, which is only a pitiful begging of the question, that would not prevent the world's becoming a continued scene of slaughter and cruelty.

In the second part, Mr Bayle answers the objections which might be raised against him, which he reduces to the following: I. "That force is not used in order to constrain the conscience, but to awaken those who refuse to examine." He refutes this plea, and examines what it is they call obstinacy. II. "That the literal sense is rendered odious, by our judging of the ways of God by the ways of men: and that though men are capable of judging wrong, when they are actuated by passion, yet it doth not follow that God may not make use of this means to accomplish his work in the wonderful conduct of his providence." Mr Bayle shews how false this thought is, and what are the common effects of persecution. III. "That things are maliciously exaggerated, when the constraint commanded by JESUS CHRIST is represented under the notion of scaffolds, wheels, and gibbets, whereas we ought only to mention fines, and banishments, and other such small inconveniencies." He shews the absurdity of the excuse, and that supposing the literal sense, capital punishments are more reasonable than the chicaneries, imprisonments, banishments, and quartering of Dragoons, which they had made use of in France. IV. "That we cannot condemn the literal sense, without, at the same time, condemning the laws which God established among the Jews, and the conduct of the Prophets upon some occasions." Mr Bayle shews that several things were permitted, or even commanded by the Old Law, for reasons which were peculiar to the Jewish Commonwealth, and which have no place under the Gospel. V. "That Protestants cannot find fault with the literal sense of constraint, without condemning the most wise Emperors and Fathers of the Church, and without condemning themselves, since they in some countries do not suffer other Religions, and have sometimes punished Heretics with death, Servetus for example." Mr Bayle blames the conduct of the ancient Christian Emperors, who have been guilty of Persecution; and censures the Non-Toleration of Protestant Princes, except when it is an act of policy, necessary for the good of the State. On this account, he maintains, that it is lawful to make laws against Popery, because it teacheth persecution, and has always practised it when it had the power. "The punishment of Servetus, (adds he), and of a very few others of that sort, who erred in the most fundamental doctrines, is at present looked upon as a hideous blemish on these early days of our Reformation, and as sad and deplorable remains of Popery, and I do not at all doubt, that if the Magistrates of Geneva had at present such a process before them, they would carefully abstain from such violence."

(1) Art. iii. of the Catalogue of New Books, p. m. 1347. and the following.

(1) Com-
mentaire
Philosophique,
&c. Part.
II, cap. 6.
pag. 363,
364.

The sixth objection is, "That the opinion of Toleration cannot fail to throw a 1686.
"State into all sorts of confusion, and to produce a horrible medley of Sects, which "deform Christianity." Mr Bayle draws a proof of his own opinion from this objection: for if a multiplicity of Religions be hurtful to a State. "It is only, (says he (1),
"because the one will not tolerate the other, but swallow it up by persecution.
"Hinc prima mali labe, this is the origin of the evil. If every one of them,
"adds he, enjoyed the Toleration which I plead for, there would be the same con"cord in a State, divided into ten Religions, that there is in a City wherein the "different sorts of mechanics support one another. All the differences it could "produce, would be an honest emulation which should most signalize itself in "piety, good morals, and in knowledge; every one would strive to prove itself
"the most beloved of God, by shewing a stronger attachment to the practice of "good works; nay they would even strive which should show the greatest love
"to their country, if the Sovereign protected them all, and kept an equal bal-
"lance among them by his equity: now it is evident that so beautiful an emula"tion would produce infinite advantages, and consequently that Toleration is the "most proper means in the world to bring back the Golden Age, and to make "a consort and harmony of many voices and instruments of different tones and "notes, as agreeable at least as the single harmony of one voice. What is it then "that prevents this beautiful concert, formed of voices and tones so different from
"one another; it is, that the one of the two Religions wants to exercise a cruel
"tyranny over the minds, and force the others to sacrifice their consciences to it;
"it is that Princes foment this unjust partiality, and lend the secular arm to the "furious and tumultuous passions of a herd of Monks and Clerks: in a word, these "disorders proceed not from Toleration, but from Non-Toleration." He af"terwards shows in what sense Princes ought to be the nursing Fathers of the Church.
The seventh objection is, "That constraint in the literal sense cannot be denied,
"without introducing a general Toleration." Mr Bayle acknowledgeth that this consequence is just, but denies that it is absurd. He shews that no inconveniencies would follow from tolerating not only the Jews, but if it were necessary, the Mahometans and Pagans, and much more the Socinians. He examines the restrictions of those who plead for a partial Toleration; and after making some remarks on what is called Blasphemy, he concludes, that Servetus was unjustly punished as a Blasphemer.

The 8th and last Objection is, "That constraint in the literal sense is rendered "odious by falsely supposing, that it authorises the persecution of the Truth." Mr Bayle answers that the consequence is just; and that if we admit the literal sense, Heretics will have the same right to persecute the Orthodox, that the Orthodox pretend to have to persecute the Heretics. In order to prove this, he lays it down for a principle, that men are always obliged to follow the dictates of their conscience; that they always sin when they do not follow them, though they may likewise sometimes sin by following them. That principle is founded on this Maxim, that whatever is done contrary to the dictates of the conscience is a sin; from whence it follows, that whoever doth an action which his conscience tells him is bad, or who omits doing what his conscience tells him he ought to do, offends God and necessarily commits a sin. So that if God had commanded, by a positive law, that every man who knows the truth ought to employ fire and sword to defend it; all those to whom this law should be revealed, would be indispensably obliged to obey it. But since a Heretic is persuaded that his opinions are true, he is therefore obliged to do that for his errors, which God should have commanded to be done in defence of the truth; and consequently Heretics would be authorized to persecute the Orthodox, whom they look upon as maintainers of error, if it was true that God had commanded to persecute error. He confirms this proof by distinguishing betwixt absolute truth and seeming truth. He says that as we have no certain mark whereby to discern whether what seems to be truth to us, be absolutely so; when it happens that error is clothed in the dress of truth, we owe it the same respect that is due to truth; and that considering the weakness of man, and the state in which he is placed, the infinite wisdom of God has not permitted that he should require of us rigorously the knowledge of absolute truth, but that he has laid a burthen upon us proportioned to our strength, which is to enquire after the truth, and to stop at that which seems to be such after a sincere enquiry, to love this seeming truth, and to conform ourselves to it's commands how difficult soever they may be.

(2) Dif-cours preliminaire qui conti-ent plusieurs remarques distinctes de celles du Com-
mentaire.

In the Preface intituled A preliminary Discourse containing several remarks distinct from those in the Commentary (2), the author says that he composed this work, at the desire of a Refugee, who is the author of France entirely Catholic; and that having wrote it in order to it's being translated into French, and upon occasion of the persecution of the Protestants in France, he had not quoted any English books in it, but had confined himself to such as were very well known to the French Converters. Here he attacks a-fresh the spirit of persecution, and confutes some Catholic Controvertists with a great deal of force and vehemence. "The Author (says Mr Bayle,
"speaking

1686. "speaking of this work in his Journal (1), has prefixed to his book a long pre- (1) November, ubi supra, pag. 1343, 1349.
 "liminary Discourse, which may be justly called a Philippic Oration. The definition which he there gives of a Converter is almost as cruel as the thing defined; all the rest is very much in the same strain." Before this discourse there is an advice to the reader, wherein the bookseller promises to publish speedily a third part, containing a Refutation of the reasons whereby St Augustin justifies persecution.

The News from the Republic of Letters procured Mr Bayle the esteem not only of particular persons, but likewise of several illustrious societies. The French Academy, to whom he had presented his Journal, thanked him in a Letter wherein he was assured that they had been unanimous in acknowledging his merit, and the usefulness of the present he had made them (2). The Royal Society in England wrote him a Letter wherein they say (3), That having observed his particular care in collecting every thing curious that happened among men of letters, and the fine genius he discovered in his Journal, they were desirous of holding a fixed and certain correspondence with him, from which they might reap common advantages. They add, that as the first mark of their esteem for him, they had sent him the Natural History of Fishes, by Mr Willoughby, revised and augmented by Mr Ray. He received likewise very civil letters from the Society of Dublin (4). It consisted of a number of learned and curious gentlemen who had formed themselves into a body, in order to contribute to the advancement of arts and sciences: but it continued only a few years.

On the other hand, his Journal engaged him in some disputes; and occasioned some complaints which he satisfied either by explaining himself, or by fairly correcting the mistakes he had made by following some unexact Memoirs which had been communicated to him. But he was censured in one particular, which gave him a great deal of uneasiness, not so much upon account of the manner of the complaint, as because it concerned a crowned head. This is one of the most memorable events of Mr Bayle's life, and deserves that I should here publish all the pieces which relate to it.

In the Journal of the Month of April 1686 (5), he took notice of a printed paper that was handed about under the name of Queen Christina of Sweden. It was an answer to a letter of the Chevalier de Terlon, wherein that Princess condemned the persecution in France. "It is very probable (says he) that all the Confessionaries in France would be severe to the Queen of Sweden, if it were true that she had answered the Chevalier de Terlon in the manner contained in the Letter which is handed about, wherein she loudly condemns the conduct of France, with regard to the late conversions, and especially when she considers the behaviour of the Clergy of France, against the head of the Church. There are a great many Protestants who cannot believe that a Princess who professeth the Catholic Religion, has wrote such a Letter." Mr Bayle was desired to give this Letter a place in his Journal, and he inserted it in that of the Month of May (6). It is as follows:

"SINCE you desire to know my sentiments concerning the pretended extirpation of Heresy in France, it is with great pleasure that I acquaint you with them, upon so important a subject. As I pretend neither to fear nor to flatter any person, I will freely own to you, that I am not well persuaded of the success of this great undertaking, and that I cannot rejoice upon that account, as for a thing that will be of great advantage to our holy Religion. On the contrary, I foresee a great many ill consequences, which will follow upon so strange a proceeding."

"Tell me ingenuously, are you well persuaded of the sincerity of those new Converts? I wish indeed that they may obey God and their Prince sincerely; but I fear their obstinacy, and I would not be accountable for all the profanations which will be committed by these Catholics, compelled by Missionaries who treat our holy mysteries very licentiously. Soldiers are strange Apostles, I imagine they are fitter to kill, ravish, and plunder, than to persuade. Accordingly, the accounts we have, and of which we cannot possibly doubt, inform us that they acquit themselves of their mission very much after their usual manner. I pity people who are abandoned to their discretion: I lament the ruin of so many families, so many good people reduced to beggary, and I cannot look upon what passeth in France at present without being moved with compassion. I am sorry that these unhappy people were born in error, but methinks they deserve pity rather than hatred; and as I would not for the empire of the world share in their error, so neither would I be the cause of their miseries."

"I consider France at present as in the condition of a sick person, from whom they cut legs and arms to cure a distemper which a little patience and gentle management would have entirely removed. But I am much afraid least that distemper encrease and at last turn incurable; that this fire concealed under the ashes should one day blaze out more fiercely than ever, and least Heresy, under a masque, should thereby become more dangerous. Nothing is more commendable than the “ design of converting Heretics and Infidels. But the manner in which they choose to go about it is very new. And since our Lord did not make use of that method to convert the world, it cannot be the best.

“ I admire and cannot comprehend this zeal and these politics, they are out of my reach, and I am even glad that I do not comprehend them. Do you believe that this is a time to convert Huguenots, to make them good Catholics in an age, in which the most notorious attempts are made in France upon the respect and submission which is due to the Church of Rome, which is the sole and sure foundation of our Religion, since it is to her our Lord has made that glorious promise, that the gates of Hell shall not prevail against her? Nevertheless the scandalous liberty of the Gallican Church was never pushed nearer to rebellion, than it is at present. The late propositions, signed and published by the Clergy of France, are such as have given too much ground of triumph to Heresy, and I fancy its surprise must have been very great, to see itself persecuted by those whose doctrines and sentiments are so agreeable to its own upon this fundamental article of our Religion.

“ These are the strong reasons which hinder me from rejoicing at this pretended extirpation of Heresy. The interest of the Church of Rome is without doubt as dear to me as my life; but it is upon account of that very interest that I see what passeth with grief, and I own to you likewise that my love to France is such as makes me lament the desolation of so fine a kingdom. I wish with all my heart that I may be mistaken in my conjectures, and that all may terminate in the greater glory of God, and of the King your master. And I assure myself that you will neither doubt of the sincerity of my wishes, nor that I am.”

(1) Art. i. of the new books, pag. m. 522.

(2) Art. vi. of the new books, p. m. 726.

In that same month (1) he said; “ We have been assured by very good hands that Queen Christina did write the Letter which we have inserted above.” And in that of the month of June (2) he says again: “ What we hinted at in our last month is confirmed to us from day to day, that Christina is the real Author of the Letter concerning the Persecutions in France, which is ascribed to her. It is a remainder of Protestantism.”

Some time after Mr Bayle received the following letter:

Sir,

“ I HOPE you will not take it amiss that I give you a little advice, which in process of time may be of some use to you, as you will see. You are a man of wit, and people who read your News from the Republic of Letters, if they have the least taste, confess you have an infinite deal of it: But, Sir, may not one be a man of wit without abusing people, and bringing one self into trouble? And ought you, who know so many things, to be ignorant of the respect due to crowned heads; and that these are sacred things, which are not to be touched without danger of the thunderbolt? I say this with relation to the Queen of Sweden, of whom you have taken the liberty of talking very licentiously in your Journal, upon occasion of a Letter which has been printed under her name. You mention it in four different passages, but the last of them surely proceeds from a genius which has soared a little higher than became it.

“ Although you had added to the illustrious name of Christina at least the title of Queen, you would have done nothing but your duty. Do not tell me that great Historians, such as you are, treat the greatest Monarchs in the same manner, and that they say without ceremony Louis the XIVth, and James the II, in speaking of the Kings of France and of England. The numbers XIVth, and II, carry with them a sort of distinction, and in some sort correct the liberty of that expression. But who would say, for example, Lewis has taken it into his head to convert the Protestants, by a mission of Dragoons; or, James endeavours by gentle methods to re-establish, if possible, his own Religion in his kingdom; that would be a very ridiculous manner of speaking. It is not less so, Sir, to say as you have done in your Journal for the month of June last, page 726, It is confirmed that Christina is the true Author &c. in speaking of one of the most illustrious Queens that has been, or perhaps ever will be, in the universe. You ought surely to have accompanied that name with some title, not only because of the respect you owe to so great a Princess when you mention her Majesty, but even in conformity to the stile of those who pique themselves upon being good writers.”

“ But still this is not what is most faulty in that passage of your Journal. The worst is two or three words, with which you conclude this Article: It is a remainder, say you, of Protestantism. You had done well not to have said this. Your great inclination to play the wit has hurried you on; but you have deceived yourself; there is no wit in it, there is only insolence. No body talks at that rate of a Queen who professeth with so much zeal, and in so edifying a manner, a Religion quite opposite to Protestantism; who has sacrificed every thing for it, and who in all her actions contradicts what you have said, that there is in her Majesty any remainder of your Religion. To be convinced of this, one need only read that very Letter which you mention in your Journal, or a great many “ others

1686.

"others which she has wrote on the same subject. She is not indeed a Catholic after the manner of France, she is one after the manner of Rome, that is to say, after the manner of St Peter and of St Paul. Therefore she doth not approve of these persecutions, because in reality this manner of converting Heretics, had not it's original from the Apostles.

"For the rest, all that I say to you here I say from myself, and because my duty obligeth me to do so, being one of the Queen's servants. If her Majesty happens to read your Journal, I do not know what she will say, or what she will do: but believe me, Sir, whatever protection you may boast of from the magistrates of the city of Rotterdam, that would not save you from the resentment of so great a Princess, if she should undertake to do herself justice. And the magistrates of Rotterdam are too just and reasonable to undertake to protect upon such an occasion.

"Her Majesty doth not disown the Letter which has been printed under her name, and which you have inserted in your Journal. There are only the words I am with which it concludes, which are not her Majesty's. A man of wit, as you are, ought to have taken notice of this, and to have corrected it. So great a Queen cannot make use of that expression, except to very few persons, and Mr de Terlon is not of that number. This single circumstance is sufficient to prove that the printing of this Letter was no contrivance of the Queen, as all the world knows. If you have a mind to mention it in your Journal, you may; but no rallery on this subject, as you have taken the liberty to do in the month of April, page 472: make use of this advice, and believe that in this I am truly, Sir, your very humble servant.

"P. S. I do not subscribe my name, because is it not necessary, and besides my Letter requires no answer. When it shall be proper to make myself known to you I will do it: but it is your business to amend, if you think proper."

Mr Bayle justified himself in an Article of the Journal for the month of August (1), intituled, Reflections of the author of this Journal upon a Letter which has been sent him concerning what he has said of the Queen of Sweden (2). His answer is as follows:

"The writer of this Letter doth not put his name to it, and neither tells us the time when, nor the place from whence, he writes. He only acquaints us that all that he has written is only from himself, and that his duty obliged him to do so, being one of the Queen's servants. Let us see what it is he complains of, and since it concerns a crowned-head, let us not imagine that the bitterness and passion he expresses, shall hinder us from justifying our conduct very coolly."

"He complains first, That I did not add the title of Queen to the illustrious name of Christina in my last month of June, page 726. But I am very sure that no body who judges equitably will be of opinion, that in this I have been wanting in the respect due to that great Princess. She has rendered her name so famous, that my expression in that passage ought not at all to be thought equivocal. To name persons by their names only, without adding some title, is ordinarily indeed either a mark of contempt, or of familiarity; but this is by no means a general rule, for there are some persons whose names alone excite the ideas of their great elevation, and in this case it is quite indifferent whether we give them their principal titles, or omit them. There is no harm in giving them, it is a superfluous addition which at worst can do no hurt. Neither on the contrary is there any harm in not giving them, it is an omission of no consequence. Crowned-heads are of this number, and hence it is that we say more frequently both in conversation and in history, Francis I. Charles V. Henry IV. Philip II. than King Francis the 1st, The Emperor Charles V, &c. It is supposed that the rank to which God has raised these Princes makes it impossible for a reader to imagine that their titles are omitted out of want of respect, and therefore the shorter expression is made use of without scruple. I know very well, as the author of the Letter observes, that the number first, which is added to the name of Francis, carries with it a sort of distinction; but this very instance shows, that in case the name of Francis alone contained a distinction, it would not be necessary to add the number first. Thus we say every day, that Alexander was a disciple of Aristotle, that Soliman made himself master of Hungary. One has no occasion to say either that the first was King of Macedon, or that the second was Grand Signior, or to add the ordinal number which belongs to them. Our most exact writers would say without scruple Constantine, Theodosius, Justinian, are the true authors of such a law. Or if we desire an example nearer home, who has not said or wrote, either during the life of Gustavus Adolphus, King of Sweden, or after his death, Gustavus did this or that? and whence comes it that in speaking of him it is not necessary to add the title of King, nor the ordinal number which belongs to him in the succession of the Kings of Sweden? It is because he has rendered the name Gustavus so famous, that he is sufficiently distinguished by it alone. This is the very case in question. The Queen of Sweden, his daughter, has given such a lustre to the name

(1) Art. ix. pag. m. 952, and the following.

(2) Reflexions de l'Auteur de ces Nouvelles sur une Lettre qui lui a été écrite touchant ce qu'il a dit de la Reyne de Suede.

“ of Cbristina, that the naming of it alone is sufficient to awaken all the ideas 1686.
 “ of her royalty, great qualities, and actions. As therefore it flows no want of “ respect to the father to call him simply Gustavus, so it is no want of respect “ to the daughter, to name her simply Cbristina; but on the contrary, it is giving “ to understand that they deserve these names by way of excellence, and that their “ very names contain their panegyric.

“ The second complaint turns upon my having said, that this Queen's Letter against “ the persecution in France is a remainder of Protestantism. This is very violently “ complained of. But this proceeds from not having sufficiently understood the force “ of these words. They have imagined that I intended to insinuate that this Princess
 “ had not sincerely renounced the Protestant Religion; which is what never entered “ into my thoughts. It is not necessary to a sincere renunciation of a Religion, that “ we should divest ourselves of every thing we have learned in it, and approve “ every thing that is taught in the communion which we embrace. I should “ think people very unjust, who should suspect the sincerity of a Roman Ca“ tholic, who after having joined in communion with the Protestants, should declare “ that in some particulars the Church of Rome seemed to him to have the ad“ vantage of the Protestant, such as in the celibacy of the Clergy, in the obser“ vation of Lent, and in the fasting on Fridays and Saturdays. One would have “ reason to believe that these were remainders of Catholicism; but one might say so
 “ and believe at the same time, that he had sincerely abjured his Catholicism, and “ embraced Protestantism, as the only Religion which leads to salvation. It is there“ fore judging of things without understanding them to give my words the sense “ which he gives them. The true sense they ought to have, is the following.

“ That if the Queen of Sweden disapproves of the conduct of those employed “ in the pretended conversions in France, it is owing to the principles of the “ Religion in which she was instructed before her journey to Rome, and not to “ the new instructions she has received in that country. It is not at Rome that “ one can learn to find fault with persecution. On the contrary, it is the general “ spirit of Catholicism to extirpate all sects; for they have not only made public “ rejoicings at Rome for what has been done in France; not only has the Pope “ applauded it in full Consistory, and by his Briefs, but likewise all the Catho“ lics in Europe have shown their approbation of it, at least by their silence.
 “ How then could the Queen of Sweden have the principles she has, if she had “ not brought them from her own country? It is (says the author of the Letter) “ because she is not a Catholic after the manner of France, but after the manner of “ Rome, that is, of St Peter and St Paul. But this is what I have called a re- “ mainder of Protestantism, and so this author and I have really the same thought.

“ The last thing he finds fault with, is that I did not strike out the words I “ am, out of the copy of the Letter which I inserted in my Journal. There is “ only this word (says he) which is not her Majesty's. So great a Queen cannot make “ use of that expression except to very few persons, and Mr de Terlon is not of that “ number. This single circumstance is sufficient to prove that the printing of this Letter “ was no contrivance of the Queen, as all the world knows. To this I answer, that “ I did not think that I could with justice strike out this Conclusion, I am, be“ cause by doing so, I should give people reason to suspect that I had suppressed
 “ a mark of forgery in that Letter, in order to make it appear more probable to “ the public, that it was written by the Queen of Sweden. Moreover, there has “ lately fallen into my hands a copy of a letter, wherein that Princess declares, “ that she is surprized and displeased at the publication of the other, though she “ still continues in the same sentiments. The curious will be glad to see this se“ cond Letter here at length, but the law of nations doth not allow me to give “ them that satisfaction. There is a great difference betwixt these two things, the “ inserting a piece which is in every body's hands, and is already printed; and “ the inserting a piece which has never been printed. We must, with regard to “ manuscripts, either wait for the consent of those who have a right to them, or have “ reason to believe that they are entirely indifferent what use people make of them.”

Mr Bayle's unknown correspondent was not entirely satisfied with this answer, and wrote him the following Letter:

“ Sir,

“ THE Queen has seen the answer you have made to my Letter, and I must do “ you justice on the one side, if you have been to blame on the other. Her Ma“ jesty doth not think that it is to be wanting in the respect which is due to “ her, to name her simply Cbristina. She has indeed rendered that name so il“ lustrious, that it has now no need of any other distinction, and the most noble
 “ and august titles which could be joined to it, could add nothing to the lustre “ which it has already acquired in the world. I was of opinion that it was not “ a proper expression, with regard to a prince, while he is still living; but I “ have been mistaken; persons of such elevated rank, and so full of glory, as the “ great

1686. " great Christina, have rules peculiar to themselves, and their names alone are sufficient to fill the minds of men with that respect and veneration which the titles of others excite. You have got the better in this, Sir, and I submit.

" But the case is quite otherways with regard to the word Protestantism, which has escaped you somewhat unreasonably; and which you employ all the subtilty of your wit to justify. You ought to follow my example, and own that you have been to blame. The Queen, who is pretty well satisfied with all the rest of your excuses, is not at all so with regard to this part of your justification. One ought not to seek for evasions before a genius like her's. When one has offended her, the shortest and safest way is to confess it; and after all, a genius such as your's, ought to have suggested something more worthy of her Majesty, than the reasons you have brought in your defence. Not that any thing you can say of her, is capable of giving her the least uneasiness. So great a Queen cannot but equally despise the praises and calumnies of people of a certain kind: but she is born to do justice, and you might have boasted that you are the only person in the world who has offended her with impunity, if you had not taken the course you have done, I mean that of justifying yourself.

" But you must do it effectually, Sir, and retract fully and distinctly what you have said, if you desire to give an entire satisfaction. The Queen at least has a mind that you, together with all the world, should know that she owes nothing to the Protestant Religion; and that if God permitted that she should be born in it, she renounced it as soon as she arrived at the years of discretion, and that without having the least thoughts of returning to it: that ever since that time the Catholic Religion has appeared to her to be the only one, and the true one, and that it was in conformity to it's holy maxims, and not to those of the Protestants, that her Majesty has in her Letter condemned the method used in France in the conversion of the Huguenots, and the Pope has rendered to that Letter the justice it deserved.

" You have no reason to say, as you do, that you are treated with too much bitterness and passion in the Letter which I wrote to you; on the contrary I am of opinion that you owe me thanks, and that you might possibly have had a great deal more reason to complain, if I had not wrote to you. And I would have you know that I am one of the least of the Queen's servants, and that there are in this Country a great many persons who are proud of being in her Majesty's interest, and who will talk to you in a very different manner than I have done, if you do not take more care for the future.

" I have said nothing to you concerning the word fameuse, which you have once more made use of in speaking of the Queen (1), and which has not been agreeable to her Majesty. I know that this word has not altogether the same signification in French, which it has in Latin and in Italian, and that we use it more frequently in a good than in a bad sense. But one ought above all things to avoid these ambiguities in speaking of crowned heads; with regard to whom you know the Proverb says we ought to employ only golden and filken words. And especially with regard to such a Queen as we now speak of; concerning whom we may boldly say, and without fear of offending others, that she has no equal; I say so even in point of rank, for other Queens are properly speaking only the first subjects of their husbands or sons; but the great Christina is a Queen in a manner so noble and elevated, that she knows no superior but God.

" This, Sir, is what I had farther to say to you, and is all the reply I can make to your's. I hope you will continue to make use of my advice, and that time may discover that I am more than you can imagine, Sir, your very humble servant.

" P. S. I had forgot that in your Journal of the Month of August, you speak of a second Letter of the Queen, which has fallen into your hands, and which you make some difficulty of publishing. Her Majesty would be curious to see that Letter, and you will do a thing agreeable to her Majesty, if you send it to her. You might even make use of that opportunity to write to her Majesty. Take this advice; it may be of some service to you: do not neglect it. But I must acquaint you that if you follow it, you must by no means make use of the title Serenissime to the Queen. It is a little too common for her, and her Majesty will not have it. You must only direct your Letter; à sa Majesté la Reyne Christine, à Rome.

(1) Mr Bayle did not make use of this word: He only said that Christina avoit rendu son nom si fameux, (bad rendered her name so famous) &c. the same expression which he afterwards used speaking of Gustavus Adolphus.

Mr Bayle took the hint that was given him, and on the 14th of November wrote the following Letter to Queen Christina:

“ Madam,

“ I SHOULD not have taken the liberty of writing this Letter to your Majesty, if a person who has the honour of being in your Majesty’s service had not advised me to do so, and to send to your Majesty a copy of a Letter which has fallen into my hands. I hoped, Madam, that an advice of this sort would justify my boldness, and I thought it my duty to make use of this occasion of testifying my most profound respect to the most illustrious Queen in the world. I am ignorant of the name of the person who procures me this great honour. He has not thought fit to make himself known to me by any other title than that of one of your Majesty’s servants; and I must do him the justice to testify that his zeal for your Majesty’s interests is very suitable to the title he assumes.

“ It is by him that I have been informed that there are some things in the News from the Republic of Letters, which did not seem agreeable to that respect which all the world owes to your Majesty, not only upon account of your Majesty’s heroic and extraordinary qualities, but likewise upon account of the sublime rank, in which, from your birth, God has placed your Majesty. As I was sensible of my innocence, I was seized at once with the most inexpressible surprize, and the most unsufferable grief, when I found that my words were interpreted in a manner so contrary to my genuine intention; and to every thing that common sense ought to dictate to every rational creature. For is there any person, Madam, who has the smallest degree of knowledge or reason, who is ignorant of that almost infinite glory which surrounds your Majesty, and of the profound homage which is due to your Majesty from all the world; and if any person has been capable of forgetting this duty, what shame ought not he to feel upon that account? I protest to your Majesty, that ever since I was able to read I have known that your Majesty is the admiration of the universe, and that there is not any one person in the whole Republic of Letters who is more thoroughly sensible of, and more charmed with the just encomiums which have been given to your Majesty by all the learned world. I can with truth affirm that I can still repeat all the passages of Alaric (1) which relate to your Majesty, whose august name shines from all quarters. So that I would be the farthest in the world, from either saying or thinking any thing which I apprehended to be contrary to the respect which is due to so great a Queen. My sorrow therefore was exceeding great, when I understood that some persons, who have the honour to serve your Majesty, had judged me guilty. I immediately endeavoured to justify myself, and I am informed that your Majesty has been pleased to declare, that you are satisfied in the main with my defence. This is my greatest consolation; and I am very much persuaded, that it will not be more difficult for me to demonstrate my innocence entirely, when it shall please your Majesty to lay your commands upon me.

“ The second Letter which I received upon this subject, acquaints me with a thing which your Majesty desires I should make public. It is, that your Majesty renounced the Religion in which you was born, as soon as you attained the years of discretion. If your Majesty command me I will also publish this new explanation; but I was of opinion, that since I have done myself the honour, by the advice of one of your servants, to send to your Majesty the copy of a Letter, and at the same time to pay to your Majesty my most humble homage, it was my duty to wait for your Majesty’s commands. I most humbly beg that your Majesty will be pleased to pardon all that may have escaped me, which has given occasion to judge amiss of my intentions; and I protest to your Majesty with the utmost sincerity, that my strongest passion is to testify to all the world the admiration, veneration, and profound submission, with which I am, &c.”

The Queen upon the 14th of December 1686, wrote to him the following answer:

Mr Bayle. I have received your excuses, and am willing that you should know by this Letter that I am satisfied with them. I am obliged to the zeal of the person, who gave you occasion of writing to me; for I am very glad to know you. You express so much respect and affection for me, that I pardon you sincerely; and I would have you know, that nothing gave me offence but that remainder of Protestantism, of which you accused me. I am very delicate on that head, because no body can suspect me of it, without lessening my Glory, and injuring me in the most sensible manner. You would do well if you should even acquaint the public with the mistake you have made, and with your regret for it. This is all that remains to be done by you, in order to deserve my being entirely satisfied with you.

(1) Scudery has composed a pompous Panegyric on Queen Christina, in the Xth Book of his Poem called Alaric ou Rome Vaincue.

1686. As to the Letter which you have sent me, it is mine without doubt, and since you tell me that it is printed, you will do me a pleasure if you send me some copies of it. As I fear nothing in France, so neither do I fear any thing at Rome. My fortune, my blood, and even my life are entirely devoted to the service of the Church; but I flatter no body, and will never speak any thing but the truth. I am obliged to those who have been pleased to publish my letter, for I do not at all disguise my sentiments. I thank God they are too noble, and too honourable to be disowned. However, it is not true that this Letter was written to one of my Ministers. As I have every where enemies, and persons who envy me, so I in all places have friends and servants; and I have possibly as many in France, notwithstanding of the court, as any where in the world. This is purely the truth, and you may regulate yourself accordingly.

But you shall not get off so cheap as you imagine. I will enjoin you a penance; which is, that you will henceforth take the trouble of sending me all curious books that shall be published in Latin, French, Spanish, or Italian, on whatever subject or science, provided they are worthy of being looked into. I do not even except Romances or Satires; and above all if there are any books of Chymistry, I desire you may send them to me as soon as possible. Do not forget likewise to send me your Journal. I shall order that you shall be paid for whatever you lay out, do but send me an account of it. This will be the most agreeable and important service that can be done me. May God prosper you.

CHRISTINA ALEXANDRA.

1687. It now only remained that Mr Bayle should acquaint the public with the mistake he had made and with his regret for it, in order to merit that Princess's entire satisfaction. This he did in the beginning of his Journal of the month of January 1687. "We have been informed to our incredible satisfaction, says he, that the QUEEN of SWEDEN having seen the ninth Article of the Journal of August 1686, has been pleased to be satisfied with the explanation which we gave there. Properly it was only the words remainder of Protestantism, which had the misfortune to offend her Majesty; for as her Majesty is very delicate on that subject, and desires that all the world should know, that after having carefully examined the different Religions, she has found none to be true but the Roman Catholic, and that she has heartily embraced it, it was injurious to her glory to give occasion for the least suspicion of her sincerity. We are therefore very sorry that we have made use of an expression, which has been understood in a sense so very different from our intention, and we would have been very far from making use of it, if we had foreseen that it was liable to any ambiguity: for besides the respect which we, together with all the world owe to so GREAT A QUEEN, who has been the admiration of the universe from her earliest days, we join with the utmost zeal in that particular obligation which all men of letters are under to do her homage, because of the honour she has done the sciences by being pleased thoroughly to examine their beauties, and to protect them in a distinguishing manner."

Thus Mr Bayle extricated himself out of this affair with honour, and had the address not only to appease a provoked Queen, but likewise to procure marks of her favour. She very soon had the unwelcome news of his not being able to perform the penance she was pleased to impose upon him. He sunk under the weight of an insupportable labour. Besides his public and private lectures, he was employed in composing his Journal, a task which alone required the labour of many persons. The Composition of his Philosophical Commentary quite exhausted his strength. On the 16th of February 1687, he was seized with a Fever, which hindered him from finishing the Journal for that month. But as he hoped that this indisposition would be attended with no bad consequences, he gave notice on the back of the title page, "That fore eyes and a slight fever, which had left him several times, and returned as soon as he attempted to resume his studies, did at last oblige him to publish the Journal for this month incomplete, and to acquaint the public likewise that the Journal for the month of March should appear very soon." But his Fever, attended with a head-ach, encreased to such a degree that he was obliged to give over that work. He engaged Mr de Beauval to continue it, and Mr de Beauval began that Continuation, which was printed at Rotterdam by Mr Leers, with the month of September 1687, under the title of The History of the Works of the Learned (1). "Ever since the month of April last, says he in the preface, the Author of the Republic of Letters having being indisposed, and afflicted with pains in his head, which Mr Balzac would call the pangs of his beautiful productions, proposed to me that I should continue his work, which he was by this means forced to give over. I confess that possibly being flattered by my vanity upon the account of his having singled me out upon such an occasion, I accepted the task without making all the reflexions that such an undertaking deserved. I believed that his choice would supply both the place of merit, and of excuse with the public, and so resolved to make some attempts at least. Since I have entered into this detail, adds he, people would no doubt likewise know

(1) Histoire des Ouvrages
des Sçavans.

“ why I have not continued this work under the same title, that Mr Bayle made use of. I own that this would have been more natural: but my particular attachments to Rotterdam, the great plenty of the best books which are to be had at Mr Leers’s, together with some other reasons which it is not necessary to mention here, made me think it more proper to change it. After all I thought it best to treat the public as we do those who are afflicted with the loss of a person very dear to them, whom we must never carry to those places, which may bring to mind, or awaken the ideas of the object of their grief. The public would have always in the News from the Republic of Letters, sought after the illustrious Author who gave them birth, and the same title ill supported, would only have served to redouble their sorrow for the loss of so inimitable a person.”

In the mean time, the Sieur Desbordes, who had printed the News from the Republic of Letters, caused them to be continued by Mr Larroque, and some other persons, until the month of August of the same year 1687, and Mr Barin, a French Minister, composed them without any assistance from the month of September to the month of April 1689.

We have seen what pains Mr Bayle was at, that he might not be thought the author of the Philosophical Commentary. He endeavoured even to deceive his friends, “ These gentlemen at London, says he to Mr Lenfant (1), have a strange itch of printing. The public ascribe to them a Philosophical Commentary on these words of St Luke compel them to come in, wherein under pretence of attacking Popish persecution they aim at establishing a toleration for the Socinians.” He feigned that this Commentary came from London, because some Ministers among the Refugees, who lived there at this time, were thought to be great friends to Toleration, and had even rendered themselves suspected of Socinianism. Notwithstanding all this he was still suspected to be the author of it. To put a stop to this suspicion he published on the back of the title-page of the Journal for the month of April 1687 (2), that “ certain persons, ill-disposed towards the author of the General Criticism on Mr Maimbourg, having affected to ascribe to him the Philosophical Commentary on the words compel them to come in, he thought himself obliged to complain of this bad office, and to declare that he will look upon all persons as persecutors with regard to him, who shall continue to spread abroad a conjecture so opposite as this is to all the rules of Criticism. One might as well, adds he, ascribe Voiture’s Letters to Balzac, or those of Baudius to Blondel.”

The Philosophical Commentary did not please Mr Jurieu; and how was it possible for him to relish a book wherein mildness, moderation, or, to say it in one word, Toleration, was so strongly established. He undertook to refute it, and gave to his answer the following title, The rights of the two Sovereigns in matters of Religion, Conscience, and the Prince. In opposition to the indifferency of Religions and universal Toleration, against a book intitled a Philosophical Commentary on these words of the Parable, Compel them to come in (3). He sets out under the character of a novice in writing, who in obedience to the commands of a friend, and out of vexation at that book, was a going to be an author in spite of nature and himself. Afterwards he gives his friend his opinion concerning the Commentary, That it is an original and not a translation. That it is of French and not of English extraction. He adds, That it is not the work of one single person. “ This appears, says he, to be the work of a cabal, and a conspiracy against the truth; nothing is more unequal than the stile of it. In the first part the expressions are clear and pretty strong, but there are passages in the second where one finds a confusion, and obscurities which do not seem to proceed from the same genius that wrote the first. The pretended Translator affects sometimes to make use of old French words, which are not now in use among good writers; but his fraud is a little too gross, for elsewhere he shows that he understands French well enough to write more correctly.” But in the advice to the reader he affirms downright That the authors of the Philosophical Commentary are French Divines, and consequently Refugees. When Mr Jurieu wanted afterwards to lay the composition of this book as a crime to Mr Bayle’s charge, Mr Bayle always brought him back to this declaration, that it is the work of certain French Divines. Observe how he endeavours to soften this false judgment in a satirical piece which he published against a great many French Ministers, and particularly against Mr Bayle, in the year 1691. “ In the year which followed our dispersion, says he (4), there appeared a wicked book intitled, The Philosophical Commentary, &c. wherein the pernicious doctrine of the indifferency of Religions and Doctrines of the Christian Religion is maintained in so rash and bold a manner, as even goes the length of infolence. I can truly say that this book wounded and struck me in a very sensible manner. One could easily guess from the third volume of the General Criticism, whence it had it’s original. But the stile, and many other circumstances, made us believe that it was the work of a cabal, and published by several persons in concert.”

Mr Bayle had finished the third part of his Philosophical Commentary, and given it to the Printer before he fell sick. The impression of it was finished before the end of February, but he did not receive any copies of it ’till the 20th of June.

(1) Letter of the 3d February, 1687. pag. 281, 282.

(2) There are some Copies where this is not to be found,

(3) Des Droits des deux Souverains en matiere de Religion, la Conscience & le Prince. Pour détruire le dogme de l’indifference des Religions & de la tolerance universelle, contre un Livre intitulé Commentaire Philosophique sur ces paroles de la parabole, Contrains les d’entrer.

(4) Apolo- gie du Sieur Jurieu, p. 4. col. 2.

1687. It is intitled, A Philosophical Commentary on these Words of JESUS CHRIST, compel them to come in. Part the third. Containing a refutation of the Apology which St Augustin has made for those who use violence in making converts. At Canterbury, by Thomas Litwel, 1687 (1). Here two Letters of St Augustin are refuted, the one wrote to a Donatist Bishop named Vincencius, who had let that Father know how much he was surprized at his inconstancy, having formerly been of opinion that the authority of the secular power ought not to be made use of against Heretics, but only the word of God and persuasion; whereas now he maintained quite the contrary. The other is addressed to Bonifacius, who was a Tribune in Africa, wherein St Augustin pretends that it is lawful to employ the secular arm to destroy Heretics. The Archbishop of Paris had ordered these two Letters to be printed in 1685, with a long Preface intitled, The Conformity of the conduct of the Church of France in reclaiming the Protestants, with that of the Church of Afric to bring the Donatists into the Catholic Church (2). This is likewise the title of the whole book. Mr Bayle had refuted some passages of this Preface in his preliminary Discourse. He doth not here confine himself to the two Letters which I have mentioned, but likewise answers what St Augustin has said on this subject in some other Letters.

As soon as he had seen Mr Jurieu's answer, he wrote a letter to his Bookfeller, dated from London the 25th of May 1687. "If you have (says he) still time enough, (and it is no matter though you have already sold some copies) I desire you to publish what follows at the beginning of the third part." He says afterwards, that he has just read the treatise Of the rights of the two sovereigns, &c. against a book intitled a Philosophical Commentary, &c. and that he finds it an unsuccessful and very weak attack on that Commentary. "The author, (adds he) owns in the beginning, that in spite of himself and of nature, his Chagrin, and the desire of one of his friends, are going to make him an author. One must have very little judgment to make such a confession. Chagrin ought to have no share in the composition of any work. . . . His performance is faulty in those very places which most essentially require solidity, since it goes entirely upon a false state of the question, so that he fights against a shadow. I mean against an opinion which he falsely imputes to me. He is at prodigious pains to prove that men frequently sin and offend God, while they act according to the light of their conscience. Who denies that? have not I said so very distinctly in more places than one? he accuses me likewise of introducing an indifferency of Religions, whereas on the contrary, there never was any doctrine more opposite to that indifferency, than this which lays it down as a principle, that we ought always to act according to our consciences. Fallacies of the same sort prevail in the passage where he treats of the legislative power of Sovereigns in matters of Religion. As for quotations from the scripture, they are very frequent in his book, but for the most part misunderstood, and in the manner of St Augustin. To conclude, this author has officiously meddled with a subject he doth not understand, and has through the whole been guilty of the fallacy of not proving what was the point in question."

Mr Bayle's indispotion still continuing he resolved to try a change of air, and drink the waters of Aix la Chapelle. He left Rotterdam upon the eighth day of August, and went to Cleves, where he arrived the 13th of that month. Next day he went to lodge at the house of Mr Ferrand, Minister of the Castle of Cleves, and continued there till the 15th of September, on which he passed to Boile Duc, and from thence to Aix la Chapelle, in company with Mr Pielar, Minister of Rotterdam, and Mr Farjon, Minister of Vaals. He returned to Rotterdam upon the 18th of October: but he was obliged to repose himself for some months longer; as he writes to Mr Constant in a Letter of the 22d of March 1688. "It is more than thirteen months (says he (3), since I fell sick, and all the while have only lingered and languished, and I now only begin at the return of this spring, to be able to take a little literary exercise. After my return from Aix la Chapelle, where I had been to drink the waters, I found your son here. . . . but unluckily for me, I was not able to speak much without bringing upon me a return of my slow Fever, and this has been my continual misfortune during my illness: if I entered never so little into conversation, I was the worse for it." He gives Mr Lefant a more particular account in a Letter of the 20th of July, "You do me a great deal of honour (says he (4), remembering, as you are pleased to do, a person in a manner dead to the world, and blotted out of the memory of the living. . . . I have made a Journey to Cleves, another to Aix, and upon my return hither, I have, during the whole winter, immersed myself in the greatest Quietism imaginable, without either reading or writing. At last, after I thought myself sufficiently reposed, I re-assumed my Philosophical Lectures, first my public only, and afterwards likewise my private ones; but with regard to other matters, I observed and do still keep myself in a full and absolute inaction. . . . I have not as yet returned to my books, nay I do not so much as run through the Literary Journals; and

(1) Commentaire Philosophique sur ces paroles de Jesus Christ, contraindre: troisième Partie contenant la Refutation de l'Apologie que St Augustin a faite des Convertisseurs à contrainte. A Canterbury, chez l'honnorable Thomas Litwel 1687.

(2) Conformité de la Conduite de l'Eglise de France pour ramener les Protestans, avec celle de l'Eglise d'Afrique pour ramener les Donatistes à l'Eglise Catholique.

(3) Letters &c. ubi supra, p. 283, 284.

(4) Ibid. pag. 285, 286.

“ out of fear of being tempted to break this agreeable charm of indolence, very 1687.
 “ seldom visit the booksellers, so that I am quite ignorant what new things they “ have got. I only hear by chance sometimes that this or the other book is “ come out.”

All the men of letters were afflicted at Mr Bayle's illness: and they were overjoyed to hear of his recovery. Mr du Tor de Ferrare, a Counsellor in the Parliament of Rouen, a man of great worth, and a great master in the lapidary stile (1), testified his joy upon that occasion, by the following beautiful inscription:

(1) See his Elogy in the Mc- moires pour l'Histoire des Sciences & des beaux
 Arts, December
 1704, Art.
iv. p. 440.
and the following
of the Dutch Edition.

In

Doctissimi Bælii

Sanitatem restitutam

S O T E R I A.

QUÆ TE MORI VETAT GLORIA,

ÆGROTARE PROHIBET.

OMNIBUS CARUS ET UTILIS

SCRIPTORES

CRITICA FACE ELUCIDASTI,

CENSORIA NOTA EMENDASTI.

QUÆSITOR URNAM MOVENS

MAGNUM IN NOMEN ITUROS

ÆTERNITATI

PRONUBA MANU DICASTI.

LABORIBUS TUIS ALIENOS ABSUMIS,

DELICIIS NOSTRIS NUSQUAM ABSUMENDUS.

IN HOC VENERANDUS

QUOD NEMINEM CONTEMPSISTI:

IN HOC VERENDUS

QUOD NEMINEM FORMIDASTI:

DIGNUS QUI VERITATIS ANNOS EXÆQUES.

QUI LABANTEM SUSTENTAS COGNATAM VERITATI LIBERTATEM.

NON AD UNIUS UTILITATEM REGIONIS NATUS,

ITA EXILIUM TOLERAS

UT VIDEARIS OPTASSE:

ITA CUNCTOS EMINUS COMINUS REFICIS,

UT VIX CREDARIS ULLIBI ABESSE.

THEATRUM ERUDITIONIS CIRCUMDUCTILE FACTUS EST ORBI.

SUBSELLIA QUÆ DICENDO FATIGARE NON POTES, TE SILENTEM FERRE

TE QUIESCENTE QUIESCERE
 NE SPERA.

VALE, VIVE, SCRIBE.

ENCÆNIA RENOVATÆ FACUNDIÆ

FAUSTIS LITERATORUM ACCLAMATIONIBUS CELEBRANTUR.

Mr Bayle had once a design to leave Rotterdam. The death of Mr Paets, and 1688, the violent temper of Mr Jurieu, had made him weary of it: accordingly he desired the famous Mr Abbadie, who was then at Berlin, to procure him some establishment in that City. He knew that the Elector of Brandenburg gave a generous protection to the French Refugees; and besides he had several friends at Berlin. Mr Abbadie upon this addressed himself to the Dukes of Schomberg, who

1688. who being well acquainted with Mr Bayle's merit, expressed a great satisfaction at his design of coming to Berlin, and promised to engage the Marechal to speak of it to the Elector. But that great Prince fell sick about this time, and his death (1), a little after, put a stop to the effects of that Lady's good inclinations towards Mr Bayle.

(1) He and the qth of
May 1688.

Mr Bayle published the following Advertisement, under the name of the book-seller, on the reverse of the title-page of the News from the Republic of Letters, for the month of October 1687. "We have received a Letter dated from London, "by which we are informed that John Fox of Bruggs is the real name annagrammatized of the author of the Philosophical Commentary, and that he will very soon give us occasion to speak of the answer, which he has in the press, to "the treatise Of the rights of the two Sovereigns." This was in order to prepare the public for a continuation of the Philosophical Commentary, which he designed to publish very soon. In effect, it appeared soon after under this title: A Supplement to the Philosophical Commentary upon these words of JESUS CHRIST, compel them to come in. Wherein, among other things, the only refuge that was left to the adversaries is quite destroyed, by demonstrating that Heretics have an equal right with the Orthodox to persecute. Something is likewise inserted concerning the nature and origin of error. At Hamburg, for Thomas Litwell 1686 (2). The author in a long Preface acquaints us, that having heard of a book intitled The true System of the Church (3),

(2) Supplement du Com-
mentaire Philosophique sur ces paroles de Jesus-Christ,
contrain-
les d'entrer. Où entre autres choses l'on acheve de ruiner la seul écha-patoire qui restoit aux adversai-res, en dé-monstrant le droit égal des Hérési-ques pour persécuter à celui des Orthodoxes. On parle aussi de la nature & origine des erreurs. A Hambourg pour Thomas Lit-
well, 1688.

wherein his opinion concerning Toleration, and the rights of conscience were attacked, and also that the treatise Of the Rights of the two Sovereigns, was not the first essay of a young author, but the work of one who had appeared frequently in print, he had resolved to answer them both, and to divide his book into three parts. The first to contain some additions which seemed to him very proper for ever to silence all the advocates for constraint. The second to contain an answer to three chapters of the true System of the Church, wherein a doctrine contrary to his is maintained, and an answer to all the objections of the author of the Rights of the two Sovereigns, and likewise to every thing that he has advanced directly in favour of his opinion. He adds, that he had laboured so diligently in the execution of this design, that he had finished it before the end of December 1687, and had sent the manuscript to the printer: but having found afterwards that this work would be too bulky, he thought himself obliged to suppress the two last parts, and accordingly "he had ordered the book-seller to put a stop to the impression, and "it had happened very luckily that they were not as yet come to what he had "said concerning the affairs of England, the Penal Laws, and the taking away "of the Test, &c. subjects which were not then seasonable, considering the turn "that things were likely to take." He assigns several causes of the encrease of the bulk of his book, and among the others the following: "It has proceeded "partly (says he) from this, that the gentlemen who translated my English Ori- "ginal, could not as they pretended, strip it of it's native dress without making use "of a diffused stile; they have likewise diverted themselves by mixing a great "many different things together, sometimes following one system and at other times "another, sometimes imitating the manner of thinking of certain authors, and not "their stile, and at other times the stile of others, and not their manner of thinking; "designing by this means to make a medley of it, which has caused the Readers, "as they pretend, to ascribe my Commentary to a good many different people, "without ever guessing at them or me, though my name was only con- "cealed under an Anagram, which deviated but very little from the rules. "And they make a diversion of concealing themselves so successfully, and of put- "ting the searchers after the fathers of anonymous and pseudonymous books up- "on a wrong scent." The rest of the Preface is employed in shewing from a passage of the true System of the Church, that the writer of it agrees entirely with Mr Bayle's opinion, and consequently that Mr Bayle is orthodox, and that it is there- fore this writer's business to answer himself, and to answer the author of the Rights of the two Sovereigns. In this manner Mr Bayle makes Mr Jurieu, who is author of both these books, contradict himself. He adds afterwards some reflexions which serve to confirm what he has said in this Supplement.

(3) Le
vrai Système de l'Eglise.
Tous Book appeared in 1686.

(4) Ré-ponse d'un
Nouveau Converti à la Lettre d'un Refugié. Pour servir d'addition au livre de Dom Deny de Ste.
Marthe, intitulé,
Réponse
aux Plain-tes des Protestans.
Suivant
l'imprimé à Paris chez Etienne Noel, à la place de Sorbonne, 1689.

(5) Ré-
ponse aux plaintes des Protectants tou-chant la prétendue persécution de France.
Où l'on expose le sentiment de Calvin, & de tous les plus ce-lebres Mi-nistres, sur le peines dûes aux Hérési-
ques.

At this time Mr Leers was printing Mr Furetiere's Dictionary; and the author having died while it was in the press, the Book-seller desired Mr Bayle to write a Preface to it. It is an excellent piece.

1689. In the beginning of the year 1689, there appeared a pamphlet entituled, An Answer of a New Convert to a Letter from a Refugee, by way of supplement to Father de Ste. Marthe's book intitled, An Answer to the complaints of the Protestants. According to the copy printed at Paris by Stephen Noel in the place de Sorbonne 1689 (4). Father de Ste. Marthe, a Benedictin of the Congregation of St Maur, had published at Paris in 1688, a book intitled An Answer to the Complaints of the Protestants concerning the pretended persecution in France. Wherein the opinion of Calvin, and of the most famous Ministers concerning the punishment due to Heretics, is shewn (5). Here he pretended that the Reformed complained without reason of the rigour that had been exercised against them, since they must have been used with much greater severity, severity, if they had put the laws of the first Christian Emperors in execution, or followed the maxims of the Reformers themselves, who teach that Heretics ought to be put to death. He reproached them likewise for taking up arms in defence of their Religion, and accused the Protestants in general of being fond of Independency, and enemies to Monarchy. The Answer of a new Convert, which serves for a supplement to this piece, is dated from Paris the 20th of December; and the Letter of a Refugee is dated from Amsterdam the 6th of the same month. The Refugee, who had retired to Holland after a tedious imprisonment, puts the new Convert in mind of the disputes they had formerly had, particularly concerning the burning of Servetus, and the rising in arms of the Protestants. He says that his friend always referred him to Father de Sainte Marthe's book; and adds, that instead of engaging himself in discussing all these facts, "he chose rather to employ his time in prayer, "and in meditation on the glorious promises which God has made to the Reformed "in the Apocalypse." But that since his arrival in Holland he has had an opportunity of consulting some of the most learned men of the party, who had furnished him with the four following answers with regard to the affair of Servetus. "I. That at worst it was only a fault of particular persons, the party not having "in the least meddled in that process. II. That if some Doctors have formerly "wrote in justification of such proceedings, they have made no profelytes; and "that it is a long while since they have been cured of these violent sentiments "among the Reformed. III. That the doctrine which some people might have had "on this subject, concerned so small a number of Heretics, that it ought not to "serve for a recrimination to those, whose cruelties are so general. IV. And lastly, "That the practice of the Reformed sufficiently justifies them; for since Servetus's time we do not find that they have punished the Socinians who have been "among them, or that they have ever extended Calvin's Theory to the Papists." And as to what regards subjects taking up arms upon account of Religion, he says that very learned and very pious men have assured him that it is lawful, when subjects have no other intention by it but to procure themselves the liberty of following the light of their conscience, being ready to show their fidelity to their Prince in all other matters: and therefore that the Reformed ought not to be ashamed of what their ancestors may have said or done in that respect. He sends him the two last Pastoral Letters of Mr Jurieu, and exhorts him to return to the Protestant Church. "You cannot choose a more proper time, says he, to go out from the midst "of spiritual Babylon. You may possibly ruin yourself by continuing in it, in time as "well as to all eternity; and the great success with which God has already favoured the "holy and heroic expedition of the most accomplished Prince who is at present "upon earth, shows us that the time is at last come when the true Church shall "enjoy a flourishing prosperity. You understand me, you know that I do not "only mean that all goes ill for you in England, but likewise that God has struck "your Kings, and above all the Pope, with the most extraordinary stupidity "that ever was known, and the most fruitful in blunders."

The new Convert begins his answer by criticizing one of the Pastoral Letters, and afterwards examines the four answers which the Refugee had been furnished with, concerning Servetus. He reduces them to these four questions. "I. Whether "the punishment of Servetus proceeded from the ill humour of a particular person, or "if it was not generally approved of by the Protestants? II. Whether the Protestants now have different sentiments from those of the last age concerning the "punishment of Heretics? III. Whether the doctrine of the Reformers concerning "the punishment of Heretics, can be justified by saying that it only concerned a small "number of Heretics, in comparison of the great number of erroneous people whom "the Catholic Doctors think punishable? IV. Whether the practice of the Calvinists with regard to the punishment of Heretics can justify the doctrines of their "divines upon that subject." The new Convert answers in the negative to all these questions; and in refuting the second, he refutes at the same time what Mr Bayle in his General Criticism, and Mr Jurieu in his Apology for the Reformation, had answered to Mr Maimbourg, upon the subject of Servetus; and what Mr Rou, in his Seduction éludée, had answered to the Bishop of Meaux upon the same head. Hitherto he preserves a good deal of moderation; but he attacks the Protestants with great violence in the sequel of this pamphlet, intitled, Reflections on the Civil Wars of the Protestants, and the present Invasion of England (1). He says that the Revolution in England has not at all surprised him, since he knows what that Religion is capable of, which is wont to stir up people to Rebellion. He adds that this event is an apology for the conduct of those Princes who have purged their kingdom from such a sect; and that the quickness of this change, which the Protestants boast of, is a proof that the spring of this affair was not their fear of being oppressed by the Catholics; that King James was dethroned for no other reason than because he would not espouse the passions of the enemies of France, who were envious of her prosperity, but that all the Leagues formed against Lewis XIV served only to increase his glory, and to heighten the idea of his formidable power. He maintains that the Catholic Princes have given greater examples of Toleration than the Protestants;

(1) Reflections sur les guerres civiles des Protestans, & la présente invasion de l'Angleterre.

1689. restants; and insults the whole body of the Refugees upon the account of the lofty hopes of some among them whom he represents as waiting, like the Jews, for a Messiah who shall conquer all the Popish Kings, and enter Rome in triumph. He taxes the French Protestants with vanity in considering their party in France as the whole Protestant party, and the ruin of their Churches as the ruin of the Protestant Religion. He accuseth them of feeding themselves with visions, dreams, and chimerical interpretations of the Apocalypse, as if the Edict of Nants had been the design and principal object of the inspired Oracles in that sacred book. And lastly he accuseth them of being animated by a spirit of Rebellion and of Satire, and of being seized with an inveterate and incurable disease, of rebell[ing] against their lawful Sovereigns on the one hand, and on the other of filling the whole world with the most infamous calumnies, that ever were imagined. To this little book is prefixed an Advertisement of the Dutch Bookseller, wherein it is said that the author of this Answer had sent it from Paris in 4to to the author of the Letter: that it was not doubted but Mr Pellisson had a considerable share in it, though the stile of it is different from his, because the Letter which gave occasion to it, was written to one of his intimate friends. It is added, that a very learned author was labouring incessantly at an Answer to it, wherein the public would see the most delicate questions in Morality, especially with regard to these times, treated in the most agreeable and exact manner, and that it was hoped it would be published in a few months.

Mr Bayle mentions this piece in one of his Letters to Mr Rou. "They have crucified both you and me at Paris lately, says he (1), but not so severely as they have done Mr Jurieu, in an Answer of a new Convert, &c. which they pretend is wrote by a Disciple or Profelyte of Mr Pellisson. If Mr Pellisson has any share in it, he must needs have given credit to a very false report, which might possibly even have reached his ears, that I am the author of a Letter which was printed at Amsterdam in answer to his Chimera's of Mr Jurieu (2), for Mr Pellisson has spoken very civilly of me in his last book; whereas this New Convert treats me harshly. The piece I am talking of, is short and indifferently wrote; but very injurious to the party. They have reprinted it in this Country. Mr Bayle gives this account of it from the bookseller's advertisement; but all that was said of it there was a mere feint. This piece was not printed at Paris, and the Answer which the bookseller promised, never appeared.

If we consider this performance as a continuation of the Philosophical Commentary, we will be ready to believe that Mr Bayle is the author of it. It is natural to suppose that having seen with grief that his Commentary, which was designed to attack the persecutions of the Church of Rome, had been represented by the Ministers as a pernicious book; he may have made use of the way of recrimination in the person of a new Convert, to force them to declare for Toleration, or to give up the cause to the Catholic writers. Besides it is plain, that the author of it strikes particularly at Mr Jurieu, the principal advocate for constraint in religious matters, he laughs at his Interpretations of the Apocalypse, and the chimerical hopes with which he fed the Refugees. He has him likewise in view in a sort of digression, which we find at the end of it, under the title of Reflections on the Civil-Wars of the Protestants, &c. as it would be easy to show.

However, in Holland this piece was thought to be Mr Pellisson's (3). They were the more easily persuaded of this, because it was known that he had laboured much in the Conversions, and had published some treatises of Controversy, under the title of Reflexions sur les differens de la Religion. Mr Jurieu ascribed this Answer to him without hesitation [G]; and as the Protestants were charged with maintaining

(1) Letter of the 24th of February 1689, p. 301.

(2) It is a piece consisting of 8 pages in 4°, intitled Reponse à l'Auteur des Chimeres de Mr Jurieu.

(3) Mr Pellisson disowned it in the Histoire des Ouvrages des Scavans, February 1690, p. 276.

(d) Lettre écrite de Suisse en Hollande pour suppléer au défaut de la Réponse que l'on a- voit promise de donner, à un certain Ouvrage que Mr Pellisson a publié sous le nom d'un Nouveau Converti, &c. (e) In the month of May 1691.

(f) See the Letters to Mr. Leyland of the 25th of May, and to Mr. Constant of the 12th of July 1690, with the Remarks, pag. 321, 322, 325, 326.

(g) Apologie du Sieur Jurieu, pag. 24. et. ii.

[G] Mr Jurieu ascribed this Answer to him without hesitation. In one of his Pastoral Letters, which contains some Reflexions upon the Libels which came

(a) Pastoral Letter from France on occasion of the affairs of the present time; after having spoke of the books which were published in France against the Protestants, he adds (a), "We see lately published a Libel under the title of An Answer of a new Convert to a Letter from a Refugee, to serve for a Supplement to Dom Denis de St Martine's book (b). These gentlemen may pretend to hide themselves under feigned names, they are always found out. We have no new Convert who can write in that manner; and with that force upon the subject. One must be confirmed in a spirit of persecution, and full of the old leaven to write so. Be not therefore deceived in this matter, it is not a new Convert (c) but an old scholar of the Jesuits, who has made great proficiency in that school." Mr Huet, a Minister and a Refugee, who lived at this time at Dort, and who afterwards went to the Hague, wrote an Answer to this piece which was very much esteemed. It came out under this title: A Letter written from Switzerland to Holland, to supply the place of an Answer which has *been promised to a certain book published by Mr Pellisson, under the name of a new Convert, &c. (d). But as he maintained a political Toleration, and in defending what Mr Bayle had said concerning the punishment of Servetus he had given up Mr Jurieu, the latter was so piqued at it, that he accused him before the Synod of Leyden (e) which was composed of his creatures, and got him suspended from his Ministry. He inveighed afterwards against him in his Libels, and particularly in his Tableau du Socinianisme, where he endeavours to establish persecution (f). However it was not Mr Huet he aimed at; Mr Bayle was the person he really had in view. By procuring a condemnation of Mr Huet's opinion concerning Toleration, he wanted to render Mr Bayle odious, whom he looked upon as the author of the Philosophical Commentary. He durst not attack him, and so he vented all his spleen upon Mr Huet, and sacrificed him to his rage. He himself has let us in to this secret, in recounting his proofs against the Heterodox, with all the ill nature he was master of. "A little while after, says he (g), the Philosophical Commentary appeared. And it was the labour of this book that had almost cracked his brain.*

1689. This was his last resource, he turned all his views that way, and in his writings prepared the people for this great revolution [M]. He laboured to prove that the power of princes proceeds from the people, and that there is a mutual contract betwixt the Prince and people (1). He maintains that it is lawful to defend our Religion by force of arms (2). He likewise makes an apology for the Revolution of England, and for King William (3), who was violently attacked in several libels then published in France [N]. There appeared likewise several pieces on this subject composed by Refugees. There were likewise some persons, who abusing the liberty of the press they enjoy in Holland, published romantic and satirical pieces against Lewis XIV, against King James, and against the Queen his consort: but these libels were only relished by the mob, and the greatest part of them were not written by Refugees.

In the heat of this war of political and satirical authors, there appeared towards the end of the month of April 1690, a book entituled, An important advice to the Refugees, on their approaching return to France. Given for a new year's gift to one of them in 1690. By Mr C. L. A. A. P. D. P. At Amsterdam by James the Cenfor, 1690 (4). This book was wrote in form of a Letter to a friend, dated from Paris the first of January 1690. In the beginning the author rallies the Refugees upon the hopes they had conceived of seeing very extraordinary events in 1689. "You see, (says he), the year 1689 expired without any thing happening very extraordinary. You promised yourselves mighty and wonderful things that year; that it should be fatal to the Romish Church in general, and more fatal still to France, that we should see nothing but great crises of affairs, wonderful Revolutions, and in short every thing most suiting a climacteric year of the world. You have seen on the contrary every thing go on so naturally, so smoothly, and so altogether of a piece, that it would be hard to find in History a first campaign of so general a war as this, in the greatest animosity of the parties concerned, wherein so few remarkable things have fallen out, as in the year 1689. At least it is certain, that the thing which you looked upon as the most infallible, I mean your re-establishment, has not happened. I do not say this, (adds he), to insult you, God forbid; you know my sentiments: you are not ignorant that I always disapproved the usage you have met with, and I am exceedingly sorry that France has deprived itself of so many honest people, and so many persons of merit, who have been obliged to seek shelter in foreign Countries. So that if I observe with pleasure that the year 1689 has not answered your Predictions, it is by no means because of the loss you thereby sustain, but because we ought to be glad for the sake of reason and good sense, that the superstitious confidence in chimerical calculations, and popular credulity, are belied by such palpable experiences, which may weaken them as much as they would have been confirmed by events which you expected." After this he congratulates his friend upon the favourable disposition in which the King of France was said to be with regard to the re-establishment of the Reformed, and assures him that in general the most reasonable part of the three estates of the kingdom would approve of allowing them an honest liberty. "But allow me, (continues he), to give one advice to you, and all your brethren Refugees wherever dispersed, which is to perform a sort of Quarantine before you set a foot into France, in order to purify you from the bad air you have breathed in the places of your exile, and which has infected you with

(1) Pastoral Letters of April 15, and May 1, 1689.

(2) Letter of Jan. 1, 1689.

(3) Letter of May 15, 1689.

(4) Avis important aux Réfugiés sur leur prochain retour en France. Donné pour Entretenues à l'un d'eux in 1690. Par Monsieur C. L. A. A. P. D. P. A Amsterdam chez Jacques le Censeur, 1690.

"two

his predictions chimerical, and to laugh at the credulity of those who had given credit to them. He therefore found himself under a necessity of abandoning what he had said concerning the manner in which the Reformation should be established in France. According to his first scheme, that Reformation was to be brought about without violence, without effusion of blood, by the King's own authority: but the revolution in England, and the confederacy of so many Princes against France, made him believe that it should triumph there by way of conquest (r); and he declared "that he firmly believed that God had raised up King William to execute his great design of abasing and humbling the persecutors in France (s)." He would needs lend a helping hand himself. "After several nights meditation he contrived a sort of pontons, by means of which they might land as many troops as they had a mind in France without much difficulty, and in spite of the Militia that might be upon the coast (t)."

[M] In his writings he prepared the people for this great revolution. He made several reflexions upon the state of affairs in his Pastoral Letters, wherein he set forth the wonders of providence, in the present situation of Europe, and particularly of England (u). He exhorted the Reformed in France to be firm and unshaken, and promised them a speedy deliverance. He gave over writing Pastoral Letters in the month of July 1689, and in the month following he published a new work, which came out monthly under this title, Les soupirs de la France Esclave qui aspire après la liberté. The design of this work was to shew that the ancient liberties of France were lost, and that it was absolutely necessary to reform the government of it, and change it into an Aristocracy.

[N] The Revolution in England, and King William were violently attacked, in several libels published in France. Mr de Vilé, besides what he published monthly in his Mercurie Galant, put out likewise every month a volume concerning the present state of affairs (x). Mr le Noble published also several libels. Father de Ste. Marthe published a book, intituled, Dialogues concerning the Prince of Orange's enterprize upon England, wherein it is proved that this action fixeth upon the Protestants the character of Antichristianism, with which Mr Jurieu reproacheth the Church of Rome. Paris, 1689. And no less a man than the famous Mr Arnauld would needs engage in this affair, in a piece intituled, The true Picture of William Henry of Nassau, a new Absalom, a new Herod, a new Cromwell, a new Nero. Mr Jurieu refuted this last, in a book printed at the Hague 1689, under the title of An Apology for their most Serene Britannic Majesties against an infamous Libel, entitled The true Picture of William Henry of Nassau, &c.

(x) Sur les Affaires du tems.

(r) Chimeres démentées, p. lvi, lvii.

(s) Pastoral Letter of July 1, 1689, pag. 273, col. 2.

(t) Chimeres démentées, p. lviii, lix.

(u) See the Pastoral Letters of the 25th of February, pag. 93, of the 13th of March, pag. 102, and of the 25th of March, pag. 107 of the year 1689.

“two very dangerous and hateful distempers, the one is a spirit of satire, the other a sort of republican spirit, which tends to nothing less than to introduce Anarchy into the world, the greatest plague of civil society. These are two points upon which I take the liberty to speak to you as a friend.”

Concerning the first point, which regards satirical writings, he makes bitter complaints of the many Libels full of calumnies and scandalous stories which were spread abroad every where, and wherein the Refugees seem, says he, to breathe nothing but vengeance. He lays them to the charge of the whole body of the Refugees, because they had not in a public manner disowned them. He even goes back as far as their ancestors, and accuseth them of having first introduced the licence of diffamatory Libels. He maintains that this satirical rage is an infallible mark of Heresy; and shows how much slander is contrary to the spirit of Christianity. He puts the Refugees in mind of the patience of the primitive Christians, and opposeth to the licentiousness of their pens, the moderation of the English Catholics, who were Refugees in France, and of the French writers. He doth not spare the Emperor nor the Pope himself upon the account of their being enemies to France. In the mean while, he represents himself as full of love, charity, and compassion for the Refugees; and protests that he speaks to them in this strong manner for no other reason but to persuade them to reform, and to disavow their satirical Libels in a public manner. In this manner he softens the bitterness of his reproaches and insults. He proceeds to their sedition writings, and under this class comprehends all those wherein it is maintained “That princes and their subjects engage themselves to one another mutually, and by way of contract to the observation of certain things, so that if the Prince fail in the performance of what he has promised, the subjects are thereby freed from their oath of allegiance, and may transfer their homage to new masters, whether the whole people disapprove the breach of promise of those princes, or the most numerous and most considerable part of them agree to it.” He pretends that it is on this principle that the Reformed have supported all their civil wars, and founded their seditious maxims. He attacks this doctrine smartly, and makes use of that manner of arguing which they call reductio ad absurdum, and maintains the absolute power of Princes with a great deal of warmth. He heaps together all the reproaches which Mr Arnauld in his Apology for the Catholics, and other Controversists have thrown upon the Protestants, on account of the principles of Buchanan, Junius Brutus, and Pareus; and exhorts the Refugees to do something to show that they are not infected with these political Heresies. He chargeth the Presbyterians with the death of King Charles I, and reproacheth the Church of England with abandoning the sound doctrine of submission due to Princes, and embracing the Presbyterian opinion of the lawfulness of bringing Kings to justice; and in a word, he represents the Protestants, and in particular the Refugees, as seditious persons, who bring Rebellion and Anarchy every where; and declares that Princes cannot rely upon their fidelity.

All these invectives are followed by a sort of digression, which he intitles Reflexions on the irruption of the Vaudois. He owns that the Vaudois have been unjustly treated, but maintains that they are inexcusable for having entered their own Country in a hostile manner, and made war upon their Prince; and from thence he takes occasion to return to the absolute power of Princes. After this follows the Conclusion. “Now you see, says he, in what consists the Quarentine which your best friends among the Catholics desire you would perform before your return to France, it is to protest in the most public manner, either that you never approved of those scandalous and seditious Libels, which your authors have published by heaps, or that you sincerely repent your having done so, and are extremely sorry that you were ignorant of their evil tendency, or that you had not the courage to declare against them.” He once more returns to this subject, and afterwards makes several reflexions on the Campaign of 1689, tending to extol the greatness of France, and the glory of Lewis XIV. From thence he passes to the Revolution in Siam, which was very acceptable to the Hollanders, because of the check it gave to France. He says that the Controversies of the Protestants had grown worse these four or five years past, especially with regard to their civil wars; and he sets in opposition the fidelity of the French Catholics to Henry IV, to that of the English Protestants to James II. He allows his friend to publish this Letter, and make what alterations in it he shall think proper. He concludes with a very devout prayer, and with wishes for the conversion of his friend to the Catholic Religion; but “if the hour, says he, for that happy change is not as yet come, may heaven grant that you at least may be endowed with the sentiments which every honest man ought to have for his country.”

If one compares this Advice to the Refugees, with that part of the Answer of a new Convert to a Letter from a Refugee, intitled, Reflexions concerning the Wars of the Protestants, he will find a great conformity betwixt them; the same sentiments, the same reproaches, the same insults. The one is only in a manner the prelude or sketch of the other. They both pursue the same design, and follow the same plan, but in a manner different enough to make us doubt, whether these two pieces 1690. come from the same hand. In the Advice the subject is treated more at length, is more embellished, and more engaging; the style is more correct, more lively, and more vehement.

To this book is prefixed a Preface, the author of which, a Refugee at London, is as zealous a Protestant, as the writer of the Letter appears to be a zealous Catholic. He says that this piece surprized him extremely from the very beginning of it: that it was the performance of one of his old friends, an Advocate by profession, but who had employed himself more in reading books of Controversy than at the bar: that he must do him the justice to own that he had loudly condemned the Dragonnings; and that he could not imagine why he had made choice of him to be the depositary of a heap of indignities thrown out with the utmost bitterness, both against the whole body of Protestants, and likewise against those who had fought out of France, their cruel step-mother and not properly speaking their country, a sanctuary where they might serve God according to the purity of the faith. "The ground, says he, of this so severe and so extravagant behaviour, and so contrary to the equity and moderation which I have always observed in him, is first, that the Refugees being in a place where they are at liberty to complain of the barbarous treatment perfectly worthy of the Religion of Antichrist, as well as unworthy of all sort of Humanity, which they had suffered in their own country, had published their complaints against France in a pretty lively manner: and in the next place, that the Protestants of England and Scotland have not been so simple, after so long experience as they have had of the treachery and cruelty of the Church of Rome, to suffer themselves to be led like sheep to the slaughter, but had rather chosen according to the laws and liberties of their country to shake off the yoke, and free themselves from slavery, and receive the Deliverer whom God had raised up to them, as he did frequently to the people of Israel in the time of the Judges." He adds that he was resolved to make this old friend of his such an answer as should make him repent his having so highly and maliciously provoked him; but that the public would be better acquainted with the justice of his resentment, if they saw this piece such as he had received it: that he had struck out a great many passages which breathed an unheard of rage, and had only retained certain passages which he designed to examine and to confute exactly in the answer which he was preparing. He gives the plan of this answer, and adds that in the mean while, he had thought it proper to publish this piece that his brethren might know in what light some people considered them, and what envenomed reflexions were made against them; hoping that some body would undertake their Apology, and confine himself to these two general heads, the satirical writings and the seditions writings, while he would canvass the other articles particularly, and leave nothing without a full and strong answer. He invites the author of the Letters concerning the present state of affairs (1) to do this, and says that he is so much the more interested in this matter, that he is one of those writers who are accused as satirical. "It will be, adds he, very easy to vindicate our Refugees, for I have been assured, by some of my friends in Holland to whom I wrote on that subject, I. That the pieces wherein they pretend to give an account of amorous adventures, and wherein persons of the first quality are defamed, were composed by Papiests, before there were any Refugees in that country. II. That the news writers who have given France the greatest cause of complaint, are not Refugees, nay some of them are not so much as Frenchmen." He gives an account of the alterations he has made in the performance of his friend, and concludes with a Panegyric on King William the favourite of God. "One, says he, may justly give him that title, and apply to him what the scripture says of David, that God has found him a man according to his own heart, has led him by the hand, and placed him upon the throne, with this advantageous difference, that whereas David was not put in possession of the crown of his father-in-law who was rejected by God 'till some time after his death, God has anticipated that favour to King William, having bestowed upon him the crowns of his father-in-law even while he was still alive." He adds that the Princes who are the greatest enemies of the Protestant Religion, that the August House of Austria whose zeal for the Catholic Religion is sufficiently known, and all the Catholic Princes in Germany, had applauded that happy Revolution: and that it was visibly a miraculous work of Providence, which had confounded both the counsels of France and of James II, since of a thousand means which they had in their power of giving a powerful check to that enterprize, they had precisely chosen that conduct which rendered it infallible.

The Advice to the Refugees was printed secretly at the Hague, and was presently answered by several hands. Mr Tronchin du Breuil vindicated the Refugees in his Letters concerning the present state of affairs (2). Mr de Bauval in his Journal (3) showed the injustice and unreasonableness of this author's complaints: and Mr Coulan, a Minister and Refugee at London (4), answered him more fully in a treatise intitled: A Defence of the Refugees against a book intitled An Advice, &c (5). We may see Mr Bayle's judgment of these Answers, in a Book he published in 1692. Af-

(1) Lettres sur les matieres du tems.

(2) Letter of the 1st and 15th of May; of the 1st of June; and of the 1st of September 1690.

(3) Histoire des Ouvrages des Savans, April 1690. Art. x. pag. 364.

(4) Anthony Coulan born at Alais on the 10th of October 1667. He died at London the 23d of September 1694.

(5) La Defense des Refugees contre un Livre intitule, Avis, &c. At Davenport in 1691 in 120. pag. 157.

(1) Project & Fragmens d'un Dictionnaire Critique, pag. 110. ter having pointed out the Advice to the Refugees, he adds (1), "I mean that sort of sermon wherein we are accused of a pretended proneness to libelling and civil wars, with as much vehemence as ever a Minister showed in a fast-day sermon, when he lays the breach of the whole Decalogue to the charge of his hearers. And since this occasion offers, adds he, it will not be unreasonable to observe here, that the violent reproaches of this declaimer have produced a good effect. They are not perhaps the cause that those wretched little satirical books do not come so thick among us as before; but at least it is certain that they have obliged the best writers of the party to inform the Public, that it is without reason that people pretend to make the whole body of the Refugees accountable for these sorry books: so that we shall have cotemporary evidence to latest posterity to clear us from the malicious imputations, which some people endeavour to fix upon our cause. Let no body alledge, that the excellent writers who have disclaimed them, have done it in an anonymous way; for since they have answered for the whole body, without any persons entering a complaint against their declaration, this proves that the whole body acquiesces in it. Add to this that the name of the person who writes every fortnight in so ingenious and judicious a manner concerning the present state of affairs, is now known to every body. And as to the author of the inimitable History of the Works of the Learned, is there any body who doth not know his name? And with regard to the person who has lately given us the Defence of the Refugees against the Important Advice, he is no doubt very worthy of credit in what he advances as from his brethren. He fully answers all the reproaches which concern this satirical spirit, and sets forth his opinion on the other point with a great dexterity of wit. All things well considered, it must be owned that though a disavowal which had preceded the severe reproaches of the adversary, and had been made by persons appointed for this purpose by the Synods, would have been both more honourable and more authentic, yet nevertheless none but extravagant cavillers can henceforth renew these accusations." Some other Answers were likewise made to this piece [O].

(2) P. 418. a Letter from the author of the Advice to the Refugees (2). "I confess, says that author, that I was surprized to see my performance made public. I did not trust my friend with it for that purpose, especially there being several things in it which I cannot approve of. I mean the passages wherein I speak of the manner in which you have been treated in France. You know very well that though I had thought in the manner he makes me speak, I would not have been so imprudent as to say such things in the middle of Paris. I shall perhaps send it to you very soon reprinted with the necessary alterations." And in the month of February 1691 he published an Extract of a Letter from Paris which gave an account that this work was in the press. "They are actually reprinting, says the writer of this Letter (3), the Advice to the Refugees, with the King's Licence, the author who had kept himself concealed upon account of several things which could not fail to irritate the Archbishop of Paris and Father de la Chaise, has found means of making his peace by adding some things, and taking away what might give them offence." In fact, it was reprinting at Paris, with the King's Licence dated the 20th of October, and the first two sheets of it appeared in Holland in the month of March following (4). They suppressed the Preface of the first edition, and substituted the following Advice to the Reader: "This piece having been sent by the author into foreign parts to one of his friends, it has been printed there with several alterations contrary to his intention. This obliges him to reprint it in France in it's true and natural form. He protests sincerely that he had no other intention in writing this, but to do his duty by acquainting those in whom he interests himself, with certain important truths which they do not sufficiently reflect upon, and that he has been so far from regarding either favour or hopes from the court, that he has even avoided being known to it, concealing himself for this good action with as much care as others do for bad ones." But this edition was interrupted by the death of the Bookseller: they set it on foot again a few months after, and the Impression was finished upon the 9th of December 1692, with a new Licence dated the 19th of September, the preamble of which is as follows: "Our well-beloved Mary Magdalen Guellerin, widow of Gabriel Martin, late Printer and Bookseller in our good City of Paris, having

" remonstrated

(a) Reponse sommaire au Livre intitulé Avis important aux Réfugiés sur leur prochain retour en France. Par Monsieur G. N. A. 3. M. Maastricht 1690.
(b) Delicé de la Nation Britannique; où les Droits de Dieu, de la Nature, & de la Société sont clairement établis, au sujet de la Révolution d'Angleterre, contre l'auteur de l'Avis aux Réfugiés.

[O] Some other Answers were likewise made to this piece. Mr Nizet, Advocate and Professor of Law at Maastricht, published, in 1690, A short Answer to the Advice to the Refugees (a). Mr Abbadie confined himself to what related to the Revolution in England, and printed at London in 1692, A Defence of the British Nation; Wherein the Rights of God, of Nature, and of Society, are clearly established, with relation to the Revolution in England, against the author of the Advice to the Refugees (b). Mr de Larrey made a full and large Answer to it under this title: An

Answer to the Advice to the Refugees. By M. D. L. R. At Rotterdam for Reinier Leers, M. DCC. IX (c). This work he was desired to undertake by Mr Leers, who having a mind to publish a new edition of the Advice to the Refugees, engaged him to write this Answer to it, to be published along with it. He reprinted the Advice from the Paris edition, with the same date, and under the same Printer's name. But he restored the Preface which they had suppressed at Paris. The Advice and Mr Larrey's Answer make two volumes in 8vo.

(c) Reponse à l'Avis aux Réfugiés, par M. D. L. R.

1690. "remonstrated to us, that by our Letters of the 20th of October 1690, signed le Petit, and sealed, we have given permission to the Author of a book intitled, "An important Advice to the Refugees upon their approaching return to France, to print, sell, and distribute the said work throughout all our Kingdom for the space and term of ten years, which Author has yielded his right to the said deceased Gabriel Martin, husband to the petitioner; but having affected to continue unknown to the public, he made a difficulty of allowing the said privilege expeded in his name, to be inserted in the Registers of the society of Booksellers of our City of Paris, which together with the sickness and death of the late Gabriel Martin, has interrupted the impression of the said work which was already begun, and will retard it still if we are not pleased, in consequence of the agreement made with the foresaid Author, and with his consent, to allow the said privilege to be registred in the name of the petitioner. For these reasons desiring to show favour to the said petitioner, we have permitted and allowed, and by these presents we do permit and allow the impression of the said book to be continued, &c."

1691. No body in Holland now talked any longer of the Advice to the Refugees; this book was quite forgot (1), when Mr Jurieu took it into his head all of a sudden, in the month of January 1691, to send word to Mr Basnage that he looked upon Mr Bayle as the author of that libel, and that he must go out of the seven Provinces. Mr Basnage endeavoured to make him take other sentiments, but he gave no ear to him. Mr Bayle told Mr Basnage that he had formerly intended to answer this book, and that in order to convince Mr Jurieu of his mistake, he was going to set about it again. At the same time he desired Mr Basnage to assure Mr Jurieu that he was ready to confer with him on this subject, and to satisfy all his doubts (2). All this did not appease Mr Jurieu. The hatred which he had of a long time conceived against Mr Bayle was changed into rage: he imagined that he had found a proper occasion of defaming him. Nay if it had been in his power he would have likewise taken away his life. "Since it was not in my power, (says he (3)), to get all the punishment which he deserved inflicted upon him, I resolved at least to expose him to public infamy." It was with these dispositions that Mr Jurieu set about an Examination of the Advice to the Refugees, wherein in the beginning he endeavours to discover the author. After having praised the composition of the book, he undertakes to shew that the author of the book and of the preface, are one and the same person: that this author is a Protestant, and lived in Holland; and that the Preface which he wrote in order to conceal himself had discovered him. In fine, he characterized him in such a manner, that one might easily see that he wanted to point out Mr Bayle, though he did not run the hazard of naming him. But when he comes to give the reasons that could have induced Mr Bayle to write this piece, he found himself extremely embarrassed. "What (says he (4)), could be the design of this author? was there ever so whimsical a design? what view could he have? At first I fancied he was one of our Sceptics who designed only to divert himself with truth, and defend both sides of the question; first to make a book against us, and afterwards to destroy it by another for us, to shew that Truth as well in facts as in matters of right lies in the well of Democritus; that one may doubt of every thing, affirm, defend, and attack every thing. And I am still of opinion that a little of this has entered into his views. I believe he would have kept his promise if so much noise had not been made, we should have had a sorry confutation, for in it he would have spoke against his inclinations, and his maxims; whereas here he speaks his real sentiments."

After this Mr Jurieu undertakes to discover the real intention of the Author. He says that this Author, "being extremely fond of the independant and absolute power of Princes, and seeing that for some years past they had wrote against his idol the King of France pretty freely; and being above all full of indignation against the Revolution in England and the dethroning of King James, he had at length lost all patience, and could no longer refrain from writing an apology for the King of France, and for King James (5): and that it was upon this account that he was obliged to screen himself under the mask of a bigotted Papist, and of a violent hater of the Protestant Religion (6)." He confesseth that this mask would have kept him in suspense had it not been for the Preface (7)." However he did not believe that this Author was so animated against the Protestant Religion as he pretended to be. "We do him the justice, (says he), to believe that he is not so malicious against the Protestant Religion as he would make himself appear to be, and that his raving against us is a part of the comedy, that he may under that deep disguise defend both the King of France, King James, and arbitrary power (8)." He did not even believe that any motive of interest had engaged him to write in favour of these Princes. "We must, (says he), do him this justice, that interest could have no share in these appearances of zeal. For he had no design of making a merit of

(1) Cabale Chimerique, pag. 198, 353. Left Con-victi.n. pag. 35. col. 1. Chimera demonstred, pag. 351, 352.

(2) MSS. Memoirs of Mr Basnage. See likewise the Chimera demonstred, pag. 351, 352.

(3) Apology for Mr Jurieu, p. 25. col. 1.

(4) Examen d'un Libelle &c. pag. 36, 37.

(5) Ibid. pag. 38.

(6) P. 39, 40, 41.

(7) P. 40.

(8) P. 40, 41.

" this work with these powers, since he has taken all manner of precautions not 1691.

(1) P. 69. " to be known (1)."

But he did this justice to the author, only to make him appear the more like Mr Bayle. He did the same thing in speaking of the Advice. At first he said of this book all that he thought of Mr Bayle, whom he had in view. He found the style of it flowing, easy, and lively; that his figures were natural, his metaphors happy, his ornaments well chosen and well placed; that it engages the reader by a secret charm; that it was filled with agreeable literature, and that his learning was mightily well displayed (2). All this agreed to Mr Bayle in the opinion of the public. Afterwards

(2) P. 5, 6. he says that this Author strikes blow after blow to overbrow his adversary, and sets forth with a great deal of art, and in a very narrow compass, all the strongest things that had ever been advanced against the Reformed; that his book was the most dangerous piece that had been wrote against them since the Reformation; showing the Reformation in the most hideous light (3): because all this was still necessary to his design, which was to render Mr Bayle odious. But when he came to answer the book, and was much heated, he forgot all his former description of it, it was then a piece so extravagant at the bottom that it required neither system, principles, nor reason to compose such another. A work which was all outside and nothing within; a little figure of wax-work well polished and well dressed, well furnished with red and white, but within had neither flesh, bones, nor nerves; there was nothing in it but two very meagre difficulties which the author had plumped up by the fertility of his imagination, and

(3) P. 7. out of the treasure of his common-place books (4): two poor difficulties, all the rest being mere gilding, embroidery, invectives, idle stories, reproaches, trifles, and reflexions nothing to the purpose, and which proved nothing (5): a piece wherein there was no system (6), a pretty little collection from the Polyanthea and pure pedantry (7); in fine, a work wrote with so little wisdom and solidity, that the Author must have considered mankind as brutes, who suffer themselves to be led by the nose or by the ears (8). His judgments were entirely regulated by his passions. He represented the Advice as a formidable work, that he might with the greater probability ascribe it to Mr Bayle;

(4) P. 91, 92. and he accused Mr Bayle of having made an apology for the King of France and for King James, because at that juncture nothing was more proper to incense the public against him.

About this time there was at Geneva one Goudet, a Merchant, who had but little business indeed, but was a great Projector. He took it in his head to adjust the differences of Princes, and become the pacificator of Europe. He composed a book entitled, Eight Dialogues, wherein Irene and Aristus lay down measures for putting an end to the present war by a general peace (9). These Dialogues contained a Project of Peace, wherein Mr Goudet assigned to the Princes and States of Europe the Territories they were to possess. France for instance, was to keep Franche-Comté, their conquests in Flanders, and Luxembourg; but must restore all that they had conquered in Catalonia from the peace of the Pyrenees, and in Germany from the peace of Nimeguen, excepting Strasbourg. She must likewise demolish Mont-Royal, Fort-Louis, Hunniguen and Fribourg; and in equivalent our projector gives her the City of Mons and all Hainault, and some other territories which lay convenient for her. He gives her likewise Lorraine, and the Duke of Lorraine was to have Servia and Bulgaria, and Belgrade for the capital of his new Dominions: but afterwards he changed this article, and gave him Brabant and the rest of the Spanish Netherlands. France was to restore to the Swiss the Town of Fribourg and the fortress of Hunniguen, after they were demolished; and the Emperor was to yield to them the four Forest Towns, together with the Brisgau and the Suntgau. He gives up likewise to France the principality of Orange, the County of Avignon, and the Venaissin; and in exchange he gives to the Prince of Orange the Baillywic of Gex, and to the Pope an annual tribute of fifty thousand Crowns to be paid by the Duke of Savoy, in consideration of which this Duke was to have Casal and Pignerol. He grants likewise to the Protestants in France a perpetual Edict, which should secure to them the same liberty of conscience which the Catholics enjoy in Holland: but they were not to be allowed to write against the Church of Rome. The Dutch were to have all the commerce of the Indies, and France was to demolish certain places in the Low-Countries, which might give them umbrage. He would have King William to be acknowledged King of England, and King James made King of Jerusalem and of all Palestine. The Christian Princes were to unite to destroy the Ottoman Empire. The Elector of Bavaria was to be Emperor of Constantinople, and Count Tekely was to have Belgrade and the Provinces of Servia, Bulgaria, Bosnia, Rascia, Moldavia, and Walachia. These two last were to be Tributaries of Poland. He gives also to France, Egypt, a part of Syria, and the Isle of Rhodes, and "the advantages that will arise from thence, (said Mr Goudet (10), is, that by this means at the expence of the Infidels, there will be employment found in remote countries for the unquiet and restless temper of the French, who can hardly be at ease themselves or suffer other people to be so, which is not of small consequence to the general interest." To render this peace perpetual, the Princes of

(9) Huit Entretiens où Irene & Aristote fournissent des idées pour terminer la présente guerre par une Paix générale.

(10) Second Dialogue &c. p. 27, 28.

1691. Europe were to give every year to the Swifs six hundred thousand crowns to maintain 40000 men, who should be always ready to pour in upon any one who should endeavour to disturb it; and these troops in case of need were to be joined by 30000 men whom the Emperor and the Princes of the Empire were to keep on foot.

Mr Goudet admiring the sublimity of his genius in this project of peace which he had formed, communicated it to every body whom he could persuade to read it. He entertained the French Resident with it, who made a jest of it (1). But this did not discourage him. Knowing that Mr Minutoli, to whom he was related, was a friend of Mr Bayle; he desired him to send this scheme of a peace to Mr Bayle, "in order to have his judgment of it, as well as that of many other illustrious persons in foreign countries (2)." In the month of September 1690, Mr Minutoli sent the first six dialogues to Mr Bayle, without naming the Author, and told him at the same time, "that if they did not design to take a particular care of the interest of the Protestant Religion, and of his dear brethren the Refugees in this scheme, he would not have to much as looked into it, but that the person who was concerned in it had assured him that the sequel would satisfy all the scruples he could have on that head (3)."

The article concerning the Refugees was reserved for the seventh Dialogue, which was not sent to Mr Bayle. Mr Minutoli desired him to communicate the six first to Baron Groeben, Governor to Prince Louis, brother to the Elector of Brandenburg; to Dr Burnet, Bishop of Salisbury; to Mr Hulst, the State's Resident at Brussels; to Mr Fremont d'Ablancourt, and to Mr de Bauval: and in general he desired him to put it into the hands of as many ingenious men and Ministers of State as possible, and to acquaint him with their opinion of it (4). Mr Bayle caused some transcripts to be made of it, and sent them to the persons named by Mr Minutoli. They did not think very advantageously of it. "Besides that they did not esteem it well wrote, they found in it chimeras and notions of a Platonic Commonwealth, and of that Christian Republic of which Mr de Sulli has prescribed the plan (5)." Mr Bayle did not read it, for besides the great aversion he had to the reading of manuscripts, his other affairs, and the indifferent character which was given of it by the persons who had read it, made him neglect it entirely (6). He acquainted Mr Minutoli with their judgment of it, and added, "that the author might lay it down as a thing certain, that any plan of a general peace, which did not strip France of all that she had conquered for some years past, and which did not weaken her to such a degree as to make her neighbours no longer jealous of her, would be rejected (7)." While they were making copies of this piece, Mr Bayle chanced to go into Mr Acher's shop, a Bookseller in Rotterdam, who (8) desired him to cast his eyes upon a manuscript which had been sent him and give him his opinion of it, and tell him whether it was a piece which would sell. Mr Bayle presently upon looking into the first page of it knew it, and said aloud, in presence of several Refugees who were in the shop, that it was a piece which he had given to be copied, and appeared to be vexed, because he was afraid that the copier had taken it into his head to give it to the press; for he had only been desired by his friend at Geneva, to show it in manuscript, and to get the opinion of good judges concerning it, that the Author might alter it according to the different views which might be suggested to him. But Mr Acher made him easy on that head, by telling him that the person from whom he had the copy, would part with it to no body but to Mr Bayle; and as he believed that Mr Bayle had the disposal of it, he desired that he would procure him the publication of it. Mr Bayle answered that he had received no order to get that piece printed, but that if this should be resolved upon, and the choice of the Printer be left to him, he would prefer him to any other. He appeared very grateful for this.

"(9) Some time after Mr Minutoli wrote to Mr Bayle, that the Author was preparing to publish the first six Dialogues at Laufanne, while in the mean time he was finishing the two others. Mr Bayle told this to Mr Acher, who did not think fit to alter his design upon that account, since it was not likely that an Edition in that country could hinder the sale of one in Holland, which would be more beautiful and more easily sent every where than that of Switzerland. He proposed therefore only to oblige Mr Acher, that they should send him the sheets of the Laufanne edition as they came from the press, there being a Bookfeller at Rotterdam who would reprint them. They agreed to this proposal, and post after post Mr Minutoli made Mr Bayle hope that they would send him the sheets with the Author's corrections. He acquainted him that the work would be considerably enlarged, and that the form of it would be almost wholly changed for the better; that the author insisted particularly on a Guarantee, and had put the article concerning the Refugees on such a footing as had been approved of by several of them. As the sheets did not come, Mr Minutoli desired Mr Bayle to keep the Bookfeller in hopes,

(1) *Extract of a Letter from Geneva &c.
in the Chi-mere demonique,
p. 204.*

(2) *Letter
from Mr Minutoli to Mr Jurien, ibid.
p. 194.*

(3) Cabale Chimerique, p. 5, 6, of the second Edition.

(4) *Ibid.
p. 20. and the following.*

(5) *P. 13,
14.*

(6) *P. 7,
and the
following.*

(7) *P. 20,
77.*

(8) *P. 16.
and the
following.*

(9) *P. 18,
19.*

- (1) P. 22, 23. " (1) During this delay of the sheets, Mr Acher told Mr Bayle from time to time, 1691; that he would not print this project until he knew whether it might not give offence. Mr Bayle always told him, that he would do well to give it to read to any body he pleased, and Mr Acher having said that he would be directed by him in that matter, Mr Bayle answered him, that he need not do so, that he had not read it, and would not read it while it continued in manuscript. He even told him plainly the opinion of Messieurs d'Ablancourt and Bauval, and of some others who had read it. This did not discourage him, for Mr Jurieu's prophecies (which he had printed) had taught him by experience, that the most chimerical books, are the very best for the Printer . . . At last (2), when Mr Bayle could not tell what to make of this delay of the sheets, he was informed, in the time of the siege of Mons (3), that there were copies of the first edition at the Hague. This made him advise the Bookseller to give over the thoughts of printing the Project of Peace, and so much the more because the siege of that place, which ever way it turned, would change the state of affairs : and he found that he had already taken that prudent resolution."
- (2) Ibid. p. 24. Mr Jurieu's book against the Advice of the Refugees, and against Mr Bayle, was actually in the press, when the first six dialogues concerning the Project of Peace, printed at Lausanne, came into his hands. He was quite a stranger to this work. (4)
- (3) Mons capitulated on the 9th of April 1691, after 16 days open trenches. " Mr Minutoli, in his letters to Mr Bayle, had never particularly named Mr Jurieu as one of the persons to whom he ought to show the manuscript. He believed no doubt that it was not necessary to do so, having heard of their intimate acquaintance, and as he desired his friend to shew it to judicious persons in general, he took it for granted that Mr Jurieu would see it among the first. Mr Bayle would not have failed to have shewn it to him at first, tho' his friend had not particularly desired him to do so ; but he was afraid lest Mr Jurieu should have thought it was with a design to affront him, if he had desired him to read a project of peace, wherein they had departed so far from his system. For Mr Bayle saw plainly from Mr Minutoli's first letter, that according to this project, the religion of the Protestants was not to be the national religion in France. As Mr Bayle had never relished Mr Jurieu's System, and possibly had talked with too much liberty of it before some of his spies, he had already incurred his secret hatred ; so that he had reason to fear, that in so delicate an affair, as the glory of having given true or false predictions concerning great events, the smallest matter should pique him, and might be taken, especially coming from such a hand, for an insult."
- (4) The Chimericalness of the Rotterdam Cabal demonstrated &c. p. 194, 195, in the Note. Mr Jurieu was, in fact, extremely irritated at this Project of Peace : but he grew quite outrageous when he understood from Mr Acher, that this work had been long before sent to Mr Bayle, and was told what had passed between Mr Bayle and him concerning the manuscript. Being always full of wild dreams, and become quite furious against Mr Bayle, he built upon this a system a thousand times more chimerical than the chimerical Project of Peace itself. He prefixed to his Examination of the Advice to the Refugees (5) ; an Important Advice to the Public (6), wherein he declared that all that he had said " concerning the design of the author of the Advice to the Refugees, was only the effort of a person groping his way in a dark place. It is true, adds he, that I must have been blind, and at present I can hardly imagine how I could fail of discovering the whole mystery at first sight. (7) They who are under suspicion, and are justly so, could find no better means of justifying their friends, than by asking, cui bono ? and I confess that this difficulty raised a scruple even in me, which did not indeed make me in the least doubt from whence the book came, but which however embarrassed me : when at last God, whose pleasure it is that mysteries of iniquity should be discovered, has permitted that another unexpected discovery should give more light into it. The public must know then, that this is not the work of a private person who designed to defend the authority of Princes. They who have imagined so, have been mistaken (8). This is the work of a Cabal which extends from south to north, and has its center at Paris and at the Court of France (9)." He added, " That there was a French party at Geneva, which was hatched under the wings of the Resident of France ; that this party consisted of persons of all ranks and characters ; and that this cabal kept a correspondence with another in Holland entirely in the same interests (10). That they both had the same view, which was to relieve France from her present distress, by a peace as advantageous as she could wish for : that their design was to disunite the Allies, to raise a spirit of rebellion in subjects against their Sovereigns, which would force the Allies to receive peace upon any condition : and in fine, that these two parties did nothing but in concert with the Court of France, and by her direction (11)." That in consequence of the views and instructions of the Court of France, Mr Bayle, who was the head of the northern cabal, had wrote the Advice to the Refugees ; and Mr Goudet, agent for the southern cabal, had composed the Dialogues concerning a Peace, which were drawn up by the Resident of France, and corrected at Versailles ; that Mr Bayle had undertaken to get them printed at Rotterdam, in order to spread them the more easily over all Europe, and particularly in Holland and in England (12). After this he calls Mr Bayle an Impious and
- (5) Examen de l'avis aux Refugiez.
- (6) Avis important au Public.
- (7) Avis important au Public, p. 3, 4.
- (8) Ibid. p. 5.
- (9) Ibid. p. 7.
- (10) Ibid. p. 7, 8, 9.
- (11) Ibid. p. 42, 43.
- (12) P. 37, and the following.

1691. and prophane person, without honour or religion, a traitor, a deceitful man, an enemy to the State; a person to be detested and deserving corporal punishment.

In the mean while he owned that this accusation concerning the Advice to the Refugees, was founded on simple presumptions only. "It may be, says he (1), that some people who would appear to be disinterested, will say that this is to push people too fiercely, and to expose them to the public hatred without having sufficiently convicted them but when the public security is concerned, must we wait for conviction, are not disaffected persons discovered by strong presumptions, that we may be upon our guard against them?" It is very singular, that while he was accusing Mr Bayle of a design to ruin the Protestants; some confessions escaped him which destroyed this accusation. "The Author, said he (2), believed that at last this would do them no more hurt than an hundred other libels which have been wrote against them: that this would be forgot like the rest, and that for the present it would be of use to France, and by accident to the Protestants themselves, because it would contribute to dissolve the confederacy, and to bring about a peace." And with regard to the project of peace, after having represented it as a piece concerted with the court of France, and capable of dis-uniting the allies, he said that it was a performance so full of chimeras that one must be a chimerical man who would set about the answering of it (3). But these reflexions which were sufficient to have opened the eyes of a disinterested person, made no impression on Mr Jurieu: he did not want to vindicate Mr Bayle, he wanted to find him guilty. He likewise attacked Mr Bauval. He accused him of having forged the Letter which he had inserted in his Journal, wherein it was said that they were reprinting the Advice to the Refugees at Paris (4). But as the first sheets of this new edition had been seen in Holland, he pretended that this was an artifice they had contrived to screen themselves from suspicion; and that the Royal Licence, printed in the first sheet was forged.

His book against the Advice to the Refugees appeared (5) under this title: An Examination of a Libel against Religion, the State, and the Revolution of England, intituled An important Advice to the Refugees upon their approaching return into France (6). There was prefixed to it An important Advice to the public, as we have already observed.

As soon as Mr Bayle had read this Advice to the public, "he went to the grand Schout of Rotterdam, and told him that if his accuser would go to prison with him, and undergo the punishment which he should deserve, in case Mr Bayle was found innocent, he was ready to go there (7)." He likewise informed two of the chief Magistrates of Rotterdam, and two or three other gentlemen at the Hague, distinguished by their merit and employments, of Mr Jurieu's accusations, that these accusations were false, and that he desired nothing of the State but that they would not condemn him without a hearing (8). Possibly he would have done well to have gone no further. Mr Jurieu would never have had the confidence to appear before a Magistrate with him. He had no legal proof to alledge, they would have ridiculed his presumptions, and he would have been declared a false accuser. But as he had publicly accused Mr Bayle of being the head of a Cabal or conspiracy against the State, Mr Bayle thought himself obliged to justify himself in the same manner. He intitled his Answer (9), The chimerical Cabal: or a Refutation of a fabulous Story which has been lately published with a malicious intention concerning a certain project of peace, in the Examination of a Libel, &c. intituled An important Advice to the Refugees on their approaching return into France (10).

In the beginning Mr Bayle gives an account of all he had done with regard to the project of peace, agreeably to what we have related above. He takes notice of all the falsehoods in Mr Jurieu's narration, and of all the extravagancies he had been guilty of in this matter. As to the Advice to the Refugees, which made the second article of his Accusation, he says he had at first designed to handle that subject in a particular treatise; but considering that this work might encrease under his hand, and not appear soon, he thought it would be best in the mean while to give this prelude of an Answer. He agreed with Mr Jurieu that the Advice to the Refugees was the work of a Protestant: but he undertook to show by the strongest presumptions that it must have been written in France; and so he refuted all the suppositions which Mr Jurieu had made to prove that it had been composed in Holland, and that if the author was at Paris, he would discover himself. He shows the difference betwixt that author's manner of writing and his own. He refuted all the characters by which Mr Jurieu had pretended to point out the author of the Advice in order to conclude that it was Mr Bayle. He showed how ridiculous his remarks and chicanery were concerning the new edition of that piece, which they were printing at Paris; and that Mr Jurieu's presumptions gave him no right to arraign him publicly as a traitor, an impious person, and guilty of high-treason both against God and man; and proved that in order to make him appear guilty he had made use of deceit, treachery, and the blackest malice. He showed that the characters which Mr Jurieu fixed upon the author of the Advice, offered presumptions incomparably more strong than Mr Bayle was not the author of it, than all

that

- (1) Ibid. pag. 110, 111.
- (2) Ibid. pag. 57.
- (3) Ibid. pag. 80.
- (4) See above, pag. xlvii, xlviii.
- (5) About the end of the month of April 1691.
- (6) Examen d'un Libelle contre la Religion, contre l'Etat, & contre la Revolution d'Angleterre, intitulé Avis important aux Refugiez sur leur prochain retour en France.
- (7) Cabale Chimérique, pag. 94. of the first edition.
- (8) Ibid. pag. 207, 208.
- (9) It was dated the 8th and 13th of May 1691.
- (10) La Cabale Chimérique: ou Refutation de l'Histoire fabuleuse qu'on vient de publier malicieusement touchant un certain Projet de paix, dans l'Examen d'un Libelle, &c. intitulé Avis important aux Refugiez sur leur prochain retour en France. A Rotterdam chez Reinier Leers, 1691, in 12°.

(1) Ibid.
pag. 283.
and the
following.

that he had alledged to prove that he was. Lastly he re-capitulates Mr Jurieu's accusations, and reduced them to twenty five Articles, the eighteenth of which was (1), That Mr Bayle made hardly any secret of his Atheism, that he did not edify the public by any act of Religion; that he was without Religion, and without love to God, so that his supreme deity was called Lewis XIV. "Here, adds Mr Bayle, are eighteen Articles, out of which I am sure my adversary will never extricate himself. The last alone is sufficient to employ him for his whole Life, without drawing any thing but matter of confusion to himself from it. I wait with a great deal of impatience 'till he shall come that length. It is so capital a point, that he must either conquer or die. He must prove it, either by my writings or by credible witnesses, or by avouching by unquestionable signs, that God has conferred upon him the gift of prophecy to such a degree, that he sees all that passeth in peoples hearts. Passion has blinded him in such a manner that he could not see, that though his cause had been good, he would have ruined it by the great number of facts with which he has loaded it. For though he should succeed in all the rest of the articles, if he failed in the last could he justly escape hanging? is not Atheism punished capitally every where? and ought not an accuser who is convicted of false evidence, to suffer the same punishment which the person accused would have undergone, if he had been found guilty. . . . I repeat it once more, an accuser who embarrasseth himself so stupidly and foolishly excites rather our pity than our anger. Who would not laugh to see a Minister undertake to prove, that a man who in the sight of the world communicates four times a year, and is frequently present at the public prayers, and at the best part of the sermon, doth not perform any religious act? I will show him that my pretended impiety consists only in my not having applauded his false miracles, false prophets, and pretended revelations; and I will never be ashamed of having contributed to stop my fellow Refugees upon the brink of Fanaticism, and of having indirectly hindered Mr Jurieu himself from pushing his chimeras still further (2)." To these eighteen articles he added seven more, and (3) declared that all that Mr Jurieu could write before he had proved these twenty five articles would be lost labour, and that his honour would not be at all salved by proving some of them only; for if he should fail in others, he would still be convicted as a public calumniator, in a matter where life and fame are concerned; and consequently his Ministry would be thereby so much dishonoured that he would be a reproach to the Protestant Church if they did not depose him."

(2) Ibid.
p. 286.

(3) Ibid.
p. 294,
295.

As this was not one of those disputes which arise among men of letters, about points of erudition or science, but an affair wherein honour and even life was concerned, if the treason against the State had been proved; Mr Bayle did not think himself obliged to keep any terms with his accuser, he unmasked him so successfully, that even Mr Jurieu's pride and arrogance were not able to stand so rude a shock. He had recourse to the civil power, and presented to the Venerable Burgomasters of Rotterdam a Petition wherein he drew his own picture to the life. It is as follows:

The Sieur Jurieu, who has had the honour for so many years and by so many labours to defend the cause of God, prays for justice from your Lordships, against a horrible Libel composed by the Sieur Bayle, wherein the said Bayle calls him rogue, villain, impostor, calumniator, and wicked man; and calls the Princes who have shaken off the yoke of Popery flagitious men, and assassins, and says many other infamous things against the Reformation. The Sieur Jurieu implores protection for his innocence, and that the said book may be prohibited, lacerated, and torn to pieces; the author punished as such atrocious injuries deserve; and that the Sieur Jurieu may be permitted to defend himself publicly, he promising to do so with modesty and christian moderation; and that the Sieur Bayle may be forbid to compose any more books against the Sieur Jurieu.

(4) Chimeres demontrees, p^{te} f. pag. lxxv, lxxvi.

"This is, says Mr Bayle (4), one of the most violent and at the same time the most burlesque piece that was ever seen. To desire that an accuser of high-treason both against God and man should be allowed to write against the party accused, and that the latter should be forbid to write against his accuser; must not one be out of his wits to offer such a petition? A Gentleman who should desire his Prince to give him leave to fight in single combat with his adversary, after tying him hand and foot to a tree, would not be so ridiculous. But his assurance in accusing Mr Bayle before these gentlemen, of having in his Cabale Chimerique called the Princes who have shaken off the yoke of Popery, flagitious men and assassins, and of having said several infamous things against the Reformation, is such a furious calumny, that tho' he should meet with no other disgrace in this process, but the being convicted of having advanced such a falsehood in such a petition, he would have good reason to repent of his notable accusation."

The Burgomasters of Rotterdam acted a part agreeable to their equity and wisdom. They exhorted both Mr Bayle and Mr Jurieu to make up matters as soon as possible; and forbade them to write any thing against each other, which should not first be examined by Mr Bayer, Pensionary of the city. They prohibited likewise the publication of any more anonymous libels, such as had appeared at Rotterdam 1691. "against the Cabale Chimérique (1)." We shall soon have an occasion of speaking of these libels.

"against

What Mr Jurieu had wrote concerning the pretended Cabal of Geneva, drew upon him both the indignation and contempt of that whole City. One of the Syndics wrote what follows on this subject to a friend of his in Holland (2): I can assure you, Sir, that people in this Country have been very much offended at Mr Jurieu's manner of writing, and that he has lost his reputation among all men of honour and good sense. One cannot imagine what could make him write in the manner he has done against this City. What he has said is absolutely false, and entirely his own invention. All that is true in the matter is, that one Goudet, a Merchant, has taken upon him to write certain projects of peace &c.

See likewise what a private Gentleman writes from thence (3): "We cannot but look with indignation upon a man, who, filled with the most deadly poison, bites without distinction every thing that comes in his way, friends and foes, not sparing even Sovereign States. What have the Magistrates of Geneva done to him that he should endeavour to embroil them with their people, and set them at variance with all the Protestants and the Allies? but all that I can say to you on this subject is, that every body here has looked upon his calumnies with the utmost contempt."

Mr Minutoli wrote a letter to Mr Jurieu on the same subject in very strong terms. I do not know, (says he (4)), whether our Government, and so many persons of distinction, so unworthily treated in a point which concerns so deeply both their conscience and honour, will not endeavour to give you the most mortifying proofs of their just resentment; but I am very certain that I must have forgot all the rules of justice, if I did not at present appear in favour of Mr Bayle, who by the accident which I will tell you, was brought by me only into that affair, which you are pleased to lay to his charge as a great crime. He proceeds to give a detail of all that had passed betwixt Mr Bayle and him concerning the project of peace; which agreed in every circumstance with the account Mr Bayle himself had given of it in his Cabale Chimérique, and which I have before related. He reproached Mr Jurieu with having upon some frivolous conjectures, placed both Mr Bayle and him in his pretended Cabal. Tell me upon your conscience, (says he), how would you take it, if any body upon such presumptions, which they might have against you, should presently, without farther examination, in a public manner accuse you and your friends as persons without Honour, Faith, or Religion? He exhorted him to acknowledge his fault, and not to oblige him to make this Letter public for Mr Bayle's justification.

Mr Jurieu received likewise Letters from some friends he had at Geneva, advising him not to give any credit to the story of the Geneva Cabal, and not to consider the project of peace as a serious matter (5). But this did not hinder him to publish without the knowledge, and contrary to the prohibition of the Magistrates, a piece intitled, (6) New Convictions of the Author of the Advice to the Refugees. Together with the Nullity of his Defences. By a friend of Mr Jurieu. Part the first. He wrote under the name of a friend, that by this disguise he might not come under the Magistrates prohibition. He maintained in it all that he had before said concerning the Cabal at Geneva, and the project of peace. This first part was soon followed by a second, intitled, The last Conviction of the Sieur Bayle, Professor of Philosophy at Rotterdam, concerning the Advice to the Refugees, which may serve for a Factum in the complaint laid before the State (7). In this last piece, he no longer talks of the dangerous Cabal which extended itself from North to South, which had its center at the Court of France, and whose intention was to raise an insurrection in Holland and in England to confound all the Designs of the Allies, and by this means to procure an universal Monarchy to France, and consequently to ruin the Protestant Religion. He saw that he had thereby made himself both contemptible and ridiculous; he therefore changed the state of the question, and only accused Mr Bayle of having had an intention to publish without the knowledge of the State, A Project of Peace contrary to their intentions and interests (8). With regard to the Advice to the Refugees he only repeated and amplified the accusations which he had already brought against Mr Bayle: and instead of justifying himself from the falsehoods and calumnies which Mr Bayle had reduced to twenty five articles, he gave a loose to abuse and invectives. He had even the boldness to deny that the Magistracy had forbid him to write, as they had done Mr Bayle. "Surely, (said he), one must have a very bad opinion of the Administration both of this City and of the State, to believe that they have put a man accused of treason against the State, upon the same footing with one who through his zeal for the State has brought a complaint against him. It would not be at all just to take the right of defending himself from a man who has been so violently attacked, as Mr Jurieu has been. He is obliged for the edification of the Church to vindicate his name wherever his works have carried it (9)." However as it was very certain that they had been both alike forbidden to publish any thing which had not been examined by Mr Bayer (10): this Magistrate on reading that part of

(1) Chimere de-montree, p. 4.

(2) Ibid. Preface, p. xxxv, xxxvi.

(3) Ibid. p. xxxvi, xxxvii.

(4) Letter from Mr Minutoli to Mr Jurieu of the 13th of May 1691. In the Chimere de-montree &c. p. 189, 190.

(5) Ibid. Preface, p. xi, xii.

(6) Nouvelles Convi-ctions contre l'Auteur de l'Avis aux Refugees. Avec la nullité de ses justifications. Par un Ami de Mr Jurieu. Premiere Partie.

(7) Der-niere Convi-ction contre le sieur Bayle, Professeur en Philosophie à Rotterdam au sujet de l'Avis aux Refugees, pour servir de Factum sur la plainte portée aux Puissances de l'Etat. Both parts together contain 36 pages in 4°, in two columns small character.

(8) Last Conviction &c. p. 15, col. 1.

(9) Ibid.

(10) Chimere de-montree, p. 215, 216, and Preface, p. lxxiv.

the Factum, was extremely surprized at Mr Jurieu's assurance in maintaining the con- 1691.

(1) Letter to Mr.

Infant of the 24th of August 1691. p. 390, 391.

(2) Lettre écrite à M. B. Prof. en Phil. & en Hist. à Rotterdam sur la Cabale Chimérique.

(3) Remarques Générales sur la Cabale Chimérique de Mr Bayle: I. & II. Suite de ces Remarques.

(4) Bauval Copy of a Letter from Mr S.... concerning the General Remarks on the Cabale Chimérique, p. 1. and the following.

(5) Entre-tiens sur le grand scandale causé par un Livre intitulé la Cabale Chimérique, p. 157.

(6) Lettre sur les petits Livres publiez contre la Cabale Chimérique.

(7) Courte Refutation de la Lettre écrite en faveur de S. B. pour la défense de la Cabale Chimérique.

(8) Lettre écrite à Mr B. sur la Cabale Chimérique, p. 27, 28.

Before the publication of Mr Jurieu's last Conviction, there appeared several anonymous libels against the Cabale Chimérique, wherein his accusations were repeated and even improved by new calumnies. Of this kind were the Letter to Mr Bayle, Professor of Philosophy and History in Rotterdam, concerning the Cabale Chimérique (2). It was a violent declamation wrote by a Minister, one of Mr Jurieu's Creatures. General Remarks on Mr Bayle's Cabale Chimérique, with a first and second Continuation of these Remarks (3). At first these Remarks were ascribed to Mr Bazin de Limeville, a Refugee at Rotterdam (4), but he protested that he was no ways concerned in them (5), and it was afterwards known that they were written by Mr Robethon. Mr Bayle published under the name of a friend, a pamphlet of twelve pages, intitled A Letter concerning the little books published against the Cabale Chimérique (6), wherein he informed the Public of his reasons for not answering these libels. He said that the prohibition of the Magistrate had made him suppress the answer which he had promised in his Cabale Chimérique; and that all the world was convinced that Mr Jurieu had broke the promise which he made to the Burgomasters, by publishing his pretended New Convictions. He added that he intended to answer Mr Jurieu's last libel, but that he did not think it proper to spend his time in answering a great many other pieces which only repeated the same things, or commented on some mistaken or mutilated passage of the Cabale Chimérique, and advanced falsehoods with equal boldness and malice. He gives some examples of this, taken from the two pieces just now mentioned. The Minister who was Author of the letter to Mr Bayle thought fit to reply. He published a pamphlet of twenty one pages, intitled A short Refutation of a Letter written in favour of the Sieur Bayle in defence of his Cabale Chimérique (7). He believed that Mr Bauval was author of the letter concerning the little books. I will insert here one of his accusations, Mr Bayle's answer to it, and the accuser's reply: this will be sufficient to give a notion of these two pieces, and of the character of their author. The Minister after accusing Mr Bayle of avarice adds (8), "when I speak of your avarice I do not use this word in the strict sense. They say you do not love money with a design to hoard it up; I am willing to believe it since people say so. You love it notwithstanding for the use you are pleased to make of it, with which I do not pretend to meddle. But, Sir, do you believe that the world doth not know why you discontinued your News from the Republic of Letters? We know indeed that the indisposition which seized you, furnished you with a pretence. But we know likewise, that you pretended to be better paid for it than you had been formerly, and that the Bookseller not being willing to agree to the augmentation you demanded, your agreement was at an end, and you discontinued the work upon that account. That is to say, your appetite increased in proportion with your reputation." Who could imagine that a fact could be alledged with so much confidence, without taking all the necessary precautions to be certain of its truth! However let us hear Mr Bayle. I do not know, says he (9), what name to give to a falsehood of a certain declaimer, who has lately published as a thing certain, that Mr Bayle discontinued his News from the Republic of Letters, only because the Bookseller would not give him all that he demanded for the copy. The Bookseller is still alive: his name is Henry Desbordes, he lives at Amsterdam, in the Kalverstraet, one may be fully informed what truth there is in this, with all the ease in the world; yet here is a man, who without being at the pains of informing himself, which could have retarded the publication of his wonderful Letter only a day or two, dares to entangle himself publicly in an infamous falsehood, for which he may be covered with confusion, if he is capable of any shame, by showing Mr Desbordes's own handwriting. But this author was not to be put to the blush. He answered coolly (10), "We think ourselves obliged to consult Henry Desbordes about the fact we advanced, concerning the interruption of the News from the Republic of Letters. We have spoke in the manner we have done on the testimony a printer, who at that time worked for the said Desbordes, because he had no interest to disguise matters, and we believed that he related things as they were. So we leave it as we found it, because it is a matter of very small importance in itself, and neither much helps or hurts the principal cause." This was the common custom of those writers of libels. They published upon hear-say the most infamous things they could pick up against Mr Bayle, and when they were convicted of falsehood, they said that they left them as they found them. And in this they only followed Mr Jurieu's example, who filled his Factums with mere imaginations and falsehoods. It was in this manner that he repeated several times, that Mr Bayle had lived with the Jesuits at Toulouse three years; tho' he had never lived with them, and had staid only eighteen months at Toulouse, as we have already seen. He had his spies every where, who wrote or told him what passed, and for the most part very unfaithfully. We may well imagine, that his spies were the very scum of the Refugees. He had even some of them so scandalous, that his own creatures were ashamed of it. One of his friends could not forbear writing to him, that he disparaged himself by his correspondence with a certain Minister

(9) Lettre sur les petits livres publiez contre la Cabale Chimérique, p. 6, 7.

(10) Courte Refutation de la Lettre écrite en faveur de S. B. pour la défense de la Cabale Chimérique, p. 15, 16.

1691. nister among the Refugees at London : Mr Jurieu answered him, He is a knave, it is true ; but he is orthodox : whereupon he was commonly called the orthodox knave.

There appeared likewise another piece consisting of twelve pages, against Mr Bayle's Letter, with this title, A Letter to Mr relating to a Libel intituled, A Letter concerning the little books published against the Cabale Chimerique (1). The author ascribes this Letter concerning the little books, &c. to Mr de Bauval, with more assurance than the author of the Letter to Mr Bayle had done. And indeed the same spirit was observable in both. Before these three pieces appeared, Mr de Bauval had published one of eight pages intituled, A Copy of a Letter written to M. S. . . . concerning the author of the General Remarks on the Cabale Chimerique (2). After some fine raillery upon the author of the General Remarks, whom he took to be Mr Limeville, he gives us Mr Jurieu's Petition, and shews how ridiculous it is. He made likewise some reflexions upon the unjust distinction that Mr Jurieu pretended should be made betwixt him and Mr Bayle.

The first edition of the Cabale Chimerique being very soon sold off, Mr Bayle published another corrected and very much enlarged. On the back of the title-page there is a short advertisement, wherein he desires the reader not to make a judgment of that piece from the first chapters of it, in which he was forced to be dry, and could not avoid a detail of trifling particulars ; but that they should find what followed more lively and less tiresome, if they would give themselves the trouble of reading it quite through. This edition did not appear so soon as the impression of it was finished. Mr Bayle put a stop to the sale of it for a considerable time, because the Burgomasters of Rotterdam had forbidden all the Booksellers in that City, to sell any thing that should be printed on this subject (3). But when he saw that Mr Jurieu published his Factums, he thought himself likewise intitled to publish the second edition of his Cabale Chimerique. However, he did not mention in the title that it was printed at Rotterdam, or that it was a second edition corrected and enlarged. As this title is somewhat different from the first, I will insert it here : The Chimerical Cabal : or a Refutation of the fabulous stories and calumnies which Mr Jurieu has lately maliciously published concerning a certain Project of Peace ; and concerning a Libel intituled, an important Advice to the Refugees, upon their approaching return into France, in his examination of that Libel (4).

In this edition Mr Bayle attacked Mr Jurieu very smartly with regard to the accusation of Atheism. He insisted upon this article by all the considerations which could show the importance of it ; he called upon his accuser, in a solemn manner, to prove it, he employed defiance, insults, and, in a word, every thing that is most proper to put an adversary under a necessity of producing his proofs (5). Mr Jurieu seeing himself so pressed, addressed himself to his Consistory, and promised to make good his accusation : but he gave over this design a few days after, and offered only to be their Commissary, if they would furnish him with some Memoirs, which surprized them extremely (6). He had often than once harangued in the Consistory against Mr Bayle with the utmost vehemence, and went even so far as to declare, That he would no more be reconciled with him than with the Devil (7). He endeavoured in vain to get the Acts of the Consistory annulled, which amongst other things contained that Mr Jurieu had desisted from his accusations against Mr Bayle, concerning Religion, and that he should not carry the complaints he might have against him any where but to the Consistory in the first instance (8). In the mean while he published a piece intituled, A short review of the maxims of Morality and principles of Religion, of the author of the Thoughts concerning Comets, and of the General Criticism on Maimbourg's History of Calvinism : To serve for an Information to the Ecclesiastical Judges, if they please to take cognizance of it (9). He here alledges some passages of these two books, and endeavours to show that they tend to irreligion. The same day that this piece fell into Mr Bayle's hands, he published one under this title : The Declaration of Mr Bayle, Professor of Philosophy and History at Rotterdam, concerning a Pamphlet lately published under the title of a Short Review of the Maxims of Morality &c. (10). Mr Bayle here showed that Mr Jurieu changed the state of the question, he calls upon him anew to prove his accusation of Atheism, and engages to justify himself from all Heterodoxy, as soon as this first and principal point is cleared. He adds several propositions extracted from Mr Jurieu's writings, to serve for a supplement to those, a condemnation of which had been desired from the Synod assembled at Leyden in the beginning of May 1691. "The Short Review having been distributed among the members of the Consistory, they resolved to examine a cause of so much importance : however they did not ground any prejudices against Mr Bayle's opinions, either upon the discourses, or writings of his accuser. They prepared themselves to judge the matter in a regular manner ; and Mr Bayle declared himself always ready to show his innocence, and it was not owing to him that they did not come to a final determination (11), but they did not proceed in the cause."

Some of Mr Bayle's friends sided with him even so far as to write in his favour. Mr de Bauval published A Letter concerning the differences between Mr Jurieu and Mr Bayle (12), wherein he demonstrated that Mr Jurieu could never justify his base usage

(1) Lettre à Monsieur  sur le sujet d'un Libelle qui a pour titre, Lettre sur les petits Livres publiez contre la Cabale Chimerique.

(2) Copie d'un Lettre écrite à M. S. . . . touchant l'Auteur des Remarques Generales sur la Cabale Chimerique.

(3) Letter to Mr Minutoli of the 27th of August 1691, p. 392.

(4) La Cabale Chimerique : ou Refutation de l'Histoire fabuleuse & des calomnies que Mr J. vient de publier maliciousement touchant un certain Projet de Paix, & touchant le libelle intitule Avis important aux Refugiez sur leur prochain retour en France, dans son Examen de ce libelle. A Cologne. chez Pierre Marteau, 1691, in 12^o. (5) P. 337. (6) Chimerie demontree, p. 14. (7) Ibid. p. 30. (8) Letter to Mr Lonsfant of the 24th of August 1691, p. 389.

(9) Courte Revue des Maximes de Morale & des principes de Religion de l'Auteur des Penfées diverses sur les Cometes, & de la Critique Generale sur l'Histoire du Calvinisme de Maimbourg : Pour servir de Factum aux Juges Ecclesiastiques, s'ils en veulent connoître. In 4^o. pag. 8.

(10) Declaration de Mr Bayle, Professeur en Philosophie & en Histoire à Rotterdam touchant un petit Ecrit qui vient de paroître sous le titre de Courte Revue des Maximes de Morale &c. In 12^o, pp. 24.

(11) Additions to the Thoughts concerning Comets &c. p. 15, 16. (12) Lettre sur les differences de Mr Jurieu & de Mr Bayle.

(1) New Conviction-ons, &c.
pag. 10.
col. 1.

(2) *Letter
to Mr Minutoli of the 27th
of August
1691, pag.
395.*

(3) Lettre
d'un des Amis de
Mr Bayle
aux Amis de Mr Jurieu.

(4) Lettre à Mes-sieurs les Ministres & Anciens qui composent le Synode assemblé à Leyden, le 2 de Mai 1691.

(5) Apologie du Sieur Jurieu, Pasteur & Professeur en Théologie, adre-ssée aux
Pasteurs & Conduc-teurs des Eglises Wallones
des Pays-Bas.

(6) Apology for the Sieur Ju-
rieu, pag.
25. col. 1.

(7) Ibid.
pag. 24.
col. 2.

(a) Réponse à l'avis
de Mr Ju-
rieu,
pag. 26, 27.

* Accomplishment of Prophecies,
tom. ii. cap.
12. 1st Edit.

† Ibid. tom.
ii. cap. 2.
1st Edit.

usage of Mr Bayle, whether we consider the matter with respect to the conduct be- coming a gentleman, or to our common obligations as members of civil society. Afterwards he defends himself from Mr Jurieu's attacks. We have seen that this divine had accused him of forging the Extract of a Letter in his Journal, wherein it was said that they were reprinting the Advice to the Refugees at Paris. He repeated this charge in his Convictions, and imputed likewise other crimes to him. He accused him of being the publisher of the Advice to the Refugees, and of being a man without Religion. He maintained that the Extract of the Letter was forged. "We are certain, says he (1), that it is forged. And we defy those Gentlemen to deposite that Letter, from whence this Extract was taken, in the hands of four men of honour who shall be chosen on the one side and the other, who may examine from whence it came, when it was written, and what goes before and after that passage. We defy them to do this, says he, and if they do not do it, it will be a proof that the Letter is either forged, or written by a correspondent who is in the secret, or contains things which will discover the mystery. This is a challenge which we are very sure they will not accept. They will not dare to do it." Mr de Bauval accepted this challenge. He summoned him by a Notary to name two referees, and promised to name two others, to whom he would shew the Letter: but Mr Jurieu drew back, and could never be brought to this discussion which he had proposed. Mr Bayle mentions this piece of Mr de Bauval in one of his Letters to Mr Minutoli. "Of all my friends, says he (2), there is none who has wrote any thing in my favour, except Mr de Bauval, Mr Bagnage's brother. Mr Jurieu hates him, at least as much as he doth me, and brings him into all his Libels with a perfectly brutal rudeness; and at last joins him with me as author of the Advice to the Refugees. Mr de Bauval has therefore wrote a Letter of two sheets and a half, concerning our differences, which rallies him in a very elegant and dexterous manner." Mr Huet likewise published a piece in favour of Mr Bayle, intitled: A Letter from a friend of Mr Bayle's to Mr Jurieu's friends (3), wherein he takes to task several passages of the New Convictions, and of the General Remarks. This pamphlet is wrote with a great deal of good sense and moderation.

Mr Jurieu raised as many complaints by his heterodox opinions, as he did by his violent and persecuting spirit. Some churches petitioned the Synods to examine his books; they made up a list of heresies and profane expressions contained in them [P], and sent it to the Synod then sitting at Leyden, under the title of A Letter to the Ministers and Elders, members of the Synod assembled at Leyden, the second of May 1691 (4). This accusation together with the disputes he had with several Ministers in the Synods, obliged him to publish a piece intitled, An Apology for the Sieur Jurieu, Minister and Professor of Divinity, addressed to the Ministers and Heads of the Walloon Churches in the Low Countries (5): but instead of defending his doctrine here, he with a great deal of pride and ostentation sets forth the great services he pretended to have done the Church; and after thus making his own panegyric, breaks out into railing and invectives against the Ministers who had complained of him, and once more inveighs bitterly against Mr Bayle. It is here that he owns that since it was not in his power to get him punished as he deserved, at least he would expose him to public infamy (6), and he makes grievous complaints of the clemency of the State (7). As Mr de Bauval's piece had touched him to the quick, he falls violently upon him; and tho' he had refused to abide by the terms of the challenge which he had given; he

[P] The profane expressions contained in the writings of Mr Jurieu. Mr Jurieu having complained in 1690 that Mr de Bauval had taken all occasions of introducing him in his Journal without the least necessity; Mr de Bauval answered that this was an unjust complaint. "I have done it, says he (a), only once in treating of Toleration; and I have spared him on a thousand occasions. He would long ago have thundered against me, as he has now done, if I had not shunned him even when he came naturally in my way. Have I pointed out all the blunders which Mr de Meaux, and Father de Sainte Marthe have observed in his writings? His not the one of them observed with great marks of astonishment that Mr Jurieu not being able to fix the time of the fall of Antichrist * has given this reason for it; that in matter of prophecies God doth not look so near? And has not the other reproached him with a certain chapter † in the Accomplishment of Prophecies, which has the following fine title, Some things put in order which the Holy Ghost has put out of order, with regard to the visions? Have not others made violent outcries against his Religion of the Jesuits? After having recited there a Motet wherein the King of France is introduced saying to King James II, who had then abandoned his three kingdoms, Sit thou on my right hand until I make thy enemies thy foot-stool, Mr Jurieu adds waggishly, See what an ad- "mirable metamorphosis here is! The King is become God the Father, the King of England is become God the Son; that this Trinity may be complete I think we should make a Holy Ghost of the Prince of Wales. He had jested pretty much in the same manner when he found the following resemblance between Jesus CHRIST and the Prince of Wales, that as Joseph the Virgin's husband, was not the true father of the first Jesus, James II, the Queen's husband, might possibly likewise not be father of the second."

These expressions to unedifying and so disrespectful to Religion, were complained of to the Synods. The Author of the Answer to Mr Jurieu's second Apology (b) makes a particular article of them under the title of Profane expressions of Mr Jurieu, and gives many examples of them, and among others the following: The Apostles did not imitate those jugglers, who immediately upon their arrival any where endeavour to perform some master-piece of their art, &c. The Disciples of Aristotle must needs be much surprised to find that the Eternal Word has turned Cartesian in his old days (c). Mr Saurin in his Examination of the Theology of Mr Jurieu, observes that we may add to this railery the following, which very much resembles it: Can God perform this miracle? possibly they believe he cannot, and that now he is too old to do such great and extraordinary works (d).

1691.

(b) Réponse à un Libelle intitulé, Seconde Apologie du
Mr Jurieu.

(c) Répon-
se à un Libelle,
&c. pag. 19.
& suiv.

(d) Examen de la Théologie
de Mr Jurieu, tom. i.
pag. 532.

1691.

(1) Ibid.
pag. 26.
col. 2.(2) Reponse à l'Apolo-gie de Mr Jurieu.(3) See Confiderations upon two Sermons of Mr Jurieu, &c.
pag. 36.

he nevertheless maintained that he had convicted him of being an accomplice in the Advice to the Refugees, and of being the principal actor in the comedy of the Paris edition (1). Mr de Bauval published an Answer to Mr Jurieu's Apology (2) wherein he refuted his calumnies, and showed how ridiculously he had boasted that he was the pillar of the Church, and the champion of Orthodoxy. He called upon him once more to name his arbiters to decide the difference between them with all rigour: but he called upon him in vain. At last, seeing that he would make him no reparation, nor come to any explanation, he presented a declaration to the Consistory of Rotterdam, by which he protested that he looked upon Mr Jurieu to be a calumniator and a wicked man (3).

Mr Bayle published an answer to Mr Jurieu's last pieces under this title: The Chimera of the Cabal of Rotterdam, demonstrated by the pretended Convictions which the Sieur Jurieu has published against Mr Bayle (4). This Answer is written under the name of a friend of Mr Bayle, and contains three parts: I. *The Chimera of the Cabal of Rotterdam, demonstrated by the New Convictions published by a friend of Mr Jurieu; or a Letter from a Friend of Mr Bayle to Mr *. It is a Refutation of the Factum or Case published by Mr Jurieu, in support of his Cabal of the Project of peace. It concludes with the Letter which Mr Minutoli wrote to Mr Jurieu upon that subject. II. General Remarks upon Mr Jurieu's Factum against Mr Bayle concerning the Advice to the Refugees. He doth not here endeavour to refute particularly every thing that Mr Jurieu advances in his Last Conviction; but lays down a list of things to be proved by him, without which that piece could be of no force. III. A long Preface, wherein the way to judge on which side the victory lies in this process, is laid down. Mr Bayle gives here an account of all the particulars of Mr Jurieu's accusation, and of what had been done in consequence of it. This accusation is reduced to these three heads: the Cabal of Geneva; the Advice to the Refugees; and the correspondence with the Court of France. Mr Bayle joined to it some Reflexions on Mr Jurieu's Apology, wherein he discovers several falshoods which he had advanced, and amongst others this; that Mr Bayle owed his establishment at Rotterdam to him. Mr Bayle shows that it was quite the contrary. In the Advice to the Reader, he says that this book was composed a good while before, except the last sheets of the Preface; and that it would have appeared a few days after Mr Jurieu's pretended Convictions, if the Printers had been as diligent as the Author. He gives an account of the contents of each part, and makes some reflexions upon Mr Jurieu's shameful conduct in this whole affair. Mr Bayle treats Mr Jurieu in this work with less severity than he had done in the Cabale Chimérique, as he himself observes.

Mr Bayle much about the same time published, Dialogues concerning the great scandal which had been given by a book intitled the Cabale Chimérique (5). This piece contains five Dialogues. PHILODEMUS and AGATHO, the two dialogists, consider Mr Jurieu as an eminent servant of God who has wore out his strength in the service of the Church; and are very much displeased that Mr Bayle has treated him so harshly. They acquaint each other with the conversations they have had with some Cabalists; and repeat the arguments these Cabalists had advanced for Mr Bayle, and the manner in which they had answered them. It is a perpetual Irony, under which Mr Jurieu's picture is drawn, and Mr Bayle is vindicated on many different subjects.

The mortifications which Mr Jurieu had received at the last Synod (6), the necessity he found himself reduced to of preparing his defences for the next Synod, against the complaints which came from all quarters against his doctrine, and his grief to see that, notwithstanding all his opposition, Mr Bafnage his brother-in-law was received Minister in ordinary to the Church of Rotterdam; all this together troubled him so much that he was seized with his usual vapours in the month of September 1691 (7). He found himself unable to write, and there passed three or four months without any thing appearing in his dispute with Mr Bayle. But at last his champion, the Author of the General Remarks, thought fit to publish a piece against the Chimera of the Cabal, &c. intitled, The Philosopher degraded. Which may serve for a third part to the General Remarks upon Mr Bayle's Cabale Chimérique (8). Mr Bayle's friends advised him to neglect this piece: however he thought it necessary to answer it. He gives the following reasons to Mr Sylvestre for doing so. "If you had read, says he (9), the Libel which you desire me not to answer, "I am sure you would approve of my having made that Author sensible of his insufferable abuses; and I have done this to nip in the bud a thousand little libels of this sort which he prepares to give us, wherein he would not regard the grossest falshoods, if I did not threaten to take him sharply to task. And indeed I thought I should disoblige Mr Sartre, if I should oppose nothing but silence to his testimony." To clear up this fact, I must observe that Mr Jurieu in his Short Review published a Letter from London, wherein it was positively affirmed that a person who had studied with Mr Bayle at Puy-laurens (that is to say of Decem-ber, 1691, deduced to such a degree that he turned Papist, and even went to stay at Toulouse with the Jesuits about three years: that this person having wrote to him concerning his

(4) Chi-mère de la Cabale de Rotterdam, démontrée par les prétendues Convictions que le Sieur Jurieu a publiées contre Mr Bayle. A Amsterdam chez
Henry Desbor-des, dans le Kakevstraet.
1691.

(5) Entretiens sur le grand scandale causé par un Livre intitulé,
la Cabale Chimérique. A Cologne
chez Pierre
Morteau.
1691.

(6) The Synod of Naerden, held in September 1691, ordered Mr Jurieu to produce his defences against an accusation of Heresy and Impie-ty, brought against him by five Churches.

(7) Letter to Mr Constant of 8th of October
1691, p.
498.

(8) Le Philosophe dégra-dé. Pour servir de troisième
partie aux Remar-ques Ge-nérales sur
la Cabale Chimérique de
Mr Bayle.

(9) Letter of the 17th
of December, 1691,
pag. 421,
422.

change of Religion, had received a sharp answer from him which bespoke him a true Papiſt and already filled with the ſpirit of Jeſuitiſm: that he ſaw him afterwards at Geneva after he had left Toulouſe, and that Mr Bayle calling to mind this Letter and the Answer to it, made an apology for it, and begged of him not to mention that matter. Mr Bayle denied all theſe circumſtances in his Cbimere demonſtrée, except his change of Religion. He denied that he had ever lived with the Jeſuits; and called upon the Author to name the perſon who pretended that Mr Bayle had wrote a

(1) Letter from Mr Sartre to Mr Bayle of the 6th of October 1691, p. 399, 400.

(2) Advice to the little Author of the little books, &c. p. 29, 30.

(3) It is dated the 11th of December 1691.

(4) Avis au petit Auteur des petits Livrets ſur ſon Philoſophie dégradée, 1692.

(5) Addition to the Thoughts concerning Comets, &c. p. 18, 19.

(6) This is the ordinary day wherein the Conſiſtories meet.

(7) See in the Hiſt. and Crit. Diſſ. the Article COMENIUS.

(8) The Gate of Heaven opened to all Religions, by the famous Mr Peter Jurieu Miniſter of the Goſpel and Profeſſor of Divinity at Rotterdam.

ſharp Answer to him, and afterwards had made apologies for it at Geneva: Upon this Mr Jurieu's emiſſary, author of the Letter, engaged Mr Sartre to write a Letter to Mr Bayle, wherein he owned that he had ſaid, that Mr Bayle "being at Puy-laurens, had abſented himſelf; and that it was known ſome days after that he had thrown himſelf into the Jeſuits Convent at Toulouſe; that he had wrote a Letter to him on that ſubject, ſuch as a young man might be ſuppoſed to write on ſuch an occaſion; and that he had received a very tart answer to it; and that he had likewiſe ſaid, that about three years after he had ſeen Mr Bayle at Geneva, and that Mr Bayle ſignified to him that he would oblige him, by not ſpeaking of what had paſſed at Toulouſe, becauſe it might do him hurt in the deſign he had of making ſome ſtay at Geneva (1)." The Author of the Philopſopher degraded published an Extraſt of this Letter; but he ſuppreſſed the paſſage wherein Mr Sartre declared, "that he durſt not affirm, either that Mr Bayle had received his Letter, or that he had answered it, and that ſeveral perſons who ſaw the Letter which he received in answer to his, were of opinion that Mr Bayle was not the Author of it (2)." However the Author of that Libel produced this Letter as a proof of what had been advanced againſt Mr Bayle, and to convict him of infincerity. It was this properly that obliged Mr Bayle to answer this piece. His answer (3) is intituled, An Advice to the little Author of the little Books, with relation to his Philopſopher degraded (4). He there produced many inſtances of the unſairneſs, ſtupidity, and vain repetitions of this Author. He likewiſe diſcovered ſome falſhoods which this pretended Athour to prove from this Letter of Mr Sartre, and acquainted him that he had wrote to that Miniſter, and waited for his Answer; and that Mr Sartre had already aſſured him by a common friend, that he would clear up that matter in a manner which ſhould ſatiſfy Mr Bayle.

We have ſeen that Mr Jurieu being preſſed by Mr Bayle to prove the accuſation of Atheiſm, which he had brought againſt him, had promiſed to his Conſiſtory to do it; and that afterwards he drew back, and only offered to furniſh them with ſome Memoirs on that affair; that without waiting for the orders of the Conſiſtory, he published his Short Review, which obliged Mr Bayle to publiſh a Declaration, wherein he ſhewed that Mr Jurieu had changed the ſtate of the queſtion; and at the ſame time called upon him to prove this principal article. Mr Jurieu answered nothing to theſe repeated challenges, and made no further ſtep before the Conſiſtory that year. But he would needs renew the proceſs as ſoon as the Conſiſtory was changed in the month of January 1692. "At firſt, ſays Mr Bayle (5), he would not be conſidered as a party, but a little after he himſelf agreed that he ought to take that character; he excepted againſt whomſoever he pleaſed. "And as I much about the ſame time addreſſed myſelf to the Conſiſtory to demand juſtice againſt the atrocious calumnies he had publiſhed againſt me, all things looked as if we ſhould ſoon have this affair brought to an iſſue in form; but the accuſer ſuffered ſeveral weeks to paſs without appearing, alledging from ſunday to ſunday (6) divers excuſes. At length he acquainted the Conſiſtory that he would be ready againſt a certain day. I was informed of it, and did not fail to appear, but inſtead of entering upon the affair, my accuſer deſired that we ſhould be referred to the Synod. He ſupported this by all the reaſons he could think of. On the contrary I did all that was in my power to get the Conſiſtory to retain the judgment of the cauſe in the firſt inſtance before themſelves, and propoſed that they ſhould deſire ſome of the Miniſters of the neighbouring Walloon churches, and ſome of the Miniſters of the Dutch churches at Rotterdam to join with the Conſiſtory, and that they ſhould even deſire the Magiſtrates to appoint ſome of their body to aſſiſt at the diſcuſſion of this cauſe: but all my demands were rejected by the plurality of voices; my adverſary obtained that the affair ſhould be referred to the Synod. He went in perſon to the Synod which met a few days after at Zirc-zée, but did not make the leaſt mention of our proceſs, nay would not ſo much as agree that the proceedings of the Conſiſtory ſhould be laid before the Synod, although the Conſiſtory had commiſſioned their deputies to do ſo."

About this time Mr Bayle, diſguiſed under the name of Carus Larebonius, publiſhed a treatiſe in Latin againſt Mr Jurieu's book intituled, The true Syſtem of the Church: and as there is no title to which the ear is more accuſtomed than that of the Janua Linguarum reſerata of Comenius (7). He intituled it, Janua Cælorum reſerata cunctis Religionibus; à celebri admodum viro Domino Petro Jurieu, Rotterodami verbi divini Paſtore & Theologiæ Profeſſore. Porta patens eſt. Nulli claudatur bo-neſto. Amſtelodami excudebat Petrus Chayer. MDCXCII, in 4to (8). This work had had been composed long before this time; for he makes mention of it in his Cabale Chimerique as a piece that was then ready to be sent to the press. "I know a person, says he (1), who has a Latin Dissertation ready for the press, intitled, Janua Calorum rejerata, wherein he shows that the System of the Church of this Author is a sponge to the Reformation, takes away all manner of necessity for it, and saves good people in all Religions." This was to attack Mr Jurieu in the most sensible part: this book was looked upon as the best he had written; and Mr Nicole thought it the only one of all his writings which deserved an answer (2). Mr Bayle shows Mr Jurieu, that as great an enemy as he was to Toleration, he had here opened the gates of heaven, not only to all the sects of Christians, but even to Jews, Mahometans, and Pagans. This book being wrote in a language understood by all the Learned, mortified Mr Jurieu extremely. He durst not venture to answer it. But at last having published a piece in defence of his doctrine, intitled, A second Apology for Mr Jurieu: or an Answer to an anonymous Libel presented to the Synods of Leyden, and Naerden under the title of A Letter to the Ministers and Elders members of the Synod assembled at Leyden the 2d of May 1691; he put at the end of it a kind of Advertisement, wherein he affected to despise that book; and gave extracts of two Letters, written by persons who talked very contemptibly of it, but who confess at the same time that they had not read it. The Authors of the Letter addressed to the Synod of Leyden (3), answered this Apology of Mr Jurieu in a piece intitled, An Examination of Mr Jurieu's Doctrine which may serve for an Answer to a Libel intitled Mr Jurieu's second Apology. They do not let this pitiful artifice of Mr Jurieu pass unobserved. "There cannot be, say they, a more diverting rodomontade than that of Mr Jurieu concerning the book intitled Janua Calorum rejerata, wherein people who understand those matters very well, pretend that his System of the Church is for ever demolished. He answers it by two extracts of Letters genuine or spurious; the Author of one of which says that he had not read the book, and the other that he had read five or six sections only, which make but ten or twelve pages. This is a very slight way of getting off, and it is taking people for dupes, to believe that the world will be satisfied with the judgment of this unknown person, who possibly is Mr Jurieu himself. As a Latin book is now out of his reach, and as he cannot grapple with it, he makes the judgment of two persons unknown a pretext for despising a work which he is unable to answer." Mr Bayle had advertised in the beginning of the Janua Calorum rejerata, that it is wrote in the scholastic stile (4). He likewise made use of their dogmatical method, which, together with the harsh stile, disgusted a great many people from reading this book, and made it to be sought after with less eagerness than his other writings; for otherwise one finds there the same clearness and force of reasoning.

1691.

The Author of the General Remarks, appeared again upon the Stage, by publishing Letters concerning the differences between Mr Jurieu and Mr Bayle, wherein the contradictions of the latter are discovered, which may serve for New Convictions (5). These Letters were five in number, they are dated from Copenhagen; but this did not hinder people from soon discovering the Author. He repeats in a new shape what had been wrote against Mr Bayle, and disguiseth or suppresseth what Mr Bayle had answered. Mr Bayle published on this occasion a piece intitled, New advice to the little Author of the little books. Concerning his Letters on the differences between Mr Jurieu and Bayle (6). He sets forth the reasons why he doth not answer this Author, and only gives a specimen of the false reasoning, malice, and fraudulent disguises with which his pamphlets are filled. He inserted Mr Sartre's Answer to his Letter, wherein he owned that by saying that after Mr Bayle's departure from Puy-laurens it was known that he was gone to throw himself into the Jesuits Convent at Toulouse; he only meant that this was said at Puy-laurens, and believed by every body; and with regard to other little circumstances of the time that there might be from Mr Bayle's going to Toulouse to the time when he saw him at Geneva, and concerning the particular place where they first conversed together, that it was about three years or less though his memory had failed him in this, it was a thing of very little consequence either to the one or the other: and with relation to the Answer which was wrote to him from Toulouse he said, that since Mr Bayle did not agree that he had wrote it, he would not pretend to affirm it, being in no ways certain of the matter; that is to say, he retracted all that he had advanced, and of which Mr Jurieu and his party had made a matter of triumph. To this piece Mr Bayle joined a Letter of Mr  to the Author of the Advice to the little Author of the little books. The Author of this Letter praises Mr Bayle for having at his desire suppressed the reflexions which he was going to send to the press, concerning the violent assault which Mr Jurieu had made upon the Author of the Janua Calorum rejerata, in his second Apology. He shows how mortifying that piece was to Mr Jurieu, and makes an ironical Apology for that Minister's anger. He likewise answers to the reproach which had been made to the Author upon account of his Latin. "It is very likely, says he (7), that Mr Larebonius did not expect such a reproach, not only because he declared both at the beginning and end of his book, that he had on purpose made choice of the scholastic stile, but because he did not think his adversary was able to judge of

(1) Page 104 of the 1st Edit. and pag. 102. of the 2d Edit.

(2) See the Article de COMENIUS. Rem. [M].

(3) Mr Jurieu's Dissertation de l'Esprit de l'Esprit, Mr de l'Esprit, &c.

(4) Non tam sile in Rhetorum scholis quam in Peripateticorum Lyceis obviante.

(5) Lettres sur les differences de Mr Jurieu & de Mr Bayle. Où l'on découvre les contradictions de ce dernier qui peuvent servir de nouvelles Convictions.

(6) Nouvel Avis au petit Auteur des petits Livrets. Concernant ses Lettres sur les differences de Mr Jurieu & de Mr Bayle. A Amsterdam, 1692.

(7) Nouvel Avis, &c. p. 65. See also the Article de COMENIUS, ubi supra. of

“ of Latin stile, otherwise than a blind man judges of colours. It is as un- 1691.
 “ reasonable to find fault with an Author for making use of the stile of the “ schools in a work of pure reasoning, as it would be to desire that one should write
 “ in elegant French a confutation of a parcel of forry Factums in which the Authors “ had only laboured to invent lies and contradictions. How long is it since “ people began to pique themselves in point of stile in writings of processies, in Cafes “ and Inventories. Have the accuser’s libels been refuted with that care that is “ taken in the composition of a work, which one would make worthy to “ be read upon its own account? It was known that few people would take the “ trouble to read refutations of this sort; the reading of them was not necessary “ to unprejudiced persons, and the demonstrations of Euclid would not be “ able to convince those who are prejudiced; this was known, and therefore care “ was taken not to lose time about stile.” This friend says afterwards that if Mr Bayle would have taken his advice, he would have abandoned the Author of little Books to his bad genius, without daigning to give him a word of answer, and that he is sorry to see that he continues still to confute him. You may as much as you please, (says he), convict him of having reasoned wretchedly, of having quoted falsely, and of repeating the same things without the least regard to what has been answered to them; all this will not prevent his writing on, and rekindling the flame in proportion as he observes that time begins to extinguish it. He adds, that this Author had advanced many things which Mr Bayle ought to have exposed, since he had put himself on the foot of answering him once more.

(1) This Advertisse-
ment is dated the 2d of June 1692.
 Mr Bayle prefixed an Advertisment to this piece (1), wherein he owns that the greatest part of his friends had advised him not to answer the Author of the Remarks on the Cabale Chimerique; and that if he had followed their opinion he would not seem to know that there were such things in nature as these little libels, and that they had been sorry that he had refuted some places of them: however as this is a matter where something may be said on both sides, he had not altogether followed their advice, but had chosen a middle way, which was to publish something to acquaint the public why he doth not more particularly answer the writings of this maker of Remarks. “ The principal reasons, says he, why I do “ not engage myself in answers of this sort are, I. That this Author doth nothing “ but repeat the same things without taking any notice of the answers, which have “ been made to them. II. That the public is already too much fatigued with “ so many trifling discussions. III. That this Author falsifies so grossly the passages “ which he endeavours to refute, that I have reason to think that the disinterested “ readers themselves will discover the frauds of this kind: but as I should be to “ blame if I expected to be believed in this matter upon my own word, it was “ necessary to give some proofs of this; and for this purpose care has been taken “ both in the first and second Advice to the little Author, to show by some ex“ amples what he is capable of in matter of false quotation and false reasoning.
 “ Besides it has been necessary to desire all the readers who would judge in this “ matter, to confront the writings of both parties throughout: this is the reason “ why, on the one hand, I answer something to them, and on the other why I “ do not answer all.” Mr Bayle observed that this small piece would have appeared sooner, if he had not known that Mr Jurieu had a large Factum in the press which was much cried up by his emissaries after their usual manner, and that to prevent his being obliged to go twice to the press, he had resolved to delay the publishing of this second Advice till he had by reading this piece seen whether it deserved an answer, in which case he would have refuted it at the same time with this other piece. But as he was now informed that it would not appear for some time, he did not think it proper to delay the publishing of this New Advice any longer; and promised here beforehand that if it should be worth while he would very soon demolish all the new machines of his accuser.

(2) Factum selon les formes, ou disposition des preuves contre l'Auteur de l'Avis aux Refugiez, selon les regles du Barreau: qui sont voir que sur de telles preuves, dans les crimes capitaux, on con-danne un criminel accusé.

(3) Letter of the 28th
of August
1692, p.
445.

This Factum appeared some time after under this title: A Factum in form, or the proofs against the Author of the Advice to the Refugees disposed according to the forms of the Bar:
which show that upon such proofs criminals are condemned for capital crimes (2). Mr Jurieu says in the advertisement, that a distemper which had kept him very weak for eight months had hindered him from continuing to write against the Author of the Advice to the Refugees; but that others had supplied his place. He adds that this Factum was composed by an Advocate at Paris, excepting some chapters which he had added to it. There is nothing new in this piece but the form. Mr Jurieu’s pretended presumptions are here repeated, though a hundred times refuted; they are ranged under different heads, and accompanied with a commentary drawn from Mr Jurieu’s Libels and those of his adherents. Mr Bayle wisely despised this piece, and would not so much as read it, as he acquaints Mr Minutoli. “ Mr Jurieu, “ (says he (3), has anew published a great Factum, or Casse, against me, which no “ body adviseth me to read, (and I have taken this advice), wherein he only re“ peats his old chicaneries without seeming at all to know that they have been fully “ confuted. He has, as I am informed, brought over again the story of the Cabal

1691. "of Geneva and the Project of Peace, without having the least regard to what he "has wrote to you in acknowledgement of your innocence, nor to the confession "of his most zealous partizans, that he was in the wrong to attack me on that "head, and that he ought to be satisfied with the other accusatiⁿ." Mr Jurieu's adherents wished that he had confined himself only to the accusation which related to the Advice to the Refugees: but they judged so only after they saw the event, and because they found that all that he had advanced concerning the Cabal of Geneva, and the Project of a Peace was evidently false and chimerical.

This was the last piece which appeared on this subject. Mr Bayle's prudent silence put an end to this dispute. He had refuted all Mr Jurieu's pretended presumptions; and the writings of his partizans consisted only, as we have already observed, of heavy and tiresome repetitions, ridiculous reasonings, and false interpretations of what he had written.

In the mean while people did not agree about the true Author of the Advice to the Refugees. It was ascribed to Mr Pelisson as soon as it appeared in France. Dr Wellwood, an eminent Physician at London, who published a weekly Paper called the Observer, but without setting his name to it, speaks of it as Mr Pelisson's in his Observer of the twenty second of August 1690, six months before Mr Jurieu thought of ascribing it to Mr Bayle. For it was not before the month of January 1691, that he began to say that he believed Mr Bayle was the Author of it, and the book which he published concerning it did not come out 'till near the end of April (1). "There comes very opportunely to my hand, (says Dr Wellwood (2), "a book that makes of late a great noise in the world, called Avis aux Refugez, "Advice to the Refugees; written by a learned pen in France, designedly to throw "dust on the carriage, and actions of the Protestants of Europe in general, with "relation to the late Revolution in England I both know the Author, "and can assure the reader, that it was written at command of the late King James "and the French King, signified to the Author by the Archbishop of Paris." Dr Wellwood's Observer having been translated into French, and printed in Holland under the title of A History of the Times (3). Mr Jurieu declaimed violently against this passage (4). He said that it was inserted there to serve a turn, and contrived in the same manner as the forged edition, the forged licence, and the extract of the Letter from Paris in the History of the Works of the Learned. "We were not much puzzled, " (adds he), to guess whence it came: it comes from the same person in England (5) "who is the only man there who denies that Mr Bayle is the Author of the Advice; "and who says every where that the true Author will discover himself at Paris. And "in the mean time he has thrust this into a Journal in favour of his friends on "this side of the water, and at their desire; nay it is not improbable, that this "has only been foisted into the French translation, for there is no sort of falsehood of which those Gentlemen are not capable." And after having treated Dr Wellwood in the most abusive manner, he makes a ridiculous Apology to him (6). He repeats it likewise in the Advertisement before his Casé in form. "I am obliged to inform the public, (says he), that the harsh expressions which "are in the Last Conviction against the Author of the History of the Times, ought "to be cancelled. At that time I did not at all know the Author of it. "I have been informed since that he is a very honest, and very learned "man."

Dr Wellwood in 1692, published an Apology for his Observer, under the title of an Appendix, wherein he justifies some passages of that work, and among others that which relates to the Advice to the Refugees. "This book, (says he (7), "had scarce appeared in France, and was not yet seen in England, when from "a worthy and noble person in France, since in chains for his Religion, I had an "account both of the book itself, of its being concerted with the French Court, "and that every body in Paris looked upon Monsieur Pelisson as the Author of "it. In return of a letter of mine in answer to his, my friend told me, that according to my desire, he had employed one who was intimately acquainted with Monsieur "Pelisson, to inquire of him the truth of that common report: and that Monsieur Pelisson "was pleased to allow the person that spoke to him, to think him the author, though he would "not positively confess he was so; adding, that it was not fit for him, or for the King's service, "to acknowledge that book publicly to be his, though he were the author of it. In short, this "worthy Gentleman gave me both his own and the universally received opinion at "Paris, that Monsieur Pelisson was the author of the Avis aux Refugez, and backed "it with a great many probable arguments, needless here to be mentioned. The "book itself appearing here in London a little after, I took occasion to mention "what my friend told me about it, and withal, upon his information said, I believed "I knew the author, meaning Monsieur Pelisson, with whom I was a little acquainted "at Paris nine years ago.

Mr de la Bastide (8) was likewise of opinion, that Mr Pelisson was the author of the Advice to the Refugees. He said so openly, and by that means drew upon himself the hatred of Mr Jurieu (9). Mr de la Bastide's testimony was of great weight. He had lived in a close friendship with Mr Pelisson five and twenty years; he had been together

(1) Cabale Chimérique, p. 217. of the 2^e Edition.

(2) Mercurius Reformatus, or the New Observer. Vol. iii. Numb. 7.

(3) Histoire du Temps.

(4) Last Conviction on &c. p. 34. col. 2.

(5) Mr de la Bastide.

(6) P. 36. col. 1.

(7) An Appendix to Mercurius Reformatus, p. 13.

(8) See his Elogy in the Histoire des Ouvrages des Sçavans, December 1704, Art. 14, p. 548.

(9) See Revue de l'Histoire de Mr Bayle, in the collection printed at Amsterdam in 1715, intitled, Histoire de Mr Bayle, & de ses Ouvrages, &c. p. 182 and the following.

(1) This Dissertation was published in the collection intitled Histoire de Mr Bayle &c. p. 297 and the following. Mr de la Baftide gave me a copy of it which is more exact than that which is printed.

ther with him a Clerk to Mr Fouquet ; and after Mr Peliffon was confined in the Bastille, he kept a regular intercourse of Letters with him, on matters of controversy : for even at that time Mr Peliffon inclined towards the Catholic Religion. This close friendship had made him acquainted with Mr Peliffon's turn of wit and favourite expressions. Mr de la Bastide was well acquainted with his works of controversy, and had even answered some of them. When the Advice to the Refugees appeared he found so great a conformity betwixt it and Mr Peliffon's writings, that he made no doubt of his being the Author of it. However he did not think it proper to write any thing on this subject during Mr Peliffon's life : but after his death he composed a Dissertation (1) to prove this conformity. " I propos'd, (says he), to " put in writing several general and particular observations, which all taken to- " gether evidently show, that the Author of the Reflexions on the differences about " Religion, is likewise the Author of the Advice to the Refugees, and that this last " piece is properly only a supplement, and, as it were, an appendix to the other." In his general observations he takes notice that Mr Peliffon was very well acquainted with the Belles Lettres, and ecclesiastic and prophane History : that he had studied the Scripture, the Fathers, and the writers of Controversy : that he was very well skilled in the Roman Law, and loved to make use of authorities from it on subjects of all sorts, having frequented the Bar for some years : that being appointed to write the History of the King, he collected every thing that was published, and made Memoirs and Observations on every thing that pass'd relating to affairs of State or of Religion : and in fine, that in his books of controversy, we find apostrophes and frequent exhortations to the Protestants, elevations and prayers to God, and panegyrics on the French King : characters which all taken together agree to the Author of the Advice, and appear to agree to him alone. But to make this conformity more evident, in his particular observations he brings a great number of passages of the Advice, and compares them with parallel passages in the Reflexions, and particularly in the third volume of the Reflexions published in 1689, under the title of the Chimera's of Mr Jurieu. He shows for example, that near the end of that piece Mr Peliffon insults the Refugees upon account of Mr Jurieu's Prophecies, which assur'd them of a re-establishment in France in the year 1689 ; and that the Advice begins with this very thing. In the Reflexions Mr Peliffon had said, that Mr Jurieu pours out his gall and venom upon our times, against the most illustrious defenders and protectors of the truth in our days, without respect to rank or merit : and in the Advice, there is nothing, (says the Author), so august or so eminent which you have thought worthy of your respect ; crowned heads, which upon all accounts ought to be secured from the insults of your diffamatory libels, have been the objects of the most enormous and furious calumny in many of your books. In the one and the other, the Roman Law is frequently quoted ; the authority of the greater number is insisted upon ; the Prophecies of Drabitus, and the little Prophets of Dauphiné are ridiculed ; the present state of affairs in Europe is considered ; and a great deal of pains is taken to proclaim the glory of Lewis XIV &c. With regard to the Preface, we may well imagine that Mr de la Bastide doth not ascribe it to the Author of the book itself. It did not appear natural to him that an Author should not only answer himself, but likewise satirize his own work, and give a frightful idea of it.

Mr de la Bastide concludes his Dissertation, by answering a difficulty which naturally offer'd itself. " If one should now ask, (says he), why the Author did not " name himself in this piece as he had done in others, that he might not lose, " amongst those of his own communion at least, the merit of the wit, learning, " and zeal which he seems to display in it ? besides secret reasons which we do " not always discover, it appears pretty plain that it was not his intention to conceal himself entirely or for ever, but only to stand behind the curtain for some " time, in order to know the opinion of the public concerning it. For we find that " towards the end he says to the person to whom it is address'd, that he may get " it printed, and only recommends it to him to be cautious in using his name ; as if " he would say, that it was not proper to name him openly, but he might allow " people to guess at it. Being born a Protestant, and being nearly related and " allied to several of the Refugees, it was natural that he should have some reluctance " to appear avowedly the Author of a piece which rendered them odious to the supreme powers, and seem'd to shut the door against their re-establishment. But in " all likelihood his principal reason was, that having in several places of this piece " dropped some pretty free sentiments, and some pretty strong expressions against the " manner in which those of our communion had been persecuted, and this, whether " by his not sufficiently reflecting upon the consequences of them, or that he might " by this means the more insinuate himself into the favour of the Protestants, the " Archbishop of Paris, and the Jesuits, made a complaint against him on that " account, as was commonly reported. And it actually happened that an edition " of the Advice, begun by Gabriel Martin, Printer or Bookseller to Mr Peliffon, " was stopp'd and interrupted, though it had been undertaken by his order : and " we have likewise seen that some time before his death, he got a new edition of 1691. "it printed under his own direction; but not before he had suppressed or altered the passages which had offended those of his communion, and had added a short preface instead of that which was formerly prefixed to it."

It is true however that a short while after the Advice was published, Mr Peliffon wrote to Holland to be informed who was the Author of it, and endeavoured to oblige him to discover himself by the hopes of a considerable reward (1). This would suppose that the Author of it was unknown to him, and consequently that it was not he who wrote the Advice. But Mr de la Baftide might have answered, that Mr Peliffon did this only to conceal himself the better, and besides that this supposition is destroyed by the licence of the Paris edition, wherein it is set forth that the Author of the Advice had obtained a licence dated the 20th of October 1690, but he affecting to remain unknown to the public, had made a difficulty of allowing the said privilege to be registered in his name in the registers of the Society of Bookjellers of Paris: which proves that the Author's name was known at the Chancellor's Office, and so it was not necessary to write to Holland to be informed of it.

Mr Bayle tells us in one of his Letters written in the month of October 1690, that the voice of the public at that time gave the Advice to the Refugees to Mr de Larroque (2). Mr de Larroque left France in the month of February 1686, and went to Holland (3), and the year following he published Critical Remarks upon the first volume of Varillas's History of Heresy, which were well received. I have already mentioned his answer to Mr Brueys. After having made some stay in England and in Germany, he returned to Holland, and from thence into France in the month of June 1690 (4), that is, about a month or six weeks after the Advice to the Refugees was published, and embraced the Romish Religion. When I began to write Mr Bayle's Life in 1707, I desired Mr Bafnage to give me some light in this matter, and he wrote to me what follows, concerning the Advice to the Refugees (5). "Since you desire me to write to you with full confidence about what concerns Mr Bayle; I do not think you ought to awaken the affair of the Advice to the Refugees: not that I at all suspect that he was the Author of it. I have not as yet departed from my first conjecture: which is that being intrusted with the manuscript, he had got it printed, and added a preface and some strokes of his own to it. Mr Hartsoecker has confirmed me in my conjecture, for he has assured me that while Mr de Larroque was a prisoner as Paris, he used frequently to cite this piece as a production of his own: but as this is an odious subject, it will be better to let it drop, than to set his enemies a clamouring again." He says likewise in a Memoir, which he sent me some time after. "I always believed (6), and I still believe, that Mr Bayle was Author of the Preface, and that the manuscript was entrusted with him by Mr de Larroque, who changed his Religion a short while after, and who always claimed this work as his own. This, if I am not mistaken, is all the mystery which made Mr Bayle's defences so weak: he durst not give his opinion of the book and of the Author who had always been his friend." Mr Bafnage observes that Mr Larroque always claimed this work as his own; and in fact Mr Larroque always used to say, in speaking of certain things, I have said, or I have proved this in my Advice to the Refugees; and his friends have often told it as a literary anecdote, that he was the Author of this book. This is a fact attested by persons very worthy of credit.

Here are two opinions, very opposite to one another, which notwithstanding have each of them their followers. However there is still a third, which seems to have most prevailed: many persons ascribe this work to Mr Bayle, though for very different reasons. Some ground this belief upon Mr Jurieu's testimony, but what weight can we lay upon that? besides he had so interwoven his pretended Cabal of Geneva with the affair of the Advice to the Refugees, that he could not be allowed afterwards to separate them. The falsity of the one of these accusations being well proved, necessarily destroyed the other. Notwithstanding when he was convinced that the Cabal was only a Chimera, he nevertheless persisted in his accusation concerning the Advice to the Refugees. But finding afterwards that this separation was not favourable to him, he was not ashamed to have again recourse to the accusation of the Cabal.

Others ascribe that piece to Mr Bayle, because they imagine they discover his stile in it. But this is precisely what ought to make people believe that he is not the Author of it: for besides that proofs drawn from the conformity of stile are very uncertain, the stile of it appears to be very different from that of Mr Bayle's other works: it is more pure, more flowing, and more regular. Mr de Lar ey, who had well examined the Advice to the Refugees, and who was much inclined to ascribe it to Mr Bayle, has not dared to decide. For my part, (says he (7)), I am not either sufficiently persuaded myself to undertake to persuade others, nor bold enough to decide in a problematical matter.

Lastly, this piece is ascribed to Mr Bayle upon the testimony of Adrian Moetjens, who printed it. It is said that Moetjens told several persons that Mr Bayle was the Author of it. For my part, having heard that Mr Louis, who corrected the proofs, confirmed Moetjens's testimony, I desired him to give me some information

(1) Examens de l'Avis aux Réfugiés, p. 24, 25. Chimere démontrée, préf. p. cxxi.

(2) Letter to Mr Constant of the 24th of October 1690, p. 339.

(3) Letter to Mr Rou of the 17th of February 1686, p. 251.

(4) Letter to Mr Constant, ubi supra, p. 339, 340.

(5) Letter of the 19th of August 1707.

(6) A Memoir MSS. of Mr Bafnage.

(7) In the Preface to his answer to the Advice to the Refugees.

formation in this matter. He did not think fit to write me any answer: but he said by word of mouth, to a person equally distinguished by his merit and by his works, who did me the favour to deliver my letter to him (1), "That he knew Mr Bayle's hand writing before he corrected that work, and that since that time he has had several opportunities of being perfectly acquainted with it: that the whole manuscript from the one end to the other was wrote with Mr Bayle's own hand, and that he preserved a piece of it, which he cut from one of the sheets before he returned it to Moetjens." This is all I have been able to learn of this matter. But though upon this one should no longer doubt that Mr Bayle is the Author of that piece; yet it would still be unjust to accuse him of the pernicious designs and criminal views, which Mr Jurieu attributes to him. The circumstances in which Mr Jurieu revived that book aggravated his accusations. The persecution had forced the Refugees to abandon their estates and the sweets of their native country, and to retire into foreign parts: their wounds were still fore. In this condition we are impatient of reproof, and are provoked by raillery. We take every thing in bad part; we do not consider the intention of the person who speaks, and we make groundless applications of things. And yet it is the intention which ought to guide our judgments. It is by this that we distinguish an innocent raillery from a bitter reproach, and a wholesome advice from a violent invective. Now it is not possible to imagine that Mr Bayle had an intention to blacken the whole body of the Refugees, or designed to make them odious to Princes, and to lay an invincible obstacle in the way of their return. This were to bely his own character, conduct, and all his other books, wherein he has so well defended the Reformed and shewed himself so compassionate to their misfortunes. Besides, the strongest censures in the Advice related only to a very small part of the Refugees, a handful of them who retired into Holland. They were the only persons who wrote any thing. The Refugees in Switzerland, Germany, and England, had printed nothing (2). Mr Bayle was not ignorant of this, and therefore could not have them in view, no more than those in Holland who did not write, and who even blamed the conduct of some of their brethren.

(1) Mr de la Chapelle, Minister of the Walloon Church at the Hague.
(2) We must say Mr Jurieu, justify the Refugees who live at London, and those scattered all over England; those who live at Berlin, in Brandebourg, Hesse, Switzerland, all over Germany, and at Geneva; for I do not bear that in all these places there appear any of these little books which they call Libels. The province of Holland is the only place where all these pieces appear. Examination of the Advice to the Refugees, pag. 67, 68.

(3) Examination of the Advice, pag. 13.

(4) Chimere démontrée, préface, p. cix, cx.

(5) Ibid. pag. cxi, cxii.

(6) See the Article COMENIUS, Rem. [K].

So that though Mr Bayle were the Author of the Advice to the Refugees, all that one could say concerning the motives that might have induced him to write this book, would only be, That he was vexed to see some people feed the minds of a great many of the Refugees with chimeras and apocalyptic visions, which rendered them the jest of all Europe: That having an extreme aversion to satire and calumny, he was full of indignation to see some Refugees write Libels against persons worthy of regard, and even against crowned heads; that they had taken a cruel revenge on his brother upon account of the Criticism on Mr Maimbourg, and that for a much stronger reason there was ground to apprehend that they would revenge themselves for these satirical writings, upon the Reformed who remained in France: That he knew that in that kingdom, Kings look upon themselves as absolute, and that no body there is allowed to say the contrary; and therefore he was willing to intimate that the writings of the Refugees against this absolute power, served only to render them odious and to hinder their return: That having been educated in the doctrine of the independent and absolute power of Princes, a doctrine which was taught in the Reformed churches, we ought not to be surprized to see him attack the contrary opinion with so much vigour: That not being well acquainted with the affairs of England, he did not believe that the Established Religion there was in any danger, and so he considered the Revolution as a political rather than a necessary action: That he had put on the mask of a Roman Catholic, to give the more authority to his remonstrances, to render them more lively, more touching, and more capable of making impression: "That since the Author of the Advice, according to Mr Jurieu's own confession, designed to put the Refugees in a condition of returning to France, which was not the spirit of the French Papists (3); he must needs, as Mr Bayle observed (4), have had the interests of the Protestants more at heart than those of the Papists, so that what he says in the person of a bigotted Papist must not be thought his own opinion, but the language of one who wanted to support the character under which he had disguised himself: That this Author, as Mr Bayle likewise said (5), had only collected the old and new objections of the most passionate and malicious Catholics, and the reflexions of flatterers upon the events of the first Campaign, the envenomed reflexions which were thrown upon the whole body of the Refugees for the faults of a few Authors, &c. and all this only to give occasion to a disavowal of them which might be very useful, and to an answer which might confound the malice of the persecutors of the Reformed and the vanity of flatterers, and might free the Refugees from the ridicule which their prophecies had drawn upon them; a thing which proved formerly very fatal to the Protestants who had fled out of the Emperor's dominions (6)." To this we might add that Mr Jurieu who infatuated the Refugees with his prophecies, and who had published several pieces which the Author of the Advice called Libels; that Mr Jurieu, I say, whom our Author had principally

1691.

1692. cipally in view, had acquired a sort of dominion over the Refugees [2], so that it was not possible to obtain a disfavour of those writings of which they complained, otherwise than by interesting the whole body. Even this expedient did not succeed: the Synods, who ought to have disowned them, kept silence, no body daring to speak through fear of being violently persecuted by Mr Jurieu. We might likewise add, that most part of the reproaches which Mr Bayle puts in the mouth of a Catholic, had been refuted a thousand times, and that Mr Bayle himself had answered them very successfully in his Letters against Maimbourg: and lastly that Mr Bayle intended

[2] Mr Jurieu had acquired a sort of dominion over the Refugees. Here follow some of his exploits. He assumed the character of Inquisitor of the Faith, and attacked several French Ministers, most part of whom were Refugees in Holland. He accused them of Socinianism, and brought them before the Synods. All their crime was that they were men of moderate principles; for Toleration was, in his way of thinking, the greatest of all Heresies. It was upon this account that he cruelly persecuted Mr Huet (a). He likewise accused as Heretics, or favourers of Heretics, Mr de la Conscience, Minister of Hamburg, Mr Jaquelot, Mr Papin, &c. Mr Papin was a nephew of Mr Pajon, and had the same sentiments with relation to Grace (b). He defended them against Mr Jurieu in a book intitled Essays of Theology, &c. Mr Jurieu resolved to ruin him; and for a pretext chose a little book of Mr Papin, intitled, Faith reduced to its genuine principles, and confined to its just bounds (c). This work was wrote with the same intention with that of Mr Dhuiffeau (d), that is to say, to unite Christians by bringing them back to the fundamental principles of Religion, and to inspire them with a spirit of Toleration in controverted points. It was published without Mr Papin's knowledge. The Manuscript was found in the closet of a gentleman distinguished by his rank and merit (e), and put into Mr Bayle's hands, who added two pages in the beginning, and published it in 1687, with the aforesaid title (f). Mr Jurieu got it condemned by a Synod, and persecuted Mr Papin so violently, that he forced him to return to France, and throw himself into the arms of the Bishop of Meaux. Mr Bayle mentions this in one of his Letters to Mr Minutoli. "You know, says he (g), that Papin has changed his Religion: this he would not have done, if a confutation of a book of our false prophet which he wrote, had not exposed him to the violent persecution of that Fanatic, who not being able to deny the contradictions and sophisms of which Papin had convicted him, revenged himself by writing every where that they should take particular care not to employ Mr Papin he being a dangerous Heretic, &c. Papin in vain sought bread in Germany, Holland, and England; he there found every gate shut by the secret practices of his enemy, so that he was forced by hunger to return to France, where he put the Letters which Dr Burnet had wrote to him, in approbation of a little book intitled Faith reduced to its due bounds, into the hands of the Bishop of Meaux."

When Mr Jurieu found it impossible for him to accuse people of Heresy whom he hated, he endeavoured to make them suspected by the Government, and represented them as ill affected persons. He suspected Mr le Gendre, Minister of Rotterdam, to be author of a piece against the little Prophets of Dauphiné, and upon this account he accused him before his Consistory, of entertaining correspondence with France, and of being a secret enemy to the State: but Mr le Gendre demanded satisfaction of him, and declared that he looked upon him to be a calumniator and a wicked man. This Declaration was put in writing, signed, and delivered to the Consistory: Mr Jurieu shifted as much as possible, but Mr le Gendre pressed hard upon him without giving any quarter, and he was forced shamefully to yield. His accusation was torn to pieces in his presence, and by his own consent (h). His hatred extended even to the relations and friends of those he hated, tho' they themselves had never had any quarrel with him. He used to accuse them to the Ministers of State as traitors and spies of France. Without regard to Confidence, which is the bond of civil society, he published in his Libels whatever was said or wrote to him; and when he came to fall out with his friends, he used to employ against them whatever they had said to him in confidence (i).

Here follow some more of Mr Jurieu's features. They are drawn by Mr de Bauval.

"Mr Jurieu, says he (k), has brought trouble and division every where. His hand has been against all men, and the hands of all men have been against him. Discord entered along with him into the Academy of Sedan. He divided it into parties and cabals. They who foretold what we had to expect from him by the first step he took after he was settled in the ministry at Rotterdam, have not been mistaken. He preached upon these words: How beautiful are the feet of those who bring tidings of peace: and upon coming down from the pulpit, he brought a process against his colleague for precedence; he had however the mortification to be worsted in this vain struggle for preference. For some years past Mr Jurieu has put all in combustion among us. His vain and ambitious mind has carried war every where. Bella gerimus nullo babinura triumpho. He has divided the French nation, which the common misfortunes of their flight ought to have united; he endeavours, as it were, to canton his party. The animosities which he sows and nourisheth with so much care, are so many barriers to keep them asunder. He has assumed the character of Inquisitor-General in order to acquire glory at the expence of his brethren's reputation. He acts as Universal Bishop. He has armed the Churches against one another, and has debased and vilified the gravity and dignity of ecclesiastical assemblies, by the quarrels of which he has been the author. On the one hand, we have seen members of the Synods of Amsterdam and Leyden making complaints to the public, that these two Judicatories have at Mr Jurieu's instigation been guilty of injustice, and, what is worse, of falsehood, from which they have not as yet been able to clear themselves: and on the other hand, Mr Jurieu dissatisfied with the Synod of Zurich has addressed a pamphlet to the States full of complaints, wherein he accuseth that Synod of violence, oppression, of all sorts of excess, and of endeavouring to violate the fundamental laws of the liberty both of Church and State. Nothing renders ecclesiastical assemblies more contemptible than such mutual complaints, which lessen and dishonour them. Mr Jurieu is the original cause of all those disorders. He accuseth, he lays about him on both hands: he declares that the advice of his friends, who desire him to leave the world at rest, are the counsels of flesh and blood (l). He never takes up the pen but to write diffamatory Libels, and he no sooner has laid down his arms than he takes them up again upon the first occasion. He is always the aggressor and pursuer. He employs fire and sword to root out all who do not submit to his despotic empire; he calls fraud and calumny to his assistance; and would willingly go under the standard of Religion to extirpate, after the manner of the Interdict, all who refuse to bend the knee before him. Surely Mr Jurieu has made many Refugees feel a new kind of persecution possibly more sensible than that which drove them out of their native Country. He has robbed them of that repose which they sought after in their exile: and to compleat their misfortunes and miseries, they have found among their own countrymen an unjust Oppressor, who under other names makes them feel the iniquity of the furious zeal against which they had sought a sanctuary."

(i) Ibid.

pag. 53; 14.

(k) Ibid.

pag. 7.

(l) Apologie du Sieur Jurieu, pag. 25, col. 2.

(a) See above, Rem. [G].

(b) See above, Rem. [G].

(c) La Foi reduite à ses véritables principes, & renfermée dans ses justes bornes.

(d) See the Rem. [C].

(e) Letter from Mr Papin to Mr Jurieu, inserted in his Pastoral Letter to the faithful at Paris, Orleans, Blois, &c. p. 6, col. 1.

(f) Preface of Mr Papin's book, intitled: les deux voix opposées en matière de Religion &c. pag. xi, xii, of the Liege edit. 1713.

(g) Letter of the 11th of November 1692, pag. 474, 475.

(h) Bauval, Considerations for deux sermons de Mr Jurieu, &c. pag. 30, 31, and 37.

(1) See the Chimere de-montée, p. 307, and the Answer to Mr Jurieu's Apology, by Mr de Bauval, p. 8. tended to answer the Advice (1), and that they ought to have engaged him to set about it, instead of diverting him from it by outrageous accusations. 1692.

This methinks is the judgment which an equitable and disinterested person might make concerning this piece, and concerning the design of the Author, supposing him to be Mr Bayle. However Mr Bayle always protested to those who had the greatest share in his confidence, that he was not the writer of it; so that it must be struck out of the catalogue of his works; at least this is sufficient to prevent its being alledged in proof against him, and since he constantly denied it, equity will not allow that it should be quoted in evidence to blacken his memory. These are the very words of Mr de Bauval (2).

The accusations brought against Mr Bayle had interrupted his literary labours. Study requires a perfect tranquillity. Mr de Bauval had in his Journal for the month of Novem. 1690 (3), advertised a work intitled: A Project of a Critical Dictionary, which will contain a the correction of a great number of errors to be found both in Dictionaries, and in other books (4). This, (said Mr de Bauval) is the title of a book which a learned man designs "to undertake. As he desires to have the advice and opinion of the learned concerning his design, he is about to print a Preface in which he will give a distinct account of his Project." This Author was Mr Bayle. He proposed to publish this Project a few months after, and the impression of it was begun in the month of December following. The Articles belonging to the three first letters were almost all prepared, and while these were printing Mr Bayle was to finish the others, together with the Preface. But Mr Jurieu's violent attacks obliged him to lay aside this work after the first sheet of it was printed, so that he laid down that Project very soon after he had formed it. More than a year passed before he took it up again, and at last when Mr Leers pressed him to set about it, he was obliged to make use of the first subjects which chance presented to him, till he had collected the books which were necessary to his design (5).

This work appeared in May 1692 (6), under this title: A Project and Fragment of a Critical Dictionary (7). Mr Bayle gives an idea of this Project in a long Preface, addressed to Mr du Rondel, Professor of Belles Lettres at Maestricht. He says that he designed to compose a Dictionary, which should contain all the falsehoods and errors of fact which are found in other Dictionaries, and a Supplement to their omissions under every Article. He promised likewise to make fallies upon all sorts of Authors as occasion should offer. After this he shows how useful such a compilation would be. "Were it not to be wished, (says he), that there was extant a Critical Dictionary, to which one might have recourse in order to be sure whether what we find in other Dictionaries, and in all sorts of other books, be true? It would be a touchstone of other books, and you know a gentleman who is a little affected in his stile who would not fail to name such a work, the Office of Insurance of the Republic of Letters You see very well that if, for example, I should be able to collect under the word "SENECA, all the falsehoods that have been advanced concerning this famous Philosopher, one needed only consult that article to know what is to be believed of what one reads concerning him in any book: for if it is a falsehood, it would be taken notice of in this collection, and when one did not find a thing set down here as a falsehood, one might depend upon it as true: this instance is sufficient to show that such a design well executed, would produce a very useful work, and very convenient for readers of all sorts." Mr Bayle added that he knew well enough what ought to be done in order to perform such an undertaking perfectly, but that he knew still better that he was not able to execute it: so that he would confine himself only to give a sketch of it, which should only contain a volume in Folio; leaving the continuation of it to persons who have the requisite abilities, in case this Project, rectified in every thing that shall be necessary, should be thought worthy of the labours of the learned. But as he had foreseen that even this sketch would be extensive enough to engage him in a very painful task, and that besides he was very doubtful how he should execute his project, he had resolved to venture a few fragments of this work abroad, that he might before-hand know the taste of the public, and be determined thereby either to pursue or abandon his design. These *Fragment*s contained the Articles of ACHILLES, ANTHONY ARNAULD, JANE OF ARRAGON, CORNELIUS BALBUS, of the Author concealed under the name of STEPHANUS JUNIUS BRUTUS, of CASSIUS in general, and in particular of SPURIUS CASSIUS VISCCELLINUS, of L. CASSIUS LONGINUS, of C. CASSIUS LONGINUS, of T. CASSIUS SEVERUS, which gives him an occasion of making a digression concerning diffamatory libels. He placed there likewise the articles of L. CASSIUS HEMINA, of C. CASSIUS LONGINUS, of CATIUS, of COMENIUS, of ERASMUS, of the Maréchal de GUEBRIANT, of HIPPOMANES, of the DAY, of Madam DES LOGES, of the three sisters ANNE, MARGARET, and JANE SEYMOUR, of MARY TOUCHET, and of ZEUXIS. All these Articles were personal except those of Hippomanes and of the Day, which Mr Bayle called real, because they neither related to persons nor places, and consequently did not belong to Historical or Geographical Dictionaries (8).

(8) In the beginning of the Article HIPPOMANES, p. 297.

1693.

The plan of this new Dictionary was not relished, though such a work might have been very useful. Mr Bayle laid it aside, but in the mean while he formed a design of another Dictionary which he forwarded with so much diligence, that the impression of it was begun in the month of September 1693; notwithstanding he had been frequently interrupted in it by the trouble Mr Jurieu gave him. He acquaints Mr Constant with this, in order to excuse himself for not having wrote to him sooner. "I have been, (says he (1), very much embarrassed these three or four months past by the machinations of my accuser, who having interested the Dutch Consistory in his quarrel with me, has persuaded them to examine my book concerning Comets, and to lay it before the Burgomasters as a book filled with dangerous and impious propositions, and that therefore it is not consistent with their duty to give a salary to a Professor who entertains such opinions. This is the turn he has given it, after being disappointed by the nullity and rashness of his other accusations. I was obliged to make some visits, to undeceive people concerning the pretended heresies in this book; and here one cannot do in a fortnight what might be done elsewhere in an afternoon."

(1) Letter of the 29th of June 1693, pag. 510.

Mr Bayle attributed the disgrace, which he fell under a short while after, to the solicitations of these Ministers: see in what manner he speaks of it to Mr Minutoli on the fifth of November. "Our Magistrates, (says he (2), have deprived me of my place of Professor, together with the salary of five hundred guilders which was annexed to it, they have even revoked the liberty of teaching privately which they had granted me. This resolution was taken by the plurality of voices on the thirtieth of October last; and last monday (3) the Burgomasters notified it to me in their chamber. All people of good sense here cry out against this injustice, and several of our Counsellors of the longest standing in their Offices, and of the greatest abilities, opposed this resolution with all their might, but they were outvoted. If they had not last year turned out seven or eight Burgomasters or Counsellors of this City, in order to put others in their places, this would not have happened to me. It gives me comfort to see the general discontent of the City on this account, the irregularity of their proceedings in this affair, and the unjust ground of it. This ground is my Various Thoughts concerning Comets: the Dutch Ministers have made the Burgomasters believe that it contains dangerous matters; and opposite to Christianity. This I offered to refute; and I maintain, and will prove it as clear as noon-day, that my book concerning Comets advances nothing contrary either to our Confession of Faith or to the Scripture. But however this be, they have condemned my doctrine without allowing me a hearing, and without asking me if I agreed to the justness of the extracts, and to the sense which they give to my words; neither did the Magistrates give me any opportunity of answering my accusers. There was nothing said either concerning the Advice to the Refugees; or the Project of a Peace, which I intended to publish. This would have been more odious."

(2) Letter of the 5th of November 1693, pag. 537, 538.

(3) The 2^d of November.

In another Letter to him, he says (4); "You have very probably heard it reported in your country, that I lost my place upon account of the Advice to the Refugees. For the emissaries of you know who, being mortified to the last degree; at the contempt which our Superiors showed for his pretended information concerning the Cabal of Geneva, and for his repeated calumnious Facts relating to the said Advice, have spread it abroad every where that it was the accusation about that book which produced this effect. This is a manifest absurdity, for they would not have satisfied themselves with taking away my liberty of teaching, if they had founded their proceedings against me upon an accusation of writing a libel against the State. You may affirm it confidently that the only foundation of it was the complaint of the Dutch Consistory against my book on Comets; and most people are of opinion that they never read the book, and some of them were against depriving me of my pension. It was therefore only upon account of my Treatise concerning Comets. The Dutch Consistory being almost wholly composed of persons who neither understand French, nor any thing else, except a few common places of Divinity; who besides were ill affected towards me from my first arrival in this Country, because my Patron who founded the Illustrious School, (the late Mr Paets, a great Republican) was very much hated by them: this Consistory, I say, only consulted a Dutch translation of some passages out of my book, made by my accuser, with the greatest insincerity in the world."

(4) Letter to Mr Minutoli of March 1694. pag. 542.

Mr Bayle gave the same account, but with some further circumstances, to his cousin Mr de Naudis, on the twenty eighth of December. As this Letter has not been printed, the reader no doubt will be glad to find it here.

"You must know that upon the thirtieth of October last my appointment of five hundred livres, and the liberty of reading public and private Lectures, were taken from me by the Council of this City, which is composed of four and twenty persons, whom they in Dutch call the Vroedschap. The Burgomasters who are four in number, and chosen out of these twenty four, acquainted me with

“ with this resolution, without telling me why they now took from me what they granted me in 1681. I have been told that several members of the Council opposed this act of injustice very vigorously, but the plurality of voices carried it. Let us distinguish the real cause of this from the pretext.

“ The pretext with which they coloured their conduct, when they were spoke to in private about it, and which was even alledged by some on giving their votes the day on which I was deprived of my place, is, that the book concerning Comets, which I published here in 1682, contains pernicious doctrines, and such as no Christian Magistrate should suffer to be instilled into youth. To give more authority to this pretence, the authors of this plot had by a long train of intrigues obtained that certain head-strong Dutch Ministers, great enemies to strangers and to the new Philosophy, and of a violent and seditious temper, should take the book concerning Comets into their examination, and determine that it contains unsound doctrine. All this was done in a very mysterious manner, and without giving me the least notice of it, and without having the least regard to my public declarations, which I have repeated a hundred times to the Burgomasters, Ministers &c. in conversation, that I was ready to show that my Comets contained nothing contrary either to sound reason, or the Confession of Faith of the Reformed Churches. A great number of people of merit here are highly offended at this violent procedure, which is not practised even in the Church of Rome: for there they hear an Author accused of Heterodoxy, and admit him to explain or to retract his errors. This, dear Cousin, ought to lessen your regret for not having left France. You will be a hundred times the better Protestant, if you only see our Religion where it is under persecution: you would be offended if you saw it where it is established, but let us come to the cause of my disgrace.

“ You must know that a Republican Government has this peculiar to it, that every City, nay every little Town is composed of two or more parties. In Holland there are two every where: the one is very weak, but composed of people of substance and honour; the other governs haughtily, and almost constantly makes a bad use of its good fortune. I had upon coming into this Country all my patrons, benefactors, and those who received me with civility, among the weaker party, which however was not then so weak as now: I have always cultivated their friendship, and have never conformed myself to the maxims of Courtiers. I have not endeavoured to make my court to those of the other party, which was growing more powerful every day, this appearing to me base and mercenary. So that a sudden storm having above a year ago happened in this City, which overwhelmed part of our Magistrates, and others of this all-powerful party being put in their places, the balance could no longer be preserved, and to show their power against those who do not fall down before them, and who keep up their correspondence with their old friends, they have turned me out of my place. And as doctrines pretended to be dangerous to the youth was the pretext, they were obliged to take from me the liberty of teaching in private as well as in public. By this means they have stopped up both the sources of my subsistence. I never received a farthing of my patrimony, never had a humour of laying up money, and never was in condition to save any. I depended upon my salary, which I believed I should have enjoyed for life: but now I see there is nothing certain in this world. You may judge that I had great reason to be uneasy about the time to come, in a Country where living is very expensive. But hitherto by the goodness of God I have not felt any uneasiness, but have been perfectly resigned to the will of heaven.

“ You would be surprized if I should finish my Letter without mentioning that French Minister who has published so many libels and calumnies against me. I can assure you that all these calumnies have fallen to the ground, and there was nothing taken notice of but my book concerning Comets, printed near twelve years ago. Besides they were Dutch Ministers who carried on this pursuit against me in a clandestine manner. They have owed me a grudge for a long time, because they hated the friends and patrons which I had upon my first arrival here, and being infatuated with Aristotle, whom yet they do not understand, they could not hear Des Cartes named without swelling with rage.”

Mr Bayle was ignorant of the true cause of his disgrace: his Judges did not think it proper to inform him of it. He never suspected that it could proceed from any circumstance relating to the situation of public affairs, however that was the occasion of it. France victorious every where, began to be weary of the war. The efforts which she had made to gain this superiority over her enemies, had drained her both of men and money. Peace would have been advantageous to her, and she took all possible steps to obtain it. In the year 1692 she had found means to propose it to the Emperor, the King of Spain, and the Duke of Savoy, by the Pope and some neutral Princes; but they did not give the least ear to her proposals. Seeing herself refused on that side, she wanted to try what she could do

1693. in the United Provinces, and employed Mr Amelot, her Embassador in Switzerland, to make her intentions known to several considerable persons. She promised the States a strong barrier to cover their country, a full and entire liberty of commerce, and all the other advantages they could desire. Mr Halewyn, Burgomaster of Dort, seduced by these great offers, entered into a sort of negotiation with Mr Amelot, without the knowledge of the States. King William was informed of this, and Mr Halewyn was seized, together with his brother who was believed to be his accomplice. Mr Bayle mentions this in one of his Letters to Mr Minutoli. "No body knew certainly, says he (1), what was the crime of these gentlemen until their sentence was published; for during the process, every thing was managed with great secrecy. They have discovered that Mr Halewyn the Counsellor was entirely innocent; but his brother, the Burgomaster of Dort, has been found guilty of holding correspondence with Mr Amelot, the French Embassador in Switzerland, in order to negotiate a peace in this country. He confessed this, and pretended that it was the duty of every lover of his country to endeavour to put an end to so destructive a war; that he was not the only man who had given ear to the propositions of France; and that he had communicated all that he knew of this matter to a person to whom others had made the same propositions. However he has been condemned to perpetual imprisonment, and confiscation of his estate. They have not printed with his sentence all the answers and justifications, which had been inserted in the minutes of it; and people are generally of opinion that he had no intention of betraying his country, and that he was as well affected to the Republic as those who are against a Peace; the difference between them being only, that the one believes that the continuation of the war is advantageous, and the others that it is hurtful. But, unhappily for him, correspondence with the enemy, and meddling in a treaty of peace without a particular commission from the Sovereign Powers, is treason; and this makes interested people say that the punishment inflicted upon him is too gentle. You cannot imagine, adds Mr Bayle, the hopes which our prophet conceived from the imprisonment of these gentlemen. He hoped that all his pretended Cabal of Geneva would be discovered, and that you and Mr Goudet, and the Syndics whom he aimed at, that Messieurs Bafnage and I should be involved in their positions: and he already boasted that he was the first, who had blown up the mine of that wicked plot, said he, of the project of peace, which was contriving in Switzerland. But all his hopes, as usual, were chimerical, and it appeared that we had thought of nothing less than of Mr Amelot and Messieurs Halewyn."

(1) Letter of the 14th of September, 1693, p. 521, 522.

Mr Bayle's innocence in this matter did not hinder his feeling the effects of these secret negotiations: they were the cause of his disgrace. All Mr Jurieu's intrigues among the Magistrates were fruitless. It is true he persuaded the Dutch Ministers to act in his favour against Mr Bayle; but their solicitations came to nothing. The Regency of Rotterdam had been changed in 1692, by order of King William, who turned out seven Magistrates who were Mr Bayle's protectors. However they who succeeded them had at first no bad intentions against him: they declared that they would do justice, and promised to hear his defences, if there should be occasion for it. But the secret practices of France, made King William call to mind the Project of Peace of which Mr Jurieu had made so much noise; and as the peace of Nimeguen had been brought about by spreading abroad such pieces at Amsterdam and elsewhere, he thought they had a mind to make use of the same methods at Rotterdam. That great Prince, not having time to examine this ridiculous Project, was alarmed at the thoughts of a Peace, and imagined that there was, as Mr Jurieu pretended, a cabal to assist in bringing it about, of which Mr Bayle was the chief person who had as yet been discovered. He commanded the Magistrates of Rotterdam to deprive him of his place of Professor and of the salary annexed to it, and this order was put in execution without either citing or hearing him, notwithstanding the promises they had given him to the contrary. It is very certain that the Advice to the Refugees had no share in this. King William did not regard the Refugees so much, as to trouble himself about the complaints they might have against that book. But the Project of Peace made him uneasy, he was afraid of the consequences of it (2). The Magistrates of Rotterdam, though better acquainted with this chimerical project, obeyed the orders of that Prince whose creatures they were: however they seem to have been ashamed of their conduct, since they concealed the cause of it from Mr Bayle. It even appears that they, who were in the secret, deceived those who were not, and made them believe that the book concerning Comets was the foundation of their sentence.

(2) This is taken from a Memoir of Mr Bafnage.

Mr de Bauval bears Mr Bayle witness (3) "that he received this disgrace with a philosophical constancy, and even with too great indifference; especially without uneasiness with regard to his fortune. He did not mind the gathering of riches, because really he had no occasion for them. His temperance and sobriety supplied the place of every thing, so that having little he wanted nothing. He was not however reduced to indigence, very far from it. Neither did he make any step to procure a new employment. He found himself more free and more at his

(3) Eloge de Mr Bayle.

(1) Letter of the 8th of March 1694, p. 541.

(2) See the Article G U I S - C A R D. Rem. [C].

(3) Psalms xxxix, v. 21, 22.

(4) St Matt. c. v. v. 44.

(5) Nouvelle Heresie dans la Morale, touchant la haine du Prochain, prêchée par Mr Jurieu dans l'Eglise Walloonne de Rotterdam les Dimanches 24 de Janvier, & 21 de Fevrier, 1694. Denoncée à toutes les Eglises Reformées, & nommément aux Eglises Françoises recueillies dans les différens endroits de leur exil.

“own disposal, now he was released from the tiresome labour of teaching and 1693.
“reading of lectures.” Mr Bayle gives the same account in one of his Letters to Mr Minutoli, who had condoled with him upon his disgrace. “I received it, says he (1), as becomes a Christian Philosopher, and I continue, I thank God, “to possess my mind in great tranquillity. The sweetness and repose I find in the “studies in which I have engaged myself, and which are my delight, will make “me stay in this city, if I am allowed to continue in it, at least, ‘till the impres- “sion of my Dictionary is finished; for my preference is absolutely necessary in the “place where it is printed. Moreover, being neither a lover of riches, nor ho- “nours, I shall give myself no trouble to procure an invitation elsewhere; and “would not accept of it, though it should be made to me. I am not so fond of “the disputes, cabals, and professorial snarlings, which reign in all our Academies. “Canam mihi & Musis.” And indeed he was so charmed with this quiet and in- dependent situation, that he refused very advantageous offers, and would not so much as make use of the liberty which the Regency were willing to allow him of teaching the sons of some of the Counsellors who desired it earnestly. Mr Basnage solicited him several times to give them this satisfaction, but in vain. The Count de Guiscard, who was pleased to allow him his friendship at Sedan, desired him to take the charge of his son’s education (2). He offered him a thousand crowns of appointment, and assured him that he had taken his measures so with the Court, that he should enjoy a full liberty of conscience: but Mr Bayle excused himself upon the necessity he was under of finishing his Dictionary, which was then in the press.

Mr Jurieu’s conduct sufficiently shows that he thought it was lawful to hate his 1694.
enemies and to persecute them. But he said that his enemies were the enemies of God; and declared solemnly that he thought it his duty to tread under foot all human considerations, and to have no regard to the ties or friendships of this world when the glory of God was concerned. In this manner he invested himself with the character of Defender of the Cause of God, that he might treat with indignity all those who had the misfortune to fall under his displeasure: and though nothing is more op- posite to the maxims of the Gospel than the hatred of our neighbour, he was not ashamed to defend it in two Sermons: the one on these words of David, shall not I hate those who hate thee? I hate them with a perfect hatred (3): and the other on these of Jesus Christ, love your enemies, and bless those who curse you (4). Every body was offended to hear such scandalous morality taught from the pulpit. Mr Bayle charged him publicly with it, in a loose sheet, intitled: A new heresy in Morality, concerning the hatred of our neighbour, preached by Mr Jurieu in the Walloon church of Rotterdam on Sunday the 24th of January, and on Sunday the 21st of February 1694. published for the information of all the Reformed Churches, and particularly of the French Churches gathered together in the different places of their exile (5). In the beginning he sets forth the doctrine which Mr Jurieu had preached concerning the love of our neighbour. “I shall not set down particularly, says he, all the pernicious “maxims and propositions which have been extracted from these two last Sermons; “but shall content myself with acquainting you that his doctrine in general may “be reduced to what follows: I. That sentiments of hatred, indignation, and wrath, “are lawful, good, and praise-worthy, against the enemies of God; that is to say, “as he explained it himself, against the Socinians, and other Heretics in Holland, “against the superstitious and idolatrous, &c. II. That we ought to show these “sentiments of hatred and indignation by breaking all communication with those “people, by not saluting them, and not eating with them, &c. III. That we ought “not only to hate these peoples heresies and bad qualities, but that we ought to “hate their persons and detest them. One of the objections which he made to “himself, and which he rejected with an air of the utmost disdain, was, that we “ought to be at enmity with error and vice, but at the same time have charity “for the person of the sinner.” Mr Bayle next takes notice of the false interpreta- tion which this Minister had given of the Scripture in order to draw it to his pur- pose, the pernicious consequences which may follow upon this doctrine, and how necessary it was that the Ministers of the Walloon Churches should stigmatize this pernicious morality, the tendency of which must be the throwing Holland into confusion, and putting an end to its commerce. “For what must be the conse- “quence, says he, if the Reformed should neither salute those of another Religion, “nor eat, nor trade with them? what must be the consequence if they be allowed, “and it be thought praise-worthy, to hate the persons of all Papists, of all Arminians, “Mennonites, &c. and if we are obliged by the Gospel only to wish them spiri- “tual blessings, without being obliged to procure them any temporal good, to draw “them out of a ditch if we should see them fall into it, to give them alms if we “see them in want? could this country prosper upon such principles? are not “they therefore seditious, and tending to overturn the Government, as well as “heretical? Is the person, who teaches them, ignorant that this is censuring with “an astonishing boldness the supreme powers and the laws of the Government under “which we live?

1694.

Mr Bayle made too great haste to publish this charge. He was blamed for doing so. Mr Jurieu was actually printing these two Sermons, and they were ready to be published. If he had waited for their publication, they would have furnished visible proofs of his pernicious Morality. As soon as he saw this charge he suppressed them, and published a paper under the title of Reflexions upon a Libel in a loose sheet, intitled, A new Heresy in Morality, &c (1), wherein he denied that he had preached the Doctrine he was accused of. Mr de Bauval took occasion from this to set Mr Jurieu's morals in a full light, and to show that this Minister's conduct was agreeable to his morality. This piece is intitled, Considerations on two Sermons preached by Mr Jurieu, concerning the love of our neighbour: wherein the following curious question is incidentally handled: If we are obliged to bate Mr Jurieu (2). Mr de Bauval showed very well that Mr Jurieu by suppressing those sermons furnished a proof that he had preached what he was accused of. "If the Morality contained in Mr Jurieu's sermons, says he (3), has nothing scandalous in it, it is very surprizing that he has put a stop to the impression of them. He might have contented himself with a denial of the Libel, without engaging himself further in the matter; but we know that they were in the press. The sheets of them have been seen, and all of a sudden he changed his resolution. The reason which he gives for this interrupting and retarding of them, strengthens the suspicion instead of weakening it. We are very well informed (says he) that these Gentlemen lie in ambush, and that they have prepared their batteries in order to find heresies in these sermons, and we do not think it proper at present to give them the pleasure of an engagement, we will wait a little 'till their fire is somewhat spent. But if Mr Jurieu is under no apprehensions with respect to orthodoxy, far from suppressing his sermons upon account of the menaces of these gentlemen, he ought to laugh at their preparations, and make all their batteries useless. These gentlemen whom he aims at, are not Knights-errant to go about to fight with phantoms; and after all, the public, who is their common judge, would have vindicated Mr Jurieu, if they had cavilled him without reason. If they had offended the world by it, so much the worse for them, it would have been at their own expence and at their own peril. As for Mr Jurieu, if his morals are sound, the printing of his sermons would have put these gentlemen to silence, and would have stifled all the murmurs they have raised on that subject. But it must be confessed that this so sudden interruption of a design already begun, is so unlike Mr Jurieu, that he gives ground thereby to think that he has stopped the course of the impression for no other reason but that his doctrine might not be exposed to the inevitable censure of the publick. It is at least a strong presumption, that the Information to the public stopped him short, and that what ought to have been a further reason for hastening the publication of his sermons, has obliged him to put it off to an uncertain time. This prudence of waiting 'till these gentlemen's fire was a little spent, seems to be only an artifice to let the remembrance of these sermons, which is at present too fresh and recent, pass away, that by this means he may afterwards be at liberty with more impunity to give them a quite different form. If Mr Jurieu has taught, as he assures us he did, that we ought to forgive our enemies: that we ought not to seek to revenge ourselves: that we ought to suffer injuries patiently, this is without doubt the doctrine of the Gospel, he runs no hazard; but his irresolution shows that he is embarrassed, and is contriving some trick to save himself: for he promises either the sermons or a treatise. One would say he doth not know on which side to turn himself. A man has not all this uneasiness when he has only preached the morality of the Gospel. There has been a clamour raised about these sermons. It is therefore these very sermons which ought to appear or nothing. A treatise on this subject will not decide the question. Besides, if Mr Jurieu has preached no other doctrine than what we have just now mentioned, from whence have those rumours and the emotion of his audience proceeded? whence comes it that the Reformed Ministers of Rotterdam have all with once voice disapproved of his morality? we defy him to refer himself to their judgment. Whence comes it that some of his hearers have been so shocked and offended at him, that they have declared they will no longer hear him. While he went on in the common road, he found no such commotions? But what is still more, from whence ariseth the difficulty which the Commissaries of his Consistory make of granting him the approbation he desired? How comes it about that they have not as yet found sufficient evasions and softenings to make it safe for them to do so? This is a strong presumption that his morality startled them. Otherwise they would have granted him their approbation without difficulty."

Mr Saurin agrees with Mr de Bauval in his sentiments on this subject. That Divine declares, that "the most favourable thing that we can say of these two sermons, is that all the good people who heard them were offended, and grieved in the highest manner; and that Mr Jurieu's friends were much mortified on account of them (4)." He says that Mr de Bauval had very well observed that it was a poor shift to pretend, as Mr Jurieu did, that he would not publish those sermons, because his informers were lying in ambush, and had prepared their batteries

(1) Reflexions sur un Libelle en feuille volante, intitule Nouvelle Heresie dans la Morale, &c.

(2) Considerations sur deux sermons de Mr Jurieu, touchant l'Amour du prochain: ou l'on traite incidemment cette question curieuse: S'il faut haïr Mr Jurieu.

(3) Considerations on two Sermons of Mr Jurieu, &c. pag. 2, and the following.

(4) Examination of Mr Jurieu's Theology, &c. Tom. ii. pag. 803.

(1) Ibid. p. 812. in order to find heresies in them at any rate. He thinks that pretence very ridiculous. "I admire, (says he (1), Mr Jurieu's bravery who boldly refuseth to fight, because he sees the enemy ready to offer him battle: if we did not know from whence he is, we would be ready to think him of another Country than his own. To speak seriously, Mr Jurieu could not say any thing more poor, or which gives more matter of triumph to his accusers. Either he was afraid that those Gentlemen would really find heresies in his sermons, or he was not. If he was afraid of it, he was conscious of his guilt. If he was not afraid, he ought to have published his sermons immediately, in order to convict his accusers of calumny before the whole world." Mr Saurin confirms this argument by several other reflexions, and afterwards speaks of Mr de Bauval's piece. "They have published, (says he (2), some Considerations on Mr Jurieu's two Sermons, wherein his Reflexions are answered, and it is proved that he really preached the hatred of our neighbour, and that he cannot clear himself from it. Mr Jurieu (adds he) has made a Reply to this piece, in another intitled, An Apology for the Synods, and for several good people who have been abused in Mr de Bauval's last Satire, intitled, Considerations on two Sermons &c (3). One would think, (adds Mr Saurin), that while he makes an Apology for others, and for himself on some other points, he ought not to have forgot to have apologized for his doctrine concerning the hatred of our neighbour. It was this which ought principally to have been done in his last piece, and it was this which people of sense, who are concerned for the glory of God, the purity of our morality, and for Mr Jurieu's reputation, wished and expected to find there. But their hopes have been deceived. Mr Jurieu is very large on several other matters, but says not one word on this."

(4) In the posthumous editions of the Critical Dictionary, there is a long digression on this accusation, in the article ZUERIUS BOXHORNIUS.

(5) Addition aux Pensées diverses sur les Comètes, ou Réponse, à un Libelle intitulé, Courte Revue des Maximes de Morales & des Principes de Religion de l'Auteur des Pensées diverses sur les Comètes &c. Pour servir d'Instruction aux Juges Ecclesiastiques qui en voudront connoître.

(6) Addition aux Pensées diverses sur les Comètes &c. p. 25, 26. Nouvelle Avis au petit Auteur des petits Livrets, in the preface, and pag. 46 and the following.

It may be thought, perhaps, that I have insisted too long on this subject: but as it is not easy to imagine that rage could carry a Minister of the Gospel so far as to preach the hatred of our neighbour, I thought it necessary to show by good authorities that Mr Jurieu had really preached that detestable doctrine, and that Mr Bayle had good reason to accuse him of it (4).

Mr Bayle published much about the same time a Book intitled, An Addition to the various thoughts concerning Comets, or an Answer to a libel intitled, A short Review of the Maxims of Morality and Principles of Religion of the Author of the Various Thoughts concerning Comets &c. to serve for information to the Ecclesiastical Judges, who may please to take cognizance of it. At Rotterdam by Reinier Leers. M.D.C.XCIV. In 12° (5). He here gives the reasons why he did not sooner answer this libel. Mr Jurieu had made no answer to Mr Bayle's summons and defiance concerning his accusation of Atheism, although he had brought it before the Consistory; and had even defisted from it. He had afterwards published his Short Review, wherein he arraigns certain propositions out of the Thoughts concerning Comets, and out of the New Letters against Maimbourg, as dangerous, heretical &c. He had addressed himself to the Consistory to get these Propositions condemned, and when they were ready to examine into that matter, he had desired that it should be referred to the Synod; and yet notwithstanding he had suffered four Synods to pass without mentioning it. This libel contained no objections against the book concerning Comets, which might not be answered by the book itself, and Mr Bayle designed to publish a new edition of it, with additions containing new proofs, new explanations, and new answers to all the objections, which could be made to what he had advanced. It was here that he designed to have answered the Short Review. But being informed in the month of February 1694, that Mr Jurieu had got a Committee to be appointed by his Consistory to decide upon the Extracts which he had produced in that libel; so sudden and unexpected a change made him fear some bad design, and obliged him to publish this answer. "Mr Jurieu, (says he (6), has a mind to act a part in his own Consistory, which hitherto he has not been able to act with regard to me. He will no longer be my Accuser, he will be my Judge, and manage matters so that we shall henceforth hear no more of the accusation of Atheism, but they will only examine whether there be any erroneous and dangerous Propositions in my writings, which may be punished by Church censures. In all appearance he designs they should judge without hearing me, and solely upon the credit of his extracts, and of the consequences which he has drawn from them. Our dispute therefore is now to appear before the Ecclesiastical tribunals, and that too upon a new foot. But as it may very possibly happen, that every thing shall pass there without my having the least knowledge of it, it is absolutely necessary for me to have recourse in this manner to a public Factum, which may serve for information to the Judges who desire it, and may take away from those who do not, all room for pleading ignorance. I will confine myself to short observations, not only because I desire that the long Apology for my Comets, which will appear in the third Edition, may have the grace of novelty; but likewise because I will not leave to those who do not care to be informed, their common pretence in such cases, that the length of the piece discouraged them from setting about the reading of it."

1694.

He showed that Mr Jurieu had misrepresented what is said in the Thoughts concerning Comets, and drawn false and absurd consequences from it. For example. This Minister affirms that Mr Bayle in this book pretends that "God never performs prodigies and extraordinary things, in order to be presages of what is to come, such as earthquakes, extraordinary meteors, signs which are seen in the heavens and upon earth, apparitions, voices, births of monsters, floods; and that he maintains that all these things are brought about by natural and necessary causes, and that God doth not at all design by things of this sort to foretel judgments, which he intends to inflict upon men, nor even to manifest his Deity." But this is not at all Mr Bayle's opinion. What he maintains is, that God never miraculously produces comets, earthquakes, inundations, monsters &c. with a design to threaten Infidels with the judgments which his justice is preparing against them; for he cannot persuade himself that such a conduct, which appears to him to be proper only to foment the abominable superstition of idolaters, is consistent with our ideas of the goodness, justice, and sincerity of God. He doth not pretend to deny that God ever performs in any part of the world what we call prodigies or presages; he says only that things which appear equally and indifferently among heathen nations and among the children of God, are not miraculous productions, appointed to threaten mankind. His doctrine tends to give us such an idea of God, as affords a lively representation of his wisdom, goodness, and truth. It denies certain presages indeed; but it is because they would be injurious to these divine Perfections.

Mr Bayle likewise entered into a detail of Mr Jurieu's extracts, and discovered both his insincerity, and his want of discernment and penetration. He refuted his objections concerning the Parallel between Pagan Idolatry and Atheism, concerning the morals of Atheists &c; and proved what he had advanced in his new Letters against Maimbourg, about the Rights of an erring Conscience. He afterwards lays down the true state of the question betwixt him and his adversary, and shews in what manner Ecclesiastical Judges, who shall take cognizance of this dispute, ought to proceed. He subjoins a Petition to the Christian Universities, wherein he desires them to decide upon this representation of his principles which he had made to them: and concludes by impeaching twelve propositions drawn out of the Short Review, as false, rash, and impious.

This work broke all Mr Jurieu's measures, and reduced him to silence. This was no easy matter: but Mr Bayle had set his proofs in so evident a light, that it was not possible to make a reply. It was however only the work of a few days. "It cost me so little trouble, (says he (1), that the three or four days which I bestowed upon it, would have been too much, if I had thought fit to make a larger answer, but my resolution of being short, made it necessary to employ more time. I have destroyed that libel so as not leave one stone upon another. The public will see that my adversary is ignorant of his own Religion, that he attacks what he has maintained in his other books, and that he denies the most evident truths: and which is worst of all, his quotations are so unfaithful, that there is no ground to think that he erred sincerely."

(1) Addition to the various Thoughts &c, in the Advertisement.

An Officer, a friend of Mr Bayle, having let him know how much he desired to see a reconciliation betwixt him and Mr Jurieu, Mr Bayle showed him that it was impossible. "The nature of this quarrel is such, (says he (2), as can admit of no reconciliation: there can only be what in your profession is called a cessation of all acts of hostility. For the question is, whether I have been in a Cabal which did conspire both the ruin of Religion and of the Government, or not. He has accused me of this publicly, and I have shown him that this Cabal is the most ridiculous chimera, that ever was heard of. He has accused me of being the Author of a book called An Advice to the Refugees, wherein the diffamatory libels which are printed in this Country against the King of France, and the dethroning of King James are condemned; and I have shewn that all the proofs which he has alledged against me are impertinent. If he reconcile himself to me, he must own himself an infamous calumniator; and if I reconcile myself to him, I must acknowledge myself guilty. This is what renders our reconciliation impossible. For my part, I do not care for any reconciliation. It is sufficient for me that the Government takes no notice of his accusations: for while there is no process against me, it is plain they laugh at his pretended proofs. For as to the place which they have taken from me, that was upon another account."

(2) MSS. Letter to Mr  of the 25th of November 1694.

1695.

Mr Bayle continued to bestow all his time in the impression of his Dictionary. The impression of the first volume was finished in the month of August 1695 (3). The public preposited in Mr Bayle's favour, expected it with impatience, but Mr Bayle on the contrary was very much afraid of the reception it should meet with. "If the public, (said he to Mr le Duchat (4), has conceived any hopes or good opinion of my Dictionary, (of which I have reason to doubt, not knowing on what it can be founded,) I must expect many complaints; they will find themselves disappointed and villainously cheated, for I own ingenuously to you, that this work is nothing else but a confused compilation of passages tacked to

(3) See the Letter to Mr Constant of the 22d of August 1695, p. 570.

(4) Letter of the 9th of January 1696, p. 576.

“ one another, and that nothing can be worse suited to the delicate taste of this age : 1695.
 “ but there is no remedy, jacta est alea.”

However the Booksellers in foreign Countries, in consequence of the taste of the public, demanded so many copies, that the number which was printed of the first volume was not sufficient to satisfy them ; so that Mr Leers was obliged to print a thousand more copies of the second, and to reprint a like number of the first : this made some people imagine that there was a second edition of the whole work published (1). Mr Bayle was not concerned in this re-impression ; and he complained that there were many errors in it (2). He could not correct the proofs of it ; the impression of the second volume took him up so entirely that he had not even time to write to his friends. “ You would excuse my silence (says he to Mr Constant (3), if you knew what a load of business I have upon my hands, occasioned by the impression of my Historical and Critical Dictionary. The Bookseller is resolved at any rate to finish it this year ; so that I am obliged to furnish him constantly with new copy, and every day to correct the proofs, wherein there are a thousand errors ; for my manuscript is so full of rasures and references, that neither the Printers nor the Corrector of the press can find their way through such a labyrinth : and another thing that retards me very much is, that not having all the books at hand which I have occasion for, I am obliged to wait till they are procured for me, when any body in this city has them.” He complains likewise that the frequent returns of his head-ach made him lose a great deal of time. “ I am very glad, says he (4) that your megrims have left you ; mine would have done me the same favour, if it had been in my power to live without study, but obstinate labour nourishes them, and makes them return very frequently. By this means I lose many days in every month, which obligeth me afterwards to apply more closely to regain the time I have lost.”

(1) See the Letters to Mr Constant of the 4th of July 1697, p. 654, and to Mr Constant, July 15 of the said year, pag. 660, 661.

(2) Letter to Mr le D.E.M.S. of the 7th of July 1698, p. 712, and the following.

(3) Letter of the 31st of May 1696, p. 588, 589.

(4) Ibid. p. 591.

(5) The Duke of Sbrewsbury, Secretary of State.

The impression of the second volume was finished on the 24th of October, and the work came out under the following title : An Historical and Critical Dictionary by Mr Bayle. At Rotterdam by Reinier Leers. M.D.C.XCVII (7). In the beginning of the Preface Mr Bayle acquaints the Reader, that this work is not what he promised in the Project published in 1692. His first design was, as we have observed, to publish the errors of Dictionaries, and other books, both great and small. But being informed that a mere collection of errors would disgust the readers, and that they desired something historical, he was obliged to lay aside that undertaking.

(6) MSS. Memoir of Mr Bagnage.

(7) Dictionnaire Historique & Critique, par Monsieur Bayle. A Rotterdam chez Reinier Leers 1697.

“ See in what manner (says he) I have changed my plan, in order the better to hit the taste of the public. I have divided my composition into two parts : one of which is purely historical ; a succinct narration of facts ; the other is a large commentary, a medley of proofs and discussions, wherein you find a criticism of many errors, and sometimes a long train of philosophical reflexions ; in a word, such a variety as makes me hope, that in one place or other all sorts of readers will find something to their taste.” He adds that this change had made the greatest part of the materials he had prepared useless to him, and that this was one of the reasons which had retarded the publication of this book. Another reason was, that he had carefully avoided every thing that is to be found in the Dictionaries already published, or which he foresaw would be contained in those promised by learned men. He had done the same with regard to Mr Du Pin’s Bibliothèque of Ecclesiastical Authors, and to Mr Teissier’s Additions to the Elogies of learned men, taken from Thuanus’s History. He would not put the reader under the necessity of buying the same thing twice : though in the mean time he had thereby deprived himself of all the materials which are most easily collected and digested. To these reasons we may add the alteration which he made in the choice of the articles. At first he intended to give real as well as personal articles. But he was told that the former not being historical, would not be relished ; which deprived him once more of a great many materials. However, to prevent the loss of the articles HIPPOMANES and of the DAY, which had appeared in the Project, he placed them at the end of the work under the title of Dissertations. He ascribed likewise the delay of this work to the badness of his health, to the great exactness in his citations, to his want of the necessary books, and to the difficulties arising from

1697. from the stile, which requires great attention if we would prevent equivocal expressions, verbes, and false applications of relatives.

He offered all these considerations, in answer to those who might think it strange that he had spent above four years in composing these two volumes. But as others, on the contrary, might be astonished that he had been able in that time to compose two such large volumes in Folio, and might believe that he had made too much haste; he observes that uninterrupted labour will go a great length in little time, and that he had lost no time in the recreations which are very common among men of letters: "I remember as well as they (says he) the dithich of Cato Interpone tuis interdum gaudia curis &c., but I very seldom make use of it. Diversions, games, collations, journies into the country, visits, and such other recreations necessary to a great many studious men, as they say, are not my business. I lose no time in them, nor do I spend it in domestic cares, making interest for preferments, solicitations, or other affairs. I have been happily delivered from a great many occupations which were not very suitable to my humour, and I have had the greatest and the most charming leisure that a man of letters could desire. By this means an Author makes a great progress in a few Years. His work will increase daily under his hand, though he be not careless in the composition of it."

After this he gives his reasons why he has quoted long passages of Greek and Latin Authors, and why instead of translating them himself, he has frequently made use of the versions of Amiot or Vigenere. He adds, that people of grave and severe characters may possibly find fault with him for his quotations from Brantome and Montagne, containing actions and reflexions of too gallant a nature; but that persons of merit, who had the Bookfellers interest at heart, had been of opinion, that, in order to raise a general demand for this Work, it would be necessary that they who do not understand Latin, and do not trouble their heads with Philosophical and Theological discussions, should find some agreeable entertainment in it. He had been told that if he was too averse from taking that advice, he ought at least to allow others, to furnish the Bookfeller with such memoirs, and even sometimes with dogmatical reflexions, which might excite some attention. That he had accordingly consented that the Bookfeller should insert whatever memoirs should be sent to him: that with relation to the Philosophical reflexions which sometimes had been pushed some length, he did not think it necessary to make any apology for them, for as they only tend to convince man that the best use he can make of his reason, is to subject his understanding to the obedience of Faith; they can't but deserve the thanks of the Divines.

Next follow some remarks upon the liberty he has taken of criticizing the faults of some celebrated Authors, or of pointing out their defects. He declares that he has not the least intention to diminish the reputation they have justly acquired, and that besides for the most part he has only related the observations of others, and only copies from Authors already printed. "Of the the two laws of History (says he) I have religiously observed that which commands to say nothing that is false; as for the other, which bids us venture to say all that is true, I cannot boast that I have always observed that; I think it is sometimes inconsistent not only with prudence but also with reason." In the mean while he was very far from believing that this work was free from faults. "I do not doubt (says he) but besides my omissions, which are many, I have committed many faults. I shall think myself obliged to those who will be so kind as to rectify me, and if I had not relied upon the advice of intelligent and equitable readers, I should have kept this work many years in my closet, according to the advice of the Ancients in order to correct it, and render it less unworthy of the public view: but considering that I had materials left for two other large volumes, I hastened the publication of it. I easily understood that I should be both more usefully and more seasonably assisted, when the public should know what I wanted, and wherein I am wanting. I hope that with those helps the Continuation of this work will be more perfect than otherwise it would have been. I shall immediately go about it, while age will permit. I see nothing wherein I can better or more pleasantly employ the leisure I am blessed with, a leisure which seems to me preferable to all things, and which has always been earnestly wished for by the true lovers of study and learning."

He observes likewise how he has behaved with regard to Moreri's Dictionary. That he has passed over several subjects, because they are to be found at sufficient length in that work: that when he has given the same articles which are in Moreri, he has been determined to do so, either because that Author gives a very short account of them, or because having the life of some illustrious person, he found himself able to give a compleat account of him; or because he had as many detached and curious matters, as would make up a tolerable supplement: that he referred the readers to that Dictionary for facts of any importance: that when he gives the same Article with Moreri, he has put the errors he has found in this Author in a remark by themselves; but has not touched those which are to be met with in the articles that are not common to both, though they are neither less considerable nor less frequent in those articles than in the others: from whence he concludes that his Dictionary is not designed to hurt the sale of the other, but on the contrary will encrease it, and make the reading of it more agreeable.

This is the first and only work to which Mr Bayle has set his name. It was not his intention to do so: he had said upon all occasions during the course of the impression, that he would not let his name appear in it, and he owns at the end of the preface that his friends had endeavoured in vain to make him change his sentiment; but that at last he had been obliged to give his consent that his name should appear. "This doth not proceed from fickleness (says he) but it is in obedience to authority that I do what I have so often said that I would not. It has been thought fit that I should affix my name, in order to terminate some differences among the Bookfellers. Without this Mr Leers could not have obtained the privilege, which he thought was absolutely necessary to him. I therefore pay a blind obedience." The occasion of this difference was, that Mr Leers having applied to the States of Holland for a privilege, the Bookfellers who were concerned in the edition of Moreri opposed it, on pretence that Mr Bayle's Dictionary was a work of the same kind with that of Moreri, and that this concurrence had been forbid by the privilege which the States had granted to them, and that this would be a great loss to them. And because they knew that Mr Bayle would not put his name to it, they made use of that circumstance to represent his Dictionary as a work which no body owned. The States notwithstanding this granted a privilege to Mr Leers, but with this condition, that Mr Bayle should affix his name in the title of it (1).

(1) This condition is expressed in the privilege.

And indeed Mr Bayle's work has hardly any thing in common with that of Moreri. It is a Dictionary of a new and singular kind. An infinite variety runs through the whole of it. In the Text or body of the articles, he in a very exact and concise manner gives the history of the persons he treats of, but he makes amends for this brevity in the Remarks which are subjoined to the text, and which are a sort of commentary on it. He draws the characters of those persons, he clears up the circumstances of their lives, and the motives of their conduct, he examines the judgment which has been, or may be made concerning them. He treats of the most important points of Religion, Morality, and Philosophy. Nay sometimes the Text seems to have been made for the sake of the Remarks. He takes occasion from the actions or sentiments of an obscure and almost unknown person, to instruct or agreeably to amuse his reader. So that some Articles which seem to promise nothing at all, are frequently accompanied with the most curious matters. He acts throughout the part of an exact, faithful, and disinterested Historian, and of a moderate, penetrating, and judicious Critic. In the articles of the Philosophers, he applies himself to discover their opinions, and to show their strong and weak sides.

Being persuaded that disputes about Religion, which have been the occasion of infinite disorders in the world, proceed only from the too great confidence which the Divines of all parties have in their own understandings; he undertakes to humble them, and to render them more modest and moderate, by showing that even so ridiculous a sect as that of the Manicheans can raise such objections to them concerning the origin of evil and the permission of sin, which it is impossible to answer. He even goes further, and maintains in general that human Reason is more capable of refusing and destroying, than of proving and building up: that there are no points either in Divinity or Philosophy, against which it doth not raise very strong difficulties, so that if we should follow it, with a disposition to dispute, as far as it will go, we should often find ourselves reduced to very great straits: that there are doctrines which are certainly true, to which it opposeth unanswerable objections; that in this case we ought to have no regard to these objections, but acknowledge the narrow limits of human understanding, and oblige it to captivate itself under the obedience of faith, and that in this, Reason doth act inconsistently with itself, since it acts upon very reasonable principles. He at the same time gives several examples of difficulties which Reason finds in the discussion of the most important subjects, and he doth this for the most part without deciding, and merely as a reporter. He endeavoured to inspire people with the same moderation with regard to historical facts. He showed that several facts which no body has ever called in question are very uncertain, or even evidently false: from whence it is natural to conclude, that we ought not lightly to give credit to Historians, but rather to suspend our judgment 'till by a rigorous examination we are assured of the truth.

The public was agreeably surprized to find that this work surpassed the favourable opinion they had conceived of it. The Bookfellers at Paris observing the great demand there was for it, resolved to reprint it, and desired a Licence from Mr Boucherat, Chancellor of France. Mr Boucherat appointed the Abbé Renaudot, Author of the Paris Gazette, to examine it in order to see if it contained anything against the Government, or against the Catholic Religion. This Abbé instead of confining himself to these two points, drew up a critical Memorial, wherein he says that this 1697. work is full of digressions; that one can find no system of Religion in it: that Mr Bayle never cites the Fathers there but in order to turn them into ridicule: that he maintains Pelagianism and Pyrrhonism throughout: that he had in different places inserted all the barbrest things which have been said or written these fifty years past against the Catholic Religion: that he every where makes panegyrics upon the Calvinist Ministers, filled with falshoods: that he seeks all occasions to render the reign of Lewis XIV odious with regard to the revocation of the Edicts, and the complaints of the Refugees: that one might observe every where in it a visible affectation of collecting the most odious and infamous things against the persons of late French Kings; and that he had purposely collected several fabulous stories in order to render Henry the Fourth's conversion suspicious: that in the article of Francis I, there was a very injurious digression against the King of England, to give ground for establishing the possibility of the supposition of the Prince of Wales: that it was full of unjustifiable objections: that Mr Bayle was only acquainted with modern books concerning Religion, and with those wrote by Heretics: that he had not the smallest knowledge of History; that his knowledge in Antiquity and Literature was all drawn from extracts which he had taken from French Translations: that he ridiculously compared the Moderns with the Ancients, and sets up the Abbé de St Real as a rival to Cornelius Nepos, in treating of the merit of Pomponius. "We may judge, says he, of the abilities of a person who in an extract of the life of Pomponius Atticus, translates "librarii, Bookfellers." This example which the Abbé Renaudot produced of Mr Bayle's ignorance is a very notable proof of his own rashness; for Mr Bayle had observed in the margin that we ought to understand by that word the Copists and Binders according to the custom of binding books at that time.

We may see by this what weight this Abbé's judgment ought to have. He had negligently run through Mr Bayle's Dictionary, and saw every thing through the prejudices he had conceived against it. He was besides naturally decisive, rash, violent, and passionate against the Protestants. He piqued himself upon his great reading and profound knowledge of antiquity; but they who have examined his works do not allow that his learning was equal to the opinion which he wanted that the public should have of it. They have found a thousand mistakes in his tract concerning the Origin of the Sphere, and showed that he has not so much as understood the Authors whom he has transcribed (1). However, upon his report, they refused the Licence which the Bookfellers of Paris desired in order to reprint Mr Bayle's Dictionary, and even prohibited the importing it into France. This was what Mr Bayle wished for (2). "I will tell you as a secret (says he to one of his friends (3), that I am exceedingly glad that they have prohibited my Dictionary in France. "It is not because the prohibition will the more excite peoples curiosity; for timur in vetitum. I have two other reasons. The one is, that if they had allowed it to be sold there, the Bookfellers at Lyons would have counterfeited it, and committed a thousand typographical errors. Their edition would have hindered the sale of that of Mr Leers, and would have multiplied the copies of a first edition, which is always imperfect when a large work has been composed hastily, and with so little assistance of libraries as I have had. This prohibition makes me hope that Mr Leers's sole edition will sell, and that he will be obliged to print a second, in the correction of which I will employ all my abilities, which are very small I own, but which however I will apply to better purpose, and I expect from your knowledge and good advice how to direct myself aright in the correction. The other reason, which still is of more importance, is, that if my Dictionary had been allowed a free admission into France, my enemies in this country, who are a factious kind of people, and very artful in giving a bad turn to things, would have inferred from hence that my book contains nothing in favour of Protestants, or against France: A proof, would they say, of the criminal attachment, of which the Author of it is suspected, to the cause of the common enemy of the repose of Europe. It is therefore of advantage to me that my Dictionary has been prohibited; notwithstanding, though I wished that this might happen, I have said nothing in it which can please our Visionaries. When any thing came in my way relating to the affairs of Europe, I have avoided saying any thing either pro or con: and they even complain in England, that I have indirectly condemned the late Revolution, and that I have declared myself too much against the rights of the people, in favour of the despotic power of Princes."

Mr Bayle criticized Mr Jurieu in several places of his Dictionary: and in doing so he only followed his plan, which was to take notice of the errors in fact, or of the false reasonings the Authors of whom he had occasion to mention. "I have sometimes, says he (4), criticized my enemy with some force; he is enraged at this, and searches for all possible means of revenging himself. When I first published my Dictionary he set his emissaries a declaiming against it, pretending that it contained impieties; and after all these snarlings, he has persuaded his Confratry to examine it. I have all my defences ready, and I am not at all afraid, provided they will, I do not say, exactly follow the rules of equity, but forbear only from violating them shamefully and without measure."

(1) See Mr Des Vignoles's Remarks on this piece of the Abbé Renaudot in the Bibliothèque Germanique, Tom. v. Art. xi, pag. 153, and the following.

(2) See Letter to Mr Jandion of the 11th of February 1697, p. 625, 626.

(3) Letter to M^r of the 13th of May, 1697, p. 642, 643.

(4) Letter to Mr Constant, July 4, 1697, p. 654.

Mr Jurieu's party finding themselves superior in the Consistory of Rotterdam, he took that opportunity to have Mr Bayle's Dictionary examined there. In the mean while he published several extracts of anonymous Letters from Paris, London, Geneva, and from some towns in Holland, to decry this work. And indeed the Authors of these Letters said a great deal against it, but most of them had not read it, and spoke of it only by hearsay. Mr Jurieu added the Abbé Renaudot's Memorial, and the extracts which Mr Bayle had given of the books of that Minister in the News from the Republic of Letters, "In order, said he, to oppose the high encomiums which " Mr Bayle has given to him and to his works there, to the criticisms in the Dictionary." To all this he added several reflexions, wherein he repeated his ancient calumnies, and made new efforts to disflame Mr Bayle, and disparage his Dictionary. In the mean time he owned that he had not so much as read the title of it (1). He intitled this compilation: The Judgment of the public and particularly of the Abbé Renaudot, concerning the Sieur Bayle's Critical Dictionary (2).

(1) I own to you that I have not read this book, nor even the title of it. Jugement du public, &c. p. 28.

(2) Jugement du public, & particulièrement de Mr l'Abbé Renaudot, sur le Dictionnaire critique du Sieur Bayle, in 4° pp. 47.

(3) Reflexions sur un Imprimé qui a pour titre, Jugement du public, &c. in 4°, page. 16. small character, and in two columns.

(4) Reflexions sur un Imprimé qui a pour titre, Jugement du Public, &c. p. 1.

(5) Ibid. pag. 1, 2.

Mr Bayle upon this published a piece intitled: Remarks on a Pamphlet, intitled The Judgment of the Public, &c (3), wherein he says that his principal design in publishing this piece was to acquaint the public that he was preparing a defence, which would demonstrate to all unprejudiced readers the injustice of his censures: but that this apology not deserving the fate of loose sheets, which for the most part do not outlive the week in which they first appear, he kept it to be placed at the beginning or end of a book in folio. For the same reason, adds he, I refer to it almost every thing considerable that might be said against that piece which is just published, and I confine myself to a few observations made in haste. He takes notice in the beginning that the title of this piece of Mr Jurieu's is deceitful. "This Libel, says he (4), has a very improper title, it ought only to be intitled: The Judgment of the Abbé Renaudot, commented upon by the publisher; for all the other judges are less than phantoms: they are invisible beings, no body knows whether they are black or white. Therefore their opinion and a cypher are of the same value. . . . What manner of proceeding is this! to make the judgment of the public to consist in such pieces. I could produce a great many much stronger in my favour, if modesty would permit: and besides how many Letters could I produce, wherein my adversary is represented both as a bad writer, and a bad man! but God forbid that I should imitate him in the use he makes of what people write to one another in confidence. "This is a conduct detested even by the Heathens themselves."

He observes that Mr Jurieu out of all his evidences has mentioned only the one who was most exceptionable. "The Author of this pretended Judgment of the Public (says he (5), has not been very wise in the choice he has made. He conceals the names of all his witnesses except one whom he ought principally to have concealed, a name odious and despised in all the countries which are at war with France. I will not take advantage of the prepossession of the public: I will not consider him with regard to his Gazette, which discredits him every where as a man who has got a habit of giving a malicious turn to lies. I will consider him on his fair side.

"The Abbé Renaudot has the character of a very learned man, and of having a taste so delicate that nothing is able to please him. One can therefore conclude nothing from his contempt of any thing: it is an equivocal proof. I have been likewise told that he is exceedingly devout. We need not therefore be astonished, that he thinks some things too free, which at bottom do not go beyond the liberties which an honest man may allow himself, after the example of so many great authors." He adds, that with regard to the gay passages in his Dictionary, which are complained of as a little too licentious, he does not doubt but every body will be satisfied when they have seen the Apology he is preparing on this head: and he promiseth to revise the article of David in such a manner that it shall not any longer serve for a pretence for the declamations of his detractors. "I have declared (says he) upon all occasions, and I here declare it publicly, that if there are any heterodox opinions in my work, I am the first who will detest them, and that I will throw them out in the second edition. All that I want is to have them pointed out to me."

He next observes several falsehoods which the Authors of the extracts had spread concerning his Dictionary: he refutes Mr Jurieu's calumnies and malicious insinuations; and shows how ridiculously he had boasted that he had reduced him to live upon the pension of a Bookfeller: he says that he had criticized him without affectation, and had treated him in the same manner with other authors, whose faults he had taken notice of; that he had done him justice when he had been censured by others without reason, and that it was not his fault that he had not had more frequent occasions of justifying him; that what he had censured in some of his works, was not the same thing which he had formerly commended; that at first he had praised him sincerely, and that afterwards he had criticized him for good reasons, being better instructed.

With regard to Mr Renaudot, Mr Bayle contents himself with observing two or three falsehoods in point of fact contained in his Memorial, delaying a thorough examination

1697. mination of it 'till that Abbé should declare himself the Author of it. "If I at any time do answer the Abbé Renaudot's Judgment (says he) it will only be after I shall know that he acknowledgeth it to be his, in the manner in which it is printed; for it is so full of mistakes, falsehoods, and blunders, that I imagine it not to be agreeable to the original: some false pieces have possibly been added to it in copying. He had prejudiced a great many people, but men of judgment having read my Dictionary, quickly put an end to that prejudice. The Abbé himself is not ignorant of this, for he says in one of his Letters, That I ought to be satisfied with the approbation of so many people. And so I am. People were surprized to find so many idle things in his report. The only question was, whether my book contained any thing which could shock either the Church of Rome or France. No body had asked him whether I was acquainted with good Authors, or whether I equal the Moderns with the Ancients. If several of my readers have contradicted him on the head of my ignorance, I disavow them: he has not said enough on this head, I know a great many more circumstances of it, and if he has a mind to draw my picture in this light, I will furnish him with a good many memoirs."

This dispute went no further. Mr de Wit interested himself for the Abbé Renaudot, and made Mr Bayle promise not to write against him. Mr Bayle religiously kept his word; and was even so scrupulous that he was not pleased to see that I designed to insert in Mr de St Evremond's Works, the answer which that celebrated writer had made to the Judgment of that Abbé. "As to what concerns (1) Letter March 7, 1702, p. 867, and the following. (says he), the Apology which Mr de St Evremond did me the honour to write in my favour, as your friendship for me is already publicly declared, I do not know whether the Abbé Renaudot will not think me guilty of an indirect breach of the treaty which Mr de Wit had concluded between us, if any thing should appear in a work reprinted by you concerning the foolish quarrel which that Abbé picked with me. You know that in my Reflexions on that Abbé's Judgment, I promised to examine and answer it more at large. He is exceedingly techy, and though he is very learned, yet he is afraid of literary disputes. He is very well pleased with the liberty of criticizing by word of mouth, but doth not care to be obliged to come to discussions in writing. The late Mr de Wit, his particular friend, persuaded me very earnestly to peace, and was vexed at the Reflexions which I had published. Mr Leers, who is under many obligations to the Abbé, who doth him good offices upon all occasions, received a Letter from him, wherein he signified that it would be against his inclination to enter into a dispute of this nature. In short out of deference to Mr de Wit, and complaisance for Mr Leers, and in consideration of the excuses which the Abbé made for himself, I having a natural aversion to literary disputes of a personal nature, consented that Mr de Wit should make us agree to forget what was passed, and make no more mention of this difference. I have kept my word very scrupulously; for there is not one word in the second edition of my Dictionary which bears the least mark of my remembrance of the Abbé's Judgment. I leave it entirely to your discretion, whether by inserting Mr de St Evremond's answer, the Abbé would not have a pretence to say that what I have not done myself I have done by a friend, by thus renewing the memory of that quarrel." Mr de St St Evremond had read Mr Bayle's Dictionary with a great deal of pleasure: and he diverted himself by composing this answer, which contains very fine and delicate raiillery (2).

1698. The first edition of Mr Bayle's Dictionary being almost sold off, they thought of giving a second. It was begun on the 26th of May 1698.

Mr Jurieu had published his pretended Judgment of the Public, in order to engage the Ecclesiastical Assemblies to condemn Mr Bayle's Dictionary. He got this libel presented to the Synod, at this time sitting at Delft; but the Synod took no manner of notice of it. The Consistory of Rotterdam itself, acted with great moderation. They granted Mr Bayle a hearing, and communicated to him the remarks which they had made upon his Dictionary; they declared that they were satisfied with his answers, and exhorted him to acquaint the public with every thing that had passed on this subject. This he did in a loose sheet, intituled, A Letter from the Author of the Historical and Critical Dictionary to Mr D. E. M. S. concerning the proceedings of the Consistory of the Walloon Church of Rotterdam, against this work (3). It is as follows.

"Sir,

"I AM informed by your last Letter that a great many contradictory accounts have gone about concerning what passed in the Consistory of the Walloon Church at Rotterdam, when the affair which I had before it concerning the Historical and Critical Dictionary was ended there. All you could gather from so many different reports was, that I had promised to amend that work in a second edition: but this not satisfying you, you desire me to give you a more exact account of that matter, and this I shall now give you.

"Be

(1) Letter March 7, 1702, p. 867, and the following.

(2) This small piece was inserted in the first edition of Mr de St Evremond's Works, printed at London in 1705, 2 Vols in 4^o, and is to be found in all the following editions.

(3) Lettre de l'Auteur du Dictionnaire historique & critique à Monsieur le D. E. M. S. au sujet des procédures du Consistoire de l'Eglise Wallonne de Rotterdam contre son Ouvrage.

(1) In the Reflections on a Pamphlet intituled
The Judgment of the Public &c, upon the Critical Dictionary, §. iii.
pag. 2.

“ Be pleas'd therefore to know, Sir, that the Consistory having thought it their “ duty to take my book into their consideration, on account of the complaints “ which several persons spread abroad concerning it, named a Committee to ex“ amine it. This Committee read it, took extracts and made remarks, and having “ made their report to the Consistory, and all other preliminaries being regulated,
 “ so that there remained nothing to be done but to hear me, and then proceed “ to give sentence, I was warn'd to appear before the Consistory, and accordingly
 “ I came there upon the day appointed. The state of the case in general being “ laid before me, together with the first article of particular extracts and remarks, “ I was ask'd what I had to say in my defence. I answer'd that not knowing “ what should be first consider'd in this affair, I had prepar'd only a very “ general discours. It consist'd of these two points. First, that I had a great “ many things to alledge in my justification on every one of the grounds of com“ plaint; and secondly, that in order to spare the Consistory the trouble of a long “ series of tedious discussions, and to contribute more effectually to peace and edi“ fication; I chose rather to change the things which had given occasion for complaint “ in a second edition, than to insist upon the reasons which I might advance to “ prove that all the noise which had been made was without foundation; that I “ had already acquainted the public with my dispositions to correct my work, ac“ cording to the advice which they should be pleas'd to communicate to me, and “ that in particular I did declare to the Consistory, that I would with the utmost “ docility and respect make use of what information they should be pleas'd to “ give me; in a word, that if I had advanced any heretical or erroneous opinions “ (which I believ'd I had not done) I disavow'd and retract'd them, as I had “ already declared in a piece printed three or four months ago (1).
 “ This answer being thought too general, I was told that they would commu“ nicate to me the remarks which the Consistory had made on my Dictionary. Ac“ cordingly they were communicated to me by the Committee which they had “ appointed; they consist'd amongst other things of these five heads: I. The ci“ tations, expressions, and reflexions all over the work, which might offend chaste “ ears. II. The article of David. III. The article of the Manicheans. IV. That “ of the Sceptics. V. The praises given to persons who had denied either the “ being or providence of God. I answer'd two things as I had done before: in “ the first place, that I thought I had a great many reasons to alledge in my “ justification on all these heads; and secondly, that notwithstanding this, I was “ ready to strike out of the book all the stumbling blocks which they had found “ there; I added that now that I knew, by the remarks of the Consistory, “ what the things complain'd of were, I saw more clearly how to correct “ them, that I thought it a very easy matter to remedy every thing, either by “ suppressions, change of expressions, or by additions and explanations. That in “ particular, I would new-mould the article of David in such a manner as no“ thing should remain there which might give offence to pious souls. That with “ regard to the horrible doctrine of two Principles, that is to say, of Manicheism, I “ had sufficiently declared how much I thought it absurd, monstrous, contrary not only “ to religion and piety, but likewise to the clearest notions of reason and sound “ Philosophy. That I would enlarge more upon this in the second edition; and “ that if in quality of an historian I had thought myself oblig'd to recite the “ arguments of the Manicheans in their full force, I on the other hand was of opi“ nion, that this was of no consequence, and that I only enlarg'd on what the “ most orthodox of our Divines every day tell us in fewer words, viz. that the agree“ ment of the holiness and goodness of God with the sin and misery of man is “ an incomprehensible mystery, which we ought humbly to adore, being persuad'd “ that since it is revealed, it must needs be so, and that we are oblig'd to silence
 “ all the difficulties which our weak reason suggests to us. That I had sufficiently “ declared on other subjects, and particularly with regard to the existence of ex“ tension and motion, that I did not think it a reason to reject a doctrine because “ I could not answer all the objections against it. That I would again examine “ the difficulties of the Manicheans, and that if could find answers, or if the re“ verend Ministers of the Consistory would furnish me with any, I would put “ them in the best form I was capable of. I made the same answer with relation “ to the article of Pyrrho; and as to the praises bestow'd on the good morals of “ some Atheists, I promis'd an Explanation, which would show how these facts “ which I have found in books, and which I was oblig'd by the laws of history “ to relate, ought not to give offence, and that in effect they do no hurt to the “ true Religion.

“ The Committee having made a report of this Conference to the Consistory, it “ was desired that I should give in writing what I had declared by word of mouth.
 “ Accordingly I present'd a memorial, wherein after having first touch'd upon the “ two general heads of my verbal answers, I protest'd that I never had design'd
 “ to advance any proposition as my own opinion, which was contrary to the Confes“ sion of Faith of the Reformed Church, in which, by God's goodness, I was born,
 “ and 1698. "and of which I made profession. That if any such propositions were to be found in my work (which I did not at all believe) they must have crept in without my observation, that I disavowed and retracted them; that if I had in certain respects taken a more than ordinary liberty of philosophizing, it was because I thought that this would be readily excused in consideration of the nature of my work, wherein I sustain both the character of Historian and Commentator, without pretending to act the Dogmatist; that the pains which I have taken to make my Philosophical Reflexions subservient to the confirmation of a fundamental doctrine of our Church, and which we constantly oppose to the Socinians, viz. that we ought to subject our understanding to the authority of God, and believe what he has revealed to us in his word, although the principles of Philosophy should not always be conforming to it: this, I say, made me hope that all my Protestant readers would be rather edified than offended by my Commentaries; that I was very sorry that the event had not answered my expectation, and that if I had foreseen the consequence of the liberty which I have taken, I would have carefully abstained from it; that to remedy what is past I would amend those passages in a second edition, and that I would have great regard to the remarks which the Consistory had communicated to me. I added to this, the particular declarations which I had made verbally to the Committee concerning the article of David, that of the Manicheans &c.

"Upon this Memorial the Consistory drew up an Act, with such reflexions and modifications as they thought proper, and this, Sir, was the amicable conclusion of that matter. They signified their desire that without waiting for the publication of the second edition, which might be long a finishing, I should publish something which might acquaint the public with the sentiments which I had set forth in my Memorial. I readily agreed to this, and I now acquit myself of that promise; and it has not been owing to me, that I have not done so sooner. I am, Sir, yours."

Mr Jurieu being vexed that the Consistory had not gratified his resentment, used all his efforts to engage them to take this affair once more into their consideration. The Consistory had been changed in the beginning of the year 1698, he flattered himself that he should find them more tractable. And indeed they did name a Committee, but did not think it proper to alter any thing in what had been already determined. They confined their examination to the making of some remarks upon the Letter which Mr Bayle had published. The Consistory approved of their report, and declared that this piece had appeared later than they had expected (1); that Mr Bayle had not sent a copy of it to the Consistory; that the number of copies which he had printed was too small; that Mr Bayle had not sufficiently enlarged on what the Consistory had required of him, and had not declared that he submitted to it without reserve: and that upon this account they might justly demand further satisfaction; but that they would be content to represent these things to him verbally, and to exhort him to correct the second edition according to the remarks which they had communicated to him, and to make a good use of the advice which they had given him: that they would draw up a Memorial wherein they might add some new remarks; and that as Mr Jurieu had been very ill used by Mr Bayle in that work, Mr Bayle should be exhorted to behave himself for the future with more moderation, both in the second edition, and in the other books which he should publish. "The Consistory having seen with grief that so little regard had been shewn to a Minister whose ministry and labours had been and still were of singular edification to the Church." A Committee was appointed to draw up this Memorial, and they were ordered to communicate it to Mr Bayle. They inserted in it what related to Mr Jurieu. They added likewise some remarks; and amongst other things they desired Mr Bayle "to take care not to refuse except upon very good grounds, what our Divines have reported of certain wicked Popes, since though he might alledge some conjectures in defence of these Popes, with regard to certain facts, yet strong reasons might be offered for their condemnation, and that it was unjust, without necessity, to side with seducers, who have done so much hurt to the Church, and to endeavour to traduce our writers as rash accusers." This affair ended here, and Mr Jurieu could not engage the Consistory any farther to gratify the desire of vengeance with which he was animated (2).

1699. In the year 1699 Mr Bayle published a third edition of his Various Thoughts concerning Comets. He suppressed the Advertisement prefixed to the second, and substituted another, in the beginning of which he tells us for what reason he had assumed the stile of a Roman Catholic in this work, both in treating of religious and political matters. He next observes upon what occasion this book was composed, and the design which he had of printing it at Paris, together with the other particulars which we related above. He observes likewise that he had promised that this edition should be enlarged with many new proofs and new answers to objections, yet notwithstanding it was entirely the same with the second, without addition

(1) The Consistory had been employed in this affair from November 3, 1697, to January 7, 1698. Mr Bayle's piece was not published till six months after. It is dated July 6, 1698.

(2) The reader will find at the end of this LIFE, the Acts of the Consistory of Rotterdam, with relation to Mr Bayle's Dictionnaire.

dition or diminution. The reason which engaged him to add nothing to it, is (says he) that this work being already too like those rivers which do nothing but wind about, he could not add new digressions to it without making it very tiresome to the reader : and that on this consideration he had reserved these additions for another volume, which should be published when he had advanced a little further in the composition of his Critical Dictionary, about which he was still employed. "What makes me (says he) refer this to that time, is that having anew examined all the objections that can be formed against the parallel which I have drawn betwixt Paganism and Atheism, it seems to me, that they may be all solved by the principles which I have laid down, and by applying the answers which I have already made use of. There is therefore no occasion to make haste." This new edition was printed while he was revising and reprinting his Dictionary. When it was finished he had nothing further to divert him from a labour which increased every day, and which did not allow him the smallest relaxation. "I should be quite inexcusable (says he to Mr Marais (1) for delaying so long to write to you, if I were not more than ordinarily busy, both in revising my Dictionary, of which they are now printing a second edition, and in correcting the proofs. It is with much ado that I can perform both these tasks, and it is very happy for me that my Thoughts concerning Comets being finished, I have a little leisure. I have read over all the sheets of it before they were printed, and though I have added nothing, but only made some small alterations in the title, it has made me lose a good deal of time." This Edition is in two volumes ; and to the second volume was joined a second edition of the Addition to the Various Thoughts concerning Comets, which was first published in 1694.

About this time Mr le Clerc, concealed under the name of Theodore Parrhase, published a book intitled, Parrhasiana : or Various Thoughts on Critical, Historical, Moral, and Political Subjects, in which there was an article that concerned Mr Bayle. He had maintained in his Dictionary, that the Manicheans could oppose to Christian Divines difficulties concerning moral and physical evil, which it was not possible to solve by the light of reason. Mr le Clerc on the contrary maintained that Origen's System which has been abandoned by all Christians, was sufficient to take away all these difficulties, and refuted Mr Bayle's Manichean in the person of an Origenist ; and concluded "that since a man of that sort can reduce a Manichean to silence, what might not they do who should reason infinitely better than the disciples of Origen (2) ?" But he declared that by answering the Manichean objections, he did not pretend in the least to hurt Mr Bayle, whom he did not at all suspect to be a favourer of them. "I am persuaded (says he (3) that he has taken the philosophical liberty, of disputing both pro and con on many occasions, without concealing the strength of either side, only to exercise those who understand the subjects of which he treats, and not with an intention of favouring those whose reasons he explains. One ought to consider the difficulties he propoeth, as we do the objections which every body is allowed to make in a school of Divinity or Philosophy ; where the further one pusheth a difficulty, the more honour redounds to those who can solve it. This is a piece of justice which he has a right to require of his readers, and which ought not to be refused him. For my own part (says he) I grant it him with all my heart, but I think I have a right to desire in return, that I may be allowed to answer his objections, without any body's making odious applications to the person, of answers which regard only the difficulties."

In the year following the Princess Sophia, Electress Dowager of Hanover, and her daughter the Electress of Brandenburg, since Queen of Prussia, had the curiosity to take a tour through Flanders and Holland. These Princesses, less distinguished by their elevated rank than by their knowledge and sublime parts, were the admiration of all Europe. They honoured the learned with their particular favour, loved to converse with them, and proposed sometimes very embarrassing questions to them. Mr Bayle was perfectly well known to them by his works, their desire of seeing Holland was heightened by the pleasure of being personally acquainted with so celebrated a Philosopher. After having travelled through Flanders, they had no sooner arrived at Rotterdam than they sent to desire Mr Bayle to come to see them. But it being late, and Mr Bayle being in bed tormented with a violent head-ach, he made his compliments, acquainting them how sorry he was not to be in a condition of paying his respects to them. These Princesses next day went to the Hague without having seen Mr Bayle, who was detained at home by his indisposition : but the Count de Dhona, having informed Mr Basnage, who was gone to the Hague, of the desire which their Highnesses had to see Mr Bayle, Mr Basnage gave him notice of it. He came, and was received by these two Princesses in a distinguishing manner. The Princess Sophia conversed with him a long time in private, she asked him many questions, and they entered upon very sublime points. In the mean while Mr Basnage entertained the Electress of Brandenburg, who expressed a great deal of esteem for Mr Bayle and his writings, which she always carried about with her. They staid with the Count de Dhona by their Highnesses

1699.

1700.

(1) Letter of September 7, 1699, p. 763, 764.

(2) Parrhasiana, Tom. I, p. 304.

(3) Ibid. p. 302, 303.

1700. nesses order. These Princeesses desired their company to Delft, but Mr Bayle not being able to wait upon them, they parted at the Hague (1).

1701. In 1701 there appeared a book intitled, An Apologetical Dissertation for the blessed Robert d'Arbrisselles, founder of the Order of Font-Evraud, with relation to what Mr Bayle has said of him in his Historical and Critical Dictionary (2). Mr Bayle, in speaking of Robert d'Arbrisselles, said, that he had been accused of lying with some of his Nuns, that by irritating his passions, he might give the more glorious victory to his virtue. It is certain that Jeffery, Abbot of Vendôme and Cardinal, gave the blessed Robert notice of the reports which went about on that head, and rallied him upon this new kind of martyrdom which he had found out. Father de la Mainferme, a Monk of Fontevraud, undertook the defence of the founder of his Order; and Mr Bayle confesseth in his Dictionary, that the reasons of the Apologist seem very strong, and that he doth not pretend to affirm what was reported of Robert. This confession gave occasion to Father Souri, a Monk of the same Order (3), to examine this subject more accurately, and to place it in a new light. His Dissertation is wrote in form of a Letter addressed to Mr Bayle. He praiseth him for having given to understand that he did not believe what was said concerning the blessed Robert to be true, and at the same time makes great encomiums on his Dictionary. "It is a long time ago (says he (4), since the Republic of Letters have been obliged to you, but this last service which you have lately done to it, by your admirable Dictionary, has crowned them all. It is not enough to say that you have given us a book, you have given us an entire library. The novelty of the design, your discernment in historical facts, the exactness of your citations, that care and discreet attention which reigns every where in that prodigious work of advancing nothing that is false, and of daring to say what is true, according to the inviolable laws of a true Historian; all this makes me say that it would have been pity, if you had yielded to the temptation of suppressing so learned a work. As for me, an inconsiderable and private person, I received it, with a gratitude which I cannot express to you, and I join with the common herd of readers at least, in making the acknowledgments which the public owes to you upon account of the great discoveries you have therein made, and I shall make a good use of them.

"The difference of party is of no consequence here, every one will be able to choose what is proper for him. You do not set a great value upon our Saints, but that prejudice doth not at all hinder you from being dissatisfied at people's laying evident falsehoods to their charge, and we cannot sufficiently acknowledge your justice and sincerity in this respect. This love for truth deserves that God should one day give you the knowledge of all revealed truths.

"I feel in myself the same equity for your Reformers. I never relished either the exaggerations or impostures of zealots; and still less the bold assertions of Boleac, an Author full of resentment; how much soever we may be inclined to believe the scandals which are reported concerning your Patriarch, who has declared himself in so open a manner against the most ancient of Churches. It is not by impostures that he ought to be attacked, and the truth of my Religion which he endeavoured to destroy, had no occasion for such assistance. I do not believe, notwithstanding their Heterodoxy, all that the Catholics say of your Doctors, except when they are supported by incontestable proofs, and neither doth my Catholicism impose upon me, as to the evil which the Protestants say of ours, when their reasons are evident. I do not tell you this, Sir, to make you excuse the more easily what I will take the liberty to remonstrate to you, nor to set myself up as a model of sincerity to a person who might serve for such to others. Although I should not act in this manner, the poor example of such an obscure man as I am, would not turn you out of your way, and you would still thunder against the forgers of lies. That of which I treated here, which has been made concerning the blessed Robert d'Arbrisselles, cannot fail to belong to your Dictionary; for if it is true, your Dictionary may take bold of it, as it is historical; and if it is false, may take notice of it, as it is critical.

"But I am very sure you do not believe it to be true. You, Sir, own as much yourself. . . . I do not pretend, say you, to affirm what is said of him, for the reasons of the Apologist seem very strong. But will you allow me, Sir, to say that possibly you have not sufficiently, in this passage, condemned that falsehood, nor with so much vivacity as you have done others of that kind, which are only founded on HEARSAY."

This is the only thing which Father Souri would have desired of Mr Bayle, for in other respects he is perfectly well satisfied with him. "Once more (says he (5), we have only gratefully to acknowledge, upon this occasion, your equity and good taste. Shall I dare however (adds he) to tell you that the entertaining part of this Article has made you in some measure forget your own maxims, and has hindered you from saying any more than the two favourable lines which I have just now cited? there never was a story more worthy of your censure than

(1) A MSS. Memoir of Mr Baynoge.

(2) Dissertation apologetique pour le bienheureux Robert d'Arbrisselles, Fondateur de l'Ordre de Font-Evraud, sur ce qu'en a dit Mr Bayle dans son Dictionnaire Historique & Critique. At Antwerp (Amsterdam) by Henry Desbordes. In 12^o.

(3) See Reponse aux questions d'un Provincial, Tom. I. chap. lxvii. pag. 684.

(4) Dissertation apologetique &c. p. 1, and the following.

(5) Ibid. p. 8, 9.

"than this. You have indeed a mind to divert your Readers, and you have your "reasons for doing so; but it is not your design to divert them at the expence
 "of truth, and you have never lost sight of it, in what relates to us." 1701.

Mr Bayle gave an account of this piece in an addition to the Article FONT-EVRAUD. "This Apology (says he) is so well turned and so solid, that every "reasonable man ought to acquiesce in it; and though I have sufficiently declared "that I did not give the least credit to the reports concerning the sharing of "the bed &c, I declare again here, that in all the passages where I have spoke
 "of it without repeating this my opinion, I desire it may be understood." Mr Bayle does Father Souris the justice he deserved. "The civility (says he), the politeness,
 "the wit, and erudition of the Author, appear in it in a distinguishing manner,
 "and I am very sorry that I do not deserve the praises which so accomplished
 "a person has been pleased to bestow by way of compliment upon me."

The second edition of the Critical Dictionary was finished on the twenty seventh 1702.
 of December 1701, and was published in the beginning of the year 1702. It was enlarged very near one half. This augmentation was contrary to Mr Bayle's intention. He only designed to make some additions to the Articles already published; and did not think of adding any new ones, he reserved them for a separate Alphabet, under the title of A Supplement to the Critical Dictionary (1). But the Bookseller desired that they should be published in this second edition, and Mr Bayle was obliged to consent to it. This change gave him a great deal of uneasiness as he shows in the Preface. He distinguished the additions in such a manner that one might discern them at first sight. He very carefully corrected the faults of the first edition, which he had either discovered himself, or which had been pointed out to him by his friends. He showed his gratitude to those who had furnished him with memoirs, and names them when he thought he could do so without offending them. In the mean while he owns that these additions had not allowed him to make the Articles of the first edition so correct as he could have wished. "I must own (says he) that the trouble which they have cost me,

 "has not permitted me to correct the Articles of the first edition, with all the fe-
 "verity and all the diligence which I would have employed about them. It is "very hard, while the Printers work without ceasing, for an Author to be able "to perform these three things, to revise two large volumes in Folio, to enlarge them
 "more than one third, and to correct the proofs."

In speaking of the corrections which he had made in the first edition, he doth not forget those which he had obliged himself to make. "There are (says he) a
 "fort of corrections which I have made as it were ex officio, and in consequence of "an obligation of which the public has been informed. I have behaved herein "with all possible care, and with a very strong intention to give satisfaction to "those who were offended. For this purpose I have suppressed every thing in the "article of David, which could give offence. This is the greatest suppression, "which has been necessary, the rest are neither considerable for their number, or "their extent. We have been able to amend every thing at the expence of a few "words, or lines, and principally by means of four Explanations, which are placed "at the end of this work." Mr Bayle did, in fact, suppress every thing which the Consistory of Rotterdam had disapproved in the article of David: but even before this edition was completed, several persons having declared that they would not buy it, if that article was not published in the same manner as before, the Bookseller was obliged to reprint it by itself (2) that they might join it to this new edition. Some of Mr Bayle's friends advised him to insert in it the Projet which he had published in 1692 together with some Essays of his Dictionary, and he accordingly placed it at the end of the Dissertations in the last volume (3).

There is no book which stands more in need of a good Index, than Mr Bayle's Dictionary. Mr Leers took care to advertise in the beginning of the Project, that he would not forget this article, and Mr Huet composed a very exact one for the first edition: but Mr Leers foreseeing that the printing of it would take up a long time, suppressed the one half of it, which disfigured it in such a manner, that Mr Bayle thought he was obliged to inform the public of this in a short advertisement, which he placed at the end of the Index. The other half was preserved, and given to the Author of the Index to the second edition, who made the best use of it he could. But this new Index, considering the great number of additions was very imperfect. Mr Bayle here lays down a method of supplying that defect.
 He takes notice at the same time that having learned by experience the qualities which a good Index ought to have, he could have made such a one, but that he had neither the time nor the patience which so tedious and toilsome a task required.
 He adds, that he had not even thought it proper that the person employed in composing the Index, should engage himself in all the details, which some readers desired, and gives his reasons for it.

He next observes that some persons might complain, that his Dictionary did not furnish them with a sufficient number of things to their taste. He says that this is the inevitable fate of all books which contain a medley of many different things,

and

(1) See the Letters to Mr de la Monnoye,
August 19
1697, p.
665; and to Mr Marais, October 2,
1698, p.
727.

(2) See Letter to Mr Pe-cher, August 10,
1705, p.
1041.

(3) See Letter to Mr Des
Mailleux, November 1 1701,
p. 839,

1702. and wherein there is a great variety. He declares that if he has made mention of one family rather than of another no less, or more considerable, he has done so without the least respect of persons, and only because he had Memoirs concerning the one, and none concerning the other. Lastly, he answers those who had found fault that he had given so few articles of great Captains. He says that this proceeds not only from his having avoided to treat the same matters which are in other Dictionaries, but chiefly from his not being able to make these articles such as he could wish. He gives an example of this, by showing upon what plan he would compose the article of the Maréchal de Luxembourg, if he had the assistance and knowledge necessary to draw it up.

He joined four Explanations to this edition, in order to fulfil his engagements with the Consistory of Rotterdam. He prefixed to them a general observation, wherein he gives the reasons why he believed that no body would be offended with the liberty of philosophizing, which he had sometimes take. In the first Explanation he justifies himself against those who had found fault with him for having said, that there had been speculative Atheists and Epicureans, who had surpassed the Idolaters in the soundness of their morals; and shows that the conduct of these Atheists, could not do any hurt to the true Religion, nor give it the least blemish. But he promiseth to treat of this more at large in the continuation of his book concerning Comets. The second Explanation relates to the objections of the Manicheans. He concludes it with the following six propositions, which contain the substance of his doctrine:

I. That it is the property of the mysteries of the Gospel to be liable to objections which natural light cannot solve.

II. That Unbelievers cannot justly draw any advantage from this, that the maxims of Philosophy do not afford solutions to the difficulties which they raise against the Mysteries of the Gospel.

III. That the objections of the Manicheans, concerning the Origin of Evil and Predestination, ought not to be considered in general as attacking Predestination, but with this particular regard, that the Origin of Evil, the decrees of God concerning it, and the consequences of it, are the most inconceivable mysteries of Christianity.

IV. That it ought to satisfy every good, Christian that his faith is founded on the testimony of the word of God.

V. That the system of the Manicheans considered in itself is absurd, indefensible, and contrary to the ideas of order; that it is liable to retortions, and is not able to remove difficulties.

VI. That in all events, adds he, no body can be offended at my confessions, unless he looks upon the doctrine of the most orthodox Divines as scandalous, since all that I have said is a natural and necessary consequence from their sentiments, and that I have only laid down in a more prolix manner, what they teach more compendiously.

In the third Explanation he shows, that the objections of the Pyrrhonian Abbé against some doctrines of Christianity, which he has related in his Dictionary, are of no force against our Religion. He first lays it down as a certain and incontestable principle, That Christianity is of a supernatural order, and that its analysis is the supreme authority of God proposing mysteries to us, not that we may comprehend them, but that we may believe them with all the humility which is due to the infinite Being, who can neither deceive nor be deceived. From whence evidently follows, adds he, the incompetency of the tribunal of Philosophy to judge of the controversies among Christians, since they ought only to be carried to the tribunal of Revelation. He draws the character of the Pyrrhonians, and shows that of all the Philosophers who ought not to be allowed to dispute concerning the mysteries of Christianity, before they have admitted Revelation as the rule, there are none so unworthy of being heard as the followers of Pyrrho. In the fourth Explanation he examines the complaints of those who had said that his Dictionary contained obscenities. He expresseth this accusation in the following manner: "That the Author relates historical facts which he has found in other authors, whom he carefully quotes, which facts are filthy and obscene, that he adds a commentary upon these historical narrations to illustrate them by testimonies, by reflexions, and by proofs, &c. in which he sometimes alledgeth the words of some authors, who have wrote freely, some of them as Physicians or Lawyers, others as Gallants or Poets: but that he never says any thing containing either explicitly, or even implicitly, an approbation of impurity; that, on the contrary, he endeavours upon many occasions to expose it to our abhorrence, and to refute loose morality." He afterwards proves by reasons, by authorities, and by examples, that these sorts of obscenities, are not of the number of those which we can reasonably censure.

Mr Bayle made an addition to the article of Origen, upon occasion of the Parablasiana of Mr le Clerc. "There are (says he) in that work some reflexions concerning the dispute between the Manicheans and the Orthodox. They are preceded by an observation as equitable as we could expect from a very honest man, they are preceded, I say, by a judgment altogether agreeable to equity, truth, and reason, concerning the views which I had in taking the liberty of relating the “ objections of the Manicheans, and of confessing that natural light doth not furnish “ Christians with any means of solving them, whether we follow the system of 1702.

 “ St Augustin, or whether we follow that of Molina, and of the Remonstrants, or “ whether we have recourse to that of the Socinians. Theodore Parrhale main“ tains the contrary, and pretends that an Origenist is able to stop the mouths of “ the Manicheans If a man of this sort (says he) can reduce a Manichean to “ silence, what might not they do, who would reason infinitely better than the disciples of “ Origen? We shall examin what he supposeth an Origenist might say, after having “ read all the objections of the Manicheans.” Mr Bayle reduceth the answer of the Origenist to these propositions: I. God has made us free to make way for virtue and vice, bame and praise, rewards and punishments. II. He damns no man simply for having sinned, but for not having repented of his sins. III. The physical and moral evils of mankind are of so short a duration in comparison of eternity, that we cannot conclude from thence that God is not a beneficent Being and a lover of virtue. It is in this last proposition, says Mr Bayle, that all the strength of the Origenist lies: the reason is because he supposeth that the torments of Hell will not be eternal, and that God after he has judged that creatures, endowed with liberty, have suffered enough, will afterwards make them happy to all eternity. The eternal happiness which will be bestowed on them according to the Origenist, fully answers the idea of the infinite mercy, though it should be preceded by even many ages of suffering; for many ages are nothing in comparison of an infinite duration, and there is infinitely less proportion between the time in which this world shall exist and eternity, than there is between a minute and a hundred millions of years.
 Therefore we have no reason to wonder that God looks upon the miseries which we suffer as almost nothing; he who alone has an adequate idea of eternity, and who looks upon the beginning and the end of our sufferings, as infinitely more near to one another than the beginning and the end of a minute. We ought to reason in the same manner concerning vice and vicious actions, which with respect to God do not continue a great while, and which in the main do not change any thing in the universe. If an artist should make a clock, which by being once wound up should go exactly during a whole year, excepting two or three seconds, which should not be equal when it is first set a going, could one say that this artist could not pretend to great skill or exactness in his work. In the same manner if God amends in one day for all eternity the disorders which the bad use of liberty has occasioned among men, can any body be surprized that he has not put a stop to them during the moment in which we shall exist upon this Earth.

Mr Bayle observes that a Manichean might answer,

I. That it is not consistent with ideal or infinitely perfect goodness, to bestow a gift of which we foresee the bad effects, without preventing them, though it is in our power: it is the essential and distinguishing property of ideal goodness, that it disposeth the being possessed of it to grant favours, which by the shortest, and most certain means which it can contrive, render the condition of the person who receives them happy. This ideal goodness essentially and necessarily excludes every thing which can agree to a malicious being; and it is certain that such a being would be very ready to bestow favours, the use of which he should know would prove fatal to the persons to whom he should grant them. Now if we consult this idea of goodness, we shall not find that God, an infinitely good principle, can postpone the happiness of his creatures to several ages of misery, nor bestow free will upon them by the use of which he was very certain they would procure their own damna-tion. But supposing that the infinite goodness of the Creator allowed him to bestow upon his creatures, a liberty of which they might as readily make a bad use as a good one, we must at least allow that it would engage him to watch over their conduct in such a manner, as not to suffer them actually to sin. As to the reason alledged by the Origenist, that it was necessary to bestow liberty upon the creature, in order to make way for virtue and vice, blame and praise, rewards and punishments; we might answer, that this reason instead of being an argument why an infinitely holy and infinitely good Being should give free-will to creatures, is, on the contrary, what ought to have hindered him from doing so. Vice and blame ought to have no place among the works of an infinitely holy cause, every thing there ought to be praise-worthy, virtue alone ought to appear here, and vice be entirely banished. And as every thing ought to be happy under the government of a supream Being infinitely good and infinitely powerful; punishments ought to have no place there. Virtue, praise, and benefits, may very well exist, though vice, blame, and punishments have no other existence than what they call ideal or objective.
 The Origenist owns that this will be the case when all creatures endowed with freedom of will shall enjoy an eternal happiness, which shall succeed to some ages of suffering. If he answers, that these blessings could not be a reward if creatures had not been endowed with liberty, it might be replied, that there is no proportion between eternal happiness and the good use that man makes of his free-will; and therefore the eternal happiness which God bestows on a good man cannot, properly speaking, be considered as a reward, it is a favour, it is a free gift. It ought not

1702. not therefore to be pretended, strictly speaking, that it was necessary to confer freedom upon men in order to their deserving the happiness of paradise, and obtaining it by way of reward.

II. Impenitence being nothing else but a bad use of our liberty, it comes all to the same thing, whether we say that God damns men only because they do not repent, or whether we say that he damns them simply because they have sinned. It is true that, generally speaking, it shows a merciful disposition to be willing to remit the punishment to those who are sorry for their faults: but when one promiseth pardon under condition of repentance to such as he very certainly knows will not repent, properly speaking he promiseth nothing, and in this case he is as fully resolved to punish them as if he had offered them no favour at all: if he had a mind in good earnest to exempt them punishment, he would hinder them from being impenitent, which is very easy for God to do who has an absolute power over our hearts.

III. The Origenists would not dare to determine the duration of these torments which precede this eternal happiness: for not only they are ignorant of it, but likewise they would be afraid of making them too short, lest they should be accused of loosing the reins to sinners; or of making them too long, lest they should not give a just idea of the mercy of God. They would not dare to make them, for example, either of a hundred or of a million of years. They do not therefore trust to the want of proportion between the duration of a million of ages, and an infinite duration; and we do not see that it solves the difficulty to say that there is infinitely less proportion between the duration of the earth and eternity, than there is between a minute and a hundred millions of years. What can be affirmed of these hundred millions of years, may likewise be affirmed of as many millions of ages, as there are drops of water in the ocean; since there is no proportion between finite and infinite. Yet in the mean while one cannot conceive that the punishment of a creature, which should be continued for a hundred millions of ages, is consistent with the sovereign goodness of the creator. This number of years, which is nothing in comparison of eternity, seems notwithstanding a very long duration considered in itself, and with regard to the person suffering. Now let us diminish this number as much as we will, we shall only thereby make a diminution of rigour, and we shall never arrive at the supreme goodness of God except by suppressing even the last minute of the pains of hell. We commend the skill of a Clockmaker when his clock fails only in two or three seconds in a year; but the exactness of an infinitely perfect artist excludes absolutely all exceptions. His goodness, his holiness, his wisdom, &c. are absolutely simple, and without the least mixture of the contrary qualities, without the least mixture which can be conceived, or which can be in the nature of things.

Mr Bayle observes that "though Origen could answer the objections of the Manicheans, it would not follow that therefore they could be much more easily answered upon better and more orthodox principles: for all the advantage that he can find in this dispute, proceeds from falsities which are peculiar to him, he giving on the one hand a great deal of power to free-will, and on the other hand substituting eternal happiness to eternal misery which he doth not admit." By supposing that eternal happiness will follow the torments which the damned shall endure for some ages, we take away the most embarrassing argument of the Manicheans; for their strongest argument is founded on the hypothesis, that all men, except a few, will be damned to all eternity; which is the doctrine of all the sects of Christians, excepting the Socinians.

In 1701 there was printed at Paris a book intitled Naudæana & Patiniana. Or Remarkable Particulars, taken from the conversations of Messieurs Naudé and Patin (1). In works of this kind, they make use of the name of some celebrated author, to introduce a great many historical and literary particulars, which have a relation to the time in which he lived, and which they sometimes even transcribe from his works. These Collections would not be contemptible, if one could depend upon the facts which are related in them; but they ordinarily fill them with an infinite number of things which are either false or uncertain, or which want many essential circumstances. To make them useful they should be attended with a Commentary both to correct them and to supply what is defective. This Mr  did with relation to the Naudæana. He both made Corrections and Additions of which he gives an account in a short preface. "All the world knows (says he) how greedily the Ana are at present received. But neither is any body ignorant, that the little exactness which one finds in them very much diminisheth the pleasure which the variety of matter and liberty of sentiments, inseparable from books of this nature, might give the readers. It is therefore to put people in mind of making them henceforth more useful, that I have undertaken to add a sort of Commentary to the pretended Naudæana. The only thing which I propose to do here is to fix the chronology of the facts mentioned in it, to add sometimes absolutely necessary circumstances, and lastly not to allow the Author to advance any thing, which is not supported by the testimony of some other person worthy of credit." Mr  tells us that he had a design of making likewise Additions and Corrections to the Patiniana, but that certain reasons had obliged him to confine himself to the Naudæana.

Father

(1) Naudæana & Patiniana. Ou singularitez remarquables, prises des Conversations de Messieurs Naudé & Patin.

(1) By Francis vander Plaats
1703.

Father de Vitry, sent the Additions to the Naudæana to Mr Bayle, and he published them at Amsterdam (1) with the Naudæana and Patimiana, under the title of a Second Edition revised, corrected, and enlarged, with Additions to the Naudæana which are not in the Paris edition. Mr Bayle added an Advertisement to it in the name of the Bookseller, wherein he says that this edition is incomparably preferable to that of Paris; that there were a great number of faults corrected in it, which disfigured the proper names so much that they were scarce to be known; that they had brought together all the passages which related to the same person, and which were dispersed all over the book in the Paris edition; and lastly, what was much more considerable, they had given very curious and very necessary supplements, from a manuscript sent them from Paris.

(2) Ré-
ponse aux Questions d'un Provincial. A Rotterdam chez Rei-
nier Leers 1704.

The second edition of the Critical Dictionary had fatigued Mr Bayle. To divert himself he composed a book intitled An Answer to the Questions of a Country Gentleman (2). He says in the Preface, that in composing it he had proposed to write a book of a middle kind betwixt those which employ our hours of study, and those which we read only for amusement. In consequence of this he goes lightly over certain matters which might have been treated in a more compleat manner, he passes quickly from one subject to another, in order to introduce the greater variety, and when it was necessary to enlarge upon some matters, he doth it in such a manner that every chapter shows them in a different light. He observes that he might have employed certain thoughts and facts which have an essential connection with the things which he has treated of, but that he abstained from doing so, to avoid repeating things which are commonly known. He doth not doubt but some readers will think that he has made too many quotations, but he shows that this is a groundless complaint. It is to go against the nature of things (says he) to pretend, that an Author in a work designed to prove and clear up facts, should only make use of his own thoughts, or that at least he ought to quote very seldom. Mr Bayle adds, "That this book is not written in the taste which has prevailed for some years past, and of which possibly the public begins already to be tired. It is not a collection of miscellaneous thoughts, or of maxims or characters, smart repartees or merry tales. What is it then? It would possibly (answers he) be pretty difficult to define it, and I leave it to every reader to do it for himself; I shall only observe that this work has some resemblance to those books which appeared in so great number in the XVth Century under the title of Diversæ Lethiones, or some other title to the same purpose."

(3) Letter
November 9, 1703,
p. 936.
See likewise the Letter to Mr Marais, August 4,
1704, p.
1001.

(4) Letter
February 8, 1704,
p. 951.

(5) Nouvelles Additions aux Elo-ges des Hommes
sçavans tirez de l'Histoire de Mr de Thou.
Tome
troisième.

This work contains an agreeable and instructive variety of historical, critical, and literary discussions. One finds there likewise some philosophical remarks and some political observations. As soon as this book appeared in Holland, one of my friends informed me that it was written by Mr Bayle. I desired to know of Mr Bayle if this was true, and he made me the following answer. "I do not wonder (said he) that you have been told that I am the Author of a new book intitled, An Answer to the Questions of a Country Gentleman. Every body here will have it that I have wrote it, and if I were ambitious I would contradict this report, for this work is not very proper to give a man a great reputation. It is a heap of little observations, which can only please those who do not even neglect literary curiosities, and do not, after the manner of the generality, look upon them as trifles (3)." Some time after this I desired him to inform me whether this book would have any continuation, and told him the opinion of some people about it. "I will not here repeat (answered he (4), what I think I told you very plainly, that I renounce all interest in the Answer to the Questions of a Country Gentleman. I know however that the Bookseller has no intention of publishing any other part to it. I mean that there is no fixed resolution or plan laid down in this matter, and there is nothing of that kind in the press. Those people are no doubt in the right who say that it doth not sufficiently interest the public, but they ought to consider that an Author cannot interest the public, except he discusses questions which concern the honour and glory of a whole people, or of a whole Religion, or at least if he doth not treat of some important doctrine of morality, or politics. All the other subjects with which men of letters fill their books, are useless to the public, and we ought to consider them as only frothy nourishment in themselves, but which notwithstanding satisfy the curiosity of many Readers according to the diversity of their taste. What is there, for example, less interesting to the public than the Bibliothèque choisie of the Sieur Colomies, which however is a work that has been looked upon as excellent in its kind, and which almost charms those who are fond of literary particularities? I could name many other books to you which are read, though they contain nothing that interests the public."

In 1704 Mr Teiffier published at Berlin, New Additions to the Elogies of learned Men. Extracted from Thuanus's History. Tom. III. (5). Mr Bayle had in his Dictionary criticised several passages in the two first volumes: Mr Teiffier in this volume agreed that some of Mr Bayle's remarks were well founded, and undertakes to defend the other passages which had been censured. But in the mean time expressed a great 1704. a great esteem and respect for Mr Bayle. "I am obliged to him, (says he (1), for "taking the trouble of reading this work, and pointing out to me the passages in "which I have been mistaken; the other Authors whom he has criticized ought "with me to express their gratitude, and acknowledge that he has done great "service to the Republic of Letters, by discovering their errors."

(1) Nouvelles Additions, &c. in the Advertissement.

Mr Teissier seemed even to be diffident of the justness of his answers. "I do not "know (says he) if I have well maintained my cause, for I have to do with a "formidable adversary, I mean with a Critic of vast erudition, exquisite judgment, "extreme exactness, and who has signalized himself by several victories which he "has obtained over the greatest Heroes of the Republic of Letters."

Mr Bayle answered Mr Teissier in a Memoir inserted in the History of the works of the Learned (2). He says that two reasons made him hasten the publication of this Memoir: the one to show Mr Teissier how sensible he was of his politeness, and the esteem he had for his work; and the other to prevent the consequences which might be drawn from Mr Teissier's answers. "It would (says he) be a very bad prejudice against my whole Dictionary, if among the Critical Observations which relate "to Mr Teissier's Additions, there were so many of them ill grounded as he pretends. "I therefore thought myself bound to discuss some of them, in order to put every "reader in a condition to judge of the dispute." He shows afterwards that Mr Teissier imputes to him things which he had not said; that he would make him accountable for what is advanced by the Authors he quotes; that he sometimes has expressed himself inaccurately, and given occasion to people to mistake his sense; and that if he in order to support his opinion has quoted Authors who in effect say the same thing that he has done, Mr Bayle has cited others to establish his side of the question, who are of greater weight and authority. He concludes with excusing the errors which Mr Teissier may have fallen into. "This (says he) is what I "have to offer in defence of my remarks. I leave it to by my readers to "judge, whether they are just or not; but I declare at the same time, that although they should decide in my favour, they will notwithstanding be obliged "to think Mr Teissier very excusable, since he has followed Authors who must "needs have appeared well informed about these matters. No body can be more "persuaded than I am that my small observations will do no prejudice to his work; "and no body is more interested than I am to banish from the Republic of "Letters, that false and pernicious maxim, that a book cannot be worthy of esteem "if it is not without errors. Matters do not go ill with some sorts of books, especially with Dictionaries, if there are but seven or eight things to be corrected in "every page taking one with another."

(2) May 1704, p. 200, and the following.

Mr Bayle likewise made use of Mr de Bauval's Journal to defend himself against the attacks of an anonymous writer (3), who had published a book at Paris intitled, The Distinction and Nature, Good and Evil: a Treatise wherein the error of the Manicheans, the sentiments of Montagne, Charron, and of Mr Bayle, &c. are censured (4). This piece had been highly commended in some books printed at Paris, and they had even said that Mr Bayle could not avoid answering it. Mr Bayle sent for it, and after having examined it found that it required no answer with respect to those who knew what he had said concerning the Manicheans, and that a short Memoir would be sufficient for those who did not know it. All that he had to do, was to show that this anonymous Author had entirely mistaken the state of the question, or at least had pretended to mistake it. In this Memoir (5) Mr Bayle observed that what this Author had said of his own, or had borrowed from St Augustin tended only to show. "I. That the system of two principles is false, absurd, and "evidently contrary to the ideas of the infinitely perfect Being. II. That this system "is particularly absurd, ridiculous, and abominable in the details, to which the Manicheans had descended." But these two propositions were no part of the matter in debate. Mr Bayle had expressly agreed to them, and consequently there was no occasion to prove them to him. He had only maintained that the hypothesis of two principles, how false and impious soever, yet attacks the other hypothesis with objections which natural light cannot solve. This was the only thing that this Author ought to have engaged with, and yet it is precisely what he had neglected to do. He had satisfied himself with acting offensively against the principles of the Manicheans, instead of standing upon the defensive, and repelling the attacks which the Manicheans might make against the most orthodox Christians. The business here was not to make thrusts, but to parry those which were made. In this manner Mr Bayle shows that this Author not having touched the Manichean objections, he did not think himself interested in the dispute, and that it was enough that he had informed the public why he did not answer him.

(3) This anonymous writer was a Cartesian of Paris, named Dom Alexis Gaudin. He was nephew to Abbé Gaudin, Canon of Notre Dame.

(4) La Distinction & la Nature du Bien & du Mal. Traité où l'on combat l'erreur des Manichéens, les sentimens de Montagne & de Charron, & ceux de Monsieur Bayle, &c. Printed at Paris in 1704, in 12°.

This anonymous author had pretended that it was easy to destroy the system of two principles by maintaining with St Augustin that evil is not a being but a simple privation: Mr Bayle owns that this being once proved would solidly refute the Manicheans in as far as they affirm that evil is a substance; but that a Manichean might easily get out of this difficulty, by showing that this is only a dispute about words, and a misunderstanding betwixt St Augustin and his adversaries.

(5) History of the Works of the Learned, Augustin, 1704, p. 369, and the following.

faries. He concludes by telling this anonymous Author, that if he thinks it proper to treat this dispute in a regular manner, he must begin anew, since he is not one jot further advanced in it than he was when he first sat down to write: but that if he has nothing to advance but what he finds in St Augustin he had better be silent. "These arguments (adds he) are able without doubt to set the absurdities of the Manichean sect in a very strong light, but this is not the affair in hand; the question here is only how to defend, and not at all how to attack; nay it would not be sufficient to confound the impieties of the Manicheans by objections; one must enter into a dispute wherein we might get the better of adversaries who would not give such advantages as they did with whom St Augustin had to do; we ought to imagine ourselves to be engaged with Sceptics, who being disgusted with the hypothesis of the two principles, reject it, and yet will not embrace the other 'till we have freed it from the difficulties with which it is encumbered. In a word, we must show by the light of nature that there is a close connection betwixt the crimes and miseries of mankind, and the ideas of an infinitely holy, infinitely powerful, and infinitely free being." The anonymous Author having no mind to engage in such a ticklish discussion, chose to be silent.

Mr Bayle at last fulfilled the promise which he had so often made of publishing a defence of his Thoughts concerning Comets. He began it in the month of November 1703, and resolved not to give over 'till he had finished it (1). The impression of it was begun in the month following (2), and the book appeared in the month of August 1704, under this title: A Continuation of the Various Thoughts written to a Doctor of the Sorbonne, on occasion of a Comet which appeared in the month of December 1680. Or, *An Answer to several difficulties proposed to the Author by Monsieur * (3). In the Advertisement Mr Bayle, says that though he had promised this work several times for ten years past, he had not made great haste to publish it, for several reasons which he relates: "So that when he all at once

"took the resolution of composing it, he had found nothing prepared for that purpose, and was obliged to awaken, or call very far back, his thoughts on this subject, so that the materials were brought together and made use of at the same time. There was only one thing in the Various Thoughts (adds he) which determined me to write an apology, to wit, the parallel betwixt Atheism and Paganism; but being thus obliged to take up the pen in my own justification, I thought myself bound to satisfy several difficulties which had been proposed to me concerning other parts of the work, and I persuaded myself that it was necessary to observe the same order in my answers which they had done in their objections, in which they had followed the order of my chapters. I have followed this method to the end of the first volume, but I was obliged to lay it aside in the second, to prevent engaging myself in a labour much larger than I had proposed. I have therefore inserted nothing in the second volume but what regarded the parallel of Paganism and Atheism, and notwithstanding I have not been able to go through that subject. There are some objections still left undiscussed on this subject which I have reserved for a third volume (4)."

Mr Bayle next makes a remark which he thought very essential. "I beg of the reader (says he) carefully to remember that this long dispute, wherein I have maintained that Paganism is at least as bad as Atheism, is a question entirely indifferent to the true Religion. The interests of Christianity are so separated from those of Pagan Idolatry, that it can neither lose nor gain by Idolatry being thought either as bad or worse than no Religion. This dispute therefore is of the nature of those problems, wherein one may indifferently choose which side he pleaseth, and orthodoxy not be concerned in the matter. It has been always left to peoples choice to maintain that Arianism is worse than Sabellianism, or that it is not; that the Nestorian heresy is more or less pernicious than the Eutychian, and so of several other questions, wherein they who are mistaken cannot be accused of doing the least hurt to the faith, provided they adhere to the decisions of the ancient Councils &c." He in the next place obviates some objections, and makes some remarks to clear up this subject. We have seen that he had promised to answer at length in this work a piece of Mr Jurieu called the Short Review: he gives us here the reasons why he has not done so. "When I published (says he) in 1694 an addition to my Various Thoughts, to answer in a few words a pamphlet intitled the Short Review &c, I promised a full refutation of it, yet notwithstanding I have taken no notice of it in this work, for I find that my preliminary answer has been more than sufficient."

The principal objections discussed in the first volume of this Continuation of the Thoughts concerning Comets, relate to the following six questions. I. Whether the consent of all nations, in acknowledging a Deity, be a certain and demonstrative proof of the existence of a God. II. Whether there be any certainty in Astrology. III. If the Pagan Religion taught the practice of virtue, or of good morals. IV. If all things were made for man. V. If Historians ought to relate things incredible and superstitious. VI. If the Polytheism of the Pagans has been exaggerated. The

(1) Letter to Mr Des Maillezeaux, November 9, 1703, pag. 936.

(2) See Letter to Mr Minutoli December 16, 1703. p. 940.

(3) Continuation des Pensées diverses, écrites à un Docteur de Sorbonne à l'occasion de la Comète qui parut au mois de Decembre 1680. Ou Réponse à plusieurs difficultés que Monsieur  a proposées à l'Auteur. A Rotterdam chez Reinier Leers, 1705, 2 Vols in 12°.

(4) Mr Bayle never wrote this third volume.

1704. second volume is employed in showing that he had reason in his Thoughts concerning Comets to say, That Ateijm is not a greater evil than Idolatry. Mr Bayle points out the writers whom he had already alledged in that work, and cites several others, among which are Fathers of the Church, and Catholic and Protestant Doctors, who have affirmed that there are things as bad or worse than Atheism, or who have even declared that Idolatry is worse than Atheism, and who have notwithstanding never been exposed to ecclesiastic censures upon that account. From hence he concludes that he was intitled to maintain the same opinion, and that if many writers have been of a contrary sentiment, this only proves that the question in debate is of a problematical nature, and left to every body's discretion, and concerning which every body is at liberty to choose either side without prejudice to orthodoxy.

He likewise here examines the question (1), Whether a society entirely composed of true Christians, and surrounded by other nations either of Infidels, or of worldly minded Christians, such as all the nations where Christianity prevails are at present, and have been for a long while, would be able to preserve itself, and declares himself for the negative. Upon this occasion he acquaints us with the notion which a learned man had formed to himself of Christianity. "I was acquainted (says he (2)), with a learned man, who fancied that Jesus Christ had not proposed his Religion as a thing which could suit with all sorts of persons, but only with a small number of the wise. He founded his notion upon this, that a whole nation which should practise exactly all the rules of Christianity, would not be able to preserve itself against the invasions of its neighbours. Now it could not be the intention of God, that an entire society should be deprived of all the human means of preserving itself independant of other people. This man would therefore persuade me, that as the Stoic Philosophy which was impracticable for a whole society was designed only for exalted minds, so the Gospel in like manner was only appointed for Ascetics, for chosen persons capable of abstracting themselves from the world, and of devoting themselves, in case of necessity, to the solitude of the most frightful deserts. In a word (said he), we ought to consider the Gospel only as a model of the utmost perfection, proposed to those to whom nature strengthened by Grace should give a relish for the most refined spirituality. Thus St Benedict, St Dominic, St Francis of Assise, and other founders of orders, have laid down rules and observances, not for all mankind, but for interior and spiritual Christians the number of which is very small. I answered this learned friend that he was evidently mistaken, since it is plain by reading the Evangelists and Apostles that the law of JESUS CHRIST is proposed to all sorts of people, of what sex and condition soever, not as a choice which they are left at liberty to make or not, but as the only means of avoiding eternal damnation."

This book engaged Mr Bayle in some disputes. He had cursorily criticised the system of Dr Cudworth and Dr Grew concerning plastic and vital natures. These Gentlemen suppose that these are immaterial substances, endowed with a power of forming plants and animals, without knowing what they do. Mr Bayle observed (3), that thereby these Gentlemen, without thinking of it and contrary to their intentions, had weakened the most sensible argument we have for the Being of God taken from the admirable structure of the universe, and gave an opportunity to the Stratonicians to elude it by retortion. For if God could give to a plastic nature the faculty of producing the organization of animals, without its having the idea of what it doth; they will conclude from hence that the formation of the regularity which we observe in the world, is not inconsistent with want of knowledge, and so the world may be the effect of a blind cause.

Mr le Clerc had adopted this hypothesis, and thought himself obliged to defend it (4). He was offended that Mr Bayle had said that it gave ground to elude by way of retortion one of the arguments which most embarrasseth the Atheists. He complained that this remark would raise very disadvantageous notions of the Religion and of the abilities of Dr Cudworth and Dr Grew, and that he found himself interested in this matter. He says that if Mr Bayle had sufficiently understood their opinion, he would have seen that it gives no handle to Atheists, because the plastic and vital natures which they maintain, are only instruments in the hand of God, that they have no power but what God has given them, that God governs their actions, that they are instrumental causes, produced and employed by the principal; and that we cannot say that a building was made without art, because not only the hammers, the rules, the squares, the compasses, the axes, the saws, but even the hands of men which made use of these utensils, are things destitute of intelligence: it is sufficient that the mind of the Architect has conducted all these, and employed them to accomplish his designs. It is evident then, adds he, that Atheists, who deny the existence of the intelligent cause which has guided and regulated the formation of all things, cannot retort the argument which these two Philosophers have opposed to them.

Mr Bayle answered (5), that he had not the least intention of doing prejudice either to the orthodoxy or the learning of these Gentlemen, and that he had even taken

(1) Continuation of the Various Thoughts &c. T. m. ii. pag. 598.

(2) Ibid. pag. 602, 603.

(3) Ibid. Tom. i. p. 90, 91.

(4) Bibliothèque choise, Tom. v. Art. iv. pag. 283, and the following.

(5) History of the Works of the Learned, Art. 1704, Art. vii. pag. 580, and the following.

care to prevent any such thought. He adds, that the defect he had found in their hypothesis, was not peculiar to them: that almost all the Philosophers, both ancient and modern were in the same case. He shows that if these Gentlemen had considered their plastic natures as simple instruments in the hand of God, they would have fallen into all the inconveniences of the Cartesian hypothesis which they designed to avoid; so that it must be supposed that they believed them to be active principles, which do not require being pushed on and directed without interruption, but that it is sufficient, that God set them in their proper places, and watch over their conduct, in order to set them right when it is necessary. Now this being granted, he maintains, that there is room for a retortion. For when we bring the order and symmetry of the world as a proof of the existence of God, we suppose that in order to produce any regular work, the agent must have an idea of it: while according to Dr Cudworth the plastic natures which produce plants and animals have no idea of what they do. If it be answered, that they were created by a Being who knows all things, and that they only execute his idea's, the Stratonician will reply that if they execute them in quality of efficient causes, this is as incomprehensible as the thing objected against, since it is as difficult to execute a plan which we do not know, but which another knows, as it is to follow a plan which is known by no body. Since you allow, will the Stratonician say, that God can give to creatures a faculty of producing excellent works without the least knowledge; you ought likewise to own, that there is no necessary connexion between the faculty of producing excellent works, and the idea of their essence, and of the manner of their production; and consequently you ought not to pretend that these two things cannot be separated in nature, and that nature may not have of itself, what these plastic beings have, according to you, by the gift of God. To abridge this dispute Mr Bayle reduced it to this question of fact: Have these Gentlemen taught that plastic and vital natures are only passive instruments in the hand of God? Mr le Clerc (says he) seems to affirm it, by his example of an Architect who erects a very regular building, though all the tools of which he makes use be void of understanding. It is evident, added Mr Bayle, that with regard to the Architect, all his tools, and even his hands, are merely passive instruments, which only move in as far as he pusheth them. If the plastic and vital natures be in the same case, I confess there is no retortion to be feared, but on the other hand God alone in this case will be the next and immediate cause of all generation; which would be to admit the Cartesian doctrine, which they meant to reject.

(1) Bibliothèque de la ville de Paris. Tom. vii. Art. vii. pag. 422, and the following. Mr le Clerc replied (1) that Dr Cudworth did not look upon the plastic natures to be passive instruments; that they are under the direction of God, who conducts them, though we do not know in what manner; that though they act regularly, yet it is under the direction of God, who intervenes as he thinks fit, and when he thinks fit; that the sole difference which is between their action and the faculty of beasts, who do several things in a regular manner when men conduct them, tho' they do not know what they do, is, that we do not know how God intervenes, and that we see how men act. But however this be, adds he, the Atheists cannot retort Dr Cudworth's argument against him, because God is Author of the order in which the plastic nature operates; and that according to the Atheists notions, matter moves of itself without any cause which regulates it, or which has given it a power of moving regularly. If any body should say that it has it of itself, that would not be to retort the argument, this would be to make a supposition, which it would be easy to overturn.

(2) History of the Works of the Learned, Dr Cudworth, 1704, Art. xii. pag. 540, and the following. Mr Bayle again replied (2), and began with stating the question anew. He said that the retortion was founded on this, that, if we suppose that there are beings which have the faculty of organizing animals without knowing what they do, we cannot refuse those who say that the world may have been produced without the operation of an intelligent cause. It would be to no purpose to answer to them, that these beings have received this faculty from an intelligent cause: for by making this answer we would still own the compatibility of the power to organize matter with want of understanding, and consequently would confuse ourselves. Mr Bayle next examines Mr le Clerc's Reply. He owns that a creature without, understanding may under the direction of God do certain things as regularly as a cause endowed with understanding; but that in that case this creature would be only a passive instrument in the hand of God. And so the plastic natures of Dr Cudworth cannot be the efficient cause of organization, but at most the instrument. They are no more capable of discernment in the first moment of conception, than in all the other moments which follow until the organization is completed; it is necessary therefore that God apply and direct them without interruption from the beginning to the end: from whence it necessarily follows, that they are only passive instruments in his hands, and so Dr Cudworth cannot avoid the retortion, except by supposing what the Cartesians suppose. The example of beasts, adds he, confirms the difficulty; for if we consider all the services which we draw from them, we shall find that in all things wherein their knowledge doth not serve them for a guide, they must be pushed or directed as if they were pure machines.

1704.

Mr le Clerc had said, that Madam Masham, Dr Cudworth's daughter, had wrote him a letter, wherein she complained with reason of Mr Bayle's proceeding with regard to her father; and that she had allowed him to print it, but that he did not think it proper to do so; because possibly Mr Bayle might change his opinion when he had better understood Dr Cudworth's system. Madam Masham had been prejudiced against Mr Bayle: but he appealed to what he had at first answered to Mr le Clerc, and added that if this Lady, who was very learned, would be pleased to examin the matter, she would find that she had been misinformed. And in fact when she had seen Mr Bayle's explanations, she desired Mr le Clerc to suppress the Letter which she had wrote to him (1).

Mr le Clerc still maintained that Dr Cudworth gave no room for retortion. He said (2), that the conception of a design, such as that of forming animals, is incompatible with a want of knowledge in the first cause; but that it is not so as to the second causes, which act under the direction of this first cause: that it is not necessary that God should direct and push them continually as we do passive instruments, and “(3) that he had proved this by the use which men make of beasts; “whose organs they do not move, which act notwithstanding in a regular manner, “in order to produce a certain effect, which they are entirely ignorant of. They “are not pushed, as Mr Bayle says, in the same manner as if they were pure “machines, since they move their own members. For example, can one say that “a dog, who being placed in a sort of wheel turns it about by going in it, and by “this mean turns a spit and what is tied to it, is employed in the same manner “as a jack? the jack is set a going merely by weights, but we do not give motion to the limbs of the dog; it is he himself who moves them, and though “we should put in his place any sort of machine it would never produce the same “effect. I own, adds he, that I cannot tell in what manner God applies himself to “matter and directs the immaterial forming natures, without being author of all their “actions; but we cannot reject this opinion as absurd, after the direct proofs which “have been brought of it. Otherwise we must reject every thing of which we have “not complete or adequate ideas, which would be to fall into a ridiculous Pyrrhonism.” As to what Mr Bayle had said that he preferred the system of occasional causes to all others, because it seemed to him to be the most proper to establish the being of God; Mr le Clerc declared that he would not engage in any dispute on that subject. “I only thought (said he (4), that after having proposed Dr Cudworth's opinion as probable, I was obliged to show that Mr Bayle was in the “wrong to say that it made way for the Atheists to destroy, by a retortion, the “strongest argument which can be produced against them, and which is drawn “from the order of the universe. After having done this, I have no more to add “upon this subject. I will not enter into personal matters, nor penetrate into “designs, which cannot be discovered, without vexing those who might be suspected “of them.”

Mr Bayle recapitulated this dispute, and examined it more thoroughly (5). He observed that Dr Cudworth's hypothesis, to wit, that God has the idea of the organization of animals, doth not in the least lessen the incomprehensibility and impossibility of his supposition that the true efficient and immediate cause of organization knows nothing at all; and that the Stratonicians may make use of the second hypothesis in order to contest the other: that they will show him that these two things appear equally impossible, the one that the inventors of a machine know nothing, the other that they should cause it to be executed by persons who have no idea of it. Mr Bayle adds, that the example of a dog who is the cause of a spit's turning about, was out of the case which he had proposed: for he had not said, that we are obliged to push and direct beasts in the services which we receive from them, but only that in all cases in which their knowledge doth not serve them instead of a guide, we must push them or direct them, as if they were pure machines. “(6) A dog placed in a sort of wheel is not ignorant that he must walk, “and that he will be beaten if he stops; is not he threatened and even beat every “time he interrupts his action? He is not therefore without a certain kind of knowledge which serves to direct him, he sees the objects which are round about him, “he is afraid, and he acts by this fear, or by some other passion upon his locomotive faculty; and in the situation in which he is placed he cannot move himself, without at the same time moving the wheel round its center, and by that “means turning the spit. It is not therefore necessary to push him or make him move his legs, it is sufficient to excite some sentiment or passion in him which “may make him move. Let us observe, continued Mr Bayle, that the motion “which he gives to himself is continually under the direction of another cause. It “is not a motion which makes him go from place to place. The dog continues “still in the same place although he never ceaseth to move. From whence proceeds “this? It is because his motion is continually determined by the disposition of the “wheel to be such as it is. Here therefore is an example which proves that “in all cases wherein the knowledge of beasts doth not serve them for a guide, “we must either push or direct them, if we want to make them serve for

(1) See Letters to Mr Caste of the 30th of April, and the 3d of July, 1705, p. 1017, and the following.

(2) Bibliothèque chérie, Tom. vii. Art. ciii. pag. 281, and the following.

(3) Ibid. pag. 280, 287.

(4) Ibid. pag. 238.

(5) An Answer to the Questions of a Court y Gentleman, Tom. iii. chap. cxxxix, and the following.

(6) Ibid. chap. cxxxix. p. 1279, 1280.

"any purpose. All muletiers and coachmen will confirm this. A coachman may be at rest when his horses know the way, or content himself with taking notice when they do not do their duty; but when they are ignorant that they must change their road, he is obliged to be active in order to give them the necessary direction." Mr Bayle added, that as to the direct proofs which had been brought of the existence of plastic natures, he did not believe them to be so strong that one must either be a Sceptic, or embrace that opinion; but that he would not enter upon that enquiry.

(1) Ibid.
chap.
clxxxii.
pag. 1286,
1287.

The conclusion of Mr le Clerc's last Reply gave Mr Bayle occasion to say (1), that Mr le Clerc "had not sufficiently reflected upon a thing which may be easily known, to wit, that the same zeal which inclines one man to maintain that a reason has a great deal of solidity for the existence of God, may incline another man to maintain that it is weak and dangerous. These two men may have the same intention, they differ only in their judgment about the quality of an argument. They ought both therefore, said Mr Bayle, to abstain from all suspicious expressions, to abstain, I say, not by saying that they will abstain from them, for this doth not fail to strike home, but by a perfect silence. Equity ought immediately to present itself to their mind, and hinder them from saying any thing which may be agreeable to the malice of their readers. The warmest defenders of orthodoxy have always preserved to themselves the liberty of examining the arguments for the existence of God, and for any other article of faith, and of rejecting such as they thought weak." He shows that in the Church of Rome they acknowledge a difference betwixt contesting a doctrine, and contesting some of the reasons brought to prove it; and that this liberty is still greater among Protestants. "But be it as it will, continued he (2), you will easily observe that the dispute about Dr Cudworth's plastic natures doth not interest Religion. It is an hypothesis lately invented which has very few followers. Whether it doth or doth not furnish the Atheists with a pretence to chicane, is of small importance. This doth not in the least hurt the many victorious arguments, which this learned Englishman has made use of and illustrated in a wonderful manner against Atheism. The system of the Peripatetics has been in the same case with these plastic natures during many ages and is so still: so that the dispute of which I am speaking only concerns two private persons, is only a question of Logic, and of Natural Philosophy. All the question is whether Mr Bayle has reason to say that a certain retortion can be made, or if Mr le Clerc has reason to maintain the contrary, and has not given occasion to his readers to discover the embarrassing consequences and defects of his plastic natures."

(3) *Bibliothèque
choisie,*
Tom. ix.
Art. x.
pag. 361,
362.

Mr le Clerc took this matter very differently. "When Mr Bayle (said he (3), accused Dr Cudworth of giving a handle to the Atheists to retort some of the arguments which are brought against them; I at first believed that it was because he did not sufficiently understand Dr Cudworth's system, for in fact he did not understand it . . . but as I have seen that he would receive no explanation upon that subject, after I had explained it to him thrice, I no longer doubted that he said this with a design to excuse the Atheists, as he doth in his Thoughts concerning Comets, and in the Continuation. . . . Being vexed, as it seems, to see Dr Cudworth triumph over the Atheists in a very glorious and advantageous manner for Christianity, and not daring to deny this, he thought it was necessary at any rate to blacken that great man's manner of philosophizing, by accusing him of furnishing arms to those who deny the being of a God." Mr le Clerc afterwards says that all the difficulty is now reduced to this one proposition: "Whether there can exist an immaterial self-acting nature, which forms in miniature, by a faculty which it has received from God, machines such as the bodies of plants and animals are, without having an idea of them." He maintained that this is possible, still supposing that the creator of this nature has in himself perfectly clear ideas of what it doth; without which it would be impossible for a blind nature to act with order. But that it doth not follow from hence, that this nature is a merely passive instrument in the hand of God, because according to the supposition it is a self-acting nature. He alledged the example of beasts, which men employ as active instruments to draw loaded carriages, and to turn millstones in a certain order; without knowing either what they do, or why they do it, or whether they observe any order or no. He related likewise the principal actions of birds, and said that how admirable soever those actions are, yet they were performed without knowledge; since otherwise we should be obliged to conclude that these animals have a great deal more wit, and reason infinitely better than man, which would be very absurd. He owned that he had not a clear idea of these plastic natures, that he did not know how God applies them to matter, nor how he directs them without being author of their actions: but that he had a very clear idea of an active instrument which is Author of its own actions, and yet doth not know what it doth, because he saw that beasts were in many respects instruments of this nature, and that this was the subject in question. He added, that we ought not, as Mr Bayle did, to take out one proposition from Dr Cudworth's system, as if he had advanced only that, and give it up to the Atheists to be retorted: that 1704. that Dr Cudworth had not maintained in general, that what has no idea of order can act with order; but that an infinitely powerful Being who has an idea of order may create other Beings which have it not, and who notwithstanding observe it; because he may give them a certain activity which they can only exercise in the manner which he thinks fit, and apply them to matter upon which they act of themselves, although we do not know how. After having thus explained Dr Cudworth's opinion, he says that he will not "stay here to retute particularly all Mr Bayle's "limities, which are not at all just, which make us forget the state of the question, "and which turn only upon confused ideas which he perplexeth with a design to "favour the Atheists. Neither will I take up time (adds he) in exposing his weak "reasonings, to shew that he has not understood me, and has not sufficiently "taken notice with what view I have spoken. This would be to tire the reader, "and one could not avoid troublesome repetitions and fatiguing discussions of "trifles."

Mr Bayle considered his last Answer as the end of this dispute, and contented himself with making some reflexions on Mr le Clerc's reply. "We may hence-

"forth (says he (1)), look upon the plastic natures of Dr Cudworth as at an end. "Not that Mr le Clerc doth not still make a great noise about it, but he only para- phraseth what he has already said, and leaves my replies in their full force. It is "not necessary therefore to support them by any new remark; it will be sufficient to "desire the readers to compare them with his last piece." He observes that Mr Leib- niz had acknowledged the justness of the retortion of the Stratonicians. "But let "us not talk any more of retortion, adds he; Mr le Clerc obviates this sufficiently "by the necessity which he supposeth there is, that God should intervene in the "work of these plastic natures. It has been proved to him, that an interrup- ted direction would not be sufficient, from whence it follows that God directs them "without intermission, which shows that they can only be reckoned an instrumental "cause. Now in this case there is no ground for further dispute; for Mr Bayle al- ways laid down this alternative, that either the retortion of the Stratonician must "take place, or the plastic natures are not the true efficient cause of the organization of "the fetus. The consequence which ought to be drawn from Mr le Clerc's answer "is, that they are only an instrument in the hand of God, whether he directs them "immediately, or whether he place them like a spring in a machine, the form of "which is the permanent cause of the direction of all the pieces, or whether "he makes use of some other determination equivalent to this. Let no body "object that they are endowed with activity, for this doth not hinder them from being "a mere instrument." He says, that he had shown that Mr le Clerc could receive no advantage from the example of beasts, and that to suppose, as he did, that birds perform many things with a wonderful regularity, tho' they are neither directed by their own knowledge, nor by the laws of mechanism; is to bring back the occult qualities of the Schoolmen. "It would be (adds he (2)), a sort of inhumanity to push "Mr le Clerc any farther: he himself owns that he is embarrassed, which is a sign "that he is reduced to the last extremity. He is therefore sufficiently punished, "especially if we consider, that being infatuated with his plastic natures, he has ex- posed himself to the ridicule of all the modern Philosophers. They cannot com- prehend how a man who has shown a good taste in other things, should chuse ra- ther to fall into the most absurd galimatias, than to part with his conceit." He says that he was persuaded, that if Dr Cudworth had foreseen the consequences of his System, he would have reformed it; and that if he had been alive when Mr le Clerc's first Answer was published, he would have been very much surprized to see his honour interested where there was so little occasion for it: that Mr Bayle's observa- tion concerned Thomas Aquinas, Scotus, and such superior genius's, as well as Dr Cudworth and Dr Grew: that the last named gentleman gave himself no trouble about it, although Mr le Clerc had in a manner provoked him to it. "Dr "Cudworth (says he (3)), would have been no less indifferent about an objection "in which he was no more concerned than almost all mankind, and would have "no doubt suspected that this was only made a pretext to serve for the begin- ning of a quarrel. He would have imagined that there was a snake in the grass, "some old leaven, some abscess which had been forming itself a great while, "and which must needs break at last." Mr Bayle adds that knowing how touchy Mr le Clerc was, he had treated him with the utmost tenderness, and had ab- stained from reproaching him with not understanding Dr Cudworth's System: that Mr le Clerc to cloak his inability to answer his arguments had treated them as trifling: in a word that the victory obtained over him on the subject of the plastic natures had so confounded him, that he was beside himself whenever he returned to that subject, and that he had loosed the reins to calumny; "like parish Priests "who cry out Heretic, if any of their parishioners though agreeing in the main "to the truth of their doctrine, do not agree about the force of the reasons they "make use of to prove it."

Thus ended the controversy which Mr Bayle had with Mr le Clerc concerning the plastic natures of Dr Cudworth.

(1) Answer for Mr Bayle
to Mr le Clerc concerning the 3d and 10th Articles in the 9th Tome of the Bibliothéque choisie,
pag. 31.

(2) Ibid.
pag. 34.

(3) Ibid.
p. 35; 36.

About the end of the year 1705, Mr Bayle published at the same time the second and third volumes of his Answer to the Questions of a Country Gentleman. In the Preface to the second volume he observed that there is this difference betwixt these volumes and the first, that the first contained a great variety of literary and historical particulars, and few matters of reasoning, and these on the contrary contained a great deal of reasoning, and little variety of literary and historical articles. "I have not heard (adds he) that any body complained that there was too much reasoning in the first part, and many have been heard to complain that there was not enough of it there, I have therefore thought it proper to change the proportions, by allowing the greatest share in the continuation of this work to what was only an accessory in the first volume." The plan of this book furnished him with a natural occasion of introducing all sorts of subjects: he took this opportunity of examining some pieces which had been lately published, wherein he found himself interested.

Dr King, Bishop of Londonderry, and afterwards Archbishop of Dublin, had published a treatise concerning the Origin of Evil (1): Mr Bayle examined his principles, but not having the book, and considering that it would have been difficult to find it in Holland, he confined himself to some general observations upon the long extracts which Mr Bernard had given of it in his News from the Republic of Letters (2). Dr King had composed this work in order to solve the difficulties which the Manicheans raise in Mr Bayle's Dictionary on the subject of physical and moral evil. Experience teacheth us that man is not only subject to diseases, pains, troubles, and sundry other miseries, but he is likewise liable to commit an infinite number of crimes. The question is how to reconcile these facts with the common notions of the sovereign goodness and sovereign wisdom of the infinitely perfect Being. Dr King had a great deal of penetration, and a very nice judgment. His penetration made him comprehend the whole extent and consequences of the difficulty; he made use of new principles to solve it. He maintains that God's end in creating the universe, was not to procure to himself glory, as the generality of Divines affirm, but to exercise his power, and communicate his goodness: that it is not true that the earth was made for man, that it is the ignorance or pride of man which inspires him with this chimerical imagination; that the quantity of happiness in the world is greater than the misery to be found there, an evident proof of which we have in the horror which all men have at death, and their violent desire for life, even when they are overwhelmed with the miseries, of which they most bitterly complain; that man being created of matter, becomes necessarily subject to diseases, grief &c; but that pain and passions are useful for the preservation of the body, since they warn it of what might destroy it; that the evils are so connected with the good that they are inseparable; that these are inconveniencies which are necessary consequences of the laws of nature; that physical evil is as necessary in the universal System of Beings, as the equality of the diameters is essential to a circle; and that these necessary evils do not at all interest the goodness of God.

(1) De origine mali.
Authore
Gulielmo
King,
S. T. D.
Episcopo Dereni.
Dublinii, 1702, in 8^o It was reprinted at London
the same year.

(2) Months of May and June
1703.

But the great difficulty regards moral evil, that is, the bad choices of man, the bad determination of his will, and in a word, all that is called vice. In order to solve it, Dr King has recourse to the ordinary solution, to wit, free-will; but he gives a notion of it very different from that of other Divines. He makes it to consist in the power of choosing, independently of the other faculties of a free agent, and of the quality of objects; so that this power is not determined by the goodness of objects, but the objects are rendered good and agreeable by its choice and determination. This perfect independence is the source of mens happiness, since it makes him master of his determinations, and disposer of his fate. Consequently God would have disturbed the happiness of the first man in its source, if he had not left him at liberty to chuse what he should please. It was necessary therefore that man should be capable of making a bad choice, and falling into sin. God could only hinder the bad use of liberty in the three following manners. I. By not creating any Being endowed with liberty. II. By making use of his almighty power to prevent free agents from abusing their liberty. III. By carrying man to another habitation, where he should find no occasion which could incline him to make a bad choice. But if none of these three be practicable, we must conclude, that the permission of sin is not blameable. Now 1. If God had created no Beings endowed with liberty, the world must have been a pure machine, incapable of any action; for matter is moved, but doth not move itself. Besides, God has created the world to exercise his virtues, and to please himself in his work. Now the more a creature is like to him, and the more self-sufficient it is, the more agreeable it must needs be to him. But we cannot make any doubt that a creature which moves of itself, which is pleased in itself, which is capable of receiving and acknowledging a favour, is more excellent, and must please him who made it, more than one which is not capable of acting, feeling, and of acknowledging a favour. 2. If God should interpose his almighty power, to prevent the bad use of liberty, greater inconveniencies would arise from thence, than from the abuse itself which we can make 1705. of this liberty. It requires no less power to hinder the exercise of liberty, than to stop the course of the sun, and besides it would be necessary, that God should entirely change his manner of acting with free agents, which is to keep them in their duty by the motives of rewards and punishments. It would deprive us of what is most agreeable to us in our determinations, which is to be persuaded that we had it in our power not to determine ourselves. It were to deprive God of the exercise of one of his most excellent virtues, to desire that he should interpose his power in order to hinder all the evil determinations of the will, in which his wisdom is exercised in the most excellent manner, and in which it shines with a particular lustre. III. As to the third manner of hindering the bad use of liberty, this were to desire that God should entirely destroy human nature, which was created to dwell upon the earth and no where else. It is true that good men shall be afterwards carried to another place, where they shall continue to all eternity, but that is only after they have been prepared upon earth, like wild stocks in a nursery before they are transplanted in order to bear fruit elsewhere.

Thus Dr King answered the objections founded upon physical and moral evil. As he supposeth that his adversaries do not admit a Revelation, he makes use only of principles drawn from natural reason. Mr Bayle did not think that his system took away the difficulties, and refuted it by several arguments which he lays down with great accuracy and force.

Mr Bernard furnished Mr Bayle with another article of great importance. He gave a critical Extract of the Continuation of the Thoughts concerning Comets (1), and attacked Mr Bayle upon the question whether the general consent of nations be a proof of the existence of God, upon the parallel of Atheism and Paganism, and upon the question whether a society entirely composed of true Christians, surrounded with other nations either of Infidels or worldly Christians, could be able to maintain itself. Every body was surprized that Mr Bernard who had always lived upon a footing of friendship with Mr Bayle, should affect to enter into a controversy with him; and it was thought that being suspected of Arminianism, he wanted by this means to ingratiate himself with the Orthodox. However he used Mr Bayle with great respect. "As I am persuaded (said he (2), that Mr Bayle searcheth after truth sincerely, I am sure without having consulted him, that he will not be displeased that I propose some difficulties to him in this Extract, as they shall offer themselves to my mind, not forgetting in the mean while the rules of good manners, and the esteem, and respect, which I have for his person and merit." Mr Bayle in the second volume of his Answer to the Questions of a Country Gentleman, answered at large Mr Bernard's objections concerning the general consent of nations. In the third volume, he examined what related to himself in a book of Mr Jaquelot's intitled, The Conformity of Faith with Reason, in answer to the principal difficulties dispersed in Mr Bayle's historical and critical Dictionary (3). Mr Jaquelot had left the Hague in order to go to Berlin, where he was Chaplain to the King of Prussia. He then declared himself openly for Arminianism; which he durst not have done in Holland, while under the authority of the Walloon Synods. In 1697 he had published a large volume intitled, A Dissertation concerning the Existence of God, wherein that truth is demonstrated, by the universal history of the most ancient times; by a refutation of the System of Epicurus and Spinoza; by the characters of Divinity which are observable in the Jewish Religion, and in the establishment of Christianity: Containing likewise convincing proofs of the Revelation of the sacred writings (4). Mr Bayle in quoting this book in his Dictionary (5), made use of an expression which infinitely displeased Mr Jaquelot. " (6) He lost all patience when he observed that Mr Bayle in quoting his Dissertation concerning the Existence of God, had only given it the title of a fine Book. He made loud complaints of this, and spread them abroad every where. It is true indeed that he durst not own that they were grounded on Mr Bayle's having made use of the positive fine instead of the superlative very fine, or of some sublime epithet. He pretended that he had used the term fine ironically. As soon as Mr Bayle was informed of this he sent a common friend, to protest to him that he had made use of that epithet in its natural signification, and it is certain that he employed it in speaking of another book concerning which no body will suspect that he would pretend to speak ironically (7). Several people from that time foretold that Mr Jaquelot would write against Mr Bayle with all the animosity of a bitter enemy, that he would conceal his resentment a little in his first attack, because he knew that the reply would give him a large field for it." Accordingly Mr Jaquelot declared in his Preface, that he had no intention of attacking either Mr Bayle's person or his morals. I esteem, said he, his erudition, his genius, his penetration, and all the fine talents which distinguish a man in the learned world. I say once more, adds he, I have no design to drive into his intentions: I leave them to be judged by God and his own conscience. He declares that he proposeth these difficulties with no other view than to obtain an answer to them.

The greatest part of this work is only a repetition of what Mr Jaquelot had said in his Dissertations concerning the Existence of God, and concerning the Messiah (8). What relates to Mr Bayle may be reduced to these three heads. I. The liberty of in-

(1) News from the Republic of Letters, February and March 1705.

(2) News &c. February 1705, p. 125.

(3) Conjointure de la Foi avec la Raison: ou defense de la Religion, contre les principales difficultez repandues dans le Dictionnaire historique & critique de Mr Bayle. At Amsterdam 1705.

(4) It is a book in 4^o of 705 pages. See Mr Bayle's opinion concerning it in a letter to the Abbé du Bois, December 13, 1696, p. 607, and the following.

(5) In the Article PERGAMUS, a City in Asia. Rem. [C] letter (j).

(6) Entretiens de Maxime & de Thémiste, ou Réponse à l'Examen de la Théologie de Mr Bayle par Mr Jaquelot, p. 14, 15.

(7) It was a book of Mr Bajnage.

(8) The Dissertation concerning the Messiah appeared in 1699.

difference. II. The Origin of Evil. III. The objections which the Pyrrhonians may raise against some doctrines of revealed Religion. Mr Bayle observes upon this that the title of Mr Jaquelot's book is deceitful, because it makes people think that it is entirely designed to refute Mr Bayle, whereas what concerns him makes only the smallest part of it. He finds another much more essential fault in it. "There is no reader (says he (1), who upon seeing this

(1) Answer to the Questions of a Country Gentleman, Tom. iii, chap. cxxix, p. 642, 643.

"title will not judge that Mr Bayle has attacked Religion, while all that he has done is to show that the philosophical objections against what Theology teacheth concerning the Origin and Consequences of Sin, are so strong that our reason is too weak to solve them, so that we ought to behave ourselves in the same manner with regard to the mystery of predestination, as with regard to the other mysteries of the Gospel; that is to say, believe them upon the authority of God, though we can neither comprehend them, nor reconcile them to the maxims of Philosophers. If he has dispersed some other difficulties in his Dictionary, they are all of the same kind." Mr Bayle adds that if this be to attack Religion we must affirm that the most orthodox Divines do likewise attack it, when they say that the Trinity, the Incarnation, Predestination, and still more particularly the Origin of Evil, are mysteries which our reason cannot comprehend, but which it ought to believe, submitting itself to the authority of God who has revealed them. He quotes a great many divines in proof of this, who all with one voice except against reason, and do not ask its assent when the question is about revealed articles of faith. He cites particularly Mr Jurieu, who in vain implored the assistance of reason to solve the difficulties which presented themselves to his mind.

(2) A Judgment concerning the rigid and loose methods of explaining Providence and Grace, p. 28, of the Edition in 1686.

"When I turn my eyes (says Mr Jurieu (2), upon the world, upon history, upon events, I find abysses there in which I lose myself, I find difficulties there which overwhelm me. It is true that I see God who created all things good at the beginning. Man at coming out of the hands of God was just, pure, and holy. But presently I find God abandoning this creature whom he had just placed in the world, and suffering him to fall into sin; sin whose effects were to be so fatal and terrible. . . . (3) I find in the conduct of God things which are incomprehensible to me, I can scarce reconcile his hatred of sin with his providence. . . .

(3) Ibid. p. 63, 64.

"(4) Is there any body so insincere as to say that he finds no difficulty in this, and that he can easily reconcile this with God's infinite hatred of sin? if God hates sin infinitely, why did not he prevent it since he foresaw it? why has he made creatures which other creatures may abuse? why has he created men when he knew they would damn themselves? why doth not he stop these men in their criminal courses? why doth not he stop the most part of men in those courses which lead them to hell? he could have saved a million of persons, and have suffered only one to be lost. On the contrary, he saves but a hundred, and suffers a million to be lost. This possibly proceeds from his want of power in this matter: but who can resist his will, and since he saves a hundred persons, why could not he, by the same means, save millions? Could it be said, that a King had the utmost aversion to the miseries and calamities of his people, who foreseeing that three fourths and a half of them were about to destroy themselves, and throw themselves down a precipice, should open the road to them, make an easy way for

(5) P. 92.

"them, and suffer them to run headlong tho' he could prevent it. . . . (5) The common sense of all men leads them to believe, that he who could have hindered the fall of the first man as easily as he has permitted it, and who has opened all the ways in which men have gone astray, tho' he could have shut them so easily, may be considered as author of the evil which he ought to have prevented according to his principles, and the hatred which he bears to evil, and which he could have hindered without the least trouble. . . . (6) It is to no purpose to say that God, before he had decreed any thing concerning the event, foresaw that man, placed in these circumstances, would fall, and that all his posterity would be lost: this doth not at all lessen the difficulty. For I could still answer: since God foresaw that Adam, placed in those circumstances, would damn himself and an infinite number of millions of men, by his free-will, and yet notwithstanding placed him in those sad circumstances, it is evident that he is the author of all evils. . . . And if we would speak sincerely, we would confess that we can answer nothing for God,

(6) P. 100, 101.

(7) P. 103.

"which can silence human reason. . . . (7) To conclude, I maintain that there is no safe medium betwixt the God of St Augustin, the God of Epicurus who was idle, or the God of Aristotle who meddled with nothing lower than the sphere of the Moon. For if we own a general Providence which extends itself to all things, in whatever manner we conceive it, the difficulty recurs, and when we think we have shut one gate it comes in at another."

Such were the sentiments of Mr Jurieu in 1686. He speaks in no less strong a manner in a piece published ten years after. "To what a height of blindness, (8) La Religion d'un Libertin, p. 385, 384.

"says he (8), must one be arrived to affirm that we should gain our cause before the tribunal of reason in the matter of the Trinity, the Incarnation, the Satisfaction, the sin of the first man, the eternity of punishments, and the resurrection of the body? they who say so, cannot believe it: I shall never be persuaded that they speak

1705. "speak sincerely. For all the false lights of reason rebel against these mysteries. And these false lights are of such a nature that there is no distinguishing them from the true, otherwise than by the light of faith."

This is precisely and in a few words all that Mr Bayle has put in the mouth of the Manicheans in his Dictionary. All his objections concerning the Origin of Evil are contained in these of Mr Jurieu: they all tend to show, that there is no hypothesis which is able to solve the difficulties which our reason offers against the providence of God with regard to evil, and that consequently we ought to hold by revelation alone. Things being so, Mr Bayle asks, why Mr Jaquelot never thought of assisting Mr Jurieu in his difficulties, which oppress him so sorely that he seems to groan under the weight of them; and why he thought himself obliged to take up his pen against Mr Bayle, since he kept silence so long with regard to Mr Jurieu, who however has said the same things?

Mr Bayle next comes to the three principal points which related to him. Mr Jaquelot reproached him with having used all his efforts to destroy free-will, thereby to give the greater force to his objections; and to show that man was unjustly punished for crimes which he was necessarily and inevitably obliged to commit. Mr Bayle answers that he had neither denied nor affirmed any thing expressly concerning free-will: that he took care not to engage himself in a preliminary question which would for ever keep the principal one in suspense. It is a subject so embarrassing and fruitful in distinctions and equivocations, that disputants have endless resources, and that it frequently happens that they fall themselves into contradictions: and that in fine he allowed him to choose whatever hypothesis he should think fit, and to go as far as Pelagianism if he pleased, which is almost the only post wherein we can make use of the liberty of indifference to advantage.

Before he touches upon the question concerning the origin of Evil, Mr Bayle observes that the question between Mr Jaquelot and him doth not concern any article of Faith, and that they are perfectly agreed in the substance of the doctrine. The matter in debate here is only whether our reason can comprehend the real and effectual agreement which is betwixt the Attributes of God, and the system of Predestination, and whether it can solve the difficulties which conceal that agreement from us, and whether reason can not only convince, but likewise enlighten our minds upon this subject. Mr Jaquelot takes the affirmative with the rational Divines, and Mr Bayle takes the negative agreeably to the hypothesis of the first Reformers, and their followers. He then observes what Mr Jaquelot ought to have done in order to succeed in his design: he ought to have proved that the perfect agreement between the theological doctrine concerning sin, and a certain number of philosophical maxims, can be shown to our reason; and he lays down seven theological propositions on the one side, and nineteen philosophical maxims on the other, which must be reconciled together in order to show the agreement betwixt Faith and Reason.

Mr Jaquelot is of opinion, that all the difficulties concerning moral evil may be solved by means of free-will, which according to him consists in "the power which man has over his actions, so that he doth what he will, because he will do it, so that if he did not will to do it, he would not do it, and would even do the contrary." A being, says he, which is possessed of this liberty is the most excellent, and most perfect of all created beings: the power of making a good or bad use of his understanding, and the command over his actions, are surely the things in which man approacheth the nearest to the Deity: God having formed this universe for his glory, that is to say, that he might be known in his works, and that he might receive from his creatures that adoration and obedience which is due to him, it was only a free Being that could contribute to this design; the adoration of a creature not endowed with liberty could not contribute more to the glory of the Creator, than a machine in human shape which should bow down before him by virtue of springs, or a speech in his praise, pronounced by an automaton. God loves holiness. But what virtue could there be in this, if man was as necessarily determined by his nature to follow good, as the fire is determined to burn? Nothing therefore but a free creature could execute God's design. Mr Jaquelot concludes from hence, that although a free creature may abuse its free-will, yet a free agent is something so elevated and so noble, that its excellence and value far exceed the worst consequences which can flow from the abuse which he could make of it.

Mr Bayle answers, that if Mr Jaquelot's principles be true, the love which God necessarily has to virtue would deserve no praise: the holiness of Saints and Angels would be only a mechanical holiness, and the Devils would deserve no blame for their hatred against God, since it is not in their power to do otherwise. He adds, that since it is one of the most sublime perfections of God, that he is so determined to love what is good, that it implies a contradiction to suppose that he may not love it; a creature determined to good, would be more conformable to the nature of God, and consequently more perfect than a creature which has an equal power of loving vice and hating it. Mr Jaquelot said, that the state of the blessed was a state of recompence, in which their understanding was so purified that it always inclined their liberty to good, and never tempted them to evil. That is to say, that they should always enjoy free-will, yet notwithstanding they would never turn aside to evil. Now since he declares that this state is a state of recompence, he must consider it as a more excellent and more perfect state than that in which we live. It was therefore in the power of God to have constantly and invariably united in man liberty and the practice of virtue. And in this case, all the value that liberty gives to the worship and obedience which we pay to God, would be found upon earth as it is in Paradise. Consequently the glory and holiness of God have no need of free Beings left to the bad use of their liberty, since they might be confined to a good use of it without being thereby less free. Mr Jaquelot would have more reason to magnify the advantages and prerogatives of liberty, and to make it be esteemed the most extraordinary favour which a creature can receive, if it had served only to render mankind happy. But God having foreseen that this wonderful gift would be the instrument of mens damnation, he could not bestow it upon them out of a principle of goodness. The present was too dangerous, and he would not have raised them so high, except in order to make their fall the greater. He would have done them a greater favour, if he had recalled a gift which has been so fatal to them.

Mr Bayle makes a still stronger answer to Mr Jaquelot. All Divines agree, and Mr Jaquelot with them, that the operation of Grace doth not in the least prejudice free-will, and that God, who is the master of hearts, infallibly directs mens liberty as he pleaseth, without violating the laws of this liberty. From whence it evidently follows, that God by confirming man in a good choice, and by infallibly directing him to good, doth no prejudice to his free-will, and that by finally preserving him from sin, he doth not deprive him of this so precious liberty with which he had invested him. If it be necessary that men should have it in their power to sin, it is not at all so that they should actually sin, and God can prevent their doing so without prejudicing their liberty. Notwithstanding, God far from disposing man constantly to good, constitutes him in such a manner, and places him in such circumstances in which he has foreseen that he will succumb, and has endowed him with a faculty of which he knew very well that he would make a bad use. So that though we allow man even an unlimited liberty the difficulty still recurs, to wit, whether the permission and foresight of sin, are consistent with the goodness and holiness of God. Mr Bayle makes use of several other arguments to prove that whatever side we embrace, we can never make use of free-will to solve the difficulties concerning the origin and consequences of moral evil; and shows that Mr Jaquelot has been obliged to cover himself with the same intrenchment that the maintainers of Predestination make use of. He shows the terrible consequences of this answer of Mr Jaquelot, to wit, that since the permission of sin was necessary to the manifestation of God's glory, it was just and agreeable to all the divine perfections. He examines Mr Jaquelot's hypothesis concerning physical evil, and the idea which he gives of the eternal pains of hell.

The third point of the dispute between Mr Bayle and Mr Jaquelot relates to the objections which Pyrrhonism may raise against some doctrines of revealed religion. In the Critical Dictionary under the article PYRRHO we find the recital of a dispute between a Pyrrhonian Abbé and a Roman Catholic Abbé. The principle in which they both agree is, that the mysteries of the Church of Rome, the Trinity, the Incarnation, Transubstantiation, the fall of Adam, and original Sin, are doctrines undoubtedly true. From this supposition, acknowledged by both disputants, the Pyrrhonian Abbé infers, that evidence is not the certain criterion of truth, since there are several evident propositions which are false if we admit the truth of mysteries. Mr Jaquelot pretends that Mr Bayle by this wanted to prove that the Trinity and the hypostatical union imply a contradiction; and he defends these two mysteries by relating what the Divines say upon these subjects. But Mr Bayle shows him that he has misunderstood the Pyrrhonian Abbé. The design of his objections is only to show that these doctrines are opposite to evident propositions, and that they deprive us of the certainty which we found upon evidence. Mr Jaquelot ought to have proved that this is false, and shewed that this example of the fashood of evident propositions, gives no ground to the Pyrrhonians to distrust propositions which appear the most clear to us. But he mistakes the matter, and raiseth up a phantom in order to fight with it. He takes it to be the same thing, to own that the mysteries of the Gospel ought to be believed though our reason cannot comprehend them, and to endeavour to ruin Religion by pretending that it is always contrary to reason. Mr Bayle wonders that so penetrating a genius has not observed that the question was not to explain the difficulties of our mysteries; the objection supposeth them true, since from hence it is concluded that evidence is not the certain criterion of truth. All that Mr Jaquelot had to do was to destroy this consequence.

1705.

This dispute did not hinder Mr Bayle from doing justice to Mr Jaquelot's merit. He owned that he had a fine genius, a great deal of penetration, and a lively and persuasive stile, that he had joined the study of modern Philosophy to that of Divinity, and had signalized himself in works of reasoning.

Mr Bayle likewise defended the answer which he had made in his Dictionary to Mr le Clerc's Origenist. The latter had given some new explanations in his Reply (1), to show that the system of the Origenist takes away the difficulties of the Manichean, who maintained that it was impossible to reconcile the permission and consequences of sin with the ideal or sovereignly perfect goodness of God. In order to prove this Mr le Clerc observed,

(1) Bibliothéque choisie, Tom. xii. art. viii. p. 330. and the following.

I. That God, who produced man from nothing, was not obliged to create him so perfect that it should be impossible for him to deviate from his duty; that it is a great proof of his goodness that he gave him the means of being happy by observing the rules prescribed to him, without being under any necessity of violating them.

II. That they exaggerate the damage which liberty has done to men, and which they might have avoided, if he who created them had made them of such a nature that they could not have departed from their duty.

III. That in order to prevent the bad use which man might make of his liberty, and to guide him to happiness, the divine goodness has been pleased to propose to him eternal rewards, and unlimited punishments in the Gospel: and that it is his own fault if he doth not avoid those punishments and obtain these rewards.

IV. God knew what would come to pass; but he was not obliged to make use of his almighty power, in order to prevent the evil which he foresaw would happen by the fault of man, because this evil is of a very short duration in itself, and in all its consequences, and occasions no disorder in the universe which God is not able to redress in a moment, and which he doth not at last redress for all eternity.

V. The inconvenience of passing through evil before the enjoyment of all the effects of the divine bounty, proceeds from the nature of man, which could not exist in the degree of imperfection where it is placed, without being liable to what has happened.

VI. God who foresaw that man would fall, doth not damn him because he falls, but only because having it in his power to rise again, he doth not rise, that is to say, he freely retains his bad habits to the end of his life.

VII. That this is already a very considerable degree of mercy, since no body is damned except for his own fault, and that it is in our power to take advantage of this goodness of God, to amend our faults, and avoid the pains of a future state.

VIII. God has bestowed many other marks of his goodness upon men. He has endowed them with a thousand excellent qualities; and surrounded them with a thousand sensible goods, which they taste with a great deal of pleasure, which make them in love with life; he hath put it in their power to make themselves happy after death, and he gives without delay eternal happiness to those who repent of their faults, and is satisfied by making the impenitent pass through moderate punishments, before he puts them in possession of eternal happiness.

IX. God has considered the miseries of mankind as nothing, in comparison of the happiness which he designs to bestow upon them. The duration of the evils which they suffer here below, and in the other world, are nothing when compared to eternity. If the Manichean should say, that, according to this principle, a certain number of ages, how great soever we suppose it, not having any proportion to infinite duration, torments for many millions of years may be as consistent with the ideas of goodness, and would be as nothing, no less than those which should continue only one day: the Origenist will answer that since there is no proportion betwixt finite and infinite, however long you suppose the torments of a creature, since they are to have an end, neither will there be any proportion betwixt God's severity and his goodness. He will add, that he doth not determine the length of the punishments; they shall be longer or shorter as justice shall require. The duration of punishments shall be shorter when they are more severe; and there shall be as great a variety of punishments, as there hath been of sins. That the arguments against punishments for several ages, do not concern the Origenist; because he is not of opinion that they shall continue so long, though he cannot precisely determine their duration.

X. What has been said above may be equally applied to moral and physical evil, or to the vices and to the sufferings of men.

Mr Bayle answered (2).

I. That the principle which they lay down, to wit, that it is not contrary to the ideas of goodness that one creature should be more perfect than another, is very true; and therefore that men have no reason to complain that they want that perfection which consists in not departing from ones duty. But neither is this the foundation of the objections. They are founded on this, that God has permitted that they should actually depart from their duty; and that they should actually feel the evils of which their nature was created susceptible. This, says he, is what doth not appear agreeable to the ideas of goodness, even granting what the Origenist remarks, that if men observed the rules which God has prescribed to them, and which he is under no unfurmoutable necessity of violating, he should be happy. We cannot conceive that the goodness of a father is such as it ought to be, when he makes the happiness of his children depend upon a condition which he knows very well that they will not fulfil, and which he permits them not to fulfil, though he could easily procure them sure and infallible means of fulfilling it.

(2) An Answer to the Questions of a Country Gentleman, Tom. iii. ch. cxxii. and the following.

II. The objection is not founded on man's not being immutably determined to good. A creature is essentially mutable, and so it would be absurd to ask why it was not immutable. The question is only, why he was permitted to turn to evil? The consequence from the act to the power is necessary, but from the power to the act is not at all so. The dispute therefore doth not turn upon the possibility of change, but upon the actual change from good to evil. Now God could hinder this without doing any prejudice to free-will. It may be said that God was not obliged to prevent it: but by this the state of the question is changed; for when the Orthodox undertake to satisfy the difficulties of the Manicheans, the question is not always concerning God considered as just; but frequently concerning God considered as good. So that though God considered as just, is not obliged to give his creatures any thing but what he has promised them by way of reward, he is obliged, considered as good, to make them useful presents, that is to say, it is of the essence of goodness to give good gifts. It is not bestowing a good present, to give a thing which one knows will be fatal to the person who shall receive it.

III. God knew that his promises and threats would not hinder men to damn themselves, and that a hundred other assistances, which he doth not bestow upon them, would have conducted them to happiness, without prejudice to their free-will. How can we reconcile such a foresight with the ideas of goodness? Is it not very evident that a real benefactor chooseth the most sure means which he knows, and flights those which he knows to be useless?

IV. Would any body praise the goodness of a Prince who should suffer disorders to reign in his dominions, because at last he could apply a remedy to it? Is it possible not to observe that such a Prince would then apply a remedy not only to the faults of his subjects but to his own, and that he had at least for some time ceased to be good, so that we might find in him a vicissitude of goodness and wickedness?

V. Our nature was made subject to sin, this is certain; but doth it follow from hence that it was necessary that we should sin? Not at all. The goodness of God was therefore at entire liberty not to permit Adam, who was subject to sin, to sin actually; and it is in vain to insinuate that God would have acted contrary to the nature of things, if he had freed men from an inconvenience to which they are subject, that is to say, into which it was possible they might fall. But was it not likewise possible that they should not fall into it?

VI. One doth not less will a thing when he renders the event of it infallible, than when he renders it necessary. Now the causes of the damnation of the reprobate, and consequently their damnation was rendered infallible, since they were placed in conjunctures in which God foresaw that they would sin during their whole lives, and in which he had decreed not to give them any assistance. He therefore created them for sin, and for the pains of hell; and if this objection be strong against the Predestinarians, it must likewise be so against an Origenist.

VII. That it is a considerable degree of mercy, to see a man abuse his free-will for fifty or sixty years, without any assistance from Grace, when it is known that this abuse will damn him, is what the ideas of our reason do not show us. They show us in the most evident manner, that goodness inclines to assist not only those who have not sufficient strength to free themselves from danger, but likewise those who having the necessary strength and skill, do not make use of it.

VIII. The pleasures of this life are mixed with so many miseries, that they cannot come up fully to the character of ideal goodness. As to that innumerable multitude of impenitents, who after a rigorous purgatory pass to the abode of the blessed, we cannot in their lot see the marks of ideal goodness. Here is a representation of the conduct which Origen attributes to God. A Prince designs to make a Gentleman his favourite. He finds him subject to great faults, he has infallible means of correcting them, yet doth not make use of them. He contents himself with making use of promises and threats, which he knows will produce no good effect. The young man is hurried along by his wicked inclinations, notwithstanding the promises and threatnings of his Prince, he is banished, and very severely punished, but at last he is called back to Court, and for the remainder of his life he enjoys the place of favourite. Can such a Prince be said to be eminently good? If we love any person, if we are good to him, we save him, as much as we are able, from the misfortune of committing faults, especially when they are to be followed by punishment; and the only manner of justifying people who expose their friends to any trouble or punishment is, that they cannot by any other means correct their vices. But this is not the present case, since we suppose a King who has effectual means of correcting this Gentle-1705. man's faults, and yet instead of making use of them, has recourse to methods which he knows will be to no purpose.

IX. The bounds which are set to the duration of the pains of the next life, the degrees and varieties which are supposed to be in them, are all very proper to prove that the marks of God's goodness are infinitely more apparent in the condition of men than the marks of his hatred, and that they have incomparably more reason to praise the bounty of their Creator, than to complain of his severity. Yet notwithstanding, infinite goodness, which ought to be pure without the least mixture of the contrary quality, ideal goodness, in a word, doth not appear in the hypothesis of Origen: it escapes us even tho' we soften it after that manner. Would a father who has a moderate love for his children, desire that the great establishments which he designs for them, should be preceded by a permission of committing faults, and by a punishment of these faults, tho' only for some days? Would he desire this, if he could render them equally happy without this preliminary? Few people would desire to buy the favour of a Prince, at the price of being put to the torture three times a week for six months. We ought not to imagine that the torments of hell are small, under pretence that they continue possibly only fifty or sixty years. This term, it is true, is nothing in comparison of eternity. But it is of a frightful length with regard to human sensibility. If one should say to a person afflicted with the Gout, "the horrible pains which you suffer, shall only last " fifty days together, and after that you shall enjoy health for fifty years," he would make him quite desperate.

X. What the Origenist has replied, cannot be equally applied to moral and physical evil. Our ideas do not discover any equality betwixt these two sorts of evils: they judge a father incomparably more to blame, who doth not hinder his children, when it is in his power, from committing a crime, than a father who allows them to eat what may be prejudicial to their health.

Some persons of Quality in England had used all their efforts to draw Mr Bayle out of his solitude and to bring him over to England. They desired that he would live with them as a friend, that they might have the benefit of his hours of recreation. I shall only name the Earl of Huntington, who together with a great deal of learning was possessed of all the accomplishments of a gentleman (1). He offered him

(1) This Nobleman died young and unmarried March 2, 1705.

1706.

The Earl of Albemarle passionately desired that he would come and live with him (2). Baron Walef went to Rotterdam to propose it to him, and redoubled his instances in a letter which he wrote to him. "If your friends (says he (3), endeavour to persuade you to refuse the proposition which I have had the honour to make to you, their friendship must needs be interested, and they can have no other motive in doing so, but their desire of possessing you at Rotterdam. Have not you sufficiently honoured that City with your presence, and has not the Metropolis of Holland, with all its advantages, a right to invite you to prefer it to a place designed for commerce? I will not mention here the great esteem which every body has for you, nor the regard they will pay to your merit. I know your indifference on this head. But together with the friendship of a noble Lord who has an infinite esteem for you, you will find libraries and walks proper to nourish, and agreeably to entertain your Philosophy. Allow me, Sir, to make use of your own arms. You have with your ordinary eloquence shown how much a man of Letters ought to prefer an abode in a metropolis to that of inferior towns (4). Either renounce your own sentiments, or grant us the favour which we desire of you. I will not repeat what my Lord Albemarle has desired me to say to you. You will find in his family a life more agreeable than I can describe to you. As much as you excel other men by your profound knowledge, and the sublimity of your genius, so much he excels by his generous and beneficent mind, by his probity, by that equality of temper, which is one of the greatest charms in life, and which is so rarely to be met with among the Great. . . . Preserve, on account of your friends, a health which you spare so little with regard to yourself, and prevent in a calm and certain retreat the infirmities inseparable from an old age so worthy of respect as yours is." My Lord Albemarle likewise wrote to him, and confirmed all that Baron Walef had told him by his direction. "I wish with all my heart (said he (5), that I could find some expression able to persuade you to grant me the favour I desire of you. I will endeavour to live with you in such a manner that you shall not repent the choice which you shall make, by leaving you a full liberty without the least constraint, as much as you can possibly enjoy at present. This you may depend upon."

(2) He proposed to entrust him with the education of his son, when he should be of an age to profit by his instructions.

(3) Letter February 9, 1706, p. 1065.

(4) See the Answer to the Questions of a Country Gentleman, Tom. i, chap. i.

(5) Letter February 11, 1706, p. 1067.

Mr Bayle answered Baron Walef, that it was very unhappy for him that his present situation was such as necessarily obliged him to continue in it. "Providence (adds he (6), orders the destiny of some persons in such a manner, that when they would be glad to enjoy a certain happiness, it doth not present itself to them, and when it presents itself, they are no longer in a capacity of enjoying it. This is my fate. I consider myself as a worn out old man, my constitution is so weak, that I cannot escape being sick or very much indisposed, if I depart in the least

(6) Letter February 12, 1706, p. 1068, 1069.

" from

“ from a regularity of life, which a long habit has made necessary to me. I have not advised with any of my friends; for, in examining by myself, the reasons which I had the honour to represent to you, and which you opposed with all the wit and eloquence imaginable; I have found it too certain, that removing from hence will not be at all proper for me Good fortune comes to me too late. “ If she had offered herself sooner, she would have made me the most contented man in the world: I would with all imaginable satisfaction have complied with the reasons which persuade me that living in a metropolis is advantageous to a man of Letters. Would to God that about the year 1690, or a little before or after, so agreeable and honourable an offer as my Lord Albemarle has been pleased to make me, had come in my way! This would have been the height of my wishes, and the sure means of obtaining much knowledge, and many degrees of wit, and abilities which I want, and which I shall never enjoy.” Mr Bayle wrote to the Earl of Albemarle at the same time to thank him for the honour he was pleased to design for him, but we have not been able to recover this letter.

(1) Défense de la Bonté & de la Sainteté divine, contre les Objections de Mr Bayle.

(2) Bibliothèque Choisie, Tom. ix, Art. iii, p. 103, and the following.

(3) Ibid. p. 106, 107.

(4) Ibid. p. 143.

Mr le Clerc flattered himself that Mr Bayle would acknowledge that his Origenist had taken away all the difficulties of the Manichean, but seeing him persist in maintaining the contrary, he concluded from thence that Mr Bayle had pleaded his own cause, and intitled his answer, A Defence of the Goodness and Holiness of God, against the Objections of Mr Bayle (1). “ When (says he (2), I read the objections made by Mr Bayle in the first edition of his Critical Dictionary, against the goodness and holiness of God, and which he maintains no Christian Divine can answer; I believed it only a sort of trial of wit, and that he had for his diversion cut out a little work for our Divines. . . . I continued in this opinion, until I had seen the last two volumes of his Answer to a Country Gentleman, wherein he seriously maintains the cause of the Manicheans against the goodness of God (3) But since he thinks himself bound in honour to maintain a Thesis opposite to the whole Christian world, which he defies methinks in a very odious and very insulting manner; he will be pleased to excuse us, if, in our turn, we maintain a Thesis, which not only honour, but likewise the love of truth and conscience obliges us to defend. I flattered myself, that possibly he would of himself acknowledge the goodness and holiness of the conduct of God, after the opportunity which I had given him of getting out of this ugly affair without hurt to his reputation; by owning that he was convinced, and making an end of the dispute by thanking those who had removed his difficulties, as is the custom in the Divinity and Philosophy schools. But as he has done quite the contrary, and pretends that we have not solidly answered him; it is necessary to let him see that we are not afraid of his arguments, and that we, without sparing him any longer, show how ridiculous they are.”

Mr le Clerc having thus assumed the character of Defender of Religion, attacked by Mr Bayle, begins by recapitulating the whole dispute; and, laying aside the person of an Origenist, answers Mr Bayle's difficulties in his own name. He declares that he has no other Confession of Faith but the New Testament, and that this is the only book which he thinks himself bound to defend. But as the strongest objection of the Manicheans is founded upon the eternity of punishments, which seems so clearly revealed in the Gospel; after having rejected the opinion of Origen he lays down his own. “ For my part (says he (4), I would answer that we are not well acquainted with the nature of the torments of the next life, that we do not know whether at first there may not be divers very sensible punishments, differing notwithstanding according to the greatness of sins, and whether God putting an end to these violent punishments, will not be satisfied to deliver over those who have obstinately abused his grace, to the remorse of their own consciences, which will reproach them with their faults, and will add to their grief by the reflexion that they have lost a happiness which they shall know that others enjoy. This possibly will be the worm which never dieth, and the fire which is never quenched. And in this I do not see that there is any thing but what is most just. Sinners might have avoided these punishments by repentance, and yet they have neglected to do it. They deserve some punishment on this account.” Mr le Clerc determines nothing concerning the duration or the circumstances of these punishments: he nevertheless says, that probably the condition of the condemned will be tolerable. But he doth not pretend to advance all these conjectures as certain and evangelical doctrine, he only means to show that we may find a very reasonable sense in the words of JESUS CHRIST relating to the pains of the next life. He adds that others may possibly be more happy in their conjectures, yet in the mean while he is persuaded that there is nothing in the conduct which he attributes to God, inconsistent with his infinite goodness; but that if there be any thing in what he has advanced which is unworthy of the justice and goodness of God, he is very certain that God will not do it. This is (continues he), what I called reasoning infinitely better than Origen, for Origen assures us of what he knows nothing of, as if he knew it, when he affirms that the pains of the damned shall not be eternal. However he looks upon Origen's opinion as tolerable, and infinitely better (says he) than the side Mr Bayle chooses, by departing from it to accuse God of being neither good nor holy.

1706.

He endeavours next to show that Reason cannot deceive us, if we make a right use of it; that it serves to prove the truth of the Christian Religion, and to make us understand the sense of the Holy Scripture: that there are in Divinity, as well as in Philosophy, several things which reason cannot comprehend, but these things are never contrary to reason, and we ought not to reject them because we do not comprehend them: that therefore we ought never to oppose the light of Revelation to the light of Reason, nor suppose that they may contradict one another, unless we reject either the one or the other, and unless we throw ourselves headlong into Pyrrhonism, since truth cannot be contrary to itself: from hence he concludes, that Mr Bayle, who maintains that we ought to renounce our common notions of goodness and holiness, cannot, if he reasons consequentially, believe that God is good and holy; and that he doth not sacrifice his reason to faith, but destroys reason by itself, and involves Revelation in the same fate, while he endeavours to screen himself by pretending to humble his reason, speaking in the stile of the vulgar Divines, whom he ridicules.

In answer to Mr le Clerc, Mr Bayle published a piece intitled An Answer for Mr Bayle, to the III and XIII articles of the IX volume of the Bibliothèque choisie (1).

"I easily believed, (says he (2), that Mr le Clerc would be out of humour upon the "defeat of his Origenist, and of the plastic natures, but I did not imagine that he "would be enraged to such a degree, as not to reflect upon the irregularity of the "conduct which he should choose. It is not therefore without surprise that I have "observed the manner of revenging himself, which he has thought fit to take; but "instead of being angry with him, I have had a real compassion for him on this "account. One cannot without pity see a man, who enjoyed a considerable share "of glory in the Republic of Letters, so touched with so trifling a check. He "ought to have comforted himself by reflecting upon his other exploits, in which he "has had better success, or at least not to have abandoned himself to such a chagrin, "as should make him declaim in a manner altogether unworthy of a man of honour and good sense. He has pretended to dive into Mr Bayle's heart, he has "accused him of horrible designs, he has repeated his accusations a hundred times "over, still in a loose manner, still without the least shadow of proof, still without regard to the clear and distinct declarations, which are to be found in a thousand places of Mr Bayle's writings." He observes, that the Republic of Letters would be a perfect anarchy, if it were allowed to attack our adversaries under pretence that they conceal bad designs in the bottom of their hearts; and he adds, that this conduct doth not at all become Mr le Clerc, who has so well described those who in order to render their adversaries odious, cloak themselves under the pretence of the interest of religion. "Doth it become him, after this, (says he (3), to de- "claim as he has done against Mr Bayle, just when he saw that he could no longer "sustain the shock in the lawful methods of dispute? Doth it become him to give "himself airs of being eaten up with zeal for the house of God? This zeal which has "come so late, would never have appeared, if Mr Bayle had renounced his remark "upon Dr Cudworth, and if he had not refuted the reasons of the Origenist." He opposeth to this conduct of Mr le Clerc, the complaints which he had formerly made against those who accused Grotius of favouring Socinianism, because he gave to some passages of scripture a sense different from that of the common orthodox writers of controversy, and who from thence had concluded that he designed to sap the foundations of Christianity. "No body (said he (4), cried out with more vehemence against "such accusations than Mr le Clerc. With how good a grace therefore doth he now "say, that Mr Bayle writes an apology for Atheists, and intends to destroy religion? "Is this pretended apology any thing else than his having rejected a bad argument?" He adds, that Mr le Clerc has been obliged several times to defend himself against the accusation of Socinianism, with which he continues still charged.

Mr Bayle afterwards lays down the substance of his doctrine on the subject in question, and reduces it to these three propositions (5):

"I. The light of Nature and Revelation teach us clearly that there is only one principle of all things, and that this principle is infinitely perfect.

"II. The manner of reconciling the moral and physical evils of man, with all the attributes of this sole infinitely perfect principle of all things, surpasseth the light of Philosophy; so that the Manichean objections leave difficulties which human reason cannot solve.

"III. Notwithstanding of this we ought firmly to believe what the light of Nature and Revelation teach us concerning the unity and infinite perfection of God, as we believe by faith, and in submission to the divine authority, the Mystery of the Trinity, the Incarnation, &c.

Mr Bayle adds, that he will without all doubt be thought orthodox in the first and third propositions; and that if he be attacked on the second, Luther and Calvin, and the whole body of the Protestant churches, and even almost the whole Christian world, must be attacked at the same time. He is persuaded that no body will ever be able to prove, that these three propositions are not what he has constantly taught in his writings, or prove that if he has established them in some passages, he has maintained propositions contrary to them in some others.

(1) Répon-se pour Mr Bayle au sujet du III & du XIII articles du IX Tome
de la Bibliothèque
choisie.
This piece is dated April 25, 1706.

(2) Répon-
se pour Mr
Bayle, p. 1.

(3) Ibid.
pag. 5.

(4) Ibid.
pag. 7.

(5) Ibid.
pag. 18.

(1) Ibid.
pag. 20.

He next makes some general Remarks on the dogmatical part of Mr le Clerc's piece, not being willing to enter into a more minute criticism which would have led him too far. "I will suppress (says he (1), a great many remarks which would show where Mr le Clerc has misunderstood me, where he disguiseth the state of the question, where he complains, without reason, that I have not understood him, where he discovers chimerical contradictions, where he takes the liberty of distinguishing into two species where there is but one, where he suppresseth what is inconvenient for him, and adds what is convenient, &c." Mr le Clerc charged Mr Bayle with accusing God of being neither good nor holy. "What horrible calumny!

(2) Ibid.
pag. 22.

"(cries Mr Bayle (2), what malicious imposture! or at least what want of discernment! but who will be persuaded that so learned a man as Mr le Clerc has erred through stupidity, and by not being able to distinguish here betwixt two things evidently different? the one is to say that God is infinitely good and holy, though our reason doth not know the manner in which this goodness and holiness is reconcilable with the misery and sins of men; Mr Bayle has said no more than this; the other is to accuse God of being neither good nor holy; Mr Bayle has never done any thing like this."

(3) Ibid.
pag. 29.

Mr Bayle doth not meddle with Origenism, he pretends that Mr le Clerc hath said nothing new on this subject, and that he has made no reply to the reasons of his adversary; so that they remain in all their force, and it is sufficient to desire the reader to compare the pieces on both sides to be convinced of this. Neither doth he regard what Mr le Clerc had said concerning the excellence and use of Reason. He only observes that the result of the Manichean controversy, which we have recited, was always that we ought from thence to infer the necessity of captivating our understanding under the authority of God, and that this is a principle common to all Christians who admit the mystery of the Trinity, and certain others. "Mr le Clerc (adds he (3), proposeth several difficulties against this, as if the most frightful Pyrrhonism were inevitable, in case revealed truths were not conformable to our common notions. All that I have to say against this is, that the Unitarians have of a long time made these objections, and the Roman Catholics, the Lutherans, and the Reformed have refuted them." He defies Mr le Clerc to dare to say, that he himself has not departed from our common notions, by acknowledging in the Deity three persons really distinct, coessential, and consubstantial, and consequently that it is his business to answer the difficulties which he proposeth against the common principle of Divines, to the confirmation of which Mr Bayle has made the whole present dispute subservient.

(4) Ibid.
pag. 40,
and the
following.

Mr Bayle draws a parallel betwixt his opinion and that of Mr le Clerc, to the end that all the world (says he (4), may judge whether Mr le Clerc had cause to intitle his Reply, A Defence of the Goodness and Holiness of God, against Mr Bayle's objections. He makes a supposition that Mr le Clerc and he are disputing with a disciple of Zoroaster about the unity of the principle of all things. Mr Bayle (says he) shall begin the attack, and force the enemy in all his entrenchments. But the difficulty doth not lie there: the question is how to resist the Zoroastrian when he shall attack in his turn, and shall labour to prove that sin and its consequences are not consistent with the idea of one infinitely perfect and holy Being. Mr Bayle will stop him short at once, by declaring that he doth not admit our ideas of goodness and holiness in general, as the rule of the goodness and holiness of God: and by opposing his system to him, which is conformable to the principles of the most orthodox Divines, he will defend with success the following Thesis: "God is infinitely good and holy, though our knowledge is too confined to be able to reconcile his goodness and holiness with the miseries and crimes of mankind in this life, and with the crimes and eternal torments of the greater part of mankind in the life to come". But Mr le Clerc, who will grant to his adversary that the common notions, that is to say, the ideas which we have of goodness and holiness in general, ought to serve us for a rule whereby to judge of the goodness and holiness of God, will be obliged to depart from the opinion of other Christians, at first by denying, with Origen the eternity of hell torments; and not finding even this post tenable, he will be forced to betake himself to conjectures, and reduce the goodness and holiness of God to a problem, the solution of which we shall only learn in the other world. Upon this Mr Bayle observes that Mr le Clerc has fallen precisely into the case on which he founded his accusation. For according to him Mr Bayle's great crime is, that he believes that no Christian system can solve the objections of the Manicheans against the goodness and holiness of God: now Mr le Clerc is persuaded of the same thing, since on the subject of the eternity of punishments, he abandons all the systems of Christians, and even that of Origen, and only intrencheth himself in may be's and probabilities. From hence it follows that according to Mr le Clerc there is no Christian system which can solve the objections of Manicheism against the goodness and holiness of God: "This nevertheless (adds he (5), is the sole foundation of his accusation against Mr Bayle: he has therefore wounded himself by the stroke which he aimed at him. He has from this ground of accusation drawn several false consequences, I mean the calumnies which he has raised against

(5) Ibid.
p. 68.

"Mr Bayle.

1706. " Mr Bayle. He has said that they who maintain that we cannot answer the Manichean objections, attack the goodness and holiness of God, and accuse him of being neither good nor holy, and that they cannot be admitted to profess that they believe him both good and holy, for having no reason to believe him so, they fall into a manifest contradiction &c. These consequences, and all the rest which I do not particularize here, fall equally upon the accuser and the accused. This can admit of no dispute."

Mr Bayle, to put an end to this debate, offered (1) to Mr le Clerc that he would submit to the decision of the Faculties of Divinity at Leyden, Utrecht, Franeker, Groningen &c. He proposed to him to draw up a Petition to be presented to these Faculties, in which he should specify the punishment which he desired they would inflict upon the person who should lose his cause. That Mr Bayle should sign that petition jointly with him, and that Mr le Clerc should join to it such propositions as he shall draw out of Mr Bayle's writings, and that he should communicate them to him, and that in case they are to be found in so many words in his works, and without any essential mutilation, he will subscribe them. The Faculties of Theology will know by this petition and those extracts, that what is desired of them is that they may be pleased to determine the following question: Are the propositions extracted from Mr Bayle's books, good proofs of Mr le Clerc's accusation against him? Mr le Clerc pretends that they are, and Mr Bayle denies it, and likewise maintains that they contain nothing contrary to the Confessions of Faith of the Reformed Churches in France and the Low-Countries. But as Mr le Clerc, adds he, declares that before he examined the second and third volumes of the Answer to a Country Gentleman, he considered Mr Bayle's objections as a trial of wit only, and that they did not prevent his believing him orthodox; Mr Bayle is of opinion that in order to lessen the trouble of these Professors, it will be sufficient if the Faculties of Divinity shall take the trouble of examining those two volumes. It would likewise (adds he) take away the greatest part of their trouble, if Mr le Clerc would mark the pages from whence he shall extract his propositions, and if Mr Bayle would likewise mark the pages omitted by his accuser, the knowledge of which he shall think necessary to inform his judges more fully of the state of the question.

Mr Bayle's enemies were not content to represent him as a man who endeavoured to destroy Religion, they strove to make him pass for an enemy to the State. This was to imitate Mr Jurieu pretty exactly. But as Mr Bayle's sentiments were too well known in Holland, for such an accusation to make any impression upon reasonable people, his enemies thought it would be better to endeavour to ruin him in England, where they expected to find less difficulty. They left no means unforgotten to prejudice the Earl of Shaftsbury against him. But they were disappointed in their attempts upon this noble Lord: he was too well acquainted with Mr Bayle, with whom he had entertained a close friendship, during the stay which he had made at Rotterdam. He perceived the motives of this accusation, and diverted himself with it among his friends. They wrote likewise to the Earl of Sunderland, assuring him that Mr Bayle had conferences with the Marquis d'Allegre, a prisoner of war, when he passed through Holland on his way to England. They added, that Mr Bayle spread every where principles favourable to Monarchy and absolute Power, that he continually extolled the grandeur of France, and talked contemptibly of the power of the Allies, and of the great actions of their Generals &c. My Lord Sunderland being of a warm and impetuous temper, and having as great an aversion to the principles which they attributed to Mr Bayle, as he had a passion for the humbling of France, and the glory of the English General, never spoke of Mr Bayle without transports of indignation and wrath. I endeavoured to undeceive him, but without success, his prejudices were too strong. I own this alarmed me. I was afraid lest he should persuade the Court to complain to the States of Holland, who considering the situation of affairs at this time, could refuse nothing to England; and least upon such powerful representations they should order Mr Bayle, a person without great interest, to depart out of the Seventeen Provinces. This in all appearance was what his enemies aimed at. I had recourse to my Lord Shaftsbury, and acquainted him with Mr Bayle's danger. This Lord promised to speak to my Lord Sunderland, but at the same time told me, that it were to be wished that to stop the mouths of his enemies, Mr Bayle should take occasion in some of his works to mention the success of the arms of the Allies, which were principally owing to the activity of the English Ministry, and the conduct of the English General. He added, that this might be done without affectation, and without departing from the character of an historian, and signified to me that I would oblige him by insinuating this to Mr Bayle as from myself.

I thought myself bound to acquaint Mr Bayle with what had passed, and with the conversation which I had had with my Lord Shaftsbury. He answered me (2), that Dr Sylvestre had before informed him that my Lord Sunderland was out of humour with him on account of pretended conferences which he had with the Marquis d'Allegre: but that this was the most notorious falsehood that could be imagined. As to the other ground of accusation, which was the chief cause of my Lord Sunderland's displeasure,

(1) Ibid.
pag. 72,
and the following.

(2) Letter
July 23, 1706,
p. 3096,
and the
following.

pleasure, Mr Bayle said, " that he defied his most inveterate enemies to find in his works the least shadow of affectation of speaking advantageously of the King of France, his Ministers or Generals, or to the prejudice of the Allies : for (adds he) we must not reckon here the Thoughts concerning Comets, a book which as I have advertised before the third edition, was composed with a design to be printed at Paris, &c. It is well known that the Abbé Renaudot alledged this amongst other reasons to hinder my Dictionary from passing into France, that it contained things against the State." Mr Bayle by no means approved the advice which had been given him, as the most proper to destroy his enemies calumnies. Being incapable of flattering on views of interest or even of praising unseasonably, he considered what was proposed to him in that light, and declared that such a conduct was very unsuitable to him. " However (says he), the plan which you lay down for me as what would disarm my enemies, is the advice of a good friend, and I return you most hearty thanks for it, but I find it impossible for me to comply with it. It would be very unsuitable for me at the age of fifty nine years, which with regard to the weakness of the constitution that nature has given me, is a more infirm old age than seventy or seventy five in other men ; who besides have struggled more than these six months past with a weakness in my lungs, a hereditary distemper of which both my Mother and Grandmother died, and which consequently doth not permit me to propose to make a long stay in this world : it would be very unsuitable for me, I say, to write like a Courtier and flatterer of men in power. My enemies would rejoice to have such an inequality of conduct to reproach me with."

(1) Letter Mr Bayle wrote likewise to the Lord Shaftsbury (1), wherein he thanked him for these new marks of his goodness : and protested that it was false that he had had conferences with the Marquis d'Allegre ; that he had not so much as known, any other ways than by the news papers, that the Marquis had been in Holland, and was gone over to England. He added, that no body knew his principles concerning government better than my Lord Shaftsbury, since he had the honour to converse with his Lordship more than once on that subject. He prayed that he would undeceive the Lord Sunderland. My Lord Shaftsbury did it with success. He represented to him that Mr Bayle being confined to his closet, and entirely taken up with his books and his works, did not in any sort meddle with affairs of State, that neither his genius nor his talents lay that way, and that these accusations proceeded only from the animosity of certain authors who had had disputes with him, and endeavoured to render him odious. My Lord Sunderland at last found that he had been imposed upon, and did Mr Bayle justice. My Lord Shaftsbury immediately informed him of this, and Mr Bayle in return testified (2) how sensible he was of the generous attention my Lord had shewn to his interest, and how joyful he was to learn " that the calumnies whereby his enemies had prejudiced my Lord Sunderland against him, were happily dissipated by his Lordship's means."

(2) Letter About this time Mr Bayle received a little book, printed at Paris, intitled, Critical Remarks on the new edition of Moreri's Historical Dictionary, published in 1704 (3). The Author (4) had drawn almost all his remarks from Mr Bayle's Dictionary, and had given them for his own, yet notwithstanding this he sometimes criticized him. Mr Bayle thought that this Piece deserved to be known in Holland, and to make it more useful he thought fit to reprint it (5) with Notes to clear up several facts which the author had either mistaken, or had not related with sufficient exactness. He even pointed out the faults of his stile, and his ambiguous or equivocal expressions ; and lastly, added a long Preface for the instruction of those who should publish any after editions of Moreri. The relation which this small piece has to Mr Bayle's Dictionary, engaged one of my friends (6) to desire it of me, that he might add it to the fourth edition of this Dictionary. I sent it to him, together with some Observations, wherein I marked the places which the author had borrowed from the Critical Dictionary, and where I distinguished the errors which he takes notice of in Moreri, and which are corrected in the later editions, from those which still remain to be corrected in the edition of 1725.

(3) Remarques critiques sur la Nouvelle Edition du Dictionnaire historique de Morery, donnée en 1704.

(4) The Abbé Tricauld, now Canon of the Abbey of Ainay at Lyons.

(5) At Rotterdam in 1706.

(6) Mr de la Motte.

Mr Bayle at the same time published a fourth volume of his Answer to the Questions of a Country Gentleman (7). He says in the Preface, which is dated November 25 1706, that this fourth volume might have appeared much sooner, if the presses of his Bookseller had not been employed in large works, which had begun long before, and which it much concerned him to finish. The five first sheets of it were printed before the beginning of April. The principal and largest part of this volume relates to Mr Bernard's Criticism upon the second volume of the Continuation of the various Thoughts, and turns upon the parallel betwixt Atheism and Paganism, and upon the question " Whether Christianity be proper to maintain Societies ? ". Mr Bayle flatters himself that his readers will find here such a variety of arguments, authorities, and histories, as will not allow them to be tired. " They ought not to fear, (says he) that because this is an answer to Mr Bernard, they will find nothing interesting in it. Every thing here is as dogmatical, and disengaged from personal disputes, as if neither Mr Bernard, nor any other particular person had been in view."

(7) At Rotterdam by Reinier Leers, 1707.

1706. Mr Bernard had likewise made critical Extracts of the first and second volume of the Answer to a Country Gentleman (1): Mr Bayle says, that he could have wished to have inserted in this fourth volume an Answer which he had made to these Extracts. "This Answer, adds he, has been finished a good while ago, and treats of matters no less curious than important. In a word, it is such as might render an Author impatient to have it published. Nevertheless he had been obliged to rest content, that the publishing of it should be referred to the volume which is to follow this." This fifth volume did not appear till after Mr Bayle's death, and he did not live to revise, correct, and enlarge it as he could have done. Notwithstanding he handles several important questions in it, and examines several historical facts with a scrupulous exactness.

Mr le Clerc did not leave Mr Bayle's last Answer without a Reply. He repeated his accusations with a great deal of vehemence (2); he maintained that Mr Bayle had not answered his principal difficulties, and that what he had objected against him in his last piece was vain and frivolous. Mr Bayle had offered to submit the decision of their difference to the Universities in Holland: Mr le Clerc answered, that he had a much easier and more honourable way, which was, said he, to desire an approbation of his Dictionary, his Thoughts concerning Comets, and the Answers to the Questions of a Country Gentleman, in which these Universities should declare, that they find nothing in them contrary to their sentiments, particularly in the articles and chapters concerning the Manicheans, and Predestination. If they grant him such an approbation (adds he) I will say that I was to blame in denying that he is of their opinion.

Mr Bayle replied in a book intitled Dialogues betwixt Maximus and Themistus: or an Answer to what Mr le Clerc has wrote in his Xib volume of the Bibliothéque Choïse, against Mr Bayle (3). Maximus and Themistus examine and criticize each in his turn Mr le Clerc's piece. They labour to defend Mr Bayle's principles, and to show that Mr le Clerc has drawn false consequences from them. They complain that he frequently disguiseth the state of the question, and takes no notice of the most strong and most convincing things which have been answered to him. We see that this dispute had degenerated into reproaches of Author against Author, and had become in a manner personal. These reproaches were attended with many harsh and provoking expressions. The learned and ingenious Lord Falkland (4) said, that there ought to be no more sharpness in a book of controversy than in a billet-doux. This maxim concerns Philosophers no less than the Controversitists; or rather all the Learned ought to be Philosophers in this respect: but when an Author sees that his person, his honour, and reputation are attacked, it is very hard for him to contain himself. He thinks himself obliged to repel these injuries, and in his turn to wound his enemy in the most sensible parts.

The attacks which were made upon Mr Bayle from all quarters, gave Mr Jurieu fresh courage. He thought the occasion favourable, and that he ought to make use of it. He published a little book intitled, The Philosopher of Rotterdam accused, attainted, and convicted (5). He repeats here his old accusations against Mr Bayle, though they had been refuted in a manner which had reduced him to silence. He bestows great encomiums on Messieurs Jaquelot and Bernard, whom he had persecuted on suspicion of Heresy: he treats Mr le Clerc in the same manner, whom he mortally hated. But these gentlemen had wrote against Mr Bayle, he brings them in evidence against him, and he would not discredit his own witnesses. In the mean while he could not help mixing some strokes of satire with these panegyrics, he maliciously hints at their former disgraces and heterodox opinions. But he made use of a cunning shift in doing this. He related under the name of Mr Bayle and of his friends, the reasons which might be alledged against admitting these three witnesses, and joins himself with them. "He is very diverting (says he (6), and his friends with him, in the reproaches which they throw out against these witnesses. The Rotterdam Divine is conceited, fond to distraction of his own productions, vastly in love with superlatives, and discontented with the bad reception of his works. Mr Jaquelot has been piqued upon hearing that Mr Bayle had spoke with small esteem of his book concerning the existence of God. Besides he is a man more than suspected, and has not extricated himself with honour out of certain affairs. Another has been censured by the Synods. The third is a Pelagian and Socinian, convicted of heresy and impiety." Mr Jurieu is at much pains to find some difference betwixt his principles and those of Mr Bayle. We may judge with what success by the account he gives of his own system, which he reduceth to these three points (7): "I. That God could have no other end in his works, in his decrees, in his providence, than his own glory; from which it follows that all the dispositions of the divine providence are just, wise, and reasonable, how hard soever they appear to the flesh and opposite to the interest of the creatures. II. That there is nothing in man, or in human things, like what is in God; the names of Being, Substance, Thinking-substance, Will, Understanding, Liberty, Right, Justice, and such like, are all equivocal, and do not signify in God what they signify in man, so that it is in vain to compare the conduct and rights of God with regard to man, with the

(1) News from the Republic of Letters, January 1706, art. iv. p. 49, and February, art. ii. p. 153.

(2) Bibliothéque Choïse, Tom. x. art. viii, p. 363, and the following.

(3) Entretiens de Maxime & de Themiste: on Réponse à ce que Mr le Clerc a écrit dans son x Tome de la Bibliothéque Choïse contre Mr Bayle. At Rotterdam, by Reinier Leers, 1707.

(4) Killed at the Battle of Newbury September, 20, 1643.

(5) Le Philosophe de Rotterdam accusé, atteint, & convaincu. The stile bears that it is printed at Amsterdam, but the Printer's name is not mentioned.

(6) Le Philosophe de Rotterdam, &c. p. 39, 40.

(7) Ibid. pag. 113, and the following.

"rights of men with regard to one another; and all arguments drawn from thence are sophisms, being founded on comparisons betwixt things not to be compared together, to wit, God and the creature, and the rights of God and those of man. III. But what puts an end to all dispute, is the sovereign right which God has over his creatures: that power without bounds, ought to silence man, with regard to every thing that troubles him, or startles his reason in the conduct of providence; and consequently this utterly confounds all the prophane and impious difficulties which the Author of the Dictionary furnisheth to the Manicheans and Paulicians, and which he displays in so pompous a manner."

Mr Jurieu shows that St Paul had foreseen and mentioned these difficulties in his Epistle to the Romans (1), and that he answers them by showing that the sovereign right which God has over his creatures ought to silence Reason. Mr Jurieu observes that St Paul concludes the dispute with this beautiful and sublime exclamation, O the depth of the riches both of the wisdom and knowledge of God! how unsearchable are his judgments, and his ways past finding out! For who hath known the mind of the Lord, or who hath been his counsellor? "It is as clear as the sun (adds Mr Jurieu (2), that by these words the Apostle designs to rebuke the rashness of those pretenders to learning, who demand that all difficulties should be solved by the way of human Reason and of their philosophical axioms, and that we should confess that human reason is incompatible with Divine Revelation, as if what is above reason must needs always be against reason." It is plain that Mr Jurieu had Mr Bayle in view here; but neither doth he forget Mr le Clerc and Mr Jaquelot. "We must confess likewise (adds he), that this pious exclamation of St Paul shows the error of those Divines, who would reconcile Reason and Revelation by Pelagian maxims. Surely, if it be true, as these Gentlemen pretend, that in order to get out of this labyrinth we need only suppose man absolute master of his free-will and of his actions, this exclamation O the depth &c. and how unsearchable are his judgments &c. appears neither very well grounded, nor very necessary. For there is no difficulty left, when we say, that God has forsaken man because he made a bad use of his free will." Here he only repeats what he had a little before said in a more strong manner and more at large. "I would willingly know (says he (3), why so many divines are afraid of this hypothesis, (of the sovereign right of God over his creatures); and choose rather to cry up the dignity of a free creature, and the excellence of liberty. This is good; but it is of no use in this question, and besides it leads to Pelagianism. By shutting one gate, as we imagine, against the impieties of the Manicheans and Pyrrhonians, we open another, or at least leave another open; for we are under a necessity of owning, that God is the Author of that free-will which he has bestowed upon man, and that he is master of it to stop the course of its disorders when he thinks proper. So that we shall never be able to stop the mouths of the prophane by this means."

(1) Chap. ix and xi.
(2) Le Philosophe de Rotterdam &c. pag. 128, 129.

(3) Ibid. pag. 118, 119.

(4) Examen de la Théologie de Mr Bayle, répandue dans son Dictionnaire Critique, dans ses Pensées sur les Comètes, & dans ses Réponses à un Provincial; où l'on défend la Conformité de la Foi avec la Raison, contre sa Réponse.

(5) Letter to Mr la Croze of the 25th of October 1706, p. 1121.

(6) Entretiens de Maxime & de Themiste: ou Réponse à l'Examen de la Théologie de Mr Bayle, par Mr Jaquelot.

(7) Entretiens de Maxime & de Themiste &c. p. 4, 5.

This is precisely what Mr Bayle had said: however he did not think fit to take any advantage from this piece; he did not think it worthy of his notice. He had before sufficiently shown the conformity of what he had advanced, with Mr Jurieu's doctrine.

Mr Jaquelot had not begun his dispute with Mr Bayle to make an end of it so soon, he returned once more to the charge; but instead of confining himself to the three essential heads of this controversy, he digressed to other matters which either entered only incidentally into it, or which had not indeed the least relation to it. He however by this means pursued his design, which was to represent Mr Bayle as a person who attacked Religion. He intitled his Reply, An Examination of Mr Bayle's Theology, dispersed in his Critical Dictionary, in his Thoughts concerning Comets, and in his Answers to a Country Gentleman; wherein the Conformity betwixt Faith and Reason is defended against his Answer (4). Mr Bayle gave the following judgment concerning this performance in a letter to one of his friends (5). "I will tell you in confidence that Mr Jaquelot's book is full of malice, infincerity, and weak reasoning. He departs as well as I from the common notions of goodness and holiness, and consequently he is wounded by all the thrusts Mr le Clerc has made against me. I shall not fail to make this observation which will embarrass my accuser; for he is Mr Jaquelot's friend, and even revised his manuscript." Mr Bayle answered Mr Jaquelot by way of Dialogue, as he had done Mr le Clerc. This Answer is intitled, Dialogues betwixt Maximus and Themistus: or an Answer to Mr Jaquelot's Examination of Mr Bayle's Theology (6). Mr Bayle in the beginning observes, that he might neglect the first three hundred and four pages of Mr Jaquelot's Reply which consists of four hundred and seventy two, because they do not concern the main point in the present controversy. The dispute had been reduced to these three points. I. The liberty of indifference. II. The Origin of Evil. III. The objections which Pyrrhonism might found upon some doctrines of Revealed Religion. With regard to the first, Mr Bayle observes that it is not necessary to insist upon it. Mr Jaquelot, says he (7), ought to have abandoned it entirely in his Reply, since Mr Bayle had given him a carte blanche, that is to say, had allowed him to show himself intirely Pelagian, since he had attacked him concerning the Origin of Evil, without supposing any other principle but the liberty of indifference. Mr Jaquelot notwithstanding 1706. " notwithstanding (adds he), has re-handled this question as a matter of great importance; Whether man is possessed of this liberty or not. His great itch for reasoning in the Arminian way has occasioned this. He shows the same impatience which new converts do, who presently publish the motives of their conversion."

Mr Bayle reproacheth Mr Jaquelot with five faults. I. That he has attacked Mr Bayle's doctrine, without seeming to know that it is the same with that of the Reformed, and afterwards seems to believe it to be very different from it. II. That he believes that the same doctrine is innocent or blameable according to the different intentions of those who teach it. Mr Bayle had shown that Mr Jurieu had taught, before him, that no system could solve the objections which may be made against the fall of Adam and its consequences, and that he had laid down the same difficulties which Mr Bayle has done. Mr Jaquelot had been asked why he did not sooner attack this doctrine, which as he imagines tends to make God author of sin, and to destroy Religion. To this Mr Jaquelot here answers (1), that he did not write against Mr Jurieu, because he believed him sincere in his System, and that he had not directly struck at any of the fundamentals of Religion: but that he thought fit to refute Mr Bayle, because he believed him ill persuaded of the System established by the Synod of Dort, and ill affected towards the principles of Religion. Mr Bayle thinks this a very extraordinary distinction. No body (says he) has ever thought of distinguishing things of this sort. It has been always believed that if two Authors maintain the same doctrine, it was impossible to refute the one without refuting the other. He puts Mr Jaquelot in mind of his declaration in the preface to his first book, that he had no intention of attacking either Mr Bayle's person or morals, or of diving into his intentions, which declaration he had repeated in the body of the book in these words: I do not at all desire to dive into this Author's secret views. . . . I forbear rash judgments (2). But in his second book he continually affirms that Mr Bayle has very bad intentions. Mr Bayle asks him whence he has got this new light, and ascribes this change in his conduct to his being irritated by the bad success of his attack. He adds that Mr Jaquelot, even when he was writing his Reply, having foreseen that the heat of the dispute and the necessity of having pretences, would oblige him to repeat his rash judgments a thousand times over, had formally disavowed them and made a sort of retraction. I only wish, says he: (3), that the reader may remember that I do not pretend to speak either of Mr Bayle's person or his morals. . . . The title of this chapter, says he some pages after (4), sufficiently shows that I do not desire to speak either of Mr Bayle's intention or of his morals.

The third fault with which he reproacheth Mr Jaquelot, is, that he affirms that Mr Bayle deprives man of all sort of liberty. To this it had been already answered, that Mr Bayle had neither affirmed or denied any thing on that subject, and that a discussion of that question was useless, because Mr Bayle had agreed to dispute with him as a Pelagian. He had attacked him all along, even supposing the liberty of indifference, and by showing that this liberty doth not at all weaken the Manichean objections. Mr Bayle therefore was not concerned to refute it, and yet he could have done it without destroying all sort of liberty, since the Contra-Remonstrants who reject the liberty of indifference, nevertheless maintain that man acts freely since he acts voluntarily and deliberately. Now Mr Bayle never undertook to deprive man of this kind of liberty. He next shows what might have deceived Mr Jaquelot, and led him aside from the true state of the question.

The fourth fault of Mr Jaquelot is, that he attacks Mr Bayle concerning the Conformity of Faith with Reason, and yet says at bottom the same thing that he has done. People believed upon reading the title of his first book, The Conformity of Faith with Reason, &c. that he had undertaken to show this conformity according to the plan laid down in the Answer to a Country Gentlemen, which is in substance this " (5) We must show that we not only have philosophical maxims agreeable to our Faith, but likewise that the particular maxims which are objected to us as not conformable to our Catechism, are really conformable to it in a manner which may be distinctly conceived. . . . (6) This Conformity requires not only that your Thesis be agreeable to several philosophical maxims, but likewise that it be not successfully attacked by any other maxims of reason. Now it will be successfully attacked by them, if you cannot defend yourself otherwise than by unintelligible distinctions, or by excusing yourself on account of unfathomable depth of the subject." It was easy for Mr Jaquelot (adds he) to perceive, even before he read the above plan, that it is this which is wanted when we desire a proof of the Conformity of Faith with Reason. But he has been very far from writing upon this plan. " When I speak of the Conformity of Faith with Reason (says he in his first book (7), I mean that we ought not to renounce our Reason, in order to embrace Religion. For though there be Mysteries in Religion which Reason cannot sufficiently comprehend, it doth not follow from this that those mysteries are contrary to reason. In the same manner it doth not follow that the infinite divisibility of body and motion, are contrary to Reason, though Reason cannot answer the difficulties which may be objected against these propositions." It is

(1) Examen de la Théologie de Mr Bayle, p. 66, 67.

(2) Conformité de la Foi avec la Raison &c. p. 222.

(3) Examen &c. p. 60.

(4) Ibid. p. 78.

(5) Réponse aux Questions d'un Provincial, Tom. iii, p. 685.

(6) Ibid. p. 687.

(7) Examen &c. p. 287.

observed, that if Mr Jaquelot hath nothing else to advance he has attacked Mr Bayle very groundlessly, since Mr Bayle never said that we ought to renounce our Reason in order to embrace Religion, and on the contrary has repeated a thousand times, that we cannot act more agreeably to reason, than in preferring the authority of the Scripture to the philosophical maxims which set themselves in opposition to our mysteries. Thus he shows that it is in vain for Mr Jaquelot to pretend to make a difference betwixt his doctrine and that of Mr Bayle, and that it appears by the state of the question laid down by Mr Bayle, that Mr Jaquelot and he do not really differ in their sentiments. 1706.

(1) Pag.
317.

The fifth fault he finds with Mr Jaquelot is, that he has undertaken an accommodation which was not at all necessary. He declares that it is his intention to show that we ought not to renounce our Reason in order to embrace Religion. Now all the world knew that they who admit the Trinity, and the other mysteries of the Gospel, believe themselves very reasonable, and that far from renouncing their reason, they found their belief upon philosophical axioms, which are in the highest degree evident and certain. They found their belief on this, that God can neither deceive nor be deceived, and consequently that what he says ought always be believed; and they employ Reason to find out the true sense of Scripture. Every body likewise knew, that it is not a just cause of rejecting a doctrine, because it is liable to great difficulties; and that the pre-eminence of the divine nature doth not allow us to subject it to the same duties by which men are tied to one another. All these truths are commonly known, and it is not this we expect from those who promise to show the Conformity of Faith with Reason. We expect that they should show that our theological systems are united with Reason by these very maxims, which it furnisheth to the enemy, and on which the objections are founded; and that the solution which they give shall discover the medium by which these philosophical maxims and theological hypotheses are connected together. But this is what Mr Jaquelot hath not done. He has been so frightened at the plan of reconciliation which was pointed out to him, betwixt seven theological propositions and nineteen philosophical propositions, that he has not had the courage to approach them: he has only pretended that these nineteen propositions "are false maxims, which ought not at all to be made use of in the present question (1)." Mr Bayle had owned that we ought to renounce the common notions of goodness and holiness in judging of the providence of God with regard to evil. This confession had displeased several people. It is upon this that Mr le Clerc grounds his accusation against Mr Bayle of destroying religion. But since Mr Jaquelot likewise refuses our common notions, and affirms that the damned will suffer eternally, he ought to think himself involved in Mr le Clerc's accusation, as an accomplice in the pretended impieties of Mr Bayle. From this he draws another proof, that nothing could be more deceitful than the title of Mr Jaquelot's first piece: The Conformity of Faith with Reason; or a Defence of Religion, against the principal difficulties dispersed in Mr Bayle's Dictionary. To rectify this title, we ought to change it as follows: The imperfect Conformity of Faith, with some maxims of Reason; or a dispute with Mr Bayle, wherein it is acknowledged that the philosophical maxims, which be believed to be irreconcilable with our systems of Divinity, are really so. After this follows an examination of the five principles which Mr Jaquelot substitutes to the common notions which he has rejected, and it is shown that they are not sufficient to satisfy reason. It is observed, that Mr Jaquelot, not being able to answer the difficulties which Mr Bayle had raised against his first work, had no other resource than to invent a new System, under favour of which he might get rid of these objections which it was not possible for him to evade, if he had continued in his first principles. Mr Bayle shows, that by this new System Mr Jaquelot retracts all that he had said in his first book, in justification of the permission of sin, on pretence that the glory of God is interested in it. He examines this new System, and proves that it is of no use in the solution of the difficulties in question. He maintains, that it evidently follows from Mr Jaquelot's system, that God has willed sin, and is, properly speaking, the cause of it. He proves that this Minister has in vain pretended, that free-will solves all the difficulties touching the origin of evil. He refutes his doctrine concerning the permission of evil, and also what he answered concerning physical evil, and Pyrrhonism, and gives an answer to several remarks which he had made on the third volume of the Answer to a Country Gentleman. Lastly, he gives the reasons why he had not examined the first 303 pages of Mr Jaquelot's reply, and had contented himself with making a few observations, which regard principally the collection of difficulties which he had drawn out of the Critical Dictionary, and to which he had joined some reflexions.

In this work Mr Bayle complains that Mr Jaquelot has made no answer to a great many embarrassing difficulties; that he abounds in shifts and disguises; that he treads sincerity under foot, in order to follow the motions of personal hatred; that he wants only to chicanery and conceal difficulties; that he mutilates the passages which he quotes from his adversary, and affects to talk contemptibly of his book: he observes that he is sometimes so confounded that he attacks his own principles; that he abandons himself too much to his presumption; that he is too proud to acknowledge that he ever has been mistaken, &c. This stile was not natural to Mr Bayle: he used to dispute without departing from the bounds of moderation. On the contrary he used to difsemble or excuse the faults of his adversaries, and soften his criticisms with a thousand polite and obliging strokes. But he was soured and piqued by seeing that his person rather than his sentiments was attacked, and that nothing was omitted in order to draw the indignation of the public upon him. This manner of proceeding seemed very unreasonable to disinterested persons. Mr de Bauval complained of it. "If Mr Bayle (says he (1), has (1) History of the Works of the Learned. December 1706. p. 544.

"had secret and dangerous designs against Religion, that is Mr Bayle's particular concern, the public are not interested in it. They who only seek after truth, will not be at much pains to examine whether the accusations against Mr Bayle be well founded or not. They will mind only the principle cause. Now it is remarkable that his antagonists attack him alone on this head, though it is certain that almost all the Roman Catholics, and the greatest part of the Protestants loudly maintain the same thing [R]. Why should they single him out, and fall

"so

[R] The greatest part of the Protestants loudly maintain the same thing. They who undertook to confute Mr Bayle upon Arminian principles, durst not deny that his doctrine was the same with that of the Reformed. They saved themselves only by saying that he had bad intentions. They in the mean while attacked the opinion of the Reformed, and pretended that it was liable to Mr Bayle's objections. Mr Jaquelot seeing that Mr Jurieu had declared, that it was in vain to exalt the free-will of man, and that this hypothesis was not capable of solving difficulties (a), made an addition to his last book, in which he chargeth Mr Jurieu's system with all the consequences of the Manicheans. Thus Mr Bayle's adversaries refuted one another, and in their turns adjudged him the victory.

(a) See above, p. ca.

(b) Addition à l'Examen de la Théologie de Mr Bayle, &c. p. 475, 476.

(c) Ibid. pag. 478.

(d) Bibliothèque chés. Tom. xi. p. 412, 413.

(e) Réponse à deux Objections, qu'on oppose de la part de la Raison à ce que la Foi nous apprend sur l'origine du mal, &c. sur la mystère de le Trinité, &c. printed at Amsterdam in 1707.

(f) Réponse à deux Objections, &c. Préface fol. 3.

(g) Bibliothèque chés. Tom. xiii. p. 425, 416.

"I cannot imagine, says Mr Jaquelot (b), how a Divine, who has well understood Mr Bayle's objections against the hypothesis of those who for all answer content themselves with imposing silence on reason, doth not perceive that it will follow from this method of arguing, that human reason may be convinced, by good and necessary consequences, that God is the cause of evil, and the author of sin." He declares that " (c) all they who will not abandon the hypotheses on which Mr Bayle has founded his difficulties, are indispensably obliged to show the falshood of his consequences, and of his objections, in a manner capable of satisfying the conscience of a knowing and reasonable man. Otherwise it is pure obstinacy, and a false honour, to resolve to continue in principles from which such horrible consequences are drawn." Mr le Clerc approved of this judgment. " Mr Jaquelot observes very well (says he (d), that if we grant to Mr Bayle, that Reason cannot make a good reply to the consequences which he draws against Religion, from the doctrine of absolute Predestination, this is to own, that these consequences are fairly drawn, and consequently that the doctrine is false. We must allow this or renounce all Logic." Mr le Clerc adds, " that the political interest which some people had formerly in maintaining Absolute Predestination having ceased, it was high time to renounce a doctrine, from which they see consequences are drawn which they own they cannot answer."

On the other side, Mr la Placette, not content with Mr le Clerc's and Mr Jaquelot's hypotheses, thought himself obliged to answer the Manichean objections by the principles of the Calvinists. But as he was a man of great moderation, he carried his regard for Mr Bayle so far as not to name him. His book is intitled An Answer to two objections which are opposed on the part of Reason to what faith teacheth us concerning the origin of evil, and the mystery of the Trinity &c (e). "Some distinguished authors, (says he (f), have undertaken to answer these objections, especially the first which is the most plausible. But as they have built upon principles which do not appear to me to be at all solid, and which are not even universally acknowledged; it were to be wished that some other would undertake this task, and examine these objections by comparing them with more solid and less contested principles." Mr le Clerc speaking of this work of Mr la Placette, observed (g) "that it was composed before Mr Bayle's death, but luckily it was not published during his life. If Mr Bayle had seen it, says he, I am sure, considering his humour, that he would have sheltered himself under the reputation of this Divine. He would have said, that he was ready to subscribe this book, without changing his opinion, and would have pretended to be as orthodox as Mr la Placette, to whom on other accounts no body will compare him." Was not this to confess, that Mr Bayle's principles were agreeable to those of this learned and judicious Divine?

Mr Naudé in 1708 published a book intitled, The sovereign perfection of God in his divine attributes, and the perfect integrity of the Scripture taken in the sense of the ancient Reformers, defended by right reason against all the objections of Manicheism dispersed in Mr Bayle's writings (b). In this work Mr Naudé opposeth the system of the Supralapsarians to the Manichean objections, being persuaded that this is the only hypothesis whereby they can be solved. So he is very far from approving of the hypothesis of Dr King, Mr le Clerc, and Mr Jaquelot; nay he even refutes them with a great deal of vivacity, and at length endeavours to show that Mr Jaquelot has not solidly answered Mr Bayle. He moreover maintains, that Mr Bayle has triumphed over Mr Jaquelot and Mr le Clerc. " Mr Jaquelot, says he (i), following a system merely of human invention, endeavours to justify God from the blame of being in any sort the author of sin. But he acquits himself very indifferently, since by drawing consequences which necessarily follow from his doctrine, we must conclude that God is the author of sin, whatever Mr Jaquelot can say to the contrary, and Mr Bayle's last work (k) has proved this in an incontestable manner. Besides, he makes God author of sin in a much more odious manner. He positively denies doctrines founded on a hundred passages of Scripture, he therefore gives it the lie, which alone is sufficient to pluck up Christianity by the roots. Moreover Mr Jaquelot frequently contradicts himself, and frequently contradicts right reason. All Christians therefore notwithstanding his answer are reduced to the straits to which Mr Bayle pretends to have pushed them. Mr le Clerc with his Originism, adds Mr Naudé, is still more unsuccessful than Mr Jaquelot, since he more formally contradicts the Scripture, and falls likewise under the same inconveniences. So both the one and other have been entirely defeated by this last book of Mr Bayle. I desire to be judged in this by those who have been spectators of the combat."

The reader will perhaps not be displeased to hear Mr Basnage's judgment of this dispute. "Two pieces says, he in a letter to me (l), have lately appeared against Mr Bayle, one by Mr la Placette, the other by Mr Jaquelot, which I have not seen. Methinks they may be easily set to combat one against the other. If a man be a Predestinarian in the terms of the Synod of Dort, he will look upon the answers of Mellicours le Clerc, Bernard, and Jaquelot as bad; and the Arminians imagine that he cannot be well answered by the ordinary system. One cannot say that he is well answered whatever system they take. For on the contrary, each party ff

(1) History of the Works of the Learned. December 1706. p. 544.

(b) La souveraine perfection de Dieu dans ses divines attributs, &c. printed at Amsterdam in 2 Vol. in 12mo.

(i) La souveraine perfection de Dieu, &c. Préf. pag. xxxiv, xxxv.

(k) Entretiens de Maxime & de Themiste, &c.

(l) Letter of Aug. 1707.

“ so bitterly upon him alone, why do they make no account of the great multitude “ of Divines who are on his side? This is one of the principal points in the dispute “ betwixt him and his adversaries, on which however they have insisted very little.
 “ Methinks this is what they ought to have principally laboured: otherwise they “ may be suspected of having designed less to defend Religion, than to revenge “ themselves against Mr Bayle.”

Mr Bayle for above six months had been ill of a decay of the lungs, which weakened him sensibly. As this was a hereditary distemper he judged it mortal, and his friends could not persuade him to take any remedy. He saw death approaching without either fearing or desiring it. He laboured constantly, and with the same tranquillity of mind as if death had not been ready to interrupt his work. In a Letter of thanks which he wrote to my Lord Shaftsbury, he gave an account both of his occupations and of his illness. “ I should have thought (says he (1), that a “ dispute with Divines would have put me out of humour, but I find by experience “ that it serves for an amusement to me in the solitude to which I have reduced myself.
 “ For as my disease is a disorder in my lungs, nothing pains me more than speaking.
 “ I therefore neither make nor receive visits, but I divert myself with answering
 “ Mr le Clerc and Mr Jaquelot, whom I find constantly guilty of insincerity.”

(1) Letter of the 29th of October 1706, p. 1124. See likewise a Letter to Mademoiselle Baricave of the 28th of October 1706, p. 1122, 1123.

(2) Mr Leers's Letter, January 18, 1707.

His Answer to Mr le Clerc was already printed, and the larger part of his Reply to Mr Jaquelot: he had answered every thing that was considerable in the last book which the latter had published, and there was nothing left to be done but to make some remarks, which he reserved for the end of it, when death prevented him. Mr Leers wrote what follows to me on that subject. “ (2) Mr Bayle died “ with great tranquillity, and without any body with him. The evening before his “ death, after having studied all day, he gave my Corrector some copy of his An“ swer to Mr Jaquelot, and told him that he was very bad. Next day at nine of the “ clock in the morning his landlady entered his chamber, he asked her, but with a “ dying voice, if his fire was kindled, and died a moment after, without Mr Baf-“ nage, or me, or any of his friends with him.” He died the twenty eighth of De“ cember 1706, aged fifty nine years one month and ten days. He had at first made a Will in favour of Mademoiselle Bayle, his niece, his eldest brother's daughter; but she having died in the month of October, the same year, he made another at Toulouse, whereby he appointed Mr de Bruguere, his cousin by the mother's side, his heir. He bequeathed to him ten thousand guilders in money, and all his manuscripts, excepting the Articles which he had composed for a Supplement to his Dictionary, which he gave by way of legacy to Mr Leers. He left all his books of Theology and Ecclesiastical History to Mr Bafnage his Executor; and the rest to Mr Paets, Treasurer of the Admiralty of Rotterdam, as a testimony of his gratitude for the favours which he had received from that honourable family. He left likewise to Mademoiselle Paets a golden medal of which the Count de Dhona had made him a present (3). He was buried in the French Church at Rotterdam: he had left a hundred guilders to the poor of that Church.

(3) See Letter to Mr Ancillon August 13, 1702, p. 915.

(4) Journal des Sçavans, January 1707, p. 207, of the Dutch Edition.

He was universally lamented. The Journal de Sçavans expressed the sentiments of the public by saying, that the year could not conclude with a more sensible loss to the Republic of Letters (4). A great many persons of distinction honoured him with their friendship. His friends in France were, the Duke of Noailles, the Count de Guiscard, the Marquis de Bonrepaux, the Marquis de Bonac, the Marquis de Bougi, Monsieur and Madame de la Sabliere, Mr du Frêne, Counsellor of the Parliament of Metz, Mr Brodeau d'Oileville, Counsellor of the same Parliament, and afterwards Lieutenant-General at Tours, Mr Thomassin de Mazaugues, Counsellor of the Parliament of Aix, the Abbé Bignon, Father Malebranche, both the Fathers Lamy, the Abbé Nicaise, the Abbé du Bos, Father de Vitry, Father Sagaens, Messieurs Claude, Mr Bayle, Professor at Toulouse, Mr Rainfant and Mr Oudinot, Keepers of the King's Cabinet of Medals, Mr Charles Perrault, Mr de Benferade, Mr Menage, Mr de Longepierre, Mr de la Monnoye, Mr Marais, Advocate in the Parliament of Paris, Mr de Fontenelle, Mr Lancelot, Mr Simon de Valhebert, Mr Naudis de Bruguere, Mr du Faï, Mr Jançon, Advocate in the Council at Paris, Mr de Larroque &c. In England: The Earls of Shaftsbury and Huntington, Dr Burnet, Bishop of Salisbury, Mr Justel, Messieurs de la Riviere and Dubourdieu, who had been Ministers at Toulouse and at Montpellier, Mr Abbadie, Mr Cappel, Professor at Saumur, Mr le Vassor, Mr de la Touche, Messieurs Sylvestre, Buissiere, Bayze, Pujolas, Coste &c. In Germany: The Counts of Dhona and Reckheim, Messieurs Leibniz,

“ pretends that the other mistakes and wanders from “ the point, and is not able to sustain the weight “ of Mr Bayle's objections. It is not two different “ ways which they take to arrive at the same end, “ but two opposite roads, of which the one takes “ to the right and the other to the left, and each “ maintains that his own road is the only true one.
 “ Add to this, that Mr Bayle has obliged Mr Jaque“ lot to declare himself Arminian, after having eaten
 “ the bread of the Orthodox for eighteen years, and “ after having made solemn protestations in our Sy“ nods that he was not so. Mr le Clerc has been ob“ liged to quit the eternity of punishments; he has “ abandoned the doctrine both of the Ancients and “ Moderns, without being able to justify Providence, “ or solve the difficulties which remain still. For “ besides moral evil, there are abundance of physical “ evils which give ground for the complaints and ob“ jections of men.”

1706. Leibniz, Thomafius, Budæus, Lenfant, la Croze, le Duchat, de Larrey &c. In Italy: Mr Magliabecchi, Library Keeper to the Great Duke of Tuscany. In Switzerland: Mr Conftant, Mr Spon &c. At Geneva: Madam Windfor, Meflicurs Minutoli, Bourlamachi, Chouet, Turretin, Leger, Piftet &c. In Holland: The Count de Frifen, the Earl of Albemarle, Mr Le-Leu de Wilhem, the Marquis de Bougi, Mr Paets, Mr de Wit, Mr Grævius, Mr d'Almeloveen, Mr le Moine, Profeflor at Leyden, Mr Fremont d'Ablandcourt, Mr Bafnage, Mr de Bauval, Mr Bafnage de Flottemanville, Mr Huet, Mr du Rondel, Profeflor at Mæftricht, Mr Drelincourt, Profeflor at Leyden, Mr Regis, a Phyfician at Amfterdam, Mr Rou &c. In Flanders: The Countefs de Tilly, Baron le Roy, Baron de Walef &c.

In his youth he had been at great pains to take extracts from, and make obfervations on, the books which he read. He had likewise then compofed, or fketched out, fome books. His collections were of great ufe to him when he wrote for the public. He then had hardly any thing more to add to them; his memory was fufficient to point out the fources which he had occafion for. The following is a lift of the principal Manufcripts which were found among his papers.

Differtationis fuper Virgilii & Homeri poematis nuper à quodam Gallo compofitæ refutatio: inchoata 9 Decembris 1671 (1). It is againft Father Rapin.

Amico fuo chariffimo ac plurimum colendo Jacobo Abbadie Epiftola fuper quæftione, an Deus poffit fapientiori perfectiorive modo fe gerere quam de factò fe gelfit (2).

Bælius Fetizoni, vel Refponfo Bælii ad Obfervationes Fetizonis fuper Epiftola prædiâa (3). Collectanea quædam ad Chronologiam, Geographiam, & Hiftoriam pertinentia (4).

Lectiões Hiftoriæ (5). Thefe Lectures compofe a body of Hiftory from the Creation down to the Roman Emperors. The errors in Chronology of Authors are obferved here, and the moft difficult points in Hiftory are explained.

Lectiões Philofophicæ (6). Thefe Philofophical Lectures are mixed with feveral ftrokes of erudition. Spinoza is confuted in them in a very lively manner.

Curfus Philofophicus (7). This Courfe of Philofophy is divided into four parts; Logic, Moral Philofophy, Physics, and Metaphysics. Mr Bayle compofed it for the ufe of his Scholars, and explained it in his public Lectures. He there recites the opinions of the moft famous Philofophers both ancient and modern, and points out their ftrong and weak fide.

“An Abridgment of Plutarch's Lives of Illuftrious Men, formed on Amiot's “Version, with collections or extracts from the Roman Hiftory, which ferve to connect the lives of the illuftrious Romans.” So that by filling up the chafms which are in Plutarch, from the other Hiftorians, Mr Bayle has compofed a compleat System of Roman Hiftory.

“An Hiftorical Index.” This is a collection of every thing either curious or remarkable in Hiftory, which Mr Bayle met with in the courfe of his reading. It begins from the year 1672. The fubjects are diftinguifhed by chapters, and ranged in alphabetical order. For example, under the letter A he treats of the Antiquity which the Egyptians and other people boasted of: and of the remarkable things relating to the Empire of Germany (8). Under the letter B he defcribes fome memorable Battles; and the honours paid to Beasts. Under the letter C he defcribes fingular Ceremonies which were ufed upon different occafions, and particularly thofe which relate to the keys of cities. He relates in what manner great men have given an account of affairs with which they were charged &c. There are likewife in this volume, fome feparate collections relating to Chronology and Hiftory.

Judgments, or a Journal of Literature (9). “This collection contains critical reflexions on the books which he had read, and thofe which had been communicated to him by letter or by word of mouth.

“Letters concerning the difpute betwixt Girac and Coftar, and fome other letters “on various fubjects (10).”

“An Harangue by the Duke of Luxembourg to his Judges, and a Letter concerning the faid Harangue (11).”

“A Letter concerning Hiftorical Phyrthonifm.”

“A Letter in juftification of the Reformed, concerning their firft rifing in “arms.”

“An Hiftorical and Critical Letter concerning the Conference at Poiffy.”

Thefe three Letters were defigned as a continuation to the New Letters concerning Maimbourg's Hiftory of Calvinifm (12).

“An Hiftorical Difcourfe concerning the Life of Guftavus Adolphus, King of “Sweden.” There are only the two firft chapters of it, but they are very long. They were compofed after the year 1683, for he mentions the laft fieve of Vienna by the Turks. The firft chapter contains Guftavus's actions unto the Treaty concluded with Poland 1629, fome time before he entered Germany in order to make war againft the Emperor Ferdinand II. The fecond treats of the origin of the houfe of Auftria, and of the various fates which it hath undergone. It contains the characters of the late Emperors, and fhow's that Ferdinand brought all his misfortunes upon himfelf, and deftroyed the power of the Houfe of Auftria, by giving himfelf up to the councils

(1) A Confutation of a Differtation on Virgil and Homer, lately wrote by a certain French Author: begun December 9, 1671.

(2) A Letter to Mr Abbadie on the Queftion, Whether God could aft in a more wife and a more perfect manner than he has done.

(3) An Answer to Mr Fetizon's Obfervations on the foregoing Epiftle.

(4) Collections relating to Chronology, Geography, and Hiftory.

(5) Hiftorical Lectures.

(6) Philofophical Lectures.

(7) A Courfe of Philofophy.

(8) Allemagne.

(9) Jugemens ou Journal de Literature.

(10) Lettres fur la querelle de Girac & de Coftar.

(11) See above An. 1680, p. xiii.

(12) See above, An. 1685, p. xxii.

of Spain, and by cruelly persecuting the Protestants. This chapter contains an account of the transactions in Germany, and in Bohemia, 'till the year 1620. It is pity Mr Bayle did not finish this work : but imperfect as he has left it, and as neglected as the title is, one may see that it comes from a masterly hand. It is filled with fine and judicious reflexions, and lively and bold strokes both concerning persons and things. It may serve for a model to Historians.

The new articles which Mr Bayle had prepared for a Supplement to his Dictionary, and which he bequeathed to Mr Leers, are not many. He himself said, that this Supplement was but little advanced, and that he was disgusted at that sort of labour,

(1) Letter to Mr Des Maizeaux September 21, 1706, pag. 1114.

(2) See Letter to Mr Minutoli, January 2, 1702, pag. 843, and Letter to Mr Marais, March 6, of the said year, pag. 859.

(3) The posthumous pieces are his Course of Philosophy in Latin, together with a French Translation, and the Fragment on the Life of Gustavus Adolphus.

since he had for some years been employed in works of reasoning (1). He had promised that these new articles should not be incorporated with the new edition of his Dictionary, and that they should be printed and sold a-part, that the public might not be obliged to buy the same thing twice (2) : but Mr Leers having left off business his stock fell into the hands of two booksellers, who, without regard to Mr Bayle's intentions, caused it to be inserted in their edition of the Dictionary printed in 1720. And what is yet more essential, they disfigured this edition by the alterations they made in it: they have even sometimes pushed their boldness so far as to change Mr Bayle's stile, and to father entire periods upon him. They had maimed and mutilated in the same manner the new edition of the Philosophical Commentary, printed by the same Booksellers at Rotterdam in 1713; but they have followed Mr Bayle's original edition in the collection of his Miscellaneous Works, which contain, in four volumes in folio, all the works which he published (excepting his Dictionary) and some posthumous pieces (3).

They used Mr Bayle's Letters no better, which I sent to these Booksellers, and which they printed in 1714. They presumed to make several alterations and castrations in them. They added Notes to them filled with gross blunders in point of Literature, base and malicious insinuations, and calumnious reflexions on several persons of distinction, and did not even spare Mr Bayle himself. I restored these Letters according to the originals, in an edition published at Amsterdam in 1729, and I joined what explanations I thought necessary to them.

Mr Bayle had a lively, shining, and fruitful imagination, a great deal of discernment and penetration; a natural and bold stile, but not very correct. His conversation was lively, cheerful, and the more agreeable that it was always useful. His memory was happy and faithful, and seasonably furnished him with every thing he had entrusted to it. He disputed without heat, and without assuming a dictating tone: and we may observe from his writings, that far from giving offence he was on the contrary rather too much inclined to praise. He was faithful and constant in his friendship, and never was any body more ready to do good offices or more disinterested than he. Far from being greedy of presents, it was with difficulty that he accepted of those which he could not handsomely refuse [S]. Having a strong passion for truth he was exceedingly sensible of any assistance which was given him in the discovery of it, and made use of these helps with the utmost gratitude. He abhorred all sort of fraud and insincerity.

Being a true Philosopher he was without ostentation in his manners, without ambition, and gave himself no airs of superiority over any person. He was sober even to frugality, being indifferent about all pleasures but those of the mind, he seemed to know the passions only to talk of them, and not to feel their effects. Modest even to scrupulousness, he would have for ever concealed his name, if it had been in his power to do it, and it was not owing to him that the public ever saw his picture.

[S] Far from being greedy of presents, it was with difficulty that he accepted of those which he could not handsomely refuse. What follows is a proof of this, which I thought not unworthy of the curiosity of the public. The late Earl of Shaftsbury having observed that Mr Bayle had no watch, bought one when he went over to England, with an intention of making him a present of it when he should return to Rotterdam. The difficulty was how to make him accept of it. He took it frequently out of his pocket when they were together, as if to see what a clock it was, but Mr Bayle took no notice of it. At last one day he took it in his hand, and after having examined it, could not help saying that he thought it a very fine one. My Lord Shaftsbury laid hold of that opportunity of offering it to him. But Mr Bayle with great confusion, and piqued that my Lord seemed to have taken what he said without design, as an indirect manner of asking his watch of him, excused himself in the most earnest manner and with great emotion. They disputed a long time. And my Lord Shaftsbury could not persuade him to accept of it, 'till he had assured him that he had brought it from England purposely for him, and proved this by showing him his own watch.

Some years after, that Lord told me that he designed to send Mr Bayle some Greek and Latin books, printed in England, and desired me to draw up a catalogue of those which would be most acceptable to him. I secretly acquainted Mr Bayle with this, that he might let me know what he had most occasion for. But he would not do it. "It is not at all necessary, said he (a), to give my Lord Shaftsbury any list of books. I most humbly thank him for the favour he designs for me: I have a sufficient token from him of a fine watch which he was pleased to force me to accept of. At that time I thought it a very useless piece of furniture, but at present it is become so necessary to me, that I could not now be without it, so that I every moment feel how much I am obliged to my Lord for so fine a present."

We may by this instance see what judgment ought to be made of those who have affirmed that he was a pensioner of the Court of France, &c.

(a) Letter of the 3d of April 1705, pag. 1014, 1015.

1706. Picture [T]. He was jealous of excess, and possibly to weakness, of the glory of his Country, and suffered with impatience that it should be attacked; and secretly despised those who had not the same opinion of it which he had.

The fruitfulness of his imagination and the vast extent of his knowledge frequently threw him into digressions, which notwithstanding he had the art to render useful and even necessary to the consequences which he wanted to draw. His penetration made him at first sight perceive all the different sides of the most abstruse subjects; he discovered all their principles, and unfolded all their consequences. The difficulties which he found in them made him very reserved in his judgments, and frequently left him only reasons for doubting. This caution made some people accuse him of Pyrrhonism. But if it is to be a Pyrrhonian to doubt of things doubtful, should not all men be Pyrrhonians?

It has been complained that he has taken a little too much liberty in his Dictionary, and that he has taken great freedoms with regard to the female sex. These however are only quotations from Authors which are in every body's hands, and which are generally esteemed. Mr Bayle being less touched with strokes of this kind, than probably those are who condemn him, was not shocked at the stile of these writers. He considered their coarse and unpollite expressions as the language of undisguised nature, or, if you will, as innocent liberties, and mere sports of wit, because they excited no disorders in his breast. His manners were always so pure and regular, that his most violent enemies never reproached him with any thing on that head. But in this, as in all other things he was not scared at the appearance of vice, because he had a solid love for virtue. No body ought to conclude any thing against Mr Bayle's Religion, from his having related in his Dictionary the difficulties which may be raised against some important doctrines. The laws of dispute required that he should make a faithful report on both sides of the question. But it is plain that he had no intention of destroying these doctrines, because the arguments which he has recited in their favour are stronger than those which he opposeth to them. Mr Jaquetot himself owns this in his Answer to the Dialogues of Maximus and Themistus, which is one continued invective against Mr Bayle.

"Libertines (says he (1), who shall read this Philosopher's works, with understanding sufficient to comprehend what they read, may easily discover that he has advanced reasons for the Existence of God, and the spiritual nature of the Soul, incomparably stronger than those with which he has furnished Pagans and others to oppose these important truths." He repeats this likewise in the Preface. Mr Bayle (says he (2), reasons with a great deal more force and evidence when he establisheth the Existence of God, than when he proposeth the difficulties with which he furniseth Simonides against this truth. . . . We ought to make the same judgment of the spirituality of the soul, if we read with application what he says of it, pro and con: and consequently to receive the Existence of God, and the Spirituality of the Soul, the two foundations of Religion, as principles very agreeable to Reason. But even they who do not approve of Mr Bayle's sentiments, admire the beauty and fertility of his genius, and the extensiveness of his knowledge; and they who do not do him this justice, and who affect, or pretend, to despise him, that they may raise themselves by debasing him, do not so much disparage Mr Bayle as their own discernment,

(1) Réponse aux Entretien de Mr Bayle &c. p. 256, 257.

(2) Pref. fol. 5.

[T] It was not owing to Mr Bayle that the public ever saw his Picture.] It was desired of him in the most earnest manner, in order to be engraved and prefixed to the English Translation of his Dictionary: but he answered that could not resolve to sit for his picture, nor to allow it to be placed before his book: that it was not in his power to conquer that reluctance, and he begged them to pardon that weakness, if they should be pleased to call it so (a).

The picture which he sent to his Mother was designed to remain in the family, and we are obliged for its being made public to Mr Marais, an Advocate in the Parliament of Paris, and to Madam de Meignac a Lady of distinguished merit, and a great admirer of Mr Bayle's memory and writings. They did not know that Mr Bayle had ever been drawn; but the Letter which he sent to his Mother along with his picture (b), falling into Mr Marais hands after the death of Mr Bayle, they had notice that this picture was at Montauban, in the house of one of Mr Bayle's relations. Madam de Merignac got a copy of it, which she gave at her death (c) to Mr de Francastel under-library-keeper to the Mazarine College, and Mr Marais caused a copy to be made from it. These are the only two copies of it, which are at Paris. The University of Frankfurt on the Oder, desired a third from Mr Marais, in order to be placed in a Hall where they had already collected eighty two portraits of famous men. Mr Bayle appears in it of a brown complexion, with lively features and very fine eyes. One easily discovers there his wit and vivacity. Some prints have been engraved at Paris from this picture. One of them was engraved by order of Madam de Meignac and Mr Marais. Mr Marais desired Mr de la Monnoye to write some verses to be placed under that print, and he composed the following Latin Distich:

*Bælius hic ille est, cujus dum scripta vigeant
Lis erit oblectant, erudiant ne magis.*

Such were Bayle's looks, whose writings justly boast
We know not if they please or profit most.

Another was engraved to be placed before the Geneva Edition of his Dictionary printed in 1715, where we find the following French verses of Mr de la Monnoye, which are an imitation of the above Latin ones:

*Tel fut l'illustre Bayle, bonneur des beaux esprits,
Dont l'élégante plume, en recherches fertiles,
Fait douter qui des deux l'emporte en ses Ecrits,
De l'agréable, ou de l'utile.*

(a) Letter to Mr. Des Maisneaux of the 3d of April 1705, p. 1011; and of the 3d of July, p. 1024.

(b) See above, in the year 1675, pag. ix.

(c) This Lady died Nov. 11, 1712. Her name was Magdalen Felix d'Ober, the widow of a family of distinction in Flanders, and widow to Mr. de Merignac.

ment, and discover more presumption than knowledge. It is common to find men of great learning with little genius, of much wit with little erudition, much solidity without any thing agreeable: but it is rare to find one who has so perfectly united all these qualities as Mr Bayle has done. This made Mr de Saint Evremond say (3),

(3) Mr de
St Evremond's Works,
Letter to Mr Des
Maizeaux,
Tom. v. p.
377. Edit. of Amsterdam, 1726.

*Qu'on admire le grand savoir
L'erudition infinie
Où l'on ne voit sens, ni génie,
Je ne saurois le concevoir:
Mais je trouve BAYLE admirable
Qui profond autant qu'agréable,
Me met en état de choisir
L'instruction, ou le plaisir.*

While some the soph profound admire,
Tho' wanting sense, and wit, and fire,
BAYLE stands my favourite confest,
Whose soul, with every talent blest,
Displays in his still various page,
The chearful wit and learned sage.

The end of the Life.

A P P E N D I X.

CALENDARIUM CARLANANUM.

An Historical and Chronological Journal of the Life of Mr Bayle.

ANNI ERÆ CHRIST.	EPOCHÆ NATIVIT.		YEARS OF THE CHRI- STIAN ERÆ	EPOCH OF MY BIRTH.
	18. Nov. 1647.			The 18th of Novem- ber 1647.
	ANNI ÆTAT.			YEARS OF MY AGE
1660, 29. Jun.	13. curr.	Initium stud. L. G.	1660, June 29.	13. current	I began to learn Greek.
1661, Fer. 1. fe- we Domin. die 25. Decembr.	15. iniens.	I. Synaxis.	1661, on Sun- day Decemb. 25.	15. near the be- ginning.	I for the first time received the Holy Communion.
1666, Fer. 6. die 12. Febr.	19. curr.	I. Professio ex Lare pater- no PdRm; ubi ascript. I. Class. 30. Non. Maij, sub Virodunenſi Clepoïn.	1666, on Saturday February 12.	19. current	I left my father's house and went to Puylaurens where I entered to the first class. Mr Clepoïn of Verdun, was my Regent.
1666,		Excursio in triduum Castra.	1666,		I made a Journey of three days to Caſtres.
1666 die 9. Sept.	19. curr.	Reditus Carlan.	1666, Sep- tember 9.	19. current	I returned to Carla.
1668, die 29. Mai.	21. curr.	Profeſſus Sacerd. & manſio uſque ad 4. Kal. Oâ. proximas.	1668, May. 29.	21. current	I went to Saverdun where I ſtaid 'till the 28th of September following.
1668, die lunæ 5. Novemb.	21. adſe- ſus.	Egreſſus Carlan. & profeſſus PdRm. manſio uſque ad d. 19. ſer. 3. menſis Febr. 1669.	1668, Mon- day No- vember 5.	21. near the end.	I left Carla and went to Puylau- rens where I continued till Tueſday February 19, 1669.
1669, die Feb. 19.	22. curr.	Logicus. Advent. TLSm.	1669, Febru- ary 19.	22. current	I began the Study of Logic. I arrived at Toulouſe.
1669, die 19. Mart. ſer. 3.	22. curr.	Transit. ad deſ. ſub Ignat. . . no cognomine: poſtera die iterum Logicus, ſub Ignat. . . no cogno- mine urbi quæ ſedes Imper. (1)	1669, Tueſ- day March 19.	22. current	I changed my Religion . . . Next day I reſumed the Study of Logic.
1670, die 19. Aug. ſer. 3.	23. curr.	Profeſſ. ex TLSm. & ad- vent. ad villam D. del Vivie ad Mazers.	1670, Tueſ- day Au- guſt 19.	23. current	I left Toulouſe and came to a Country ſeat of Mr du Vivie near Mazers.
1670, die 21. Aug.	23. curr.	Redit. ad patern. Leg. intra privat. par. moderante Rivall. Saverd. Teſt. Fratres, Guillemat. & Rivall. reſpectivè Eccleſ. . . bus Carlan. Mazers. Calmon.	1670, Au- guſt 21.	23. current	I returned to the Reformed Reli- gion, and made a private abjuration of the Romiſh Religion in the hands of Mr Rival Miniſter of Saverdun; in preſence of my Brother the Mini- ſter of Carla, of Mr Guillemat Mi- niſter of Mazeres, and of Mr Rival Miniſter of Calmont.
1670, die 21. Aug.	23. curr.	Profeſſ. Lemann. advent. die 5. 7 ^{br} . ſer. 3.	1670, Au- guſt 21.	23. current	I ſet out for Geneva, where I ar- rived on Tueſday September 5.
1670, die 21. Nov.	23. adſe.	Ingreſſ. apud Dm. Neuſtriae cognom.	1670, No- vember 21.	23. near the end.	I entered to the houſe of Mr de Normandie.
1672, die 23. Mai.	25. curr.	Transitus Copet . . . apud Don. Comit.	1672, No- vember 21.	25. current	I went to Copet to live with the Count de Dhona.
1674, ſer. 3. d. 29. Mai.	27. curr.	Profeſſ. ex Copet. & iter in Neuſtr. apud D. Rip. advent. eò 15. Jun. proxim.	1674, Tueſ- day May 29.	27. current	I left Copet and went to Normandie to live with Mr Rip. I arrived there the fifteenth of June following.
1675 Kal. Mart.	28. curr.	Egreſſ. Roth. ad Urbem: ini- bi ingreſſ. apud Dm. Ber. . . gb. 3. apr. prox.	1675, March 1.	28. current	I went from Rouen to Paris, where I entered to Mr de Beringhen's fa- mily, the 3d of April following.
1675, ſer. 3. die Aug. 27.	28. curr.	Iter Sed. advent. ultima Aug. die proxim.	1675, Tueſ- day Aug. 27.	28. current	I ſet out for Sedan where I ar- rived on the laſt day of Auguſt.
1675, die 28. Sept.	28. curr.	Incluſ. cum rival. ad comp. Teſt. quæ prop. 22. Oâ. & 23. poſt merid.	1675, Sep- tember 28.	28. current	I was ſhut up with my Compe- titors to compoſe my Theſes which I defended on the 22d and 23d of October in the Afternoon.
1675 die 2. Nov.	28. adſec.	Recept. à curat. & 4. Nov. prox. Sacramenti præſt. ad ſpar- tam Philoſoph. quæ 14. Jul. 1681. interdicit. diplom. regio.	1675, No- vember 2.	28. near the end	I was received by the Moderators of the Academy, and on the 4th of November I took the oath as Pro- feſſor of Philoſophy. The Academy was ſuppreſſed by a Royal Ediſt July 14, 1681.
1675, ſer. 2. Nov. 11.	28. adſec.	I. Exercit. in audit.	1675, Mon- day Novem- ber 11.	28. near the end	I began my Public Lectures.

(1) We have not been able to diſcover the meaning of theſe words:
Sub Ignat. . . no (Ignatiano) cognomine
Urbi quæ ſedes Imperii.

ANNI ERÆ CHRIST.	ANNI ÆTAT.		YEARS OF THE CHRIS- TIAN ÆRA.	YEARS OF MY AGE.
1681, fer. 3. d. 2. Sept.	34. curr.	Profess. Sed. in urbem, ad- vent. die 7. prox.	1681, Tues- day Septem- ber 2.	34 current	I left Sedan for Paris, where I arrived on the 7th.
1681, fer. 4. d. 8. Oct.	34. adf.	Profess. Urbe Rott. vocat. juf- su D. Pa. . .	1681 Wed- nesday Octo- ber 8.	34 near the end	I left Paris for Rotterdam where I was invited by Mr Paets,
1681, fer. 5. d. 30. Oct.	34. adf.	Advent. Rott.	1681, Thurs- day October 30.	34 near the end	I arrived at Rotterdam.
1681, fer. 6. d. 5. Dec.	35. ineunt.	Or. inaug. ob Prof. ppb. & bist. in Seb. ill. recens erect.	1681, Friday December 5.	35 near the be- ginning.	My inaugural Oration at entering to my charge of Professor of Phi- losophy and History, in the Illustri- ous School lately founded.
1681, fer. 2. d. 8. Decem.	35. ineunt.	I. Lect. ppb.	1682, 1681, Mon- day Decem- ber 8.	35 near the be- ginning.	My first Philosophical Lecture.
1682, fer. 4. d. 11. Mart.	35. curr.	Epist. de comet. absol. im- press. lum. compof. 11. Januar. 1681. missa in Urb. 27. Mai. inseq.	1682, Wed- nesday March 11.	35 current	The Impression of the Letter con- cerning Comets was finished, it was composed January 11, 1681, and sent to Paris the 27th of May following.
1682, fer. 3. d. 31. Mart.	35. curr.	Nunc. à D. J. Dam. Pa. . . paulo ante defunctam legasse duo m. Lb. Biblioth. 9.	1682, Tues- day March 31.	35 current	I was informed by Mr J. that Madam Paets, lately dead, had left me a Legacy of two thousand gilders to buy books.
1682, fer. 6. die 1. Mai.	35. curr.	Inchoata Crit. G. de l'Hist. du C. absol. 15. d. post. tradita 30. Maii Wolf. accepta ab illo die 11. Jul. dedit libr. in L.	1682, Fri- day May 1.	35 current	I began the General Criticism of the History of Calvinism ; I finished it on the 15th of the same month, and on the 30th I gave it to Wolf- gang, from whom I received it prin- ted on the first of July at which time it was published.
1682, mens Aug.	35. curr.	Visa, emend. & aucta. accep- ta edit. 2a. die lune 29. Nov. dedit libr. in L.	1682, In the month of August.	35 current	I revised, corrected, and enlarged that work, and received a second edition of it, when it was published on Monday November 29.
1682, mens. Oct.	35. exeunt.	Accepta à D. Fatiz. m. s. A- polog. pro bell. civil. quam mi- bi sub. nōie Philar. d. d. & c. impress. Hag. accepta die 21. Feb. 1683.	1682, In the month of October.	35 near the end	I received from Mr Fetizon the M. S. of his Apology for the Civil- Wars , which he dedicated to me un- der the name of Philaretus , and which was printed at the Hague, from whence it was sent to me February 21, 1683.
1683, fer. 4. die 2. Sept.	36. curr.	Absol. 2a. edit. Ep. ad. D. S. contra prę. Com. dedit Typog. 120. Exempl.	1683, Wed- nesday Sep- tember 2.	36 current	The impression of the second edition of the Letter to a Doctor of the Sorbon against the pretences of Comets , was finished. The Booksellers gave me 120 Copies of it.
1683, fer. 4. die 24. Nov.	37. ineunt.	Absol. imprimi à Typogr. Graef Exam. Method. à D. Bajss, Eccl. Rotbom. compositum, & mihi dicat.	1683. Wed- nesday No- vember 24.	37 near the begin- ning.	Mr Graef finished the impression of the Examination of the Methods by Mr Bafnage Minister at Rouen, who dedicated it to me.
1683, mens. Dec.	37. ineunt.	Absol. imp. Profel. ab. in 12. cujus auct. D. La. R. filius mi- bi dicav.	1683, In the month of De- cember.	37 near the begin- ning.	The Impression of the Proselyte a- bajss , in 12mo, was finished: it was wrote by Mr de Larroque the son, and dedicated to me.
1684, fer. 6. die 21. Jan.	37. curr.	Accept. Liber Heidelb. in Brueys exarat. à Theol. Cand. Lenf. postea tradit. Leers Ty- pogr.	1684, Friday January 21.	37 current	I received from Heidelberg, a book against Mr Brueys composed by Mr Lenfant a student of Divinity. I gave it to Mr Leers to be printed.
1684, fer. 5. die 16. Mart.	37. curr.	Acceptum exemplar tractat. in quibus dissertat. lat. in L. à Villa denuo excus. Amstel.	1684, Thurs- day March 16.	37 current	I received a copy of the Collection which contains a Latin dissertation against Louis de la Ville, reprinted at Amsterdam.
1684, fer. 3. die 21. Mart.	37. curr.	Inchoat. Nunc. Reipub. Litterar. & die 4. Apr. inseq. trans- fusa cum Des B. Typ. Amst. & die 27. Maii accepta exempl. mens. 11. die v. 2. Junii accept. exempl. mensis April.	1684, Tues- day March 21.	37 current	I began the News from the Repub- lic of Letters ; and on the 4th of April following, I made an agree- ment with Des Bordes a Bookeller in Amsterdam: on the 27th of May I received copies of the first month (of March) and on the 2d of June I re- ceived copies for the month of April.
1684, fer. 3. die 9. Maii	37. curr.	Accept. Litterę vocat. data Leovard. 21. April. Sty. vet. ad Philosop. Profess. Franek. postea die respons. petens moram: die v. 9. Junii sequente repons. aliud gratias ag.	1684, Tues- day May 9.	37 current	I received Letters from Leewarden of the 21st of April old style, where- in a Professor of Philosophy's chair in the University at Franeker was offered to me. I answered the day after, and desired time to consider of it. And on the 9th of June following I wrote them a letter of thanks.
1684, fer. 3. die 16. Maii.	37. curr.	Accept. Litterę Paris, à D. de Frejeville nunciant. obitum Fra- tris Jos. qui defunc. Paris. de morb. 9. Maii.	1684, Tues- day May 16.	37 current	I received letters from Paris, by Mr de Frejeville, giving me an account of my brother Joseph's death, who died at Paris May 9.

ANNI ÆRÆ CHRIST.	ANNI ÆTAT.		YEARS OF THE CHRIS- TIAN ÆRA.	YEARS OF MY AGE.
1685, fer. 2. die 5. Mart.	38. curr.	Accept. Exemplar Nouv. Let- tres 2. vol. in 12.	1685, Mon- day March 5.	38 current	I received a copy of the New Let- ters concerning the History of Calvi- nism , in two Volumes in 12mo.
1685, fer. 2. die 8. Maii.	38. curr.	Accept. nuncius obit. patris qui contigit die Sabb. 31. mensis Martii.	1685. Mon- day May 8.	38 current	I received the news of my father's death which happened on Sunday March 31.
1685, fer. 4. die 27. Jun.	38. curr.	Accept. Amstel. Literæ Saverd. scriptæ nunciant. Fratrem duum die 10. Jun. in carcer. Appam. inde 10. Jul. transv. Burdig. in arce quæ vulgò Chat. Tr. ubi obiit die 12. Novembr. in se- quent.	1685, Wed- nesday June 27.	38 current	Letters came from Saverdun to Am- sterdam, which gave an account that my brother was carried a prisoner to Famiers on the 10th of June, and on the 10th of July was removed to Bourdeaux to the Castle commonly called Cbâteau Trompette , where he died the 12th of November following.
Mense Octobr.	38. exeunt.	Versa Gallicè Epistola A. Paets de nuperis. Vide Novell. p. 1070.	In the month of October.	38 near the end.	I translated into French Mr Paets's Letter de nuperis &c. See the News from the Republic of Letters. p. 1070.
1686, men. Feb. die 25. fer. 2.	39. curr.	Absoluta impress. Responfionis ad Monit. Arnal. circa de senf. volupt. opinion. Mallebr.	1686, Mon- day Februa- ry 25.	39 current	They finished the Impression of the Anfuer to Mr Arnauld's Advice con- cerning Father Mallebrancibé's opinion about the pleasure of the senses.
Die 6. & 7. men. Mart.	39. curr.	Composita Epist. appendix fus. Libri Deckkerri de adelf.	On the sixth and 7th of March.	39 current	I composed a Letter to be placed by way of Appendix to Mr Deck- ker's book concerning anonymous Au- thors .
Die 22. Mart. fer. 6.	39. curr.	* * * * *	Friday March 22.	39 current	* * * * *
Die 28. Octob. fer. 4.	39. defin.	* * * * *	Wednesday October 28.	39 near the end	* * * * *
1687, fer. 1. die 16. Feb.	40. curr.	Incept morbo laborare quo in- termittere coact. Nouv. de la R. non prorsus peract. mens. Febr.	1687, Sun- day Februa- ry 16.	40 current	I was seized with an illness which obliged me to discontinue the News from the Republic of Letters , without being able to finish the month of Fe- bruary.
		Abruptum omnino opus transf. in potest. D. de Beauv. qui no- vum adorn. mens. 7b. Abruptum quoque Colleg.			I entirely laid down that work and resigned it to Mr de Bauval who published a new Journal in the month of September. I also interrupted my lectures.
Die 10. Jun.	40. curr.	Recept. 3. pars Com. ph. quæ ante morb. absoluta fuer. & Ty- pog. trad. & ante fin. Feb. prorsus typis desjer.	June 10.	40 current	I received the third part of the Philosophical Commentary , which I had finished before my sickness, and given it to the Bookfeller, who had finished the impression before the end of February.
Die 8. Aug.	40. curr.	In viam me dedi tend. Cliv. quo perventum die 13. Aug. po- stero die in hosp. D. Ferrand. past. in Castello usque ad 15. Septemb. Hinc Sylo. Ducis, inde Aquis gr. cum D. D. Piel & Farjon. Versus 18. Oct.	August 8.	40 current	I made a journey to Cleves, where I arrived August 13. Next day I went to lodge with Mr Ferrand Mi- nister of the Castle, and continued with him till the 15th of September. From thence I went to Bois-le-Duc, and afterwards to Aix-la-Chapelle, with Mr Pielat and Mr Farjon. I returned to Rotterdam on the 18th of October.

(2) These two passages are cut in the original: the one related to the impression of la France toute Catholique; and the other to the first and second parts of the Commentaire Philosophique, which appeared at the same time. The third part is mentioned here below, June 10, 1687.

AN ORDER of MR DE LA REYNIE, Lieutenant-General of the Police of the City, Provostship, and Viscounty of Paris, concerning the GENERAL CRITICISM on Mr Maimbourg's HISTORY OF CALVINISM. By the King, and the Provost of Paris, or his Lieutenant-General of the Police.

HEREAS it has been represented to us by the King's Attorney, that certain disaffected persons have imported and sold in this City, several copies of a book, intituled, A General Criticism on Mr Maimbourg's History of Calvinism, printed, as the title page bears, at Ville-Franche by Pierre le Blanc in 1682, wherein the Author of the said book, instead of a just and sober Criticism allowed to men of Letters and erudition, has had the boldness, under the specious title of a Criticism, to advance several calumnious and pretended facts, which tend under a false zeal for Religion to corrupt the fidelity of subjects: and it being for the interest of the public that the sale of so pernicious a book should be prevented, and that they who shall be found to be the Authors, or Printers, Importers, Sellers, or Venders of the same, should be punished according to the rigour of the laws; and the King's Attorney having desired that we should take cognizance thereof. WE having seen the said book, intituled, A General Criticism on Mr Maimbourg's History of Calvinism, printed at Ville-Franche by Peter le Blanc in 1682, as the title bears, containing 338 Pages, and divided into 22 Letters: WE in pursuance of the said petition have declared the book intituled A General Criticism on Mr Maimbourg's History diffamatory and calumnious, and filled with bold and seditious forgeries, and as such we order it to be lacerated and burnt at the Greve, by the hands of the hangman; and that, at the request and by the care of the King's Attorney, informations may be drawn up against those who have composed, printed, imported, sold, or vended the said book, and that process may be commenced and prosecuted against those who shall be found guilty, according to the rigour of the law. EXPRESSLY forbidding all Printers and Booksellers to print, vend, or sell, the said book, under the pain of death; and all other persons, of what quality and condition soever, to make any traffic or sale of the same under the pain of exemplary punishment: and this present Order shall be published and affixed in the usual and accustomed places; and particularly in the Hall of the Booksellers and Printers of this City, that no body may pretend ignorance of the same. Given by Mr GABRIEL NICOLAS DE LA REYNIE Counsellor of State in ordinary, and Lieutenant-General of the Police of the City, Provostship, and Viscounty of Paris, the sixth day of March, one thousand six hundred and eighty three,

Signed

DE LA REYNIE.

DE RIANTZ. SAGOT, Register.

The above Order was read, published, and affixed with sound of trumpet, and public proclamation, in the usual and accustomed places, by me Mark Anthony Pasquier, sworn Cryer in ordinary to his Majesty, in the said City, Provostship, and Viscounty of Paris, living near the Hôtel des Ursins, accompanied with Stephen du Bos, sworn Trumpeter to his Majesty, Philp le Sieû and Louis la Coste, deputy Trumpeters, March 9, 1683.

Signed

PASQUIER.

PRINTED BY DENIS THIERRY, IN THE RUE S. JAKES.

ACTS OF THE CONSISTORY OF THE WALLOON CHURCH OF ROTTERDAM, CONCERNING THE SIEUR BAYLE'S HISTORICAL AND CRITICAL DICTIONARY.

November 3, 1697.

THE Committee appointed by an Act of the fifteenth of September last, having made a report that they had examined the Extracts which Messieurs de Superville and le Page, Ministers, had made of the passages of a book of the Sieur Bayle, intituled, An Historical and Critical Dictionary, which relate to obscenities, and that having compared these Extracts with the said book, they had therein found obscene reflections, indecent expressions and questions, and a great many obscene quotations, as is more fully expressed in a Memoir which they produced concerning the same, wherein these passages are marked. Whereupon the Consistory have thought fit, that the said Memoir should be kept by their Secretary, to be produced when they shall come to a general deliberation with regard to the said book, and mean while the other members of the Consistory, may further examine the said Memoir, and make their remarks upon it betwixt this and a fortnight hence. And it has been thought proper in the mean time that this Act and others of the same nature, which shall be made on this subject, shall not be registered in the book of Acts, except by the express order of the Consistory.

November

November 17, 1697.

The term of a fortnight appointed by the preceeding Act for making remarks on the Memoir mentioned in the said Act being now elapsed, the other members of the Consistory were asked, if they had made any remarks on the same, and no body having declared that they had made any, the Report contained in the said Memoir was agreed to and held as the opinion of the Consistory.

The same Day.

The Committee above-mentioned having made a Report that they had examined the Extracts which Messieurs de Superville and le Page, Ministers, had made of the passages of the above-mentioned book of the Sieur Bayle, in the Article of DAVID, and that having compared the said Extracts with the said book, they had found that the Sieur Bayle had in general drawn a very frightful picture of the conduct and government of this King and Prophet, and that in particular he treats several of his actions in an unworthy and scandalous manner, as this is more fully expressed in a Memoir which the said Committee produced concerning the same, wherein the passages are marked : whereupon the Consistory have thought fit that this Memoir shall be kept as the foregoing one, and the other members of the Consistory may further examine the said Memoir, and make their remarks upon it betwixt this and a fortnight hence.

December 1, 1697.

The term of a fortnight appointed by the preceeding Act for making remarks on the Memoir which relates to the Article DAVID, mentioned in the said Act, being now elapsed, the other members of the Consistory were asked, if they had any remarks on the same, and no body declaring that they had made any ; the Report contained in the same Memoir was agreed to, and held as the opinion of the Consistory.

The same day.

The Committee abovementioned having made a Report that they had examined the Extracts which Messieurs de Superville and Le Page, Ministers, had made concerning the passages in the said book of the Sieur Bayle, in the Articles of the MANICHEANS, MARCIONITES, and PAULICIANS ; and having compared these Extracts with the said book, they had found that Mr Bayle had not only advanced the arguments which the Manicheans had made use of anciently, but had likewise formed new arguments in favour of Manicheism, which even tend to oppose the hypotheses of all Protestant Divines, and that he in the conclusion gives the victory to the Manichean hypothesis which had given great offence to the said Committee, as they have expressed it more at large in a Memoir which the said Committee have produced concerning it, wherein the passages complained of are marked : whereupon the Consistory have thought fit that this Memoir shall be kept as the preceeding, and the other members of the Consistory may further examine the said Memoir, and make their remarks upon it betwixt this and a fortnight hence.

December 8, 1697.

The Committee above-mentioned having made a Report that they had examined the Extracts which Messieurs de Superville and le Page, Ministers, had made of the passages of the said book of the Sieur Bayle, in the Article of PYRRHO, and that having compared the said Extracts with the said book, the said Committee had drawn up a Memoir of what they had found there scandalous and blame-worthy, which Memoir they produced to the Consistory ; whereupon the Consistory have thought fit that this Memoir shall be kept as the preceeding, and that the other members of the Consistory may further examine the said Memoir, and make their remarks upon it betwixt this and the week following.

December 15, 1697.

The term of a fortnight appointed by the second Act of the first instant, for making remarks with relation to the Article of the MANICHEANS, MARCIONITES and PAULICIANS, mentioned in the said Act ; and likewise the term of eight days, appointed by the Act immediately preceeding this, for making remarks on the Memoir relating to the Article of PYRRHO mentioned in the said Act, being now elapsed ; the members of the Consistory were asked if they had made any remarks upon the same, whereupon no body having signified that they had made any, the report contained in the said two Memoirs was agreed to, and held as the opinion of the Consistory.

The same Day.

The Committee abovementioned, having made a report that they had examined the Extracts which Messieurs Superville and le Page, Ministers, had made of the passages of the said book of the Sieur Bayle in diverse Articles with relation to Albeists or Epicureans ; and that having compared the said Extracts with the said book, the said Committee had drawn up a Memoir of such things as they had found scandalous and deserving reproof in it : which Memoir they produced to the Consistory Whereupon the Consistory have thought fit that the said Memoir should be kept as the preceeding, and that the other members of the Consistory may further examine the said Memoir, and make their remarks upon it betwixt this and Sunday next.

The same Day.

Mr le Page, one of our Ministers, informed the Consistory that the Sieur Bayle came to see him on the 10th of this month, to tell him that he had heard that the Consistory were examining his Critical Dictionary. That this had surprized him, because he did not think that Dictionaries were subject to examination ; that he had been assured that we found fault with the articles of DAVID, the MANICHEANS or PAULICIANS, the PYRRHONIANS, and sundry expressions and citations of too free a nature ; that since it was so he designed to soften and rectify these things in a second edition, either by adding or suppressing, and desired that the Consistory might be informed of this his declaration, and that he hoped they would be satisfied with it. Whereupon the Consistory having deliberated, rated, thought fit to appoint an extraordinary meeting on Thursday next on the affair of the said Sieur Bayle.

ACTS OF THE CONSISTORY

Thursday December 19, 1697.

The Consistory being extraordinarily met, according to the abovementioned Act, and having read over the four first Memoirs relating to the affair of the said Sieur Bayle, mentioned in the preceding Acts, they thought fit to acquaint the Sieur Bayle, by the mouth of their Secretary, to appear before them on Tuesday next in the afternoon, at half an hour after three of the clock, on this affair.

Sunday December 21, 1697.

The time appointed by the second Act of the 15th instant, for making remarks on the Memoir relating to several Articles concerning Atheists and Epicureans, mentioned in the said Act, being now elapsed, the other members of the Consistory were asked if they had any remarks on the same. Whereupon no body having signified that they had made any, the report contained in the said Memoir was agreed to, and held as the opinion of the Consistory.

Tuesday December 24, 1697.

The Consistory being extraordinarily assembled, according to the Act of the 19th instant, the Sieur Bayle appeared before them : to whom the Consistory having declared, by the mouth of their President, that they had found in his book, intitled An Historical and Critical Dictionary, several passages which appeared to the Consistory offensive. And in the first place, that they had found in his said book obscene expressions, quotations, and reflexions ; in answer to which the said Sieur Bayle said, " That he was not prepared to answer, not knowing what the Consistory was to propose to him ; and added, " there was a difference betwixt a Philosophical writer or an Historian, and a Divine ; that an Historian ought to be faithful and impartial, and that he is accountable if he gives false relations ; " that he might desire of this Consistory twenty audiences, of two hours each, to lay his reasons before them, but that he would not make use of that method, and that he desired to prevent a long and tedious process ; that he maintained that he had advanced nothing in the said book as his own opinion, which was contrary to our Confessions of Faith, and that he had defended the principal points of Religion in it ; that they ought not to insist on what was only trifling ; that he might criticize upon the Extracts which the Consistory had made, both with regard to facts, and with regard to right ; but that he would not in the least enter into that discussion ; that in the preface to the said book he had declared that he would be ready to correct whatever should be found in it which deserved correction ; and that in the Reflexions which he had published on a pamphlet intitled, The Judgment of the Public, he had made the same declaration ; that he declared once more to the Consistory, that he had resolved to change in a second Edition whatever the Consistory should find fault with, and that he was already at work in correcting the said Book."

The Consistory having deliberated on this Answer, and desired the Sieur Bayle to come in, they told him, by the mouth of their President, that they would not at present enter upon an answer to the abovementioned reasons alledged by him, and as to the resolution which he had declared to them, that it appeared to be too general ; that he had spoke of correcting in a second Edition, and not of retracting ; that the Consistory did not know when that second Edition should be published, and likewise that several accidents might intervene to prevent the execution of it ; that the remarks which the Consistory had made upon the said book were of importance. Whereupon the Sieur Bayle had answered " that he would be ready not only to make alterations in the said book, but likewise to retract what should be thought deserved to be retracted, and that even now, if there be any propositions in it which are laid down as his own opinion, which shall be found contrary to our Religion, that he declared them heretical."

After this the Consistory informed him that they would cause the passages of the said book to be pointed out to him, together with their remarks upon the same, and afterwards appointed Messieurs Pielat, de Superville, and le Page, Ministers ; Messieurs de Fanueil, Diodati, and Vermande, Elders ; and Messieurs de Tinnebacq and de Peyster, Deacons ; to point out to the Sieur Bayle the passages and remarks contained in the five Memoirs which have been made on that subject ; and to hear what the said Sieur should say concerning them, and to make a Report of the same to the Consistory.

January 5, 1698.

The Memoirs of the Committee appointed by an Act of the 24th of December last, reported, that having met on the 30th following, they had laid before the Sieur Bayle, the substance of the Remarks contained in the five Memoirs made with relation to his book, mentioned in the said Act, and having heard the explanations and general answers, and likewise the Sieur Bayle's offers on that subject, they had thought it proper that the Sieur Bayle should put what he had said to them in writing, which the said Sieur Bayle having done, they produced a Memoir of the same subscribed by the said Sieur, which being read before the Consistory, after deliberating thereupon, they thought fit to desire the Members of the said Committee to draw up a sketch of an Answer to the said Memoir, and to communicate the same to the Consistory, which shall extraordinarily meet for that purpose on Tuesday next, and ordered that the Sieur Bayle be summoned to appear before them at that time.

A MEMORIAL presented to the Consistory of the Walloon Church of Rotterdam on Sunday January 5, 1698, concerning the HISTORICAL AND CRITICAL DICTIONARY.

"GENTLEMEN,

"WHAT I had the honour to say to you on the twenty fourth of the last month; and to repeat more at large to your Committee on Monday last, when they read their remarks to me, I now give the Consistory in writing with more particular explanations.

"This may be reduced to two points: The first is, that I have a great many things to alledge both by way of reason and of example in my justification, without a discussion of which this matter cannot in equity be determined by way of decision. The second is, that if to prevent a long process, and other inconveniences, the Consistory think proper to terminate this affair by way of agreement, I will do all that is in my power to facilitate it. For that purpose, I in the first place declare in the sincerest manner, that I never intended to insert any thing in my Dictionary which could give just cause of offence to pious souls. I always hoped that the liberty which I took on certain occasions would be favourably interpreted, because people would observe that it is a Layman and a Philosopher who speaks, and that too in a History, a Criticism, and a large Commentary, and that I have been at pains to add, wherever I thought it was necessary, salvo's and explanations which bring back my reader to the most orthodox principle of our Communion, to wit, that the Scripture is the rule of what we ought to believe, whether our reason can comprehend it or not. I likewise hoped that every body would remember that the quality of Historian puts one under a necessity of relating many things concerning the strong and the weak side of every party, which another Author would not lay, and that the Fathers of the Church have minutely related impurities and obscenities which create horror.

"I declare in the second place that I am extremely sorry, that, contrary to my intention and hopes, several people have been offended at the liberty which I have taken, and that if I had foreseen this I would have carefully abstained from it. And in order effectually to remedy this I promise to rectify in a second edition which I shall presently set about, all the passages which have been complained of. This appears to me to be very easy to be done either by suppressions, additions, or change of expression. By reading the remarks of your Committee, I know these passages more distinctly than I did before. In my corrections I shall have great regard to these remarks, and the rather that I know that they were made by persons of great abilities, and to the good advice and information, which it shall please the Ministers of the Church to favour me with; and I shall much more consider whether a thing may offend part of my readers, than whether it be at bottom true, and not contrary to our Confession of Faith.

"I promise, in particular, to new model the Article of the Prophet DAVID in such a manner, that no stumbling block shall be left there. As to what relates to the Manichean Heresy, I have very distinctly declared that it is horrible, extravagant, contrary to common notions, and that it may be easily overthrown by the Holy Scripture. I have only maintained, that the objections concerning the Origin of Evil cannot be solved by the strength of reason, and I believed that this was saying no more than what all our Divines confess concerning the incomprehensibility of Predestination. Notwithstanding I promise to consider that matter over again, and to seek for philosophical reasons against these objections. And if your Reverend Ministers will be so good as to take the trouble of furnishing me with any, I will make use of them in the best manner I am able, and that with the greater pleasure that Manicheism is an abominable heresy with regard to Morality, and ridiculous and monstrous with regard to Metaphysics. What I promise with relation to this Article ought likewise to be understood in particular with regard to that of PYRRHO.

"In a word, I declare that I will receive with joy, and with an intention to profit by them all the advices that may be communicated to me, in order to render my book more useful to the public, and more edifying to the churches; and especially I will receive with great submission the good advices of the Consistory.

"I have only two things farther, Gentlemen, to declare to you. The first is, that I never designed to advance as my own opinion any doctrine contrary to the Confession of Faith of the Reformed Church, of which I profess myself a member, and in which I beg the grace of God that I may live and die. If therefore there be any such doctrine found in my writings, I disown it, and from this day forth entirely retract it. The second thing is, that I have good ground to hope that the Consistory having nothing in view but the peace and edification of the public, will be fully content with what is above; for methinks it is all that can be required of an Author in such a case. Besides, that by taking the way of a formal process, the Consistory must be sensible that it will be drawn into great length, that I have reasons to offer in my justification on every article; that it may perhaps be necessary to pass from one Court to another, and even come to printed Cases, which will only tend to excite new troubles without any advantage to the Church, and on the contrary will give pleasure to our adversaries.

"If all that I have said above should not be able to bring this matter to an amicable issue, and if notwithstanding thereof this affair should come to be tried by way of process, I desire that nothing that I have said above may prejudice my cause, either as to my pretensions of challenging some persons, if that shall be found necessary, or to the method of appeal, if that be found requisite. I desire likewise that what I have said either to the Consistory, or to the Gentleman of the Committee, may not be taken as part of my Defence."

And it was signed BAYLE.

Tuesday, January 7, 1698.

The Consistory being extraordinarily assembled in consequence of the last Act, and finding that they were not a sufficient number, though all the members were particularly acquainted to meet, that they might come to a resolution on this affair, and considering the shortness of the time, the Consistory being to be changed on Sunday next; after having examined the sketch of an Answer drawn by the Committee, mentioned in the preceding Act, they have thought fit only to read the said sketch to the Sieur Bayle, who having desired a copy of it, the Consistory came to no resolution thereupon, but thought proper to meet again on Thursday next.

Thursday, January 9, 1698.

The Consistory being once more extraordinarily assembled, in consequence of the preceding Act, and having read the sketch of an Answer, drawn up by the Committee, and communicated to the Sieur Bayle, as is mentioned in the preceding Act, unanimously approved of the same. The tenour whereof is as follows:

The Consistory continuing to deliberate concerning Mr Bayle's affair, after having heard the said Sieur Bayle's explanations and general answers, both in full Consistory on Thursday the 24th of December last, and on Monday the 30th of this month, in presence of the Committee who communicated to him by word of mouth the substance of the five Memoirs drawn up by the Consistory concerning his Dictionary, and have made a report of the whole on Sunday last, the 5th instant; after having likewise examined the paper presented to the Consistory, on Sunday last above-mentioned, by the said Sieur Bayle, and signed by him, in which he lays down his intentions and designs more distinctly.

The Consistory declare that they are glad to observe,

I. That the said Sieur Bayle protests that he desires to live and die in the profession of the Reformed Religion which it has pleased God to make known to him, and in which he has continued until now, disowning and retracting from this day forth all that he may have advanced in his works contrary to our Confession of Faith, supposing that there be any such thing in them, which he doth not believe, he having always had a contrary intention.

II. That the said Sieur Bayle is extremely sorry that, contrary to his intentions and hopes, many persons have been offended at the liberty which he has taken in his Dictionary, and that if he had foreseen this he would have carefully abstained from it.

III. That he abhors Manicheism, as a heresy which is entirely destroyed by the Scripture, and which is abominable, and monstrous with regard to Morality as well as Metaphysics, adding that he will be at all possible pains to refute it, which he also promiseth with regard to Pyrrhonism.

IV. That in particular he designs to correct the Article DAVID in such a manner, that no stumbling-block shall remain there.

V. And lastly, that to satisfy the complaints which have been made against his Dictionary, he designs to set about a second edition without delay; in which he will change, correct, rectify, and suppress, every thing that may have given offence, and that in order to render that edition more correct, he will have great regard to the Memoirs which have been communicated to him by the Consistory, and to whatever advice they shall please to give him.

The Consistory is very glad to see Mr Bayle in these dispositions: but they cannot approve of divers other things which the said Sieur Bayle has inserted in his paper, as among other things, that he pretends that he could justify what he has advanced in his Dictionary, if it should come to a discussion, and that he speaks of the reasons which he will then alledge, as reasons which are sufficient to justify him, so that it seems that it is only out of condescendence, and that he may not give offence to pious souls, that he is willing to correct and rectify his work, and not that at bottom he is obliged to do it, or that the work has need of it, because in quality of a Layman, Philosopher, Historian, and Commentator, it was lawful for him to advance many things, which would not be allowed in another Author. The Consistory cannot approve of these exceptions, as the President will represent to Mr Bayle more at large, yet in the mean while being willing to take the most indulgent method to endeavour to put an end to this affair, they are of opinion that in order thereunto it is necessary,

I. That Mr Bayle acquiesce in the remarks which have been made by the Consistory, that he acknowledge the solidity of them, and promise to profit by them, and conform to them in a second edition. These remarks relate 1. to the Obscenities dispersed in the work. 2. The Article of David. 3. Manicheism. 4. Pyrrhonism. 5. The excessive praises given to Atheists, with the consequences he draws from thence. Concerning which he shall declare his sorrow that he has given ground of complaint.

II. It is necessary that the Sieur Bayle should promise that for the future he will take great care to advance nothing in his writings, which may offend either the purity of Morality, or the truth of Doctrine: but on the contrary that he will dedicate the talents, which God has given him, to the defence of both, and to the edification of the Church.

III. That to repair the scandal already given, and for the edification of the public, Mr Bayle shall be earnestly exhorted, not to wait for a second edition of his Dictionary, which may be a long while hence, but with the first opportunity to print something in which he shall acquaint the public with the sentiments which he has declared to us concerning the points proposed to him.

Afterwards Mr Bayle being come in, the President once more read the before-mentioned sketch to him, which was now held as the opinion of the Consistory, and asked him what he had to answer thereto. Whereupon the said Sieur Bayle declared that he acquiesced in this resolution, and at the same time delivered the following Memoir written and signed by him:

" Gentlemen,

" B EING persuaded that the Consistory have nothing else in view, in terminating this affair, but sincerely to promote the edification of the public and the glory of God, and being desirous to concur with them to the utmost of my power, in so good a design, I accept of the conditions contained in an Act which was read to me on the seventh instant; and I declare in particular with regard to the remarks which have been communicated to me by the Consistory, that I acquiesce in them as a rule which I will punctually follow in the correction of my Dictionary for a new edition.

" I shall

OF THE WALLOON CHURCH OF ROTTERDAM. CXXVII

“ I shall likewise comply with the exhortation of the Consistory to the utmost of my power, concerning a piece to be published before the new edition, and I hope that this shall not be long delayed.

“ I hope and humbly desire the Consistory that they will be pleased not to allow their remarks and other paper relating to this affair, to fall into the hands of people who may make a bad use of them, by publishing pieces which can only do prejudice to the edification of souls, both in themselves and by the answers which I may be obliged to make to them. At Rotterdam, January 9, 1698.”

And was signed

BAYLE.

Thereafter Mr Bayle being withdrawn, the Consistory, after having deliberated on his answer, resolved to rest satisfied with it, because he agreed to every thing which they had desired of him, he acquiesced in the remarks of the Consistory on his Dictionary, and promised to publish, as soon as possible, a piece which should acquaint the public with his good dispositions. They were of opinion, that by putting an end to that affair in this manner, the Church would be more edified than by long debates; besides, that this would be the most effectual means of engaging Mr Bayle to employ his talents for the advancement of our Lord's Kingdom. Being therefore called in again to the Consistory, the President told him, I. That the Consistory was satisfied with his answer. II. That they assured him that the papers which had passed betwixt him and them, should not be given to any body to be published, that this was not the practice of the Consistory, and that they knew very well that after matters were determined, it was not fit to awaken them again by printed papers. III. That neither did the Consistory doubt that he would on his part fulfil his promise of publishing very soon a paper wherein he should inform the public of the good sentiments which he had testified to them, and that the sooner that paper should appear, the better it would be. And this the said Mr Bayle once more promised to do. After which the President represented to him that the more talents God had bestowed on him, the more he was bound to dedicate them to his glory. That he ought to labour to edify the Church, and that they hoped that for the future he would endeavour to do so; that the Consistory earnestly exhorted him to it, and that on that condition they prayed that God would bless his labours. Mr Bayle assured the Consistory that he would answer their expectations, and thanked them for their good wishes.

All the above written Acts down to this day, January 11, 1698, were read and approved of by the Consistory, this 11th of January 1698, and signed LE PAGE, Minister; PIELAT, Minister; DE SUPERVILLE, Minister; BASNAGE, Minister; J. V. KAEREN, Elder; F. VAN SCHONHOVEN, Elder; JOHN FANUEIL, Elder; JACOB VERMANDE, Elder; THEODORE SYSMUS, Deacon and Secretary; D. PRINS, Deacon; GOUERT COOLBRANT; PETER BALDE; ISAAC RERDOES, Deacon; G. ALLART, Deacon; JOHN DE PEYSTER, Deacon.

December 7, 1698.

The Committee appointed by the Act of the 28th of September to consider Mr Bayle's affair, made their Report. Whereupon the Consistory find that

I. The printed Letter of the said Mr Bayle appeared later than they had reason to expect, and that it would have been to be wished that Mr Bayle had published it sooner according to his promise.

II. That the said Mr Bayle did not send a copy of it to the Consistory: notwithstanding he was obliged to show them that he had fulfilled his engagement.

III. That the number of copies of that Letter was too small, and that there have been none to be had at the Booksellers this great while past; so that it seems as if it was intended that the Letter should be suppressed as soon as it was published, and put in the hands of as few persons as possible, which is contrary the intention of the Consistory, which desired that the public should be informed of the declarations which Mr Bayle had made concerning that affair.

IV. And what is more important, that Mr Bayle has passed lightly over the matters which had given offence, and even speaks of them as things that may be defended, pretending that he could defend what he has advanced in his Dictionary, because, in quality of Commentator and of Historian, it was allowable in him to speak otherwise than if he had been writing in the dogmatical way: an excuse which he had alledged in his paper of the 5th of January 1698, but which they had told him was by no means to be received, upon which he acquiesced simply in the Remarks of the Consistory, and acknowledged the solidity of them, and promised to submit to the same; which is a circumstance he ought to have taken notice of in his printed Letter, as being necessary to the satisfaction which was required of them.

For these and other reasons, the Consistory being of opinion that Mr Bayle's printed Letter only in part satisfies what he had promised, and so they might justly desire something farther of him, yet notwithstanding that they might not depart from the indulgent method which they had already taken, the Consistory may content themselves with representing these things by word of mouth to Mr Bayle, and earnestly exhorting him to a punctual performance of his promises: and the Consistory will take this method, being persuaded that the Sieur Bayle will, in the second Edition of his Dictionary sincerely correct the things which have been pointed out to him, and will make good use of the advices which they have given him; which is the principal thing that the Consistory proposed to itself in the whole of this affair, because they consider it as of importance to the glory of God, and the edification of the Church.

And farther that Mr Bayle who has promised to make use of the Remarks of the Consistory, may do it the more easily, the Consistory think fit that the Ministers who have already been employed in this affair, should draw up some succinct Memorials concerning the Remarks which the Consistory have made, to which they may add some others on important points, that after the Consistory shall have approved of the said Memorials, they may be put in Mr Bayle's hands, that he may remember and have regard to them.

The Consistory likewise being of opinion that our much honoured brother Mr Jurieu, one of our Ministers, having been very ill treated by Mr Bayle in his work; it is proper to acquaint the latter of the same, and to exhort him for the future to behave with more moderation, both in the second Edition of his Dictionary, and in the other volumes which he promiseth to the public, the Consistory having observed, not without grief, that so little regard has been had for a Minister whose ministry and labours have been and are of singular edification to the Church.

December 20, 1698.

The Committee, appointed by an Act of the 7th of December, read to the Consistory the succinct Memorials concerning the Remarks of the Consistory on Mr Bayle's paper, and likewise their Remarks on the most important points in the Dictionary of the said Sieur Bayle, which are approved of by the Consistory, and it is resolved that the same be communicated to Mr Bayle by Messieurs Pielat, Superville, Le Page, and Fanueil.

A Short MEMORIAL of the principal things to which Mr Bayle ought to have regard, in order to correct them in the second edition of his DICTIONARY.

THE Consistory being informed that a second edition of the Historical and Critical Dictionary, is actually in the press, think themselves obliged to acquaint Mr Bayle in consequence of what has formerly passed betwixt the Consistory and him. That he ought to remember the following things, in order to have regard to them in the corrections which he promised to make in his book.

1. He shall carefully shun all obscenities, and suppress the impure expressions, citations, questions, and reflexions; remembering that purity of spirit, as well as of body, is one of those things which are most recommended to us in the Scripture, and that all wise men ought to take great care not to favour Libertinism, which is but too common in this age, and to which the youth have but too great propensity.

2. He shall entirely reform the article of DAVID, so that pious souls may no longer be offended at it, as he has promised: and in order to this he shall conform himself to what the Holy Scripture tells us of that great Prophet. He ought even to write a vindication of him, and observe that during the life of Saul, David was the rightful King; and far from judging of the actions of that Prince by the common and ordinary course of the Kings of the earth, he shall show that he was authorized to extirpate the Canaanites. That the High-Priest, by whose means he consulted God, was a particular rule to him; that we ought to be silent where the Scripture is silent; and that its silence, far from giving a pretence against David, is rather equivalent to an approbation; and, in fine, he shall take care to establish well the prophetic and canonical authority of David's writings.

3. With regard to Manicheism, instead of displaying the sophisms of the Manicheans, and lending them reasons and new objections which they never alledged, and endeavouring to free their hypotheses from the difficulties which render it ridiculous, Mr Bayle shall refute them, and shall take care not to give the victory to so detestable and monstrous a heresy. For that purpose he shall correct the articles MANICHEANS, MARCIONITES, PAULICIANS, and likewise divers passages in his book which seem to favour their opinion, or the difficulties which they alledge against the permission of evil.

4. He shall observe the same conduct with regard to the Pyrrhonians and Pyrrhonism, which extinguisheth all Religion, and reform the article PYRRHO, taking care, both there and every where else, not to injure our mysteries.

5. He shall not give extravagant praises to Atheists or Epicureans. He shall correct the passages which may contain any affectation in favour of them, and he shall not weaken the necessity of believing a God and a Providence, and even a future life, with regard to the benefit of civil society, and the reformation of manners. He shall rather insert clauses which may serve to inspire his readers with a horror against Atheism; and shall endeavour to show that altho' Atheists have been regular in their manners, that this did not proceed from Atheism, but only from a self-love, which was always irregular. He may even bring examples, which he may know, of many Atheists who have been very vicious and very infamous.

6. Besides these five principal heads, which have been already mentioned to Mr Bayle, and which he has promised to correct, as he has likewise promised to the Consistory to receive all the other informations which they shall give him, and to make use of the same, the Consistory do exhort him to take care, in the sixth place, not to refute, except on very good grounds, what our Divines have advanced concerning certain wicked Popes; since tho' he may alledge some conjectures in defence of these Popes, with regard to certain facts, strong reasons may be opposed to him for their condemnation, and that it is unjust, without necessity, to favour the party of seducers, who have done so much hurt to the Church, and to make our authors pass for rash accusers.

7. He shall likewise revise the Articles of NICOLE and PELISSON, which contain divers things which seem to lead to Pyrrhonism, and are hurtful to the way of Examination, by which Protestants pretend that we can and ought to come to the knowledge of the truth.

8. He shall take care in speaking of Providence, not to exaggerate and magnify the difficulties of the prophane, and not give their objections an air of superiority over our answers, even in refuting those which are agreeable to Scripture: whereupon they particularly point out to him the Article of RUFINUS. He shall likewise revise the Article of XENOPHANES, in which he exaggerates the victories of the Devil.

9. It is likewise to be wished that he would have greater regard to the expressions of the Scripture in the allusions which he sometimes makes.

Mr Bayle shall have regard to all these heads to conform his corrections to them, and shall endeavour to purge his book of every thing that may have given offence to true believers. The Consistory declaring that they have only made these remarks on what appeared to them to be most essential, and that they do not pretend thereby to approve of the rest of the work.

They think themselves obliged to acquaint Mr Bayle, that Mr Jurieu, one of our Ministers, having been very ill used in his book, they desire that he may behave for the future with greater moderation, both in the second edition of his Dictionary, and in the other volumes which he promiseth to the public, and they exhort him to do so, having observed, not without sorrow, that so little regard has been had for a Minister whose ministry and labours have been and are of singular edification to the Church.

Approved and Resolved in Consistory, on the 20th of December 1698.

Mr B A Y L E's

Historical and Critical

DICTIONARY.

A.

(a) Tis intittled, Aaron purgatus. It was reprinted at Francfort in 1675 in 8vo. This differs from the Edition in 12mo at Leipsic, in 1689, mentioned in the 27th Vol. of the Biblio-theque Uni-verselle, in nothing but a new Title which the Booksellers gave it.

AARON, High-Priest of the Jews, and Brother of Moses. His History is so fully related in the Pentateuch, and in the Dictionaries of Moreri and Mr Simon, that I may be excused from making an Article of it in this place. I shall only observe, That his Weakness in complying with the superstitious Request of the Israelites, in the Matter of the Golden Calf, has occasioned a great Variety of fabulous Notions [A]. About the Beginning of the XVIIIth Century, one Monceau or Moncaius, published an Apology for Aaron (a), which was condemned by the Inquisition at Rome, as had been foretold to the Author by the Jesuit Cornelius à Lapide (b). In that Apology it is supposed that Aaron designed to represent the very same Form which Moses exhibited some time after, namely, a Cheru-bim; but that the Hebrews fell down and worshiped it, contrary to his Intention. An effectual Confutation of this Notion was published in the Year 1609, by one of the Doctors of the Sarbonne, who was a Canon of the Church of Amiens (c). It has been asserted, that this criminal Compliance of Aaron was owing to his Apprehensions of being stoned to Death; and that he hoped to have eluded the Desires of the People, by proposing to the Women, on this Occasion, that they should contribute their Earrings;

(b) Corn. à Lapide Comment.
in Exod.
cap. xxxii.
ver. 4. pag.
605.
(c) His Name was Vifort-
us; and his Book was called, De-structio Pseudo-Cherubi Moncaii.

[A] Occasioned a great Variety of fabulous Notions.]

(1) *Corn. à
Lap. in Exod. pag.
605.*

(2) *Acemeli taurum fudit corpo-rum, emittentem mu-gillum. i. e.
Acemeli
est a real Bull that bellow'd.*
*Azra xxx.
Lat. Cod.
xx Arabici
de Diis Syr.
Synt. 1. cap.
4. pag. 54.*

(3) See pag.
329. of Jeremlah de Pours's Divine Melody.

I. Rabbi Solomon held (1) that the Calf which the Israelites worshiped was alive, and that Aaron seeing it walk and eat like other Calves, erected an Altar to
it. There is something analogous to this in the Alcoran (2). II. Several Rabbies, in order to excuse Aaron, affirm, that he did not make the Golden Calf; that he only contributed so far towards it, as to cast the Gold into the Fire, to free himself from the People's vehement Importunity; but that certain Magicians, who had mingled with the Israelites at their coming up out of Egypt, communicated to that Gold the Image of a Calf. As the holy Scripture declares it was Calf-work, and fashioned with the Graving-Tool, two Things may be supposed; either, that they prepared a Mould in the Shape of a Calf, into which they poured the molten Gold; or, that, having produced a Mats of Gold, they gave it the Figure of a Calf by the Sculptor's Art. III. Many maintain, that Aaron did not make a whole Calf, but only the Head. IV. Some tell us (3), That the Powder of the Golden Calf burnt by Moses, which he mingled with the Water that the Israelites drank, stuck in the Beards of those who had worshiped it; by which means their Beards appeared gilt, as a special Mark distinguishing the Idolaters. This Fable is inserted in the 22d Chapter of Exodus, in a French Bible, printed at Paris, in the Year 1538, by Anthony Bonnemere, who says in his Preface, That this Bible in the French Tongue was first printed, at the Desire of his most Christian Majesty Charles VIII. in the Year 1495, and has since been corrected and reprinted. And in the same Preface he informs us, That the French Translator had inserted nothing but pure Truth, as it is found in the Latin Bible; and that nothing was omitted, but what was improper to be translated. So that all which relates to the gilt Beards is to be received as undoubted Fact, as well as another Story of the same kind, which is also inserted in this very Chapter; namely, That the Children of Israel spit so violently in the Face of Hu- who had refused to make Gods for them, that they suffocated him. The Book (4) from which I extract this, was written by a Walloon Minister, who fails not to exclaim against the Impudence of adding in some Places, and suppressing in others. But he is guilty of both: in his own Version he has artfully soiled in some things, and drop'd others; besides inserting childish Traditions: And yet he promises in the Preface nothing but pure Truth, and declares, that this Translation was undertaken not for the Clergy, but for the Laity, Hermits, and the lower Orders of religious Societies, who are not so learned as they should be. Which is the very Thing that renders the Translator's Unfaithfulness more culpable: for the skillful may escape the Snare;

the ignorant cannot. Lastly, The Golden Beard is not the sole Chimera which the Rabbies have invented.
Another of their Tenets is, that the Water, which Moses compell'd them to swallow, impregnated with the Particles of the Gold, whereof their Calf was made, had almost the same Effect as the Waters of Jealousy. It produced Tumours and Ulcers in the guilty, and brought no harm on the innocent (5).

(4) *Tis intitled La Divine Mélodie du Saint Psa-lme, Printed at Middelbourg in 1644 in 4to.
The Author calls himself Jeremlah de Pours.*

(5) See *Ma-
lian*, vol. 2.
pag. 165.
Bocharti Hierozoic.
pars 2. lib.
2. c. p. 31.

AARON. AARSENS.

Rings; imagining that they would chuse to renounce the Presence of a Visible Deity, rather than divest themselves of their personal Ornaments: but he found, that nothing is accounted too costly, when the human Mind is intoxicated with Superstition and Idolatry (d). They, who affirm that the Golden Calf was only Wood overlaid with Gold [B], find nothing in the holy Scripture, that can in the least countenance any such Pretence. That God suspended the natural Effects of Fire, for the sake of Aaron, as he did on behalf of the three Children in the fiery Furnace at Babylon, is, I am persuaded, an Assertion not to be maintained; and yet there are some Writers who have held that Opinion [C].

[B] That the Golden Calf was only Wood overlaid with Gold. The holy Scripture tells expressly (6) that it was a Molten Calf, and, tho' it is afterwards said (7) that Moses burnt it, and reduced it to Powder, it does not necessarily follow, that the Idol was composed of combustible Materials: It may only signify, that Moses melted down the Gold again, and divided it into very minute Particles, which became imperceptible upon being thrown into the Water; like those with which the Waters of the Tagus and Padulus are said to abound. So that Francis Junius may be mistaken when he says, (8) Quamvis non tam existimari possit Vitulus iste totus ex auro fuisse compositus, quam autem tantummodo obductus, et extra lignum, ut quere. Littere tradunt, combustum, etque in Aeres effusum. That is, But it is rather to be thought, that this Calf was only covered over with a thin Plate of Gold, the rest of it being nothing but Wood; than that the whole was entirely of cast Gold; since the holy Scripture assures us that it was burnt, and reduced to Ashes. He had more Reason for placing Aaron at the Head of his Catalogue of ancient Sculptors, Architects, Painters, Statuaries, &c. Aaron might have claimed that Distinction by Right of Antiquity, tho' the mere Order of the Alphabet had not bellow'd it upon him. This brings into my Mind the Assertion of some who contend that Moses was Master of the profoundest Secrets of Chemistry, since he knew how to pulverize Gold. Many are of Opinion, that Aaron only ordered the Artificers to cast the Golden Calf, and had no hand in it himself; and that Moses did not command the Israelites to drink the Powder of that Gold: but, having thrown it into the Stream, the only Place they could possibly drink at, it may justly be said, that he made them swallow the Idol they had worshipped (9).

[C] There are some Writers who have held that Opinion. A Cordelier, a Doctor of Divinity, of the Faculty of Paris, maintains, that the Miracle of the burning Bush at Horeb, which stood unconsumed in the midst of Flames (10), was repeated some time after, when the Fire flew two of Aaron's Sons, without damaging their Shirts; and again, when Aaron flopt the Plague which had swept away a great Number of Israelites (11). Sicut factum est, quando egressus ignis à Domino Nadab & Abiud ignem alienum & prophanum coram Domino offerentes devoravit, id est, interfecit: vestibus & tunica eorum lincis intactis remanentibus. Idem judicium est de Aaron summo sacerdote, qui citissime profectus est ad populum, quem ignis egressus à facie Domini interfecit: stetitque illæsus inter mortuos ac viventes, licet esset in medio flammæ fulgentissimæ & flagrantissimæ, secundam Josephum, lib. 4. Antiq. Cap. 3. (12). That is, As it came to this Golden Fire from the LORD devoured Nadab and Abihu, whilst they were offering strange and prophan Fire before the LORD; their Coats and linen Garments remaining untouched: The same is remarkable of Aaron the High Priest, who ran into the midst of the People, whom Fire, proceeding from the Face of the LORD, was consuming; and stood there unburt between the Living and the Dead, tho' in the midst of a most bright and intense Flame, according to Josephus, in the 3d Chapter of his 4th Book of Antiquities. To this, among other Examples, he adds that of Shadrach, Meshack and Abdenago, who escaped untouched out of the fiery Furnace at Babylon. Let it be here particularly remark'd, that he quotes not the holy Scripture, but Josephus, in relation to Aaron. And the Scripture (13) determines not whether that Plague, which Aaron flopped, and by which 14700 Persons perished, was a miraculous Fire, or something else. The Jewish Historian has entirely suppressed this Miracle: he only mentions the Fire which consumed the 250 Men that offered Incense. The Scripture mentions this likewise (14), but as a Fact preceding the Destruction stay'd by Aaron. Observe, Josephus contents himself with remarking, that the supernatural Fire which consumed Corah, and the 1250 Men that offered Incense, did no hurt to Aaron. He does not once touch upon the Circumstances for which Nadin cites him. We shall here transcribe his very Words. ὅτι ἡ πόλις, ὅτι τὸ διακρίνει καὶ ἐντέλλεται καὶ Κόρη, δίκαιος ἐν αὐτῇ, ἐξ ὁμοκαρδίας καὶ τῆς ἐκείνου αὐτὸν ἀποφύγει γυναικῶν πορεύεται δὲ μόνος Ἀαρὼν μὴδὲν ὑπὸ τῷ πυρὶ βασανῆ, τὸ τὸν θεὸν εἶναι τὸν θεὸν ἰδοὺ καὶ ἀπεκαλύπτει (15). That is, By the Force of which [Fire] rising upon them, the 250 Men, together with Corah, were so entirely consumed, that their dead Bodies could not be found. Aaron alone remain'd unhurt; because it was GOD, who directed the Fire against those only who were guilty. Here he justly acknowledges the Finger of God, but does not particularly inform us, whether the Fire actually touched the Body of Aaron; or whether God only withheld it from approaching him. Father Nadin therefore ought not to have descended from Generals to Particulars; nor to have quoted, for that purpose, the Jewish Historian. Most of the Faults of this kind, which in Books are infinite, are occasioned, either by Authors not consulting the Originals, or by their having the Confidence to alter them with their Paraphrases, the better to accommodate them to their own Schemes.

"AARSENS (FRANCIS) Lord of Somel'dyck, and Spyck, &c. was one of the "greatest Ministers the United Provinces have produced, for Negotiation [A]. "His Father, who was also a Man of great Abilities, enjoyed such a Post, as enabled

[A] Was one of the greatest Ministers — for Negotiation. His very Enemies allow him this Character, when they affirm, That he (1) was the most dangerous Genius that ever arose in the United Provinces, and was the more to be dreaded, as he concealed all the Malice and Guile of foreign Courts, under the false and deceitful Appearance of Dutch Candour and Simplicity; that he was zealous and Master of the Art of Persuasion; that he could find Reasons to support the worst of Causes; that he had (2) a Genius for Intrigue, and had entered into Leagues and Correspondencies with those Grandes of France, whose Conduct was not only suspected, but odious to the King; and that having corrupted the French Ambassador's Secretary at the Hague (3), he was Master of all the most secret Schemes of the Ministers of that Crown. I say, when they give him this Character, they describe a Man admirably furnished with all the Talents requisite for the most important Embassies, and the most delicate Negotiations. Farther, Mr Du Maurier, who always inveighs most bitterly against Francis Aarsens, takes care to prevent the Prejudice his Invectives might raise in his Readers; for he himself tells us, that his Father and this Dutch Ambassador were ever at Enmity (4); that there was an irreconcilable Disagreement in their Tempers; and that the strong Aversion they had conceived against each other, instead of wearing off, was continually increasing. He even tells us, That his Father made a Speech against Francis Aarsens, on the 13th of November 1613, before the States General (5), wherein he reproaches him with having presumed to speak disrespectfully of their Gallic Majesty, and the Lords of their Council, who were the solid Support of the Liberty of the United Provinces; and accuses him of Arrogance and Vanity in his common Discourses, and of Ingratitude, in returning nothing but Insolence for all the kind Offices that France had heap'd upon him. Thus has he furnished us with an effectual Antidote against his Poison; for who does not know, that an Author is not to be underfoot too vigorously, when he is speaking of his protect'd Enemy?

"him

(6) Coln. 3. L. 18. in Exod. p. 23. 60.

(6) Exod. xxii. 4. (7) Ibid. ver. 20.

(8) In his Catal. Artificum, p. 1.

(9) See Rivetus upon the 32d Ch. of Exod. Tom. I. p. 1184. (10) Exod. iii. 2.

(11) Lev. x. 2, 5.

(1) Du Maurier Mem. p. 376.

(2) Ibid. 378.

(3) Ibid. 381.

(12) Joann. Nodin. Comment. in Exod. cap. 3. pag. 142. col. 2.

(13) Num. xvi. 46, 47. &c.

(14) Ibid. ver. 35.

(15) Joseph. Antiq. lib. 4. cap. 3. Hudson.

(4) Ibid. 388.

(5) Ibid. 381.

" him to procure an Employ for his Son [B]. John & Olden-Barnevelt, who at that Time had the chief Direction of the Affairs of Holland, and all the United Provinces, sent him into France, with the Character of Agent. There he learnt the Art of Negotiation, under those great Masters, Henry IV. Villeroy, Rôni, Sillery, Jeannin, &c. and succeeded so well in it, as to gain their Approbation of his Conduct. He had afterwards the Character of Ambassador conferr'd upon him, and was the first, whom the Court of France considered in that Quality: And it was in his Time that Henry IV. declared, the Ambassador of the United Provinces, should take Place immediately after the Ambassador of Venice. He was some time after employ'd to that Republic [C], and to several Princes of Germany and Italy, on Account of the Commotions in Bohemia [D]. Besides which, he was sent upon several extraordinary Embassies into France and England [E], of which he has left very exact and judicious Collections. We may observe from them, that all his Instructions, and Credentials, in his later Embassies, were drawn up by himself; whence we may judge, that no State ever produced a Minister better qualify'd, not only to negotiate, but to instruct an Ambassador in the proper Points of his intended Negotiation. And, indeed, in all his Embassies, he did Honour to the State, as well as to the Character with which his Masters had invested him; nor could himself, or his Family, regret the Time [F] he spent in the Service of his Country (a). He died in a good old Age, leaving behind him one Son, who was esteem'd the richest Man in Holland [G], and well known by the Name of Monf. de Sommerdyck (b).

(a) Taken from Wicquefort's Ambassador. Tom. 2. p. 435, 43.

(b) It is thus prov'd, that the Name is Somersdyck.

(c) Du Maurier Mem. p. 377, 378.

[B] His Father enjoy'd such a Post, as enabled him to procure an Employ for his Son.] His Name was Cornelius Aarsens (6); and he was Register of the States. He was acquainted with Mr du Pleffis Myrnai, who was transacting Affairs with William Prince of Orange, whom he intreated to take his Son into his Service. This was comply'd with, and continu'd some Years. In 1598, this young Gentleman, who understood the French Tongue, and the Affairs of the Kingdom, succeeded Levin Caluad, who died Resident for the United Provinces, at the Court of Henry IV. nor was he any thing more than the State's Resident till 1609, when, upon the Conclusion of a twelve Years Truce, in which Spain treated with the United Provinces, as with a free People, Henry IV. acknowledg'd him for their Ambassador (7). During his Stay in France, which was fifteen Years, he received great Favours, and even Honours, from the King; who rais'd him to the Degree of Nobility, and made him a Knight, and a Baron: for which Reason, he was afterwards receiv'd in Holland, among the Nobility of the Province. He became at last so odious to that Court, according to Mr du Maurier, that they desired he might be recall'd. See below, the Remark [D].

(7) Ibid.

[C] To that Republic.] To this Juncture of Time must be refer'd what Cardinal Pallavicini reproach'd Father Paul with. He is in Possession (he says) of a Letter (8) of the Seur de Zulichem, Secretary to the Prince of Orange, in which he relates, that, at an accidental Interview at Venice with the Seur de Sommerdyck, Ambassador of Holland, and Francis Paolo, the good Father assur'd that Minister of his extreme Pride in beholding the Representative of a Republic, which held the Pope to be the true Antichrist. The Author of a Book, entituled Cancellaria Secreta Anhaltina, has preserv'd some Fragments of this Letter, by which it appears, that Francis Aarsens, when he went to Venice, had Authority to negotiate with the Protestant Cantons, and that he receiv'd great Honours from them. This was a Year after the Deputation of the Swiss Ministers, to the Synod of Dort. Gratias se imprimis egisse, quod Civitates & Oppida non Catholica Prædicantes suis ANNO PRÆTERLAPSO ad Synodum Dordracensem dimiserint (9). He was particularly thankful, that the Protestant States and Towns, had, THE YEAR BEFORE, deputed their Preachers to the Synod of Dort.

(8) See the Preface to the Hist. of the Council of Trent, translated by A. Houllaye.

(9) Carcell. An. salt. p. 251.

[D] On Account of the Commotions in Bohemia] This fell out in the Year 1620, and it is remarkable, that the King of France (10) forbade his three Ambassadors, the Duke d'Angoulême, the Count de Bethune, and the Abbot des Praux, to receive the Visits of Mr d'Aarsens, who was employ'd by the United Provinces, to treat with certain Princes of Germany and Italy, concerning the same Affairs of Bohemia, which were the Purport of the French Embassy. Their Order importeth, that the King was not displeased with the States, with whom he desired always to live in perfect Harmony, but had a particular Dislike to Mr d'Aarsens, for ill

" treating the Service and Dignity of his Majesty. The Ground of this Displeasure, as any one will perceive, who is the least acquainted with the Affairs of those Times, was this: Aarsens had put himself at the Head of that Party, which, in 1619, oppos'd an Affair, which was negotiated with great Earnestness, at the Hague, by the King's Ambassadors Boissie and du Maurier. Add to these Words of Mr Wicquefort, a Passage of du Maurier, which gives Light into them. " In the Year 1618, says he, (11) Mr de Boissie was order'd by the King to complain, in his Name, to the States General, of a diffamatory Libel, written, sign'd, and publish'd, by Francis Aarsens, to the great Scandal and Dishonour of the Lords of his Majesty's Council, for which, at that Time, he could obtain no Satisfaction. It is probable, this Complaint was founded upon his having charg'd the Council of France with betraying the King, by favouring those who were plotting in Holland, to reduce that Republic once more under the Yoke of the King of Spain: for, if du Maurier is to be credited, the grand Common-Place Topics of Mr Aarsens, the constant Theme of all his Writings, and of the Placards stuck up at the Corners of the Streets, was, that the Faction of Barnevelt was conspiring with Spain, to abolish both the Reform'd Religion and Liberty, at once, in the United Provinces. We may apply here the Proverb, Se non e vero, e ben trovato. — If it is not true, it is well hit off. Nothing can be a greater Confirmation of the profound Abilities of Mr Aarsens, than this Scheme.

(11) Du Maurier. p. 362.

[E] Extraordinary Embassies into France and England.] He was sent Ambassador into England, in the Years 1620, and 1641 (12). The first Time, he was the Chief of three Ambassadors extraordinary; the second Time, the Second. In this latter Embassy he was join'd in Commission with the Lord of Brédérade, who took Place of him, and Hempholiet, who was last in the Commission. The Subject of this Embassy, was the Marriage of Prince William, Son of the Prince of Orange. The extraordinary Embassy to France, was in the Year 1624 (13). " As Cardinal Richelieu was but just come to the Helm of Affairs, and was ignorant of the Dislike his Predecessors had to this Ambassador, he greatly esteem'd him, and finding him to be a Man of fine Understanding, — made Use of him to compass his own Designs. Aarsens was appointed Envoy, either to France or England, in the Year 1628; but, being prevented by the Ice from embarking, he return'd to the Hague. — His being accidentally throw down by Dogs, was construed by his Enemies to be an unlucky Omen. Arsenius à canibus fortè occurrantibus in terram deserta maleolis occasione præbuit suis ipsi ominandi (14).

(12) Wicquefort. Amb. Tom. 1. p. 650, & 750.

(13) Du Maurier. p. 382.

(14) Bonet. Epist. 76. p. 217.

[F] Regret the Time.] Du Maurier says, that Francis Aarsens died worth an hundred thousand Livres per Annum (15).

[G] Leaving behind him one Son, who was esteem'd the richest Man in Holland.] He was Governor of Nimwegen, (15) Du Maurier. p. 377.

Nimwegen,

Nimiguen, and Colonel of a Regiment of Horse. He left two Sons, the eldest of which nam'd Francis, Lord of la Platte, was cast away in his Passage from England to Holland, after having travell'd eight Years in several Parts of Europe. The other, Cornelius, bore the Name of Sommerdyck. He had been a Colonel in the Dutch Army, and afterwards Governor of Surindam; where he was kill'd in a Mutiny of the Garrison, in 1688. He married the eldest Daughter of the Marquis de St André-Membran, by whom he had several Children: she died at the Hague, in 1695, or thereabout. Of seven Sisters, which he had, three were married to Persons of Quality: The other four fell into so superstitious a Devotion, that they followed the Sieur Labadie, the Schismatic Preacher, with as much Zeal, as if he had been another Apollo.

A B A R I S, a Scythian by Nation [A], the Son of Scutbus. There have been so many fabulous Stories told of him, that Herodotus himself made a Scruple of relating them, and of informing himself perfectly concerning them. He only tells us (a) the Story of this Barbarian's carrying an Arrow through the World, and eating nothing. Herodotus, it seems, was ignorant of the marvellous Part of the Story; for they, who pretend to know it, say, That Abaris was carried thro' the Air upon his Arrow [B],

as

(a) Herod.
lib. 4. cap.
36.

(1) Suidas in Abaris.

(2) Euseb.
Chronic. n.
1454.

(3) Herod.
lib. 4. c. 36.
Diod. Sicul.
lib. 2. c. 11.
Apollonius
admir. Hist.
Sect. 4. Jamblichi vita
Pythag. c.
28. p. 127,
&c. Harpo-cration, in Abaris.
Scholiastes Aristoph.
in Equit. Eusebius, n.
1568, &c.

(1) Jamblichi, in the fragmented place, p. 128.

(2) Petitis,
de Sibylla,
l. 2. c. 7. p.
200.

(3) Non off.
le d'ouffon vif kruller, comme un Clevau-cheur d'écou-vettes.

(4) Nouvell.
de la Repub.
des Lett.
Octob. 1686.
Art. 1.

(5) Bibl. U-niversit. Tom.
2. p. 132.

(6) Petit, at above, p. 198.

[A] A Scythian by Nation. It is Suidas, who gives him this Character, and who very particularly observes, that he came from Scythia into Greece; and that, with the Arrow presented him by Apollo, he fled back again from Greece, to the Country of the Hyperborean Scythians (1). Τὴν δὲ μυθολογούμενον διὰ τὴν περὶ αὐτὸν τῆς Ἑλλάδος μῆτιν τὸν ὑπερβορίων Σκυθῶν. Ἐξοδὸν δὲ αὐτὸν παρὰ τὴν Ἀσίαν. i. e. This Person's Arrow is said in Story for carrying him through the Air from Greece (not from Scythia, as is commonly read in the Latin Version) as far as the Hyperborean Scythians. It was given him by Apollo. Eusebius (2) is likewise of Opinion, that he came from Scythia into Greece. If the Account of Abaris, which is in Suidas, were clear and distinct, we might from thence infer, that he therein takes notice of three several Countries; Scythia, where Abaris was born; Greece, to which he travell'd; and another Scythia, called the Hyperborean, whither he took another Journey. We might likewise infer, that he made use of his Arrow in flying, only in his second Expedition, and consequently that it was in Greece Apollo bestow'd it upon him. All these Conclusions would be reasonable, had we to do with an accurate Writer, or were sure that he related Matters just as they stand at present in his Works; and then we might say, that Suidas is very singular in his Opinion, since most other Authors who have mention'd Abaris, tell us, that he was an Hyperborean (3), and that when he travell'd to Greece, he set out from the Country of the Hyperboreans; and, whenever they mention his flying Arrow, they constantly observe, that he was possess'd of it before he came to Greece.

[B] Was carried through the Air upon his Arrow. Jamblichus is very explicit as to this Point, when he says, (1) Οἱ αὖ τὴν ἐν Τερεβορίῳ Ἀπάλαντος ἀρρήναι ἐντὶ τοῦ αἵματος, τοταυτὰ τε καὶ πάλαι καὶ τὰ ἀβάτα ἀββαίων ἀρροβαίων τρέπον τινα. i. e. riding upon the Arrow given him by Apollo the Hyperborean, he cross'd Rivers and Seas, and other inaccessible Places, as if he had been an Inhabitant of the Air. Monf. Petit, (2) in his Account of this Arrow, takes notice of what is commonly reported concerning Witches, riding to their Nocturnal Meetings on a Broomstick. The Journalist, who gives us an Extract of Mr Petit's Book, does not forget the Verse of Villon, wherein (3) a Witch is stiled a Broomstick-rider: I will here insert the whole Passage, because it gives us an Opportunity of making a short Remark. Mr Petit (4) alleges the Translation of Elijah, the Rapture of Habakkuk, that of Pythagoras, and the Arrow which the Hyperborean Apollo gave to Abaris. This (adds he) was a miraculous sort of Arrow, and much like the Broomstick, which, they say, Witches make use of to ride thro' the Air, to their Nocturnal Meetings. Before we make our Remark upon this, it will be requisite to take notice of a Passage in another Journal, which runs thus.

(5) Mr Petit, from Jamblichus, relates the History, or rather Fable, of Abaris the Hyperborean, to whom Apollo granted the Power of flying thro' the Air upon an Arrow, just as our Witches go to their Nocturnal Assemblies, astride a Broomstick. This is the Interpretation the Journalist gives to Mr Petit's Text, which is as follows (6): Auctor est Jamblichus in vitâ Pythagoræ, cap. 28. id munus Abaridi Hyperboreo ab Apolline concessum fuisse, ut per ætrem quocunque vellet cursum magico insectus jaculo tendere posset. i. e. Jamblichus, in his Life of Pythagoras, c. 28. tells us, that Abaris, the Hyperborean, received from Apollo, the Power of directing his Course, as he pleased, thro' the Air, upon a Magic Arrow. Now here every one may perceive that the Epithet Hyperborean may be refer'd either to the Word Abaridi, which goes before it, or to Apolline, that comes after it: The Latin Tongue is full of such Equivocations. But 'tis evident, by the Words of (7) Jamblichus, cited by Petit (8), that 'tis only Apollo that is called the Hyperborean. It would be mere trifling to criticise on the Journalist upon this Account; since, without observing that this Epithet might very well belong to Abaris, as may be seen under the first Remark, it is well known that Journalists are not tied up to a rigid Strictness of Translation. We must not forget that this was a Golden Arrow, and so necessary for Abaris's Travels, that he own'd himself (9) obliged to it for directing him the Way he should go. Pythagoras artfully extorted this Confession from him, for he robb'd him of his Arrow; and Abaris, like a blind Man who has lost his Staff, acknowledg'd his want of it. This puts me in mind of some who pretend, by the help of a certain Wand, to discover the right Road. If all be true that is related on this Subject, I think (all Circumstances considered) their Wand to be as miraculous as the Arrow of Abaris; for if, on the one hand, it has not the Power of making them fly, yet, on the other, it not only discovers Treasures, Metals, the Boundaries of Lands, Thieves and Cut-throats, but likewise the Intrigues of both Sexes. A noted Philosopher (10) who was consult'd about this Matter, in the Year 1689, returned for Answer, That this could never be done, unless by the Assistance of some intelligent Cause, and that this Cause could be no other than the Devil. While I was writing this, I was inform'd that one of the Principal of those Wand-Conjurors (11) shew'd the last Summer (12) at Lions, such surprising Experiments of his Art, that he was sent for to Paris, and on that grand Theatre made such Discoveries (13), as forc'd several to declare, they had now a greater Proof than ever, and that by indisputable Phenomena, of the Power of Dæmons to produce a great variety of Effects, under the Disguise of occasional Causes, such as a Staff, or the like. Upon this footing the Story of Abaris's Arrow may be vindicated; for why might there not have been such an Arrow formerly, since in our Days such wonderful Effects are said to have been wrought by the Frenchman's Staff? It would be worth our Metaphysicians While to enquire how the Wand came into such mighty Request; for the old Proverb, Virgula Divina, and the common Saying, with the Turn of a Stick, and the Juggler's Phrase, by Virtue of my little Wand, seem to be owing to the frequent Use of a Wand in Sorceries, according to the common Tradition. What Virtues did they not anciently ascribe to Mercury's Rod? His Golden Wings, which he fix'd on his Feet, would have been of little Use to him in flying, had not his Rod contributed thereto by it's powerful Energy; and it seems to have serv'd him as an Horse. Thus Virgil (14):

*Et primum pedibus talaria ne sit Aurea, quæ sublimem alis, five æquora supra
Seu terram, rapido pariter cum flamine portant.
Tum virgam caput: Hac animas ille evocat Orco Pallentes, alias sub tristitia tartara mittit,
Dat somnos, adimique, & lumina morte refugnat.
Illa FRETUS agit ventos, & turbida tranat Nubila.*

Hermes obeys, with golden Pinions binds
His flying Feet, and mounts the western Winds:

And

(7) See the Words in C. ration (2).
(8) Petit, p.
199.

(9) Jambli-chus p. 134.

(10) Fa'o Malle-branche in the Mercure Gallant for the Month of January,
1692.
(11) James Aymon, a Plea 32 of St Veran in Dauphine.
(12) In the Year 1689.
(13) See the Note [C].

(14) Virgil
Æn. l. 4.
see above.
Homer's Ill-
ad. and Olyss.
l. ult.
Ovid. Met. l. 1.
the Story of Argus.
Horace, Ode
10, and 21,
of l. 1.
Statius, in the Thebaid. l.
10.

as it were upon another Pegasus; so that Rivers, Seas, and Places inaccessible to other Men, were no Obstacle to him in his Journey. This Arrow belong'd to Apollo, and was apparently the same with which he slew the Cyclopes, who forg'd the Thunderbolts, which Jupiter made use of against the unfortunate Æsculapius (b). Apollo, after this Slaughter, hid his Arrow under a Mountain, in the Country of the Hyperboreans, and recover'd it after a wonderful Manner, the Winds bringing it back to him, upon a Reconciliation between him (c) and Jupiter. It is difficult to determine, when Abaris liv'd [C], there being so many different Opinions about it, as to occasion some of the Moderns to fall into Mistakes [D]: But they are more unanimous in assigning

(b) Hygin. Astr. Poet. l. 2. c. 15. p. 386.

(c) Ibid.

And, whether o'er the Seas or Earth he flies,
With rapid Force, they bear him down the Skies.
But first he grasps within his awful Hand,
The Mark of Sovereign Pow'r, his Magic Wand:
With this he draws the Ghosts from hollow Graves,
With this he drives them down the Syngian Waves;
With this he seals in Sleep the wakeful Sight,
And Eyes, tho' clos'd in Death, restore to Light.
Thus arm'd, the God begins his airy Race;
And drives the racking Clouds along the liquid Space.

D R Y D E N.

If we had the Treatise, which Barthius (15) promised on Mercury's Rod, we should doubtless have seen a very curious Piece, and probably more instructive than the Tract of Antiphon on Minerva's Wand. That Goddess had likewise her Rod, with which she made Persons look either young or old, as the occasion requir'd (16). Circe (17), the Sorceress, did more than all this, since with one single Stroke of her Wand, she could transform Men into Beasts, and Beasts into Men. Erasmus, who (18) to all those Instances adds the Rod, with which Moses wrought so many Miracles, should have taken notice, that the Devil, who mimicks God in all his Works, follow'd him likewise in that in making use of a Rod, as one of his principal Occasional Causes. Huetius (19) asserts, That what the Poets feign of Mercury's Rod, &c. was all borrow'd from the History of Moses's Rod. The Devil was certainly a very ready Mimick; for Pharao's Magicians, by virtue of their Rods, did some Miracles, which resembled those of the true God (20). Nor are we to forget the Brachmans (21), who always carry a Ring and a Staff, to which they ascribe great Virtues. I shall enlarge more on this, under the Article Rabdomancy.

[C] When Abaris liv'd. His Embassy to Athens is fix'd by some to the 21st Olympiad; by Hippocratus to the Third, and by Pindar to the time of King Cræsus (22). Eusebius is of the last Opinion, having fix'd the Journey of Abaris, and the beginning of Cræsus's Reign, to the second Year of the 54th Olympiad; but afterwards he falls into a shameful Blunder, telling us (23), That this Magician flourish'd in the last Year of the 82d Olympiad, Abaris Hyperboreus Hariolus agnoscitur. Abaris is allow'd to be the Hyperborean Augur. Valesius (24) seems to prefer the Opinion of Porphyry and Jamblicus, according to whom Abaris flourish'd in the 2d Year of the 54th Olympiad, cotemporary with Pythagoras. This is infer'd from what Porphyry and Jamblicus say, That Pythagoras shew'd his Golden Thigh to Abaris, the Priest of Hyperborean Apollo. If the Letters ascribed to Phalaris were not somewhat romantic, one might conclude that Abaris was cotemporary with that Tyrant; but it is not probable, that the Letters in that Collection were ever penn'd by him. However, 'tis an Argument produc'd by some, to prove that Abaris and Phalaris were cotemporary; for 'tis very likely, that the Sophist, who wrote those Letters, and ascrib'd them to Phalaris, kept strict to Chronology, in order to render his Fictions the more probable. Suidas places the Reign of Phalaris under the 52d Olympiad. The Opinion of Hippocratus may be back'd by the following Argument: Suidas (25) observes, that in the 5th Olympiad, the Athenians offer'd, in behalf of all the Greeks, Sacrifices that were called πρωπολαι: They were offer'd before the Land was till'd, in order to obtain the Divine Blessing upon the ensuing Harvest. Now the Scholiast of Aristophanes tells us (26), That when the Athenians offer'd the Sacrifices call'd πρωπολαι, for the whole Country, there was a great Famine and Pestilence raging over the whole Earth, which forc'd the People to have recourse to the Oracle; and that the Answer of the Oracle was, If the Athenians offer a Sacrifice, the Plague shall be stay'd. It was therefore at that time so many Ambassadors were sent to Athens, and Abaris, among the rest, in the Name of the Hyperboreans. Hippocratus, then, would not have been much mistaken in placing this Expedition of Abaris under the third Olympiad. If the Conjectures of Scaliger, upon a Passage of Firmicus Maternus, concerning the Palladium, were true, the Time wherein Abaris liv'd would be carried up much higher; for, according to some Authors, he must have flourish'd long before the taking of Troy. Others bring him down to the Time of Alexander the Great; this is indeed the whimsical Notion of an Orator, whose Opinion in this matter is not worth our regard. The Description (27) which the Sophist Himerus has left us, of the Equipage, with which Abaris made his Appearance before the Athenians, is very suitable to a Barbarian: But, says he, he was a Scythian only in his Garb; he spoke Greek, and whenever he spoke, you would have thought you had heard an Oration in the midst of the Academy, or the Lyceum. What an Absurdity! Had Plato and Aristotle founded these Schools in the Time of Abaris? A certain Author (28) endeavours to reconcile these Difficulties, by supposing there were two Abaris's; but this Hypothesis is insufficient; five or six are necessary, if he would succeed. Two will not unite these differences.

[D] As to occasion some of the Moderns to fall into Mistakes. Vossius prefers their Opinion, who say, That Abaris flourish'd between the 30th and the 38th Olympiad. This Period, says he, (29) according to Eusebius, coincides with the Reign of Phalaris—Phalaris Tyrannidem exercuit ab Olympiadi xxx (it should be xxxi) An. II. usque ad Olympiadi xxxviii. An. II. teste Eusebio. By this Hypothesis he overthrows the Notion of those, who maintain, that Abaris was the Disciple of Pythagoras; for he remarks, that Pythagoras flourish'd in the first Year of the 60th Olympiad, and died about the latter end of the 70th. He takes notice likewise, that no Disciple of Pythagoras could possibly write Letters to Phalaris. Lastly, he asserts, That all the Ancients place Abaris not only before Pythagoras, but even before Solon. Antiqui omnes de Abari loquuntur, ut non Pythagora modo, sed Solone etiam antiquiori (30). In these Remarks of Vossius there is not the least Solidity; since Eusebius, upon whose Testimony he builds, has refer'd Phalaris to another Period, namely the 3d Year of the 53d Olympiad, and the Travels of Abaris to the 2d Year of the 54th. Vossius should have observ'd this, and have remember'd, that the Passage of Eusebius, which he does not cite, was prefer'd by Scaliger (31) to that which he quotes. Scaliger grounds his Notion upon this, That the beginning of Phalaris's Reign was plac'd by Suidas under the 52d Olympiad. Add to this, that Orosius (32) remarks, that Cyrus and Phalaris were Cotemporaries. It is plain then that the Inferences, which Vossius has drawn from Abaris and Phalaris living at the same time, are not well grounded; for Abaris might have written to Phalaris after the 52d Olympiad, and have seen Pythagoras after the 60th Olympiad (33). Let this be as it will, it should never have been asserted, That, according to the Testimony of all the Ancients, Solon liv'd after Abaris; for we know that he prescribed Laws to the Athenians (34) in the 46th Olympiad, and that Eusebius places his Abaris under the 82d (35).

Mr Moreri makes a wrong use of the Observations of Vossius: He finds a Contradiction between those who say, that Abaris liv'd before Solon, and those who place him in the time of Tullus Hostilius, or of Ancus Martius, Kings of Rome. But these Sentiments are not contradictory; nor will any Chronologist scruple to assert, that these two Kings preceded Solon. Mr Moreri was misled by this Passage of Vossius (27) Apud Photium, p. 1136.

(28) Edw. Simon, ap. Konig. Bibl. vet. & nova, pag. 1.

(29) Vossius de Poëta Græcis, cap. 3. pag. 16.

(30) Ibid.

(31) Scaliger Animad. in Euseb. n. 1452. p. 94.

(32) Id. ib. n. 1390. p. 84.

(33) Note. scilicet Abaris, according to Jamblichus, was old when he was instructed by Pythagoras.

(34) See Scaliger, as above, n. 1422. p. 86.

(35) See the preceding Remarks, Circumstances (23).

(1) De Virgæ Mercurialis potestate & potentia peculiarium Trachitionem fuit mysteriodes damus in Superstitionum magno Commentario. Barthius in Stat. Tom. 2. p. 291. (16) Hom. Odyss. v. & 7.

(17) Ibid. v. (18) On the Aldes Virgula Divina, Chik. 1. Cent. 1. n. 97.

(19) Huet. Demonstr. Evang. prop. 4. p. 258.

(20) Exod. vii. and viii.

(21) Philostrophat. in Vit. Apollon. l. 3.

(22) Apud Hippocratonem.

(23) Eusebius Chron. n. 1568.

(24) Henr. Valesii Note in Notis Mauficat. in Harpocrat. p. 83.

(25) In the word πρωπολαι.

(26) In E. quid.

(d) Harpocration, on the Word *Abaris.

(e) Jamblichus in vita Pythag. c. 19. See Spanheim on Callimachus, p. 450.

(f) Diacry. Sicul. l. 2. c. 47. p. 126.

(g) Nemesio, the of Pelopo.

assigning the Reason that induc'd him to quit his Country, in order to travel thro' the World. A raging Pestilence (d) (say they) prevailing over the whole Earth, the Oracle of Apollo gave no other Answer than this, That the Athenians should supplicate the Gods for all other Nations. Hence it was, that several States sent Ambassadors to Abens, of whom the Hyperborean Abaris was one. He was then very old; and, since he returned to his Country, to consecrate the Gold (e), which he had gather'd, to Hyperborean Apollo, whose Priest he was, it might be said, that a Collection for pious Uses was one of the Motives that induc'd him to travel to Greece. During this Expedition, he renew'd the Alliance between the Hyperboreans, and the Inhabitants of the Isle of Delos (f). He undertook to foretel future Events; and as he spread his Prophecies in all Places thro' which he travelled, he might properly enough be stiled a walking Oracle [E]. Some say it was he who made the Palladium [F], That defin'd Pledge of Security to those Cities which possess'd it, and that he sold it to the Trojans. He made it of human Bones (g); Materials, which I fancy, the Makers of *Talisman*s never employ. They maintain farther, That he could foretel Earthquakes [G], remove Plagues, and lay Storms, and that he offer'd Sacrifices in

(37) Voetus as Abaris.

(37) Cælius Redic. Ant. 16. c. 22. p. 881.

(38) This Error is not in the Dutch Edit. con.

(39) Gyradius de Poet. Dial. 3. circa init. p. 119.

(40) Stromac. l. 1. p. 334.

(41) Nicetas in Orat. 23. Gregor. Nazianz. p. 774. (42) Apollon. admir. Hist. Sect. 4.

(43) In E. quit.

(44) Artemidor. l. 3. c. 21.

(45) Pausanias, l. 3. p. 94. But he says, that a Hyperborean bore the Ball of it to Greece.

(46) Plato in Chirm. p. 467.

(47) Scaliger, Not. in Esch. n. 1174.

(48) De Ex. Prof. Kel. g.

Vossius (36), fuerit igitur (Phalaris) temporibus Tullii Hostilii & Anci Maritii. And here, by the way, give me leave to say, that he has also suffer'd himself to be impos'd upon, by this Passage of Cælius Rhodiginus (37); Hujus (Abaridis) & Gregorius Theologus commeminit in Epitaphio ad magnum Basilium. Moreri is of Opinion (38), that St Gregory makes mention of Abaris in an Epitaph upon St Basil the Great. But I have not met with one Word of Abaris, in the Verses which St Gregory Nazianzen made on the Death of St Basil. I expected to have found among them the five or six Lines, which Gyradius (39) cites, as taken ex Monodia in Divum Basilium. The Term Monodia seems to refer to a Piece of Poetry; but here it is a fallacious Direction. I had recourse to the Prose of that great Divine, that is, his Funeral Oration on St Basil, and could not meet with one quarter of what Gyradius had cited. There is a particular Mistake, into which Moreri has fallen, when he says, that this Epitaph was not compos'd for St Basil.

[E] A walking Oracle.] Clement of Alexandria has plac'd Abaris among those who foretold future Events (40). Προφῶναι δὲ καὶ Πυθαγόρας δὲ μάλιστα προσετίθεν αὐτῷ, Ἀβάρης τὰ δὲ ὑπερβόρειος. Pythagoras the Great always addit'd himself to Prophesians; as did also Abaris the Hyperborean. A Commentator on (41) St Gregory Nazianzen has related, that Abaris visited every part of Greece, and there uttered his Oracles. Apollonius asserts the same thing, and besides assures us, that these Oracles were still extant. (42) Ἐγράφη δὲ καὶ χρημῆς τὰς χώρας περιρχόμενος, ἐν οἷον μύχρῃ τῷ ὄνι υπάγοντες. i. e. He wrote also Oracles in the Countries through which he pass'd, which are extant to this day. The Scholiast of (43) Aristophanes says likewise, that there were some extant in his time. Abaris was not the only Person who made it his Business to travel thro' the World, and to spread his Predictions wherever he came: it was peculiar to Diviners to do so; and hence it is, that Artemidorus (44) says, when a Man dreams he becomes a Prophet, it is generally a sign, that he will undertake a Journey, or some Business: For, adds he, Diviners are accus'd to be Vagrants. Φέρει δὲ καὶ ἀποδημίας πολλὰς, καὶ κινήσεις τῷ ὄντι τὸν δειρὸν, διὰ τὸ τὰς μάντιας περιεῖναι. This Dream portends travelling and removing from place to place; for Diviners are generally Ramblers. They have this in common with Jugglers, and all kind of Strollers. Abaris did more than foretel things to come; 'tis said that he erected Temples; that the Temple of Proserpine in Lacedæmon (45) was built by him. Plato (46) says, That he was a perfect Cheat, or rather an Enchanter, who pretended to cure Diseases by the Charm of a few Words.

[F] Who made the Palladium.] This Discovery is owing to the great Scaliger, who (47) in two places of a Passage in Firminus Maternus (48) has corrected the Word Abaris by substituting Abaris. The whole Passage, as it stands thus corrected, is as follows: Palladii etiam quid sit nomen audite. Simulacrum est ex ossibus Pelopis factum. Hoc Abaris Scythia scisse perhibetur. Jam quale sit considerate quod Scythia barbari consecravit. Etsi aliquod apud Scythas humana ratione compositum, & illa effera gens & crudeli atque inhumana semper atrocitate grassata, in constituendis religionibus rebus aliquid potuit invenire? Simulacrum hoc Trojanis Abaris vendidit, stultis hominibus etiam promittens.—Hear likewise in what the Divinity of the Palladium consists. It is an Image made of the bones of Pelops. The Scythian Abaris is reported to have been the Artist: but could a barbarous Scythian convey any Sanctity to it? Can the Scythians produce any thing agreeable to human Reason? or can that Savage Nation invent any thing fitting and proper in Religious Matters? This Image Abaris sold to the Trojans, making empty Promises to those foolish men. Scaliger has likewise corrected two Mistakes nearly of the same kind, in a Passage of the Scholiast (49) of Aristophanes. Instead of βάρην, he would have us read Ἀβάρην; and instead of βάριδος, Ἀβάριδος, which makes the Sense much more intelligible. The Passage, as corrected, is, Ὅ τὰ δὲ καὶ Ἀβάρην φασὶ τὸν ὑπερβόρειον ἔλθοντα θεοὺς εἰς τὴν Ἑλλάδα Ἀπὸ λαῶν θητιῶσιν, καὶ ἔτα συγγράφει τὰς χρημῆς τὰς νῦν προσγορευομένας Ἀβάριδος. The Meaning of this is, That Abaris, when he travell'd to Greece to consult Apollo, or to make some Oblation to him, staid in his Service, and wrote the Oracles which still go under the Name of Abaris. Valesius (50) corrects a Passage of Proclus (51), where Pythagoras is cited, ἐν τῷ πρὸς Ἀβάρην λόγῳ; he believes it ought to be read Ἀβάρην: If so, there must have been some Work of Pythagoras, (52) address'd to our Abaris. All that we know for certain is, that Pythagoras, if we will credit Jamblichus (53), explain'd his Treatise concerning Nature, and his other Tract concerning the Gods, to this Hyperborean. Plutarch (54) makes mention of a Book entituled Abaris, and compos'd by Heracleides, wherein, I suppose, were contain'd all the Adventures, both real and romantic, of this famous Hyperborean. I am surpriz'd, that Scaliger, who was in good a Disposition to discover Mistakes, should refer us to Gyradius, as a Fund of learned Instruction, concerning Abaris; for, as learned a Man as Gyradius was, yet he was not very accurate in his account of this Matter (55): He says, That Valerius Harpocration has made mention of the Wonders of the Arrow, and that, according to Herodotus, it carry'd him through the Air as far as the Country of the Hyperboreans: But 'tis certain that Harpocration speaks not a Word of the Arrow, and that Herodotus says nothing of the Flight of Abaris, much less does he determine the particular Place, to which he fled. Charles Stephens and Moreri fell into this last Mistake; Legatus Athenas veniens, ad juos Hyperboreos rediit, nihil comedens, says Charles Stephens, i. e. He return'd from his Athenian Embassy to his Countrymen the Hyperboreans, without eating any thing. Moreri says, that Returning from Greece into Scythia, he eat nothing during that long Journey. This however is more excusable than the Rashness of the former, in saying, That we have still extant the Oracles of Abaris. This is to copy after another without Judgment, and without considering, that since that was asserted, those Oracles have been lost. We shall elsewhere (56) pass a general Reflexion upon the Blunders that arise from this Principle.

[G] Foretel Earthquakes.] Porphyry (57) ascribes this Power to Pythagoras, as also that of chasing away Pestilences, of stopping Hail, laying Storms, and appeasing of Tempets by Sea, and on Rivers, that his Friends might have a prosperous Passage. He adds, That Empedocles, Epimenides, and Abaris, having learn'd this Secret from Pythagoras, put it in practice upon several Occasions; πολλὰ καὶ ἱππευτικαὶν τοιαῦτα. A modern Author, having related (58), that Pteregides, (50) Valesius not in notat Masul. in Harpocrat. p. 83.

(51) In Timæum Platonis p. 141.

(52) Compare Jamblichus's Words, as above, cap. 19. p. 92.

(53) Jamblichus's Words, as above, cap. 19. p. 92.

(54) Plutarch. quomodo audiendi Poet. init.

(55) See the Remarks [D], towards the End.

(56) In the Remark on the Article BALBUS (John) at the End. In vita Pythag.

(58) La Motte le Vayer, Tom. 11. p. 127.

(b) Jamblieh. at above, c. 19.
p. 53. &
cap. 28. p.
231.
Apollonius
also, at above.

(l) Phetil
Bibl. p. 113.

(o) Strabo,
lib. 7. pag.
208.

(o) Casu-bon's Notes upon Strabo,
lib. 7. p. 113.

(p) Origen
l. 3. against Celsus, pag.
129.

in Lacedemon, of so great Efficacy (b), that That Country, which was very subject to the Plague, was never troubled with it afterwards. He composed a great many Books (i); such as, The Arrival of Apollo among the Hyperboreans; The Marriage of the River Hebrus; a Theogony, wherein he explain'd the Pedigree of the Gods; A Collection of Oracles, and another of Conjurations, or Exorcisms, or, if you please (k), of Expiatory Prayers. All these Pieces were written in Prose, except the first. If we had the whole Speech of Himerius the Sophist, of which Photius (l) has preserv'd a Part, we could better tell, than by that Fragment, whether the great Encomiums, bestow'd by that Sophist on a certain Person, belong to Abaris or not. 'Tis, at least, past all Dispute, that he (m) praises him for his speaking good Greek. Others (n) assert, That his affable Behaviour, and plain Dealing, together with his Probity, recommended him to all Greece. I do not find, that Callimachus and Lucian, make any mention of him, though a certain great Critic (o) assures us they did. Had his Arrow been endued with the Virtue attributed to the Wand of James Aymar [H], he might have been very beneficial to the World, without fearing the Reflexion cast upon him by Origen (p), of being useless in his Generation. But we have (q) since been inform'd, that the Credit of this Wonder-working Wand was but short-liv'd [I], and that it met with it's fatal Doom at the Prince of Condé's Palace.

ABARIS, a City of Egypt. See the Article PITHOM.

(co) He cites Diog. La-
ert. in Phrecyd. Cicero-
n. 1. de Divin.

(60) Concerning Abaris,
he cites Apol-lonius, firm-named Dylcolus, cap. 5.
the same author says have quoted above.

(61) See the Remark [B].

Pherecydes, the Master of Pythagoras (59), and Anaximander, and Abaris (60), foretold Earthquakes, proposes this pleasant Question; What, says he, did they look upon the Earth as a huge Animal, and were they arriv'd at so great a Skill as to know, by feeling her Pulse, when the trembling Fit was coming upon her? Now whether the Arrow of Abaris was the Instru-ment with which he perform'd so many Miracles, or whether it contributed nothing thereto, it is certain that his Travels might be of great Use to Mankind. See the next Remark.

[H] Attributed to the Wand of (61) James Aymar.] Never did any thing make so great Noise, or occasion the writing of so many Books. I have understood since, that those who promis'd themselves so many Advantages, and so great a Victory over the Incredible, found themselves greatly disappointed in their Expectations. The single History of this whole Matter might well deserve a particular Article; and perhaps I shall give you some Hints of it under the Word Rabdomancy, or upon some other Occasion. But be that as it will, I shall not recant what I advance concerning the Usefulness of this Wand. Being in the Hands of so great a Traveller as Abaris, it would reform the Manners of Mankind more effectually, than all the Missionaries and Preachers in the World. For should such a Man return upon the Stage of the World, Jealously, that Plague of a married Life, would soon be banish'd all human Society: Neither the Italians, nor the eastern Nations, would have then occasion to set Guards over their Wives, or watch them with Argus's Eyes themselves; each Man would trust to their Honesty, and they would need no other Test, than this Wand: And the Men would not only be free from an anxious Care (62), which is too often their Ruin, but would find themselves obliged to preserve their Conjugal Fidelity, when the Reputation of it was become so necessary to them. The Appearance of a Court of Justice would strike less Terror into the Souls of Criminals, than the Arrival of an Abaris. The greatest Number of Offences, the most dangerous Sins, such I mean as are committed with the Hopes of Secrecy, would be entirely suppress'd, by thinking on the Wand; and then we might with Horace truly say:

(63) *Tutus bos etenim rura perambulat,
Nutrit rura Ceres, almaque faustitas.*

Culpari mutui fides, Nullis pollicitur casta domus stupris.

Laudantur simili prole puerperæ.

Secure in Pastures roams the wanton Steer,
And smiling Plenty crowns the fruitful Year.
Unfalsly'd Faith in every Bosom reigns,
And the chaste Marriage-bed inviolate remains.
'Tis in the Child, the honest Sire is shown,
And all his Father's Virtues are his own.

I own it is not easy to conceive, that the Devil, the profess'd Enemy of Mankind, should make choice of such Laws of Intercourse with Men, which is not considered by those, who will not allow us either to call in question the Virtues of the Wand, or attempt to explain them mechanically.

[I] The Credit of this wonder-working Wand was but short liv'd.] It scarce lasted so long at Paris, as the Time of composing and printing one single Article of this Dictionary. The Prince of Condé, whose Discontentment, if we consider his Education, must necessarily be fatal to all Impostors, and their credulous Followers, has pull'd down the Trophies set up by the Partizans of James Aymar. This poor Wretch was so unsuccessful in the Trials (64) he made of his Art in the Palace of Condé, that his Reputation was ruin'd for ever. The Public was made acquainted with the whole Affair, and there was no room to suspect the Truth, since it was by Order of that great Prince, that the World was inform'd of the Cheat. Nor indeed do they pretend any such Thing; they only endeavour to account for the Miscarriages of the Wand, as I shall observe by and by. They who assert, that the Favourers of these Jugglers ill-tim'd the Matter, and that, in such a Philosophical Age as this, such Artificers are not to be impos'd upon the World, have, in some Respects, Reason on their Side; but, all Things consider'd, they do not argue right. There are, I allow, many more private Men, at present, than formerly, who are able to oppose the Stream, and combat Error: But then I must answer; that our Age is as easy to be impos'd upon, as any whatsoever; and, after what we have seen concerning an Explication of the Apocalypse, we have no Reason to say, the World is grown wiser now a-days. It is the same it ever was: Every Delusion, which flatters it's Passions, is pleasing; it is not at all hard to be convinc'd it was impos'd upon; nor has it, upon that Account, the less Respect for the Impostor; and cries out, as much as ever, against the Incredulity of those, who will not suffer themselves to be deceiv'd. Hear what one of our Journalists tells us in Confirmation of this Matter:

"The (65) Testimony of a great Prince, and the (66) Ibid. p. 565.
"Letter of one of the principal Magistrates, are such strong Proofs against James Aymar, as none of those who give credit to the pretended Effects of the Wand, dare to contradict. But so foolish are those credulous Creatures, that hardly one of them will submit to this Evidence. Mr Vallemont, who has lately publish'd a Tract, concerning the secret Philosophy of the divine Wand, goes about to explain how the Peasant of Dauphiné might be mistaken in the Trials of his Skill before that Prince, though he had really the Power and Gifts, of which he boasted. This sort of Philosophers, as well as the Explainers of Prophecies, (for both of them are of the same Stamp) are a kind of Enthusiasts, who will never own themselves to have been in the wrong; and who, though they are convinc'd of the Falsity of what they have advanc'd, treat, as Persons of a dull Imagination, those Men of Sense, who reject their Chimeras."

SINCE the Impression of what I have said, three or four Years have elapsed without the least mention of James Aymar: Our Journalists had quite lost sight of him, and gave him over for lost. But at last they brought him again upon their Stage, in the Month of April,

(i) *Suidas on the Word
ABARIS.*
(k) The Greek Word is Suidas, is nabapud.

(m) See the Remark [C], towards the End.

(q) This was written in the Year
1693.

(64) See the Historical Letters, and the Political Mercury for the Month of
May, 1695.

(66) Ibid. p.

(62) *Per ægis graves in Cæl be vita,
Et graviter cautus cavedia vana ma-ritis.*
Aul. Idyll.
15.
Painful the Cares, even of a single State,
More taxing those which do on Wedlock wait.

(63) *Horace,
Ode 5. B. 2.*

"and that the Value of stolen Goods had in some Places been restored, upon the News of his Arrival. But our Dukes, and this excellent Prince, were both of Opinion, that Truth was preferably to be regarded." Mr Leibnitz has joined to this a Remark worthy of himself; That it had been better to have examined, how so many Persons of Merit could be deceived at Lyons, than to endeavour to find out the Natural Causes of the pretended Virtue of this

(73) Id. id.

Wand: (73) "Et scripsi nuper Parisios utilius & examine dignius mihi videri problema, morale vel logicum, quomodo tot viri insignes Lugduni in fraudem ducti fuerint, quam illud pseudophyficum, quod tractaverat Vallemontius, meliori materia dignus? Quomodo virga corylacea tot miracula operetur? Nam moralis illa quæstio, excussa pro dignitate, multorum errorum popularium origines sæpe speciosas aperiret. I gave my Opinion lately, in a Letter to Paris, that it was a Problem, whether Moral or Logical, of more Use, and more worthy Examination, why so many celebrated Persons at Leyden were impos'd upon, than that false point of Natural Philosophy, which Vallemontius (worthy of a nobler Subject) undertook to discuss, viz. whence it was, that an Hazel Wand could perform such Wonders. For the just and proper Discussion of this Moral Question would unfold the Spring, how specious soever, of many popular Errors." I fancy, that if the Magistrates of Lyons, who caus'd the Murderer to be hanged, whom James Aymar discovered at Beaucaire, had threaten'd to burn the Discoverer alive, as a wicked Magician; and had caus'd the Executioner to be present with all the Instruments of the Rack, they would have made him confess how he had learnt the Secret of the Assassination, and how he could find at Beaucaire, in such and such a place, one of the Assassins. 'Tis very probable, that those Persons, who had a mind to bring him into Reputation, that they might share the Profit with him, caus'd him to play this part. Mr Buissiere takes notice in his printed Relation (74), That this Man had a Club of People, who cry'd him up all over Paris; and who publish'd in the Mercuré Gallant for February, 1693, that he had discover'd such and such a thing; than which nothing was more false. The Prepossession was so great, that he would have got vast Sums, if he could but have maintain'd his Credit. You may judge whether his Partizans had not very good Reasons to second him.

(74) Letter concerning the real Effects of the Wand, pag. 13, 14.

(75) Mr Buissiere's Letter to me, July 25, 1693.

"(75) There never was an Imposture more credited than this; they were so prejudic'd in favour of this Person, that they made him do things which he never thought of, and found out Reasons to excuse him when he did not succeed. He impos'd on them by the appearance of a simple and rustic Air, and speaking only the Gibberish of his Country; but he was at the bottom nothing less than what he appear'd to be: The Motion of his Wand was the Cause of the Illusion. They saw the fork'd Stick turn so dexterously in his Hand, that they did not perceive the insensible Motion of his Wrist, which determin'd it to turn forcibly and quick, by the Spring which he gave to his Wand. Besides his apparent natural Plainness, he affect'd to be devout, went often to Confession, every Day to Mass, and shew'd other external Tokens of a great Sense of Religion; and said, That he had very carefully preserv'd his Virginity, without which, as he said, he could not succeed with his Wand. He would not walk in the Streets in the day-time, for fear, as he said, of being murder'd by Thieves and Pick-pockets. But all this was only because the Night serv'd better for his Tricks. However ridiculous he was, yet he did not want Admirers, and consequently People to cry him up: and if they "had not taken care to prevent his going out of Condé-House, because the Prince, who had sent for him to Paris to satisfy his Curiosity, would have him try some things, which he had thought of, before he was publicly set on work, he had been over-run by those who came in Crowds to consult him. Some wanted to know whether he could not discover the Thieves who were guilty of such a Robbery, at such a time, and such a place, &c. Others wanted to know, whether such a Saint was not the true one, rather than that of another Parish, which pretended to be in possession of him likewise. Others brought Relicks to him, to know whether they really belong'd to such a Saint. Nay, I my self saw a young Silk-Weaver, who was contracted, give him two Crowns to know whether the Woman he was contracted to had her Maidenhead or no. Those, who shared the Profit, took care to bring Grift to the Mill; and oblig'd Persons to pay the Money before-hand, if they had a mind to succeed in their Enquiries."

Such a Man at Paris would have been a certain Source of Gain, and an inexhaustible Mine to those who were to share in the Profit. Both suspecting, and suspected, Persons would have strove who should pay him best. He would have squeez'd Money out of both Husbands and their Wives, Gallants and their Mistresses: The Wand would have mov'd, or not mov'd, according as he was best paid, by one or t'other. I believe that if we could discover the Mysteries of these sorts of pretended Prodigious, we should find it to be a Combination of People in order to get Money: One boasts of an extraordinary Talent; and others endeavour underhand to establish the Belief of it. But I believe there are some Cheats, who have no need of Emisaries; the Credulity of the Publick is a sufficient Preparation for their acting the Imposture. 'Tis not long, since there went over the Towns of Holland a sort of Germans, who pretended to cure all Distempers without any Remedies. The Patients need only, said they, send us their Urine. Their Success was the subject of the common Talk; every Body related some wonderful Circumstances; their Lodgings, like the Pool of Bethesda, were crowded with infirm Persons. I don't believe that those who cried up the Art of those Quacks were Sharers in the Profit: Some pleas'd themselves in recommending the thing, because it look'd like a Prodigy; others might find something agreeable in it, because the want of Effect of the common Medicines put them out of Humour with their Physicians. The Cheat did not last long; a Month or two set all things to rights. This (76) Imposture was detected, and there were so many People undeceived, that their Approbation was chang'd into the utmost Contempt.

We must observe that Mr Leibnitz takes notice, with a great deal of Reason, (77) That if the Prince of Condé had not discovered the Imposture, no Argument could have prevail'd to this very Day with those credulous People. But it is to be fear'd, that James Aymar's Cheats will be soon forgotten; and that People would be pleas'd with the same Farce again, if the same Motives should revive it seven or eight Years hence. "Nisi Princeps Condæus cognoscendæ rei tantum studii, imò & sumptus, impendisset, laborare adhuc & conficiantur cum quibusdam ingenii, quibus gratius est per mira falli, quam nudæ veritatis simplicitati acquiescere.— Had not the Prince of Condé been at great pains and even expense, in the Enquiry, we might have still contest'd the matter with certain Tempers, which are better pleas'd to be deceiv'd by something wonderful, than to acquiesce in plain, simple, Truth."

(76) Mr La-fou a very ingenious Physician of Rotterdam published a small Treatise in Dutch and French, to show the Vanity and Ridiculousness of this Practice. See the History of the Works of the Learned, by Mr Banage, May 1697, p. 408, &c. And the Paris Journal of Jan. 13, 1698, p. 30. of the Dutch Edit.

(77) Leibnitz ubi supra.

ABBEVILLE, in Latin Abbatis-villa, the Capital City of the Dutchy of Pontibieu in Picardy, on the River Somme, five Leagues from the Sea, in the Diocese of Amiens, was formerly, as the Word imports, no more than a Country-Seat belonging to an Abbot. 'Tis suppos'd, that this Abbot was St Riquier, or one of his Successors, who, perceiving the Situation to be very pleasant and commodious, two Leagues from his Abbey of Centula, caus'd first of all an House (a) to be built there, and then a Castle, where was a Priory (b) dependant upon the Abbey. Hugh Capet, willing to make a strong Place of it, in order to stop the Incurfions of the Barbarians, took it away from the Monks (c); and when he had fortified it, gave it to Hugh his Son-in-law, who took upon him the Title of Protector, because the King his Father-in-law had committed to him the Protection of the Church of St Riquier.

(b) Sirmond. Note in Epist. 36 Alexandri III.

(c) Hariulfus a Monk of Centula, in the Chronicle of his Monastery, l. 4. c. 12. apud Hadr. Valart. Notit. Gall. p. 1.

(a) Father 1. Abbé in his Methodical Tables of Royal Geography, p. 322. Edit. 12mo.

(d) Id. Valens ib.

His Son Angelram was satisfied with this Title, 'till such time as he had killed (d) in Battle the Count of Boulogne, and married his Widow; for then he took upon him the Title of Count of Pontieu, which has been continued to his Successors. In process of time Abbeville became very considerable. It is at present so large, that there are scarce ten or twelve Cities in all France which surpass it, or which so much as equal it in Circumference. (e) Sanfon, whose Words I just now cited, in his Computation made in the Year 1636, tells us, that it contained thirty five or forty thousand Souls. It was his native Country; and 'tis remarkable, that in a short time it produced three

(e) Sanfon's Enquiry into the Antiquity of Abbeville, p. 2.(f) The Son of one of Sanfon's Sisters.

(g) Id. p. 59, 60.

skilful Geographers, Himself, Peter (f) Duval, and Father Phillip Briet the Jesuit. The River Somme divides itself here into several Branches, which run partly within, and partly without the City. Father L'Abbé is not of Sanfon's Opinion, who maintains, (g) that Abbeville was always the Capital of Pontieu [A]; and that the other Cities of that Country were not in comparison near so antient as That [B]. Much less will he allow, what Sanfon pretends, viz. That this City was formerly called Britannia [C]; and that it was one of the most flourishing Cities of all Gaul, long before Jesus Christ. We shall, in it's due Place, take notice of the whole Contest, which Father L'Abbé [D] had with him on this Subject. Abbeville is endowed with excellent Privileges;

(1) L'Abbé, Tabl. Method. p. 320. Edit. 12mo.

[A] Was always the Capital of Pontieu.] Father L'Abbé (1) refutes him as to that particular in these Words, "You have not read, Sir, the Titles and Memoirs of the Abbey of St Riquier, which inform us, that under Lewis le Debonnaire, in the Year 815, there were, within the Walls of Centula, Two thousand five hundred Houses, several Artificers, a great many Streets, &c. That Abbeville is reckoned among the Towns and Villages which depended upon it." If any Credit may be given to the Verse that is commonly repeated in that Country;

Turribus à centum Centula nomen habet.

The hundred Towers with which the Walls of Centula were flank'd, occasioned it's Name (2).

(2) Id. ib. p. 316, 317.

(3) Id. ib. p. 320.

[B] Were not in comparison near so antient as That.] "This is (3) false," say the Inhabitants of S. Riquier. "What have you in Abbeville that carries any Marks of Antiquity? hence your Collegiate Church of St Wulfran owes it's Foundation to William de Talus and John his Son, Eleven hundred Years after Christ; and the Priory of St Peter of the Order of St Benedict, was founded but a few Years before: for as to the Parish Church of Notre-Dame du Châtel, it only looks like a country Church." As to Fredogarius, whom Sanfon has cited as his Voucher for the Existence of Abbeville in the Time of the Mayor Ebroinus; to this 'tis replied (4), That we ought to read in the Ninety sixth Chapter, not, atque Abacius villa evadens aufugit, but atque à Bacio villâ evadens aufugit.

(4) Id. ib. p. 321.

[C] That this City was formerly called Britannia.] He grounds this Opinion on a Passage of Strabo, where he fancies 'tis said (5), "That the Deputies of Marseilles appearing before Scipio, and being ask'd by him, what they knew of Britannia, Narbo, and Corbilo, not one of them could say any thing in Commendation of them, though they were the best Towns in all Gaul." He supposes that it was in the Year of Rome 532. that the Deputies of Marseilles shew'd themselves so grossly ignorant. His Reason for it, is, that he, who propos'd those Questions, was the same Scipio, who lost the first Battle, which Hannibal gain'd over the Romans. He supposes that this Scipio, willing to get Intelligence of Hannibal's March, fail'd to the Mouth of the Rhône; and that there the Deputies of Marseilles, who came to compliment him, could make no Reply to his Questions. This we shall enquire into farther, under the Article of Pytheas. Let us at present proceed to the other Hypotheses of Sanfon. He observes, I. That the City of Narbonne was one of the most antient, and most flourishing Cities of Gaul; and (6) yet it is not nam'd 'till after that of Britannia, among the Three, of which Scipio desired to be inform'd. II. That the Belgium, in the Commentaries of Julius Cæsar, was a Region (7) among the Belgæ, which comprehended the Beauvaisis, the Amienois, the Artois, and perhaps also the Vermandois, and the Senlisians. III. That the Inhabitants of the Coasts of Great-Britain, came from (8) Belgium, and retain'd the Names of the Cities, from whence they came; as Cæsar informs us. IV. That, according to Pliny's (9) Calculation, the People, whom he styles Britanni, must have been Inhabitants (10) of Pontibius. V. That of all the Parts of Belgium, from whence

(6) Id. p. 3.

(7) Id. p. 39.

(8) Id. p. 17.

(9) Lib. 4. cap. 17.

(10) Id. p. 46.

People went over into England, there is none that ought to come into the Account, so much as that which is situated by the Sea-side; that is, the Country of Pontieu: From all this he infers (11), That the Britanni of Pliny are the chief Inhabitants of Belgium, who went over into England; and that at first they retained their antient Name, and at last render'd it universal over the whole Country; and that they would not have called themselves Britanni, had not their Capital City been Britannia: It follows then, that the Capital of Pontieu was the antient Britannia of which Scipio desired to be inform'd; now Abbeville is the Capital of Pontieu: It went therefore under the Name of Britannia, the most flourishing City of the Gauls, even before the Second Punic War.

(11) Cluver. in Germani. Ant. l. 2. c. 27. cluise antior terred Britanni than Britannia.

Doubtless there is Learning and Genius in this long Train of Suppositions and Consequences, considering the Manner wherein the Author has manag'd it; But, after all, 'tis a mere Romance, an airy Phantom, founded on a Passage not duly understood. The Matter of Fact is this; Strabo (12) tells us, that Pytheas has inserted among the fabulous Stories of Pytheas, "That none of the Inhabitants of Marseilles, who had an Interview with Scipio, could say any thing considerable, when he questioned them about Britann, no more than any of the Inhabitants of Narbonne, or of Corbilo, the two best Cities of the Country." This is the true meaning of the Greek Text, as may be collected not only from the Rules of Grammar, but also from the Humour of the Stroller here mentioned; καὶ ὅς τις αἰσῶν Πολύβιος, μὴδὲ τις τῶν ἐν Πύθει μνησθέντων, ὅτι Μασσαλιωτῶν τῶν συμμάχωντων Σκίπιον αἰδῶς εἶχε λέγειν ἵδεν μὴδὲς αἰὼν ἑρπεθῆς ὑπὸ τῷ Σκίπιονος ὕπαι της Βροτανικῆς ἢ τῶν ἐν Ναρβόνῃ, ἢ τῶν ἐν Κορβιλλῶν, αἵτις ἦσαν ἀπὸ τῆς αἰδῶς τῶν αὐτῶν (13). This Fellow, to put the better Gloss upon his romantic Stuff and Rhodomontades, used to brag, That he would inform his Readers of a thousand things, of which they never had heard before. No question then but he boldly gave out, that his Relation of Britain presented us with the first and earliest Account of that Island; and that, to prove it, he made use of this Argument; viz. That Scipio could learn nothing about it from the Inhabitants of Marseilles, nor from those of Narbonne, nor from those of Corbilo upon the Loire; though these were the most flourishing Cities of Gaul. Every one may see how Sanfon has mistaken the Words of the antient Geographer, to which no question the Latin Version has not a little contributed: Cujus (Corbilonis) mentionem faciens Polybius simul Pytheæ refert commentum, Massiliensium scilicet, qui Scipionem conveniunt, nullum quicquam habuisse dignum memoratu quod diceret, interrogatus de Britannia, itemque Narbonensium & Corbilienensium, cum hæc tres urbes Gallie omnium esset optime. One might be apt to imagine, at first Sight, that the three chief Cities of Gaul, mentioned by the Translator, are call'd Britannia, Narbo, & Corbilo; but upon due Attention, we shall perceive that Britannia is here taken for the Island Britannia: And thus Strabo (14) is us'd to express himself, without the Addition of the Word Narbo, Insula.

(12) Strabo. l. 4. p. 190.

(13) Id. ib.

(14) See among other PLACES, l. 1. p. 71.

[D] The Contest which Father L'Abbé had with him on this Subject.] He made his Declaration of War,

Privileges; and as it has never been taken, (b) it is stiled, The Virgin of the Country, and has for it's Motto, semper fidelis, always faithful. Whoever would be acquainted more at large with what relates to this City, the Privileges of it's Mayors, the famous Men who have been born or died there (i), &c. may consult the genealogical History of the Counts of Pontbieu, printed at Paris, by Francis Cloufier, 1657. in Folio. The Author only tells us his Name by these initial Letters, F. I. D. J. M. C. D. But 'tis easy to perceive that they mean Frere Ignace de Jesus-Maria, Carme deschausé. i. e. Brother Ignatius de Jesus-Maria, A barefooted Carmelite. See the Article S A N S O N (James).

(b) Du Val in his Treatise of France p. 70.

(i) 'Tis with great Reason that I have here added an Etcetera, for the Book is full of foreign Matters.

Therein is to be found Bayard the Knight, and several other Persons who have no manner of Relation to Pontbieu.

(15) Sanson as before, p. 76, dec.

(16) Justin. l. 43. c. 5, 6.

(17) See the Remark [A] of the Article Pytheas, towards the End.

(a) Some call him Abbat.

(b) Athenus Oronient. Vol. 1.

(c) Fuller's Worthies of England.

War, and his first Act of Hostility, in these Words: "Britanniam Abbavillæus Chalcographus interpretatur Abbeville, lepidissimo commento, quod non tam ex Pytheæ mendaciis, quam ex ignorantiæ linguæ Græcæ editum malignam in lucem demonstrabimus alias, cum primum singulare illum de Britannia tractatum nancisci & legere datum fuerit. The Abbevillean Chalcographer (so he stiles Sanson) interprets Britannia to mean Abbeville, upon a pleasant Hypothesis enough, which we shall show in another place to be unfortunately built, not so much upon Pytheas's lying Accounts, as upon an Ignorance of the Greek Tongue, when it shall be in our Powers to procure and read over the remarkable Treatise De Britannia." Thus he exprels'd himself in his Pharus Gallie antiquæ, printed at Moulins 1644. He had not as yet read the Book, which Sanson publish'd on this Subject at Paris, 1636. He had only seen the new Appearance of Britannia, not in the large Map of ancient Gaul, published by Sanson in the Year 1627, but in a small Chart publish'd since. Having at last perus'd the Book, he refuted the Principles upon which 'tis founded, Ann. 1646, in the Methodical Tables of the Royal Geogaphy; and did not forget to observe, that, according to the Sense, which the Sieur Sanson gives to Strabo's Text, it must be said, that the Inhabitants of Marjeilles were wholly ignorant with respect to the City of Narbonne, Ann. U. C. 532. though Marjeilles had then been built about 400 Years, and Narbonne was a very flourishing City. Sanson was sensible of the Difficulty, and guarded against it as well as he could (15). But who can imagine that the Marfillians, because they had frequent Wars with their Neighbours, had not Time to know what Narbonne was? The Passage of Justin (16), which Sanson relates, informs us, that before the Year of Rome 362, they had often conquered the Carthaginians, and entered into Alliance with the Spaniards. Father L'Abbe was not much the better for his Triumph; for Sanson made the same Insults over him in his Turn, which almost ruin'd the Pharus Gallie antiquæ. Note, That with respect to his Hypothesis concerning Britannia, he wrote a Reply (17) which was never printed.

ABBOT (a) (GEORGE) Archbishop of Canterbury, and Author of several Books [A], was the Son of a Cloth-Worker, and born at Guilford, in the County of Surry, in 1562. He studied at Oxford, and in the Year 1597 was made Master of University-College. Two Years after, he was advanced to the Deanery of Winchester, which he held 'till the Year 1609, when he succeeded Thomas Morton in the Deanery of Gloucester. Hitherto his Advancement was not very shining, nor quick; but afterwards it made a very great Progress in a very little Time; for he was made Bishop of Lichfield, Dec. 3. 1609, Bishop of London, Feb. 1610, and Archbishop of Canterbury in March following (b). His Learning and fine Talent of Preaching contributed less to his sudden Advancement, than his Interest with the Earl of Dunbar, whose Chaplain he had been. His Conduct was not pleasing to every Body. It was thought strange, that he should have more regard to his Secretary than to his Chaplains; and that, when he appeared abroad, he should show more Respect to the Laity than to the Clergy. It was supposed, that, having never had any Benefice with the Cure of Souls, that is, having never experienc'd the Difficulties to be met with in the Direction of a Parish, he was thereby become less capable of shewing any Indulgence to the inferior Clergy. His Severity towards them, and the Countenance he gave to the Nonconformists, were the two principal Reasons of the Clamour that was rais'd against him. The latter of these caus'd a modern Writer to say, That if Laud had succeeded Bancroft, and the Project of Conformity had not met with an Interruption in the Time of Abbot, doubtless the Schism in England would have been at an end (c). King James was disgusted with Abbot, because he oppos'd the Design That King had of marrying the Prince of Wales to the Infanta of Spain. The Enemies of the Archbishop, being apprized of this, thought they had a fair Opportunity of crushing him; for they hoped to gain the Ascendant over this superstitious King, by alledging the Sacredness of the antient Canons. For the better understanding of this, it must be observ'd, that Abbot had accidentally kill'd the Keeper of Bramzel Park, belonging to the Lord Zouch. The Bishop of Lincoln, who was then Lord-Keeper of the Broad-Seal, told the Duke of Buckingham, That the Archbishop was ipso facto deprived of his Dignity, upon the Account of the Murder he had committed. For this he appeal'd to the Laws of England, and the Severity of the antient Discipline; he added, That it was to be feared the Papists would make an Advantage of it, if they should suffer one to exercise the Office of an Archbishop and Primate of the Realm, whose Hands are defiled with Blood. In short, he gained his Point so far, that a Commission was issued to some Bishops and Peers, to enquire into the Matter of Fact. The Event of this Enquiry was not very agreeable to the Archbishop's Enemies; for it was adjudg'd, That this involuntary

[A] And Author of several Books. The chief are, Quæstiones sex Theologicæ totidem prælectionibus disputatæ, printed at Oxford, 1598. Dr Hill's Reasons for Papistry unmask'd (1) at Oxford, 1604. An Exposition upon Jonah, by way of Sermon. The History of the Massacre in the Valteline. A Treatise of Geography; of which the ninth Edition, which was not the last, is in the Year 1607. And a Treatise concerning the Perpetual Visibility of the Church, printed at London, 1624. to which he has not put his Name.

(1) Dr Hill had embrac'd the Romish Religion.

(A) The Dile of Buckingham.

(e) Ruth-worth's Historical Collections, Tom.
1. Where is to be seen a long Memorial of George Abbot, upon the Account of his Sufferings.

luntary Murthur had not disqualified him. This happened in the Year 1621. Six Years after, a new Storm was raised against him, which quite overthrew him: Nor is there any thing surprizing in it; for the Favourite (d) owed him a Grudge, and could not endure that several Persons, offensive to him, frequented the Archbishop's Table, one of the most splendid at that time. The Pretence made use of, was, That this Prelate refused to license a Sermon of Dr Sibbort, upon Apostolical Obedience, though the King had commanded him so to do: Upon which he was suspended from all his Archiepiscopal Functions, which were administered by other Prelates; among whom was William Laud, who was afterwards his Successor (e). Abbot retired to the Place of his Nativity, and afterwards to Croydon Castle, where he died on the 4th of August, in the Year 1633. His Monument is to be seen, with several Ornaments and Inscriptions, in Guilford Church. He founded an Hospital well endowed in that Town. There was another George ABBOT [B], who publish'd, in English, a Paraphrase on Job; Short Notes on the Psalms; Vindiciæ Sabbati, &c. (f) He liv'd in the Year 1640.

(f) A Hen.
Oxon. ib.

[B] Another George ABBOT.] The Sieur Hen-ninges Witte was not aware of this, in his Diarium Biographicum; where he attributes to the Archbishop of Canterbury the Works of the other George, the Paraphrases on Job and the Psalms, and the Vindiciæ Sab- bati. He likewise ascribes to him, A Treatise against Bishops, and another against the Brownists. Tho' it seems very odd for a Primate of England to write against Bishops.

ABBOT (ROBERT) elder Brother to the former, born also at Guilford (a), and Student of Oxford in Baliol College: One of his first Employments was that of Lecturer at Worcester; then he was made Minister of the Church of All-Saints in the same Place; and a little after Minister of the Parish of Bingham in Northamptonshire. All this happened between the Years 1581 and 1588. He Commenc'd Doctor of Divinity at Oxford, in the Year 1597, and was admitted Chaplain in Ordinary to King James I. in the beginning of his Reign. In the Year 1609, he was made Master of Baliol College; three Years after he was advanced to the Dignity of Regius Professor in Divinity, in the University of Oxford. In his Lectures he made choice of a Subject so agreeable to King James, and managed it with that Depth of Thought and Learning, as is supposed to be the only Reason of his Advancement to the Bishoprick of Sarum: The Subject he made choice of, was, The supreme Power of Kings; which he maintained against all the Subtilties and Sophisms of Bellarmine and Suarez. This is what may be seen in his Treatise, entituled, De Supremâ Potestate Regia, printed at London, 1619. He likewise publish'd, in 1613, a Latin Book, no less agreeable than his Lectures, viz. An Answer to the Apology publish'd by Eudæmon Joannes the Jesuit, in Vindication of his Brother Henry Garnet. He did not long enjoy his Bishoprick, for he was Consecrated Decemb. 3. 1615, and died of the Stone (b) March 2. 1618. Within two Years after his first Wife's Death, he married a second, which was highly displeasing to the Archbishop his Brother (c). Some have wondered how it came to pass, that, after he had shew'd his Learning and Merit both by speaking and writing; and having been successful in every thing he undertook, whether preaching, composing of Books and Lectures, disputing, maintaining of Theſes, or solving to a Wonder the most knotty Questions, it has been Matter of Surprise, I say, how he came to be promoted to a Bishoprick so late. For this there are three Reasons assigned; First, That he was not Ambitious: Secondly, That he was suspected of being a Puritan: And, Lastly, That his Relations were unwilling to consent, that the Church should be Adorn'd with the Spoils of the University; and that he should leave his Professorship to be made a Bishop (d). This last Reason, in my Opinion, is not well grounded. Let this be as it will, those, who have made a Comparison between the two Brothers, prefer George as an Eloquent, and Robert as a Learned Preacher. They tell us, That George was the fittest for Business; and that Robert was the most profound Divine: They add, that the Gravity of George was attended with an Air of Severity, and that of Robert with a smiling Aspect (e). The latter was reckoned a moderate Calvinist; for he explained the Doctrine of Predestination according to the Hypothesis of the Sublapsarians. In the Note we shall give you the Catalogue of his Works [A]. There has been since him another Robert ABBOT, a Native of Cambridge, who has publish'd several Books in English. He was a London Divine, after he had been a Minister in Kent, and other Places (f). The Catalogue of the Bodleian Library makes three Robert Abbots out of one, and the Treatises, which were composed by one and the same Person, are there divided amongst them.

(b) The Sieur
Witte places his Death
March 11.
1618. That he liv'd could not be deny'd;
viz. That the English do not live in their Year as other Countries do.

(c) Athen.
Oxonien.

(d) Fuller's Worship.

(e) Id. ib.

(f) Athen.
Oxonien. s.

(g) Scilicet very much commendat Book, in his Scholæ, p.
1-3, 2.

[A] The Catalogue of his Works.] Besides those I have already mention'd, he compos'd, A Mirror of Popish Subtilties, London, 1594. Sermons on the 110th Psalm, 1601. Defence of the Reform'd Catholic of Mr W. Perkins, against the Boston Counter-Catholic of Dr Bishop, and a Reply to the Answer of the same Doctor; London, 1611. Anticristi (1) demonstratio contra Pontificem, London, 1603. Exercitationes de gratia & perseverantia Sanctorum, Ibid. 1618. Animadversio in Richardi Thompſoni diatribam de amifi-

sione Justificationis & Gratia, Ibid. 1618: His Commentary on St Paul's Epistle to the Romans was found in his Study; it contains four Volumes, and was given to the Bodleian Library by Dr Edward Corbet, the Husband of Margaret Brent, Daughter of Martha Abbot; which Martha was the only Daughter and Heir of our Robert, Bishop of Sarum (2). That learned Prelate shew'd his great Skill in Polemics, by enlarging on all the Matters of Controversy, which the Epistle to the Romans affords.

(2) See the English, superior, quoted in this Article.

ABDAS, A Bishop in Persia, in the time of Theodosius the younger, was, thro' his inconsiderate Zeal, the Cause of a very terrible Persecution, which was raised against the Christians, who enjoy'd a full Liberty of Conscience in Persia, when this Bishop took the Liberty to pull down one of the Temples, where the Persians worshipped the Fire. The Magi made their Complaints to the King [A], who sent for Abdas, and, after a mild Rebuke, ordered him to rebuild the Temple. Abdas refused to do it, though that Prince declared to him, that, in case of his Disobedience, he would cause all the Christian Churches to be pulled down. Which Threat he executed (a); and all the Christians were delivered up to the Mercy of his Clergy [B], who, being angry at the Toleration that had been granted them, fell upon them with great Fury. Abdas was the first Martyr, who lost his Life on that Occasion, if we may so call a Man, who by his Rashness [C] (b) exposed the Church to so many Misfortunes. The Christians, who had long ago forgot one of the most essential Parts of Christian Patience, had recourse to a Remedy, which occasioned another Deluge of Blood. They implored the Assistance of Theodosius, which kindled a long War between the Romans and Persians (c). 'Tis true the latter were worsted: But was there any Certainty that they should not overcome the Romans, and that, being flushed with Victory, instead of persecuting only the Christians in Persia, they would not exercise a general Persecution against all the other Churches? Thus we see what Mischiefs the inconsiderate Zeal of one Man may occasion. The Fury of the Persecutors could scarce be satisfied in the Space of thirty Years (d). They, who (e) suppress that Reason of the Rage and Violence of the Persians, can't be excused. The Commonwealth of Learning might enter an Action against 'em, as is practised against those Sellers, who (f) conceal what they ought to acquaint the Buyers with; and it were to be wished, that the Publick would be more severe against those Historians, who suppress certain Facts; It is so common a Fault amongst those Gentlemen, that it is high time to prevent it for the future, if possible.

(f) Cum et duodecim tabulis istis effectus ea praestari que essent lingua nuncupatis, que qui inficiatus esset dupli penam subiret, a Jureconsultis etiam retentis pena est constituta. Quiliquid enim esset in praedio visum si venisset nominatum dictum esset praestari oportere. Cicerone de Officiis. l. 3. c. 1. Sic likewise Grotius de Jure belli, l. 2. c. 8. n. 7. and Pufendorf de Jure Nat. lib. 5. c. 3.

(a) Ex Theodoret Eccl. Hist. l. 5. c. 39.

(b) Vedelius, a Protestant Divine, blames that Bishop, apud Voet. disp. Theol. Tom. 3. p. 310. (c) Socrates, l. 7. c. 18. Hist. Eccl.

(d) Theod. ibid. (e) See the Remark [C].

(1) Theod. Hist. Eccl. l. 5. c. 39. (2) Socrat. Hist. Eccl. l. 7. c. 18. (3) Baron. ad ann. 420.

(4) Theod. ubi supra. (5) Socrat. l. 7. c. 8.

(6) This was wrote in 469.

[A] To the King.] 'Twas Isdegerdes, if we rely upon (1) Theodoret; but, according to (2) Socrates, the Persecution began under Vararanes, Son and Successor of Isdegerdes. Baronius (3) dares not determine which of the two is in the right.

[B] To the Mercy of his Clergy.] So I call the Magi, who, amongst other things, took care of Religion. It was their business to prevent all manner of Innovation in Religious Matters. Theodoret (4) compares them to a Whirlwind, which raises the Waves of the Sea; Τράκοντα διαλαύβροντες ἔσαν ἡ ἑλκή μαλακῶν, ὅτε τὸν μέγαν καθάρει ὅτε τινὲς καταγίνοντο ἐκ τῆς ἐλκῆς. The Tempest continu'd more than thirty Years, being rais'd by the Magi, as so many Whirlwinds; such was their Function in the Storm that toss'd so violently the Church of Persia. Socrates (5) tells us, that they made use of several Impostures to put a stop to the Progress of the Christian Religion, when they saw that the Love Isdegerdes had conceived for the holy Bishop Marutbas, gave them Reason to fear, that he would forsake their Religion. They were so bold as to hide a Man under Ground, in the Temple where the King used to worship the Fire; and they order'd him to cry out, when the King came in, "That they ought to turn out That Prince, since he had been so impious as to believe, that a Christian Priest was a Friend of God." If what is most falsely said by impious Men were true, viz. That Religion is a mere human Invention, set up by the Sovereigns to keep their Subjects within the Bounds of Obedience, may we not assert, that Princes are the first who have been taken in their own Snare? For Religion is so far from making them Masters of their Subjects, that, on the contrary, it gives their Subjects a Power over them, since they are obliged to profess the Religion of their People, and not That, which seems to them to be the best: And if they are resolv'd to profess a Religion different from that of their Subjects, their Crowns will fit loose upon their Heads. We see how the Persian Magi threaten'd their King, though he had only careles'd one Bishop. Has it not been asserted, that the last (6) King of Siam was pull'd down from the Throne, for having too much favour'd the Christian Missionaries. The same Socrates, who mentions the Artifices made use of by the Magi, to put a stop to the Propagation of the Gospel, tells us likewise, That, after the Death of Isdegerdes, they inspired his Son with such a Spirit of Persecution, that the Christians were treated with shocking Cruelty. They had endeavour'd, but in vain, to inspire his Father with the same Spirit; for he was inclin'd to embrace the Gospel. Socrates assures us of this: But he is to blame for not owning sincerely, that the rash Action of Bishop Abdas afforded the Magi a very plausible Pretence. Compare with this the Remark [B] of the Article of Junius (Francis) Professor at Leyden.

[C] A Man, who by his Rashness.] All the Church Historians are not guilty of the Insincerity, for which I blame Socrates; for Theodoret (7) ingenuously confesses, That the Bishop, who pull'd down a Temple, occasion'd the dreadful Persecution of the Christians in Persia. He does not deny but that the Zeal of that Bishop was unseasonable; but he maintains, that his Refusal to rebuild the Temple is worthy of Admiration, and deserves a Crown: For it seems to me, says he, as great an Impiety to build a Temple to the Fire, as to worship it. Nicephorus (8) does but transcribe Theodoret. For my own part, I am of Opinion, That no private Men, whether they be Metropolitans or Patriarchs, can at any time be dispens'd with from obeying this Law of Natural Religion. The Damage, that has been done to one's Neighbour, ought to be made up by Restitution, or some other Way. Now Abdas, a mere private Man, and a Subject of the King of Persia, had destroy'd another's Property, and a Property which ought to have been the more invaluable, as it related to the establish'd Religion of the Country; he was therefore indispensably obliged to obey the Orders of his Sovereign, by restoring what he had destroyed: And it was no good Excuse to say, That the Temple, which he was ordered to rebuild, was design'd for the Use of Idolaters; for he was not to put it to that Use, and he could not be answerable for the Abuse of those, to whom it belong'd. Would it be a good Reason for keeping a Purse, stolen from another, to say that the Man, from whom it was taken, spends his Money extravagantly? Let him do so; you are not answerable to God for the ill Use he makes of his Money: Let him enjoy what is his own; what Right have you to it? Besides, could there be any Comparison between the Destruction of a Temple, without which the Persians would have remain'd as great Idolaters as they were before, and the Destruction of many Christian Churches? Abdas should have therefore prevented this last Evil by the first, since the Prince put it to his Choice. Lastly, can any thing render the Christian Religion more odious to all the Nations of the World, than to see, that after the Christians had insinuated themselves, as desiring only the Liberty of teaching their Doctrine, they are so bold as to destroy the Temples, consecrated to the Religion of the Country, and to refuse to rebuild them, when the Sovereign commands it? Is it not to give occasion to the Infidels to say; These Men desire at first a mere Toleration, but in a little Time they will;

(7) Hist. Eccl. lib. 5. c. 39.

(8) Lib. 14. c. 19. I find apud Salzen. Otia theol. p. 639. that Socrates, vocat exertim rem non opportunitatem, calls that an ill-tim'd Action, which was done by the Bishop. He quotes Hist. Tripart. l. 5. c. 50. but it is certain that That Chapter is taken from Theodoret. Voetius disput. Theol. Tom. 3. p. 310. quotes Eusebius, who could not mention it.

will pretend to share with us all Employments and Places of Trust, and then become our Masters. At first, they think themselves very happy, if they are not burnt, afterwards very unhappy, if they have fewer Privileges than others; and then again, very unhappy if they are not the only prevailing Party. For some time they resemble Cæsar, who could bear no Master; and then Pompey, who could suffer no Partner?

(g) Lucan.
l. 1. v. 125.
see likewise
Florus, l. 4.
c. 2.

Nec (g) quonquam jam ferre potest Cæsare priorem, Pompeium parem.

Superior Power, fierce Faction's dearest Care,
One could not brook, and one disdain to share.

Rowe.

The Persecutors of the French Protestants maliciously inspired Charles IX. with the like Thought. 'Tis said, that that Prince made use of these Words, speaking to the Admiral de Coligny (16), Per immanem vi contentavate d'un poco di Ranza, bora la volete del pari, fra poco vorrete esser soli, & cacciar noi altri fuori del regno. i. e. At first they pretend to be satisfied with a little Liberty; then they desire to be upon an Equality; next they aspire to govern alone; and at last, they would drive us out of the Kingdom. Such are the unavoidable Inconveniences, which They expose themselves to, who maintain so warmly, That the Power of the secular Arm ought to be made use of for the Establishment of Orthodoxy. Such were the Principles of Abbas. For what would he not have done with force of Arms against the Idolaters under a Christian Emperor, since, under a Heathen Prince, who tolerated the Christian Religion, he pulled down a Temple, for which the Heathens had a very particular Veneration. Compare this with what you will meet with in the Remark [B], of the Article BRAUN (George).

(1) David's History of the Civil Wars
in France, l.
4. p. 138.
Ann. 1506.

ABDERAME, Governor of Spain, for Ischam Caliph of the Saracens in the VIIIth Century, endeavoured to extend their Empire over France, after they had conquered all Spain. They might have been contented [A] with the Countries they had already subdued; but it was very natural for them not to stop in so fine a Road of Success. If we had a particular History of Abderame, written by one of his own Party, it would doubtless appear, that he was very well qualified to satisfy the excessive Ambition of his Master; and that he was one of the greatest Generals in the World. We should meet with nothing but great Actions and Triumphs. I know that some Christian Writers speak well of him: And indeed 'tis no small Praise to have penetrated, as he did, into the very Heart of France: But, after all, there is nothing like a Writer of one's own Party. Abderame quickly removed the Obstacle, which Eudes, Duke of Aquitain, had raised against him; having in a little time reduced the (a) Governor of Cerdagne, who had taken up Arms at the Solicitation of that Duke, to the Necessity of killing himself. He treated his Widow [B] very civilly, who was Daughter of Duke Eudes, and a most beautiful Woman. As soon as he had suppressed that Insurrection, he applied himself with all imaginable Care to Preparations for War, in order to invade France; and (b) the Year following, made an Irruption into that Country with one of the greatest Armies that had been seen for a long time: It spread far and wide, and filled every Place with Desolation and Horror. The Memory whereof is not yet lost, even amongst the common People in the Countries, which were so cruelly ravaged. 'Tis not known whether the Gasccons [C], whose Duke was a Friend to the Duke of Aquitain, made any Resistance, or whether they submitted to the Saracens: We only know, that Abderame, having advanced as far as Bourdeaux, took that City, and burnt all the Churches;

(a) H's Name was Munuz. See his Article.

(b) In 732.

[A] Have been contented. Perhaps the World has never seen such an Instance of a long Series of Victories, and large Conquests, as the Saracen History presents us with. The Idea which the Roman Poet formed of a vast Dominion, takes in but part of their Empire.

Latus regnes, avidum domandæ
Spiritus, quam si Lybiam remotis Gadibus jungas, & uterque Pœnus serviat uni (1).

(1) Hor. lib.
2. Od. 2.

That Man a wider Empire gains,
Who his own craving Wits restrains,
Than he, whose Sword, and wide Command,
Join distant Spain to Lybia's Sand;
Than if they did his Arms obey,
And either Carthage own his Way.

CREECH.

Reason prompted them both to stop, and not to stop. This seems a Contradiction, and yet 'tis very true: If they had stopped, they might have been praised for it upon several Accounts; but they had been blamed likewise for several Reasons. They might have been charged with Weakness and Imprudence. It might have been said, That they neither had the Courage nor the Skill to improve the Opportunities which Providence put into their Hands; and that a little more Boldness and Courage would have enabled them to conquer the whole World. They, who do great Actions, are never secure from such malicious Reflections: If it cannot be denied that they have done great Things, it will be said however, that it is nothing in Comparison of what another would have done in the like Case. The Heathens would have called this a Criticism on Fortune for the ill Choice of her Favourites.

[B] He treated his Widow, &c.] I shall observe in another Place (2), that the Daughter of Eudes, who was married to the Governor of Cerdagne, was the most beautiful Princess of her Time; and that, being brought to Abderame, he sent her to the Caliph. A Circumstance, which a Saracen Historian would not lightly pass over, as we Christian Writers do. He would extol it above all that has been celebrated by the Greeks, to the Glory of Alexander, and by the Romans, to the Glory of Scipio. Alexander (3) behaved himself chaastly towards Darius's Wife and Daughters, who were his Prisoners. Scipio (4) laid a Restraint upon his Passions, though he had a very beautiful Virgin in his Power, and sent her back to a Man of Quality, to whom she was contracted. A panegyric Writer might find in the Circumstances of Abderame's Conduct some Reasons to give him the Preference. He might have kept for himself the Widow of a Rebel Governor: She was an extraordinary Beauty, and yet he left her untouched.

(2) In the Article Munuz.

(3) See the Remark [G], of the Article Macedonia.
(4) Val. Maxim. l. 4. c. 3.

[C] Whether the Gasccons—made any Resistance.] The most exact (5) Historians observe, That Abderame entered France, through the Country that lies betwixt the Garonne, and the Ocean; and they say, That Country was at that Time under the Dominion of the Duke of Gascony, and not under the Duke of Aquitain. They make no mention of the Siege of Arles, which, Moreri says, the General of the Saracens undertook; before he went into Aquitain, and before he made himself Master of Languedoc, Quercy, &c. This Account is so much the more perplexed and confused, as it is certain that the Saracens were Masters of Languedoc, before Abderame passed the Pyrenies. The Way he took will furnish me presently with a justification of the Duke

(5) Moreri, Cordemoy.

Churches: After which, he was victorious in a bloody Battle [D] over Eudes, a little beyond the (c) Dordogne [E]. He crossed Poitou; he plundered the Church of St Hilary at Poitiers, and proceeded to Tours, in order to plunder the Treasure of St Martin's Church. It was then, that Charles Martel, seconded by the Duke of Aquitain, stopp'd the Course of that Torrent. The great Army of Abderame, the Number of the Towns he plundered, and of the Churches he burnt in his way through Perigord and Saintonge, made his March so slow, that Eudes had time to re-inforce himself with a considerable Army, before he join'd Charles Martel: After the junction of their Armies, they march'd (d) beyond Tours to meet Abderame. The two Armies, being in fight of one another, spent near seven Days in skirmishing; but at last, on the seventh Day, which happened to be a Saturday of the Month of October, in the Year 732 [F], the Battle was fought with a very great Loss to the Saracens. Yet we must not imagine the Number of the Dead was so great [G] as some hyperbolical Historians have represented it to be. Abderame was kill'd in the Field of Battle; the broken Remains of his Army retired more easily than they could have expected [H] (e). The Duke of Aquitain, who has been fall'y charged with being the (c) See Cordemoi's History of France, Tom. 1. p. 43, &c.

Cause

(c) With respect to the Pyrenees.

(d) With respect to Paris.

(6) Histor. Saracen. l. 2. p. 111, 112.

of Aquitain. The Account of Augustin Curio (6) is still more confused: He says, That Abderame enter'd France before the Death of Munazza; that he won a Battle there against Eudes; that being returned thither after the Death of Munazza, he cross'd the Rhone, and made a horrid Slaughter at Arles, and afterwards besieged Toulouse, without taking it, and then Bordeaux, with very good Success; and at last, that he plundered and burnt St Martin's Church at Tours.

[D] A bloody Battle.] The Loss of the Christians was so great, if we may believe Isidorus, Bishop of (7) Badajoz, that God only knows the Number of the French that were slain. According to Mezerai, (8) Duke Eudes fought with all imaginable Bravery, but at last he was forced to yield, with such a loss of his Men, as is not to be express'd.

[E] A little beyond the Dordogne.] I do not apprehend what Cordemoi (9) means, when he says, That if Eudes had waited for the coming of Charles Martel, as he should have done, the Saracens had never cross'd the Dordogne. Did they not cross it before (10) the Battle was fought, and before Charles Martel had pass'd the (11) Loire? To what Purpose therefore should he have expected him, in order to prevent the Passage over the Dordogne? That Historian should have said, That if Eudes had staid for Charles Martel, he might have prevented the Irruptions of the Saracens into Saintonge and Poitou; because in that Case he had not lost the Battle; and having all his Troops, he might have kept the Enemy in awe, by the Favour of some advantageous Posts, which he might have secur'd. Thus, preserving his Troops 'till the Arrival of Charles, the entire defeat of the Saracens would have been more practicable, in whatever Province they had been met with. It is, perhaps, difficult to determine, whether the Eagerness, which prompted Eudes to a speedy Engagement, be most worthy of Censure, or the grave and slow March of Charles towards the Loire. Those two Generals both plaid an artful Part. Eudes was desirous to beat the Enemy without the Help of Charles Martel; and the latter was not displeased to see Aquitain laid waste by the Saracens, and the Troops of Eudes worsted. By this means he got rid of the Obstacles, which he feared from thence, to his great Design of making himself King; and the Glory of being the Deliverer of France, would increase in proportion to the small Share his Rival had in it. Some Spanish Writers say (12), That Eudes was beaten between the Garonne and the Dordogne. Mezerai made use of better Memoirs, when he said (13), "That Eudes durst not stay for the Saracens beyond the Rivers, but retired on this side the Dordogne; and, being there reconcil'd to Martel, he assembled his Troops, expecting that he should come and join him with the French Troops; but Abderame broke his Measures, and marching forward, cross'd the River to attack him in his Camp. The Duke staid for him without stirring, and fought with great Courage." This shews that his Impatience is not so much to be blamed, as Charles Martel's Patience.

[F] In the Year 732.] Is it not very strange, that such a Victory as this should not escape Chronological Contradictions? Catell places it in the Year 725. pag. 529. of his Memoirs (14); but in pag. 531. (no very great Interval) he places it in the Year 728. "The Year following, says he, which was the Year 728,

"Eudo Duke of Aquitain died." Calevisus, quoting the Annals of Fulde, places it in the Year 726; Peta-vius (15) in 725. Formerly most Writers pitch'd upon the Year 725, or 726, but of late they declare for the Year 732. Father L'Abbé, Mezerai, Cordemoi, &c. agree in that, with the Annals of Metz, and the most ancient Chronicles.

[G] The Number of the dead was so great.] 'Tis commonly computed at 370 or 375 Thousand, and That of the French at 1500. This is the Computation of (16) Anastasis Bibliothecarius, Paulus Diaconus, and several other Historians: But it is now no longer credited. Mezerai says, That the whole Army of the Saracens consist'd but of Fourscore or an Hundred thousand Men. We must remember that they fought till Night (17) without giving ground, and that they were not pursued the next Day, when it was known that they had march'd all Night. But it would have been almost impossible to make such a prodigious Slaughter of Men, who stood their Ground. A Slaughter of so many thousand Soldiers can't happen but in pursuit of a flying Army, when no Quarter is given. Since therefore the Night parted the two Armies, what we read in du Haillan must needs be a meer romantic Story, viz. That King Abderame, and almost all his chief Officers, were found among the great Heaps of dead Bodies, only suffocated by the Numbers that overwhelm'd them. If there had been at that time any Weekly News-Writers, we might have better judg'd of the Number of the Saracens by the Gazettes publish'd before the Battle, than by the Descriptions given afterwards of it. During the March of those Barbarians, the Licens'd News-Writers would have represented their Army as inconsiderable, and weaken'd it every Day by Deserions and Sicknesses: But, after the Victory, they would have corrected themselves, and assur'd us, upon good Authority, that the Army consist'd of innumerable Multitudes. One might therefore be impos'd upon both by the former and latter Gazettes; but if I were to chuse, I should rather trust the first Account than the last.

[H] Retired more easily than they could have expected.] To rectify the popular Notions of that great Victory, it is requisite to consider what the most accurate Historians have said of it. "(18) The Saracens threw their Darts to no purpose; the Shields of the French Soldiers, rais'd one above another, secur'd them; and, when the Saracens came on Sword in Hand, all their Efforts being not able to break so great and so close a Body, did but serve to put themselves into disorder. Charles, who knew how to take his Advantage, immediately attack'd them. A prodigious number of them were killed by the French, who continued to fight very close: Abderame himself was kill'd upon the Spot; but the Night coming on put an end to the Fight, before Charles was sensible of all his Advantages. He did not think it proper to follow the Remains of the Saracens Army, to avoid the Ambuscades that are always to be feared, when the Enemy is very numerous. Nay he caus'd his Troops to retire in good order, and with their Swords in their Hands, into the Camp, where they staid all Night, and at break of Day he drew them up again in order of Battle in Sight of the Enemies Camp. There were so many Pavillions in it, that, though the Field, wherein the Battle was fought the Day before, was

(15) Petav. Ration. temp. Part I. l. 8.

(16) He took it from the Relation written by Eudes, to Pope Gregory II. See below, the Remark [K]. (17) See the following Remark.

(18) Cordemoi's History of France, Tom. 1. p. 405.

(7) Isidorus Pacenc's Chronic.

(8) Mezerai, Chronol. Abridgment, Tom. 1. p. 293.

(9) Cordemoi's History of France, p. 404.

(10) Eudes did not go back, unless he heard that Abderame had cross'd the Dordogne; but met, and fought him. Id. ib.

(11) Id. ib.

(12) See Catell's History of Languedoc. p. 525, 526.

(13) Mezerai, ubi supra.

(14) For the History of Languedoc.

Cause [I] of this Invasion, was greatly instrumental in obtaining the Victory [K]. It is surprizing, that so important a Victory should not have been well described by the Writers of that Time, and yet that the modern Historians should tell us so many Particulars concerning it [L].

(10) Mezerai's Cronica.
Abdymment.
Tom. I. p.
192.
(25) See the Remarks [A],
in the Article of Caesar.

(21) See his Article.

(22) With respect to Spain.

"cover'd all over with the dead Bodies of the Saracens, Charles had some Reason to believe; that they had still a great number of Soldiers conceal'd in their Tents, and he expected every Minute they would fall out; but at last, after a long Stay, the French perceived that the Saracens had abandon'd their Camp, and some Spies reported, that they had march'd all Night towards Septimania. However he look'd upon this Flight of an Army, which he esteem'd to be more numerous than his own; as an Artifice to draw him into some Ambuscade; and was satisfy'd with making sure of the Saracens' Camp, where he found all their Baggage, together with the Booty they had gain'd." This is what induc'd Mezerai to say, (19) That Charles did not well improve the great Advantage he had gain'd. I am willing to believe he was like many (20) others, better qualified to gain a Victory, than to improve it: But perhaps he thought fit to let the Saracens retire quietly, that they might be the more able to ruin the Duke of Aquitain, whom he looked upon as a dangerous Enemy. With how much Difficulty did He and his Son Pepin subdue that Family? It was the last that submitted to those Usurpers. To conclude; Notwithstanding the ill Success of Abderame, his Successors return'd some Years after into France, and did a great deal of Mischief.

[I] With being the Cause.] There was never a more unlikely Accusation than this is. For first, Eudes (21) had married his Daughter to the Governor of Cerdagne, to engage him thereby in a Civil War, which might prevent the Saracens' Irruption into France. His Son-in-law perished in that Enterprize, and his Daughter falling into the Hands of Abderame had been sent to the Caliph of the Saracens. Secondly, It does not appear that Eudes made any Step to facilitate the Entrance of the Saracens; he gave them no Passage through his Territories; they enter'd into Gaul through the Country of the Duke of Gascony, and so advanced as far as Bourdeaux. Besides, it does not appear that the Saracens had any regard for the Territories of the Duke of Aquitain; they treated him like an Enemy, from the Beginning to the End; so far were they from restoring any thing to him of what they had taken from him in their former Expeditions; as they would certainly have done, if they had treated with him concerning Abderame's Invasion. Lastly, was there any necessity that Abderame should be solicited to come into France? Had not the Saracens enter'd into France already? Had they not already taken Narbonne, Carcassonne, and extended their Conquests as far as Bourdeaux? Abderame's Expedition was but a Continuation of what his Predecessors had so well began; he was willing to carry on their Conquests (22) beyond the Pyrenees; and, to give a greater Eclat to his Undertaking, he refus'd to follow a beaten Path. He cross'd the Pyrenees, thro' the Country of Biscay; which was a ready Way to make new Conquests; whereas if he had gone thro' Rouffillon, he must enter into a Province already conquered. As for those many Annalists, who throw this Blemish on the Duke of Aquitain, their Testimony cannot counterbalance the Reasons that may be alledged in his Justification; for they are a sort of Men, who do but transcribe from one another; and the first took his Account from a Tradition, which ow'd it's Original to the Artifices of the Cabal that favoured Charles Martel. That Cabal had several Reasons to charge the contrary Party with holding Intelligence with the Enemies of the Church and State. We do not find that Isidore of Badajoz, Sebastian of Salamanca, Roderic of Toledo, and such like Spanish Writers, who are free from the Prejudices of that Cabal, have accus'd Eudes of having invited the Saracens into France. See what it is to be born under a lucky Planet! I don't believe that Charles Martel invited those Infidels; and yet he ought to have been suspected of it rather than Eudes, since Eudes was the first who was to be oppress'd, and Charles might think, that whilst the Saracens were employ'd in delivering him from so formidable a Rival, he should have time enough to get his Army ready to fight them, and that a Victory would very much shorten his Way to the Throne. These are good holds for the malicious Interpreters of the Conduct of Great Men; and yet Charles has not been suspected of holding Intelligence with Abderame.

[K] Was greatly instrumental in obtaining the Victory.] There are some Historians, who make no mention of his Engagement with Charles Martel upon that Day; but others expressly assert it. These are the Words of Paulus Diaconus (23): "Deinde post decem annos cum uxoribus & parvulis venientes, Aquitaniam Gallie provinciam quasi habitaturi ingressi sunt; Carolus liquidem cum Eudone Aquitanie Principe tunc discordiam habebat, qui tamen in unum se conjungentes contra eodem Saracenos pari consilio dimicant, nam irruentes Franci super eos trecenta septuaginta quinque millia Saracenorum interemerunt, ex Francorum vero parte mille & quingenti tantum ibi ceciderunt; Eudo quoque cum suis super eos irruens pari modo multos interficiens omnia devastavit." Ten Years after, (the Saracens) coming with their Wives and Children, made an Irruption into Aquitain, a Province of Gaul, with a Design of settling in it; Charles being at that time at Variance with Eudo, Duke of Aquitain; but, uniting upon this Occasion, they oppos'd the Saracens with Confederate Forces; for the Franks, pouring upon them, slew 375000 Saracens, with the Loss of but 1500 Men on their own Side; Eudo likewise, settling upon them with his Forces, routed them with a great Slaughter. Regino likewise mentions the Reconciliation of Charles and Eudes: He says it was made before the Battle, and that afterwards they jointly attack'd the Saracens. Siegebert divides the Glory of the Day between those two Chiefs in such a Manner, that he seems to allow Eudes no other Advantage than that of having forc'd their Camp, and destroy'd the Remains of their Army: Eudo quoque reconciliatus castra Saracenorum irrupit, & reliquias eorum contrivit. Roderic Archbishop of Toledo will afford us a good Proof; for he says, (24) that the Forces of Charles Martel consist'd chiefly of Germans, Goths, and French, who remain'd to Eudes after the Victory, which the Saracens obtained near the Dordogne. We must not forget the Letter, written by Eudes to Pope Gregory II. wherein he gave him an Account of the Battle. Marianus Scotus, and Orbo of Frisingen mention that Letter. Anastasi the Librarian (25) likewise mentions it; but 'tis strange that he should ascribe all the Glory of that Day to the Duke of Aquitain, without speaking one Word of Charles Martel. As to the Number of the Dead, he makes it 370000 on the side of the Saracens, and 1500 on the side of the French. His Authority is the Letter of Eudes, out of which he extracts a particular Circumstance, which is ridiculous enough, namely, That on the Day of the Battle Eudes caus'd three holy Sponges, sent him by the Pope, out of those that serv'd for the use of his Table, to be cut into very small Pieces, and made his Soldiers eat them: Which had so good Effect, as to secure those, who eat of them, from being killed or wounded. The following Words of Martial will explain what is meant by the use of his Table,

Hæc tibi sorte datur tergendis spongia mensis Utilis (26).

This useful Sponge, which Chance has render'd thine, If right apply'd, will make your Table shine.

[L] And yet that the modern Historians should tell us so many Particulars concerning it.] I shall apply here the judicious Reflexion of the Historian, who has been my chief Guide in this Article. "That Day, says he (27), can never be too much taken notice of, and the ancient Annalists can never be sufficiently blamed, for omitting all the Circumstances of so memorable an Action. But on the other Side, they, who have some love for Truth, can hardly excuse some modern (28) Authors, tho' otherwise Writers of great Merit, for being so particular in the Description of the Battle. They speak of it as if they had been present in all the Councils,

(23) Histor. Longob. lib. 6. c. 46. in Catel's Memoirs of Langue-doc, p. 530.

(24) Roderic's Historia Arabum, in Catel's Memoirs, p. 529.

(25) Catel's Memoirs of Langue-doc, p. 531.

(26) Mart. Epig. 144. lib. 14.

(27) Cordemoi's History of France, p. 506.

(28) He speaks in the Margin Paulus Æmilius and Fauchet.

" Councils, and had seen all the Motions of both " Armies: They describe not only the Arms of the " French and Saracens, but also the manner how
" Charles and Aberame drew up their Troops. They " give us long Speeches, which are neither real nor " proper: They mention Aberame's Stratagems, the " Dexterity wherewith Charles hindered them from

" taking effect, and they conclude with the De" scription of the different Postures of the dead Bo" dies, that were found in the Field of Battle, not " omitting even the Groans of the dying, and the " Praises which Charles and Eudes bestowed upon
" one another."

ABDERUS; the Favourite of HERCULES. See the Remark [D] of the following Article.

(a) Herod.
1. 7. c. 109,
326.

(c) See his Article.

(e) Strab. 1.
24. p. 443.

ABDERA, a Maritime Town of Thrace, near (a) the Mouth of the Nestus. Some say, That it was (b) built by the Sister of Diomedes [A], and that it took it's Name from her; but that it was rebuilt by the Clazomenians; in the 31st Olympiad, and that they gave it their Name. According to Herodotus, they only laid the Foundations of it under the Conduct (c) of Timefus, being driven away [B], and their Designs prevented. The Teians only, properly speaking, built Abdera, when, being upon the Point of falling into the Hands of Harpagus, Cyrus's Lieutenant, they chose rather to abandon their Country, than to live under the Dominion of the Barbarians. They all, therefore, embarked, and went (d) to finish what had been only begun by Timefus. This gave occasion to a (e) Proverb not well understood by Erasmus [C]. I pass over the Opinion of those, who ascribe the Foundation of that Town to Hercules [D]: I rather chuse to take Notice of some remarkable Particulars, which

(b) Solen. c.
10. See also Mela, 1. 2.
c. 24.

(d) Herod.
1. 7. c. 161.

[A] The Sister of Diomedes.] No Reader can believe what Moreri says, without being persuaded that Abdera, built by the Teians, took the Name of Diomedes, who reigned in it, and that Herodotus gives us this Account of the Matter. But this is only Mistake upon Mistake. For 1st, What concerns Diomedes, relates to the poetical Times; but the Abandoning of Teos, by it's Inhabitants, and their retreat into Thrace, where they built Abdera, is a Fact of the Historical Times, which falls under the 59th Olympiad. 'Tis therefore a strange Oversight to join these two things in such a manner, as to place the Fabulous Times after the Times of True History. If you have a mind to follow Herodotus's Account of the building of Abdera, by the Teians, let us hear no more of Diomedes, who, if ever there was such an Hero, must have been dead many Ages before: Or, if you design to speak of That ancient King of Thrace, give us notice, that you are relating an Opinion different from that, which concerns the Teians. 2. When Herodotus mentions the building of that Town, he does not speak one Word of Diomedes. Lastly, It is not true that Abdera went by the Name of Diomedes. Moreri should have said, that, according to Solinus, The Sister of Diomedes built it, and gave it her Name: From whence Salmastus (1) was in the right to infer, that Diomedes's Sister's Name was Abdera. There is a Medal in Goltzius, which represents the Head of a Woman, with this Legend, (2) ΑΒΔΗΡΑΕ ΚΟΡΑΕ. The most (3) learned Antiquaries understood it of Diomedes's Sister, who founded Abdera.

(1) Salmastus
Exercit.
Plinianæ. p.
160.

(2) The Maid of Abdera.
κόρη Διομήδεως
pro κόρη.
(3) Pausanimi Epist. ad Laurent. Begerum.

(4) Herod.
1. 7. c. 168.

[B] Being driven away.] Herodotus (4) says so in express Words, ὅτι ἀπὸ τῶν ἱππασθῶν, expell'd by the Thracians. We shall see in the next Remark a Mistake of Pinedo, in relation to this Story. In all appearance the Printers only are the cause of this other Mistake, Thracibus ejectis, which is to be found in the learned Letter of Mr de Spanheim to Mr Beger. They have put it ejectis, instead of ejectis.

[C] A Proverb not well understood by Erasmus.] The Proverb is, Ἀβδῆρα μάλ' ἔστιν ἀνύστα; Abdera the fine Colony of the Teians: the meaning of which, according to (5) Erasmus, is, If you make me uneasy, I know whither to retire. Hoc ænigmatæ proverbiali significamus, non desse quo confugiamus, si quis præter modum pergat esse molestus. Pinedo, a Portuguese, who was forc'd to fly his Country, to avoid the Pursuits of the Inquisition, understands this (6) Proverb in that Sense: but he adds, that such retreats are not always successful, as he is convinc'd by Experience. " Quo (Proverbio) significabatur non desse quo confugiamus, si nobis contumelias inferantur, ut fecere Teii, sed hoc non semper feliciter solet evenire, & doctus & expertus loquor. The Meaning of which (Proverb) is, That we are never at a Loss for a Place of Retreat, when we are reproachful by us'd; an Instance of which we have in the Teians; but the Event of it is not always fortunate, as I can assure from my own Experience." Had He

(5) Erasmus.
Adag. Chil.
2. Cent. 4.
no 53.

(6) Pinedo
in Stephan.
de Urbib. p.
5.

no better Reason to complain, than he had to assert, in the same Page, That the Teians expell'd Timefus the Clazomenian, who had begun to build Abdera, his Complaints would be very ill grounded. But to return to Erasmus. I shall not so much censure him for his Explication of the Proverb, as for what he adds, That perhaps Cicero alluded to it in his Epistles to Atticus; he quotes two (7) Passages out of them, in which 'tis plain Cicero speaks of Abdera, only to represent it as a Place, where Affairs were manag'd very foolishly, and (as we say) without Rhime or Reason. But if Erasmus, who made use of a periphrasis, is, notwithstanding, liable to Censure; what shall we say to Moreri's positive Assertion, without doubt Cicero alludes? What shall we think of it, when we come to know to what he refers that Allusion? It is not to That Fact, which Erasmus conjectured he meant: That would have been, in Comparison, a light Mistake: But he supposes Cicero alludes to I know not what Lustre, which (says he) it is certain the Clazomenians, being expell'd from Asia, gave to the City of Abdera, which made it so famous, as to occasion the Proverb of the Greeks, ΑΒΔΕΡΑ ΤΗ ΒΕΛΟΥΤΗ. I repeat it again; 'tis plain that Cicero mentions Abdera, only to ridicule the Government of that Place. 'Tis therefore a great Fault to say, That without doubt he alludes to the Lustre, the Glory, and Beauty, of that Town. But besides, it is not true that the Clazomenians were the Cause of this pretended Lustre, which occasioned the Proverb. I own, that, according to Solinus, they rebuilt Abdera, and made it larger than it was before, but this is all that we read of them: And, if we consult Herodotus, we shall find that the Thracians did not give them time to build it. After all, is it not certain that Strabo expressly applies the Proverb to the Teians, who, for fear of being expos'd to the Insolence of the Persians, retir'd to Abdera? Is not the Name of the Teians included in the Proverb? Besides, let Moreri inform us a little, where he has found, that, when the Clazomenians came to build that Town in Thrace, they had been expell'd from Asia. Herodotus and Solinus spoke not one Word of it. Lastly, I find every body understands this Proverb, rather to the Disadvantage than to the Advantage of Abdera. Erasmus himself did not reject the Explication of Evaristus, though not much to the Reputation of that City: " Existimat convenire proverbium ubi quis fortunam tenuemus, sed cum libertate conjunctam, antequam amplius opibus, sed obnoxiois servituti. Cuius sententia non refragor; nam damnatus est Abderitarum aer & item paucæ. He thinks the Proverb is applicable, where any one prefers an humble Fortune, with Liberty, to large Possessions, upon the hard Terms of Slavery. Which Opinion I have no Objection to, for both the Climate and the Lands of the Abderites are condemn'd." See Isaac Vossius, upon (8) Pomponius Mela.

(7) Epist. 16.
1. 4. & Epist.
7. 1. 7.

[D] Who ascribe the Foundation of that Town to Hercules.] Mr de Saumaise proves, only (9) by the Testimony

(8) Pag. 155.
(9) Salmastus,
Exercit.
Plin. p. 160.

- (f) Plinius,
l. 25. c. 8.
(g) Justin.
l. 25. c. 2.

(h) Πανεύς Ἀβδηρί-ται ὅτι τῶν πινυνοειδῶν ἀναρχῶν
ταί. Several of the Ab-derites are recorded by the Index-Writers.
Stephanus Byzant. in verbo
"Ἀβδηρί-
(10) Apol-
lodor. lib.
1. 2.

(11) Ἀνδ' Ἀβδηρίται τὸ ὄνομα ἱερωνίκου ἀναρχῶν.
Saumaise has rightly observed, that instead of Ἀβδηρίται, it should be Ἀβδηρίται, which Name Apol-lodor. (he says Apollonius) gave to Hercules's Favourite. Pseudo and Herodotus say, that Passage ought to be thus corrected; but they do not tell us that Saumaise had said so before them. The first quotes Apollonius, and was not aware that it is a Fault of the Pref. or of Memory, in Saumaise instead of Apollodor. Philostratus might have been quoted.

- (12) Apud
Salmat. ubi
supra.
(13) Hyginus
Fab. 3c.

(14) Vigenere's An-notations on the Sepulchre of Abderus in Philostratus.
(15) Philo-
stratus in Icom-
ibid.
(16) Vigenere asserts, falsely, that Tatian in his Discourse, against the Gentiles, says, that Hercules found Abde-rus's Laff eaten.
(17) Problem. Hephæst. apud Plotium p.
484.
(18) Span-heimii Epist.
ad Beyer.
(19) See
Glareanus,
Justin Vari-
orum u.
Cælius, p.
523.

(17) Problem. Hephæst. apud
Plotium p.
484.
(18) Span-heimii Epist.
ad Beyer.
(19) See
Glareanus,
Justin Vari-
orum u.
Cælius, p.
523.

which have been transmitted to us concerning Abdera. The Pasture-Ground about it was of such a Nature, that it (f) made Horles mad. There was such a multitude of Frogs and Rats there (g) in the Time of Cassander, King of Macedonia, that the Inhabitants were forced to retire to another Place [E]. But either they returned soon after [F], or the Town was supply'd with other Inhabitants. The Abderites have been very much decied [G] for their want of Wit and Judgment; and yet their Town has produced many great Men, such as Protagoras, Democritus, Anaxarchus, the Historian Hecataeus, (b) the Poet Nicanetus, and several others, mentioned in the Catalogues of illustrious Men. Nothing can be more strange than the Dissemper,

Testimony of Tzetzes, that the Foundation of Abdera was ascribed to Hercules. He might have alledged a better Authority; for Apollodorus (10) tells us, That Hercules, having Rollen the Mares of Diomedes, had notice given him, that the Bisones had taken up Arms; that, thereupon he gave those Mares to the keeping of a young Man called Abderus, whom he loved, and march'd against the Bisones; that he kill'd part of them, and put the rest to flight; that he slew likewise Diomedes; but that, at his return, he found the Mares had torn Abderus in pieces: that he built a Town near the Sepulchre of that young Man, and gave those Mares to Euryheus. Stephen of Byzantium says only, That the Town of Abdera was so called from (11) Abderus, Hercules's Favourite: He does not say whether it was built by Hercules, or by this favourite Boy. This last Opinion is mentioned by Marcianus (12) Hecataeus, perhaps the seventh Book of Strabo, if we had it entire, would determine the Matter. The Extracts we have of it only tell us, that the Name of the City of Abdera was taken from a certain Person, who was eaten up by Diomedes's Horles. Observe (13) that Hyginus seems clearly to say, That Abderus was one of Diomedes's Servants, and that he was kill'd by Hercules: "Diomedem regem Thraciz & equos quatuor ejus qui carne humana vefcuntur cum Abdero famulo interfecit. He slew Diomedes, King of Thrace, and his four Horles, who were fed with human Flefh, together with his Servant Abderus." Mr de Saumaise observes upon it, that we must not expect to find a great Uniformity in the ancient Fables. His Observation is just: The Writers of the fabulous Times, are full of Contradictions. But perhaps it may be said, that Hyginus's meaning is, that Hercules, seconded by Abderus, kill'd this cruel King of Thrace, who fed his Horles with Man's Flefh. I will not warrant this Confruction. Vigenere (14) had already observ'd, that Hyginus and Philostratus contradict one another. He might also have said, that the latter very much differs from Apollodorus; for (15) he says, that Diomedes gave up Abderus to his Mares; and that Hercules coming to rescue his Favourite, found him half devoured, and that, to punish Diomedes, he caused him to be eaten up by his (16) own Mares. Philostratus does not say, as Apollodorus does, that Hercules built a Town near the Sepulchre of his Friend; as, on the other Side, Apollodorus does not agree with Philostratus, that Hercules appointed certain Games or Exercises, in honour to the Memory of Abderus. I believe there is but one (17) Author, who has asserted, that Patroclus was Abderus's Brother. Some pretend to prove, (18) by Medals, that the Abderites were more willing to ascribe the Name of their Town to Abdera, Sister of Diomedes, than to the Favourite of Hercules.

[E] To retire to another Place.] Justin says, That Cassander fearing, lest they should invade Macedonia, made a Treaty with them, and placed them on the Frontiers. Cassander's Fear (19) has been laugh't at: How could a Prince, who kept all Greece in awe, be afraid that the Inhabitants of one single Town, who fled from Frogs and Rats, should invade a whole Country against his Will? Moreri, who, 'tis likely, never knew that Justin was criticiz'd upon that Account, has done all that was requisite to free him from such a Censure; for he declares, That Cassander received very kindly the Abderites in Macedonia. They who depend upon his Dictionary, will not think of criticizing that ancient Historian. Moreri adds, that this Kindness of Cassander is to be ascrib'd to the Year of the World 3650, according to Eusebius's Chronology. Could any one who reads this, believe that Eusebius has not one Word of that Action of Cassander, and that he does not compute Time according to the Years of the World? But, to go to the Bottom of the Matter, I assert, that, according to Justin, the Abderites were placed by Cassander on the Frontiers of the Country, before he destroy'd the Sons of Alexander: But according to (20) Cæsius, he had entirely got rid of them, in the Year of the World 3641. And therefore Moreri's Chronology is as false, as this Account of Cassander's Kindness is contrary to the only Historian he could follow.

[F] They return'd soon after, or, &c.] What Lucian relates concerning the Distemper of the Abderites, happen'd under the Reign of Lysimachus, and consequently after they were plagu'd with Frogs; for, according to Justin (21), this last Adventure preceded the Time wherein Lysimachus and Cassander assumed the Title of Kings. To which I add, that, under the Reign of the late King of Macedonia, the City of Abdera was in a flourishing Condition. The (22) Prætor Lucius Hortensius plundered it, but he was blamed for it by the Senate of Rome; and the Abderites were restor'd to their Liberty.

(G) The Abderites have been very much decied.] We have already seen how Cicero treats them in his Letters to Atticus. He is not more complaisant in (23) another Book, wherein, having mentioned an Opinion which he thinks to be ridiculous, he adds, Quæ quidem omnia sunt patriâ Democriti quam Democritus digniora. Which better suit with the Country of Democritus, than with Democritus himself. Juvenal, who could not deny that Democritus was a Man of much Wit, and great Wisdom, pretends 'tis a Proof that great Men may be born in a thick Air, and in a Country of Fools.

Cajus prudentia monstrat
Sæmpos passio viros & magna exempla daturis,
Fervorem in patria cæffoque sub aëre nati. (24)

Learn from so great a Wit, a Land of Bogs,
With Ditches fence'd, an Heaven fat with Fogs,
May form a Spirit fit to sway the State,
And make the neighbouring Monarchs fear their Fate.

DRYDEN.

Marial did not entertain a much better Opinion of the Abderites, when he said,

Si patiens fortisque tibi, durusque videtur,
Abderitanæ pectora plebis babes. (25)

If Thou believ'st this Wretch a daundless Wight, Thy Judgment speaks the A dull Abderite.

Figure (26) grossly mistakes the meaning of this Passage; he thinks the Words are address'd to a Criminal, who represented on the Stage the Action of Mativ Scævola, by putting his Hand into the Fire; but they are apply'd to those, who were so silly, as to mistake it for an Act of Courage, since that Criminal did it only to keep himself from being burnt alive.

Nam cum dicatur, tunica præfente molesta,
Ure maxum, plus est dicere, non facio. (27)

For, were he bid to burn his Hand alone,
The Fire prepar'd, and pitchy Garment on,
Shou'd he refuse — I'd swear 'twere bravely done.

Isaac Vossius, who was often particular in his Way of thinking, has given us an Apology of a new Cast for the

(20) Moreri
commonly follows Cæsius's Chronology.

(21) Justin
l. 15. c. 2.

(22) Livius
l. 43.

(23) Cicero
de Natur.
Deor. l. 10.

(24) Juvenal
Sat. 10. v.
49.

(25) Mart.
Epigr. 25.
l. 10.

(26) Vigen-ere ubi supra

(27) Mart.
ibid.

per, which raged for some Months [I] in Abdera, in the Time of Lyfimachus (i). It was a violent Fever, that came to a Crisis, and so went off, in seven Days; but it so disordered the Imagination of those that were seiz'd with it, that it converted them into Players. They were perpetually reciting Scraps of Tragedy, especially of the Andromeda of Euripides, as if they were upon the Stage: So that the Streets were full of pale and lean Actors, who were making tragical Exclamations. This continued 'till the next Winter, which proved very cold, and consequently more proper to stop this Raving. Moreri gives a very wrong Account of the Matter [I].

Mr Beger

(i) Lucian's Method of Writing History, about the Beginning.

(28) Iliac. Vossius in Pompon. Melam. p. 135.

(29) Hippocrat. l. 3. de morbis vulgar.

(30) Ili. Voss. ibid.

the Abderites. He owns (28), that many of them were born, or became mad; but he pretends 'twas not a Sign of Stupidity, since Madmen seldom seize Blockheads and Fools, but frequently attacks the greatest Wits. As to the Passage of Hippocrates (29) who mentions many Abderites, whose Fever had been attended with Raving, Vossius pretends 'twas not that which occasion'd the Proverb relating to that Town, but rather the pleasing Affection of Mind, which (30) succeeded the Fever. Ex Affectu juvenitissimo, qui spiritum febrilibus succedere solent, ut testatur Lucianus Scripto de conscribenda Historia. They became extremely fond of Verses and Music, and acted the Part of Comedians in the Streets: Such a polite Phrensy as this, says he, does not fall upon stupid and phlegmatic People: Tam elegans insania non cadit in crassos et phlegmaticos; necum in vervecem capta. That Author should have remembered Aristotle's Maxim, One Swallow does not make a Summer. Why does he turn into Custom and Habit the Consequences of a Fever that happened but once? What he quotes out of Lucian is a single Fact, on which such Proverbs can't be grounded. I shall observe by the way, that Brahmus did not rightly apprehend Cicero's (31) Meaning; for it must be inferred from the Words of that Roman, not that the Inhabitants of Abdera were stupid, but that, through a prodigious Roving of their Imaginations, they fell into incredible and groundless Paradoxes. "Abderitanis natura peculiatem fuisse mentis stuporem indicat M. Tull. in libris de Natura Deorum. "Cicero, in his Book of the Nature of the Gods, 'assures us, that the Abderites were affected with a peculiar Stupidity of Mind," says Erasmus (32). Some very learned Men (33) quote them as the very Words of Cicero: So true it is, that the Collections of Men of Letters, like Virgil's Fame, receive continual Additions by removing from Place to Place.

Mabilitate viget, viresque acquirit eundo (34)

— Each Moment brings,

New Vigour to her Flights, new Pinions to her Wings.

DRYDEN.

They, who pretend that the Word abderitis, which is proverbially used in Tatian's Discourse against the Greeks, signifies a Teller of idle Stories, do not, by that, confirm the Charge of Stupidity upon the Abderites. People are not imposed upon by Fools and Blockheads. Not to say that Tatian applies that Word to the Doctrine of Democritus, who certainly was no Fool.

[H] The Distemper, which raged for some Months. Lucian, who has described it's Symptoms, pretends to have found out the Cause of it. Archebius, says he, a good Player, having acted Euripides's Andromeda before the Abderites, in a very hot Summer; many came out of the Theatre in a Fever, and having their Imaginations thoroughly affected with the Tragedy, the Ravings caused by the Fever represented nothing to them but Andromeda, Perseus, Medusa, &c. and so strongly excited in them the Ideas of those Objects, and of the Pleasure they had received from the Representation, that they could not forbear reciting and acting in imitation of Archebius. I make no doubt, but the first, who acted this Farce in the Streets, after their Fever was over, injured several, who were growing well. Every thing contributed then to the spreading of the Contagion. The Mind is subject to epidemical Distempers as well as the Body; and nothing more is wanting, than a lucky Beginning, and due Preparation. Let an Heretic, or a Fanatic, start up at such a time, whose contagious Imaginations, and vehement Passions, know how to gain Ground, and they'll infatuate a whole Country in a little time, or at least a great many People.

In other Places, or at other Times, they might not perhaps be able to gait three Profelytes. Recollect the Story of (35) those Virgins of Miletus, who were for some time so disguised at the World, that they could not be cured of the Design of killing themselves, but by threatening to expose those stark naked to public View, who should make away with themselves. The very Remedy shews that their Passion was only a Distemper of the Mind, wherein the Understanding had no Share. Something like this was seen at Lyons (36) towards the end of the XVth Century. The Difference between these Distempers, and the Plague or Small-pox, is only that the latter are infinitely more frequent. I should be induced to think, the Ravage which the Player Archebius, and the Sun (37), made in the Minds of the Abderites, was rather a Sign of Vivacity than of Stupidity: However, it was always a Mark of Weakness; for which I appeal to those, who have observed what sort of Men are most affected with the Representation of a Play (38). "Quos (terrores et errores) auxerunt Poetæ; frequens enim confellus theatri, in quo sunt mulierculæ & pueri, movebat audiens tam grande carmen:

Adsum atque advenio Acherontæ vix via alta atque ardua

Per speluncas faxis structas asperis, pendentibus, Maximis, ubi rigida constat crassa caligo inferum.

"The Increase of which (Terrors or Mistakes) is owing to the Poets: for a full Audience, among which are Women and Children, are greatly affected with such pompous Numbers, as these.

*Behold me here, arriv'd from Hell's Abode,
Thro' gloomy Caverns, and rough, hanging, Rocks,
Where Horror dwells, and everlasting Night, Forcing my dangerous Way!*

[I] Moreri (39) gives a very wrong Account of the Matter. 'Tis not true, that the Abderites died on the Stage, nor that the Proverb, Abderitica mens, was occasioned by the Distemper, they were then affected with. Moreri would find it very hard to prove that there was such a Proverb: It is not sufficient to maintain that the Abderites were commonly look'd upon as Fools; he should make it appear that these very Words, Abderitica mens, were made use of to denote the general Opinion the World entertained of them; but 'tis certain Erasmus does not quote any one Author, that used these Words. But I will not insist upon that Incident: nay, I am willing to give up as false the following Reflexion, viz. That a Thing of so short a duration, as that Distemper of the Abderites was, which has been only mentioned by Lucian, who made use of it with no other design, than to form the Exordium of a Dissertation; such a Fact, I say, is not sufficient to occasion a Proverb, by which a whole People are for ever render'd infamous. For if it be said, that the sero sapient Phrygians might have proceeded from one single Error of the Phrygians, I can shew a great Difference between the two Cases, since it is certain that as soon as the thing became a Proverb, it was not apply'd to the Phrygians more than any other Nation: Whereas the Reproach cast upon the Abderites, concern'd them literally, and at all times, just as (40) that which is cast upon the Normans and Gascans concerns them in a most proper Sense. But to consider this as a mere Cavil, and to come close to the Point: Moreri's Proverb, Abderitica mens, was only designed to charge the Abderites with great Foolishness; but the Distemper mentioned by Lucian was not Folly; it was a disordered Imagination, and a sort of Madness, which falls rather upon Men of great Wit, than upon Fools and Blockheads.

Moreri

(35) Plutarch de fortibus fact. mulierum.

(36) Bodinus Miscell. l. 5. c. 27.

(37) The common Maxim of the Philosophers, Sol & homo generant hominem. The Sun and a Man beget a Man, was verified here in a particular manner. (38) Cicero. Tullius. l. c. 16.

(32) Adagi. Chil. 4. centur. c. 27.

(33) Cicero, in the Nature of the Gods, says, Abderitani stupori mentis obnoxii sunt. Laur. Begerus Observ. in Numism. quæd. p. 16. See also Lloyd and Hofman, in the Word Abdera. (34) Virgili Æneid. 4. l. 275.

(39) He has committed many other Faults. See the Remarks [A], [C], and [E].

(40) Tacitus says that the Proverb which reflects upon Normandy and Gascony, are grounded upon a slight and trivial Fault, which pass from one Generation to another.

(k) Laurentius Begerus. His Book was printed at Berlin, in 4to. in the Year 1691.

M. Beger (k), who published his Conjectures on a Medal of the Abderites [K], which he fancied was struck in memory of this troublesome Distemper, changed his Opinion, after reading the fine Dissertation written to him (l) on that Subject, which contains several things relating to the City of Abdera. I shall mention some of them in the last Remark. There was a kind of Ceremony practised in that Town on certain Days, which might be called, in some Respect, an Auto de Fe; for it was without doubt an Act of Religion. I think Ovid is the only Author that mentions it: 'Tis one of the Imprecations, with which he loads his Enemy:

(l) By Elias Kiel Spanheim. It was printed with Mr. Beger's Treatise.

Aut te devoveat certis Abdera diebus,

Saxaque devotum grandine plura peiant, (m)

A Victim, at Abdera, may'st thou bleed,

And all the stony Show'r descend upon thy Head.

(m) Ovid. in Ibid., v. 465.

The Commentators are silent upon this Passage. I suppose they cannot find the Origin or Circumstances of that Ceremony. I shall take Notice elsewhere of a (n) Temple of Jafon in Abdera, which Parmenio destroyed.

(n) In the Dutch Edition of his Dictionary.

Moreri is therefore to blame for saying that his Proverb was grounded on the Phrenzy mentioned by Lucian. Tho' I name Lucian, I am not ignorant that Moreri has only quoted Cælius Rhodiginus, which (41) he has been already censured for. He had that Quotation from Charles Stephens. He, and a great many others, have answered, and do answer every day, the Hopes, which that Italian Author conceived, when he resolved to quote no body. He hop'd to be quoted himself, which he should not have been, if he had put in the Margins of his Book the Names of the ancient Authors, whom he transcribed.

[K] On a Medal of the Abderites.] It represents a Griffin on the one side, and on the other a Man's Head without a Beard, crowned with Laurel, with these Words, ΕΠΙΔΙΟΕ ΑΛΙΟΤ. Mr Beger was of Opinion, that this Medal, consecrated to Apollo, under the Title of Jupiter the Inauspicious, sub Jove sinistro, (the same as sub Vejoce at Rome) was intended to denote the excessive Influence of the Sun's Heat, which occasioned the Imperfection with which the Abderites were reproach'd, and which, notwithstanding, made them good Disciples of Apollo. Mr de Spanheim understands by that Inscription, the (42) Prætor, or Governor, of Abdera; and says, That the Griffin having been the Symbol of Teios, as appears by many Medals, 'tis no wonder that the Inhabitants of Abdera, a Colony of the Teians, should have stamp'd the same Symbol on their publick Monuments. It was the constant Practice of the Colonies, with respect to their Mother-Town: The Example of Syracuse and Corfu, whose Arms were a Pegasus, in imitation of Corinth, is a Proof of it. As for the Head crowned with Laurel, it represents Abderus, Hercules's Favourite, or (43) Tisamenus, the Clazomenian, who was worship'd as a Hero by the Teians settled in Abdera. Isaac Vossius (44) understands by the Inscription of that Medal, Jupiter Frumentarius, Jupiter the Harvest-God, as if Ζεὺς ἄριστος was the same thing with Ζεὺς ἐπιεικής; and he grounds his Explication upon the Fertility of the Soil which surrounded the Town of Abdera: whence the Triballi, being reduc'd to a great Scarcity, flocked thither, according to (45) Diodorus Siculus, it being the most fruitful Spot of Ground they could meet with. Mr de Spanheim does not deny; and he mentions another Passage of Diodorus (46) Siculus, wherein Abdera is reckon'd to be one of the most flourishing Towns then in Thrace. He mentions likewise another Passage out of a Letter, ascribed to Hippocrates, wherein 'tis only said, That Abdera is no obscure Town, οὐκ ὀλίγον ἢ ἀνθρώπων. But, notwithstanding, he refuses Vossius concerning the Meaning of the Medal. Before I make an end of this Remark, I must observe, that it would be very wrong to take for an Instance of little Wit, what pass'd (47) between the Inhabitants of Abdera and Hippocrates, on Democritus's Account. The great Concern they express'd for the Health of Democritus, their Fellow-Citizen, is a Sign of their good Judgment. 'Tis true, Hippocrates did not confirm the Opinion they had entertain'd of Democritus: They took him to be a Fool; but he seem'd to Hippocrates to be wiser than his Countrymen. However this proves nothing; for I am sure all the Cities of Greece would have judg'd of Democritus as his Countrymen did: And we should at present entertain the same Opinion of a Philosopher, who should laugh at every thing; who should say, That the Air is full of Images, who should study the singing of Birds, and shut himself up in Sepulchres, &c. And none but Wits of the first Rank, who guard against all Prejudice, would be able to form a right Judgment of him. But that sort of Men are very scarce at all Times, and in all Places. They are as scarce, and perhaps more, than honest Men, who, in Juvenal's Opinion, hardly equal the Number of the Mouths of the Nile.

(45) Id. lib. 13. p. 194.

(47) See the Letters written on both Sides upon that Occasion, among the Works of Hippocrates.

—rari quippe boni: numerus vix est totidem, quot Thebarum Portæ, aut divitis Ostia Nilæ. (48)

(48) Juvenal. Sat. 13. v. 26.

Good Men are scarce, the Just are thinly sown;
They thrive but ill, nor can they last, when grown.
And shoud' we count them, and our Store compile,
Yet Thebes more Gates would shew, more Mouths the Nile.

CREECH.

ABDIAS of Babylon, an Author who deserves to be ranked amongst the most impudent legendary Writers. He is an Impostor, who pretends to have seen our Saviour, to have been one of the LXXII Disciples, to have been Witness of the Actions and Death of several of the Apostles; to have followed St Simon and St Jude into Persia; and to have been established by them the first Bishop of Babylon. The Work, that goes under his Name, is divided into ten Books, and entituled, Historia Certaminis Apostolici. Wolfgang Lazius (a) found the Manuscript in a Cave at Carinthia; and, though he was a learned Man, he suffered himself to be so much imposed upon by that fabulous Writer, that he prepared to publish it, as an important Piece. He gave credit to the Inscription of that Manuscript, importing that Abdias, made Bishop of Babylon by the Apostles themselves, had writ in Hebrew this History of their Lives; and that it was translated into Greek (b) by Eutropius, and into Latin by Africanus. He published it at Basil (c) in the Year 1551, with some other Lives

(a) A Physician at Vienna in Austria, and Historiographer to the Emperor Ferdinand I. See the Epistle Dedicatory of his Edition.

(b) The Preface of Julius Africanus says, That Eutropius was a Pupil of Abdias. (c) In Cypricans, Fol.

of the Saints. It was since reprinted several times (A), in several Places. Fabricius remarks, that it is a Mistake to suppose it was inserted in the Bibliotheca Patrum (d). Laurence de la Barre inserted it in his History of the Fathers at Paris in 1583 (e). 'Tis not Pope Gelasius, as Moreri would have it, but Pope (f) Paul IV. who rejected the Work of our Abdias, as an Apocryphal Piece. Several Writers, both Catholic and Protestant, have acknowledged that 'tis an Imposture. The latter pretend to have undeceived the others [B]: But this is not granted them [C]. After all, there is no great Glory in the Discovery; for this Impostor has had the Assurance to quote (g) Hegeffippus, who flourished 130 Years, or thereabouts, after our Saviour's Ascension. He likewise mentions (b) a Disciple of the Apostles, called Crathon, who, as he says, wrote a History, in ten Books, of all the Actions and Sufferings of St. Jude in Persia, for the Space of thirteen Years; which History, pursues he, was translated into Latin by Africanus the Historiographer. That Africanus can be no other than Julius Africanus, who died about the Year 230 (i).

(d) J. Alb. Labr. in Cod. Apocr. N. T. p. 4. 1.
(e) Abd. not in 1581, at 13 in More.
(f) L'Abbé de Script. Ecclési. T. 1.
p. 3.
(g) See Vo-
lus, de Hist. Gr. p. 20.
(h) Abd.
Hist. Cert. Apost. 1. 6.
p. 83.
(i) Cave's
Hist. Litt.
p. 72.

[A] Reprinted several times.] Mr du Pin, who mentions the Editions of 1557, 1560, and 1571; and besides, an Edition of Basil, in the (1) Year 1532. and one of Paris, in 1583. has forgot the first, which deserv'd most to be mention'd. I have not by me his Bibliothèque de la Paris Edition; and therefore I dare not affirm, that he takes notice of the pretended Edition of Basil in 1532. Now because he mentions but one Paris Edition, which is that of 1583, the Reader might very well think, that the others mentioned by him are not of Paris: And yet it is certain, that Abdias was publish'd there in the Year 1560, in 8vo, with a Preface of a Doctor of the Sorbonne, call'd John Faber. The Abbreviator of Gesner, and Dr Cave mention a Paris Edition, 1571, in 8vo. 'Tis fallily said in Magirus's Eponymologium, that this Work was printed the first time at Paris, in 1551.

[B] To have undeceived the others.] Consult Rivetus (2) chap. 6. of the first Book of his Criticis Sacer, where, having observed the Prepossession of Lazius, and the Authority which Harding and Bellarmine ascribe to our Abdias, he adds; "Ejus nugæ & mendacia non ex quâ operosius persequamur, quia jam oculatioribus Pontificis ita patent EX NOSTRO- RUM ANIMADVERSIONIBUS, ut eos tam putidi commenti pudeat. I move upon myself the parts of a farther Examination of his idle Stories, and Inventions; since the more judicious Catholics are so convinc'd by MY ANIMADVERSIONS, as to be assur'd of so false a Cheat." He quotes Baronius, Molanus, Paggin, and even Bellarmino, who thought better of it since; he quotes them, I say, as acknowledging the Imposture of that History of the Apostles.

[C] This is not granted them.] Father L'Abbé (3) exclaims in a strange manner against Rivetus, on account of the Passage I have just now mention'd. He may be in the right, when he says, the Catholics found out the Imposture, before the Protestants had given them any Insight into the Matter; but he is very much to blame for his sharp and injurious Words; for thus he speaks: "Hæc quiquilias ab otioso bulatore, qui merito jure Pseudo-Abdias dicitur, coniectas interpolatave nullius fidei atque auctoritatis esse apud eruditos, docuerunt jampridem Catholici Traditores, Sixtus Senensis, Joannes Heflessius, Joannes Molanus, Cardin. Baronius, Polleminus, Salmero, Miræus, alique, ut flicam Vossium, Cocum, Rivetum, similesque Heterodoxos Criticos,

"in alienis ab Ecclesia Catholica castris militantes, atque ex Catholicorum duntaxat scriptis & observationibus suffarcinatos. Mentitur enim pro more Andreas Rivetus, qui libro 1. cap. 6. effatur ausus est, oculatioribus Pontificis ex suorum, hoc est, Hæreticorum hominum, animadversionibus edoctis, nugæ & mendacia illius operis deprehendisse, ita ut eos tam putidi commenti pudeat. Sed, amabo, quis Calvinii catulus hoc commentum subodoratus est ante Heflessium, Molanum, Sixtum, ipsumque adeo Paulum IV. Romanum Pontificem, qui inter scripta à se damnata rejicit?—Several Catholic Writers, such as Sixtus Senensis, Joannes Heflessius, Joannes Molanus, Cardin. Baronius, Polleminus, Salmero, Miræus, and others, not to mention Vossius, Cocus, Rivetus, and the like heterodox Critics, who fight under other Banners, than those of the Catholic Church, and are beholden only to the Writings and Observations of the Catholics: All these, I say, have long ago taught, that this Trash, cook'd up by that idle Fabulist, the Impostor Abdias, deserv'd to have no Credit or Weight with the learned. Rivetus, therefore, would impose upon us, according to Custom, when he has the Assurance, in the sixth Chapter of his first Book, to declare, that his own, that is, the Animadversions of an Heretic, had so undeceived the more judicious Catholics, that they were assur'd of so false a Cheat. But, pray, which of Calvin's Writings smelt out this before Heflessius, Molanus, Sixtus, and even Paul IV. Pope of Rome, who has plac'd this Book in his Expository Index?" I believe this Book was condemn'd again at Rome, since the Death of Paul IV. for I don't think that Claudius Episcopus means the Condemnation made by that Pope, when he says, "Qualiscunque autor sit Abdias, superiore certè quam hæc scriberemus anno à Romanis Inquisitoribus proscriptus est. Whatever kind of Author Abdias may be, it is certain his Book was condemn'd, by the Roman Inquisitors, a Year ago." Those Words are in the 5th Chapter of the 5th Book of Continentali. The Continuator of Magirus (4) is in the wrong to conclude from thence, that the Year meant in that Passage is 1568; for that Work about Continence was printed (5) in 1565. Peter Paul Vergerius, a Protestant Writer, who died in 1564, exclaimed against the Imposture of our Abdias, in his Idolum Laurentianum.

(4) Epist. mol. Critic. p. 2.
(5) See Leou-
nos, Hist. Collig. Nar-væ, p. 710.

ABDISSI, [A] Patriarch of Musal in Assyria, beyond the Euphrates, came to Rome in the Year 1562, and having paid his Homage to Pius IV. received the Pallium from him. The Council of Trent being then met, the Cardinal de Mula, Protector

(1) Pan- vinus, Life of Pius IV.
(2) Thuan-
Histor. l. 32.
(3) Aub-
Miræus, Politic. Ecclési.
l. 2. c. 5. p.
217.
(4) Thuanus calls him Saluta; Spon- danus, Sul- ta; See the Remarks in the Index
Ecclésiast.

Pope Julius III. that he was a Man of admirable Learning; that he understood many Languages, and was extraordinarily well versed in the Holy Scriptures. Thuanus's Memoirs imported, that he understood the Chaldeæ, the Arabic, and Syriac, and gave pertinent Answers to the Questions propos'd to him. Pancinius, Serius, and Spondanus, affirm the same thing with more Circumstances. He says in his Confession of Faith, as it is set down by them, That he had been a Monk of St Anthony, in the Monastery of St Rochas, and St John, two Brothers. He had very much propagated the Roman Faith, if we may believe Aubert Miræus; but his Successors took no Care to keep it up; so that Leonard Alet, Bishop of Sister-

Protector of the Eastern Christians, acquainted that Assembly with it. His Letters were read in the XXII Session. They imported that the People under the Jurisdiction of that Patriarch had been instructed in the Christian Faith, by the Apostles St Thomas and St Thaddeus, and by one of their Disciples, called Mark; that their Belief was altogether the same with that of the Church of Rome; that they had the same Sacraments and the same Ceremonies; that they had still some Books written from the time of the Apostles; that That Patriarchate reaches into the very Heart of the Indies, and comprehends many Nations, some of which are subject to the Turkish Emperor, others to the Sopbi of Persia, and others to the King of Portugal. The Portuguese Ambassador protested immediately, That the Eastern Bishops, subject to the King his Master, acknowledged no Patriarch. Afterwards Abdijis Confession of Faith was read (a), bearing date the seventh of March, 1562. wherein he promised to observe and teach his Inferiors a perfect and perpetual Conformity of Opinions with the Church of Rome. Lastly, they read the Letters he writ to the Council, to excuse himself for not going thither [B], and to beseech the Fathers to send him their Decrees, which he promised should be punctually observed. All those things had been read already in a Congregation, without exciting any one's Reflexions; but the Protest of the Portuguese Ambassador gave Occasion to take notice of the Absurdities of that Account: Some began to murmur; the Portuguese Bishops were ready to speak their Sentiments, when the Proctor, in the Name of the Legates, diverted the Blow. Thus Fr. Paolo (b) relates the Matter: I shall examine this in another Place (c).

(a) It is to be seen in O-nuphrius Panvinius's Life of Pius IV. in Suri Comment. P. 754. And in Spon-danus, Contin. Annal. ad an. 1562.

(b) History of the Council of Trent.

(c) In the Article Hebrew

the Pope's Nuncio in those Parts, in the Year 1583, found that the Patriarch Donba Simon, who was the second since Abdiej, had retired towards the Borders of Perfia. The Pope's Affairs were not in a better Condition, when Peter Strozza, Secretary to Paul V. publish'd at Rome, and at Cologne, in 1617, his Disputation, De Chalcæorum dogmatibus (5).

[B] To excuse himself for not going thither.] This shews that Moreri is very much millaken, when he says, "That Abdissi assisted at the Council of Trent," and presented his Confession of Faith in the XXII. "Session." Aubert Mureau, committed the same Fault, "qui & Tridentino Concilio interfuit, quo was present likewise at the Council of Trent," says he (6), speaking of his Abdissi. Which is more surprising, is, That Moreri quotes Theanus and Spennius, though the first says not one Word of that Patriarch's pretended Journey to the Council; and tho'

the second expressly says, That they read the Letters, wherein Abdya excused himself for not coming to Trent. I shall occasionally observe a Fault, which much needs have crept into Thuanus's History: He says (7) That Patriarch came " Ad Apollotorum limina Pontificem salutatum, ut ab eo confirmatus " partem de corpore Sancti Petri acciperet. i. e. "
" He came to the Apollotical See, to salute the Pope, "
" that, being confirm'd by him, he might receive part "
" of the Body of St Peter " Any one, who reads these Words, would think that he came to ask an Arm or some other Piece of St Peter's Body; for to come to Rome, in order to carry away such Presents, is a thing very acceptable to that Court. But I am persuaded that instead of partem it should be pallium, as we read in Spondanus, who uses almost the same Expression with Thuanus. We may see this in his Continuation of the Annals of Barbaria.

(-) Thom.
l. 32, p. 640
col. 2, v. 10.
Francot.
1245.

(c) See Minneap, ibid.
p. 210.

[14, p. 217.

ABEL, second Son of Adam and Eve, was a Shepherd. He brought an Offering to God, of the Firstlings of his Flock, at the same Time that his Brother Cain offer'd the Fruits of the Earth. God accepted the Oblation of Abel, but not That of Cain: which displeased the latter so much, that he rose up against the other and slew him. This is all the Account Moses gives us of him (a): But we might greatly enlarge this Article, if we would expatiate upon every Thing, which the Curiosity of human Wit has produc'd upon the Subject. We shall however avoid entering upon the Detail; nor shall we pretend to guess at the Age of Abel, when he was slain. It is impossible to arrive at any Certainty in this Matter; because we know not the Duration of the State of Innocence [A]; nor how much younger Abel was than Cain [B];

(2) Post
etiam dict.
contingent

[A] The Duration of the State of Innocence. Authors are greatly divided upon this Question: Some assert, that Adam fell on the very Day of his Creation; and that he continued in Paradise but fix, seven, or ten Hours (1). Others extend the Time to six, eight, or ten Days; others to thirty four Years. Most of them build their Opinions upon a supposed Resemblance between Adam and Jehus Christ: For Instance, if Adam be supposed to continue in Paradise forty Days, or thirty four Years, the Reason is, because Jehus Christ tarryd forty Days in the Wilderness, or lived upon Earth thirty Years (2). The Empiricks of these Reasons is obvious to Men of Sense. There are very strong Objections to the Opinion of those, who restrain the State of Innocence to a few Hours; but much stronger against theirs, who continue it to several Weeks or Years. For, with the good Leave of the Rabbins, it is certain from Moses's Account, that Adam did not know his Wife, till after their Departure from Paradise. Now, why should he defer the Consummation of his Marriage so long? Had he not received the nuptial Benediction from the Mouth of his Creator? Was he not commissioned, in form, to increase and multiply, and to replenish the Earth? This most substantial Reason for the Delay of this Consummation till after the Fall, is that of St Austin (3).

that "The Woman was tempted and seduced, almost" as soon as formed. Mox creata muliere, antequam "convenient, facta est illa Transgression." The other Reason he gives, namely, that they were obliged to wait the Command of God, is none at all (4); for I have already observed, that this Command had been authentically notified to them. It could be once proved, that the Innocence of the first Man continued many Days, it would effectually confirm the Opinion of those, who assert, that, had it not been for the first-bitten Fruit, Adam and Eve would have preserved their Virginity for ever; and that it was in consequence of God's fore-keeping the Fall, that they were created of different Sexes. But, be that as it will, we cannot determine certainly at what Age they began to propagate. We shall in another Place (§) regulate the Opinion of some, that Cain was not conceived 'till a long time after Adam's Transgression; either because his Father obtained from the Pleasures of Matrimony, in Mortification for his Offence; or because he had left Eve for some other Woman.

[B] How much younger Abel was than Cain! The Narration of Moses seems clearly to prove, that Cain and Abel were not Twin-Brothers: Nevertheless, one of the most judicious Interpreters of the Scripture, believed, with some of the Rabbins, that they were.

ventirent:
 Cur enim
 non ad hunc rem divina expectaretur Auctoritas, uli nulli
 c. negligenti-tiam, inamistum tibi, in obedientia carnis urge-bat illa ibid.
 It may be said, that God had not yet commanded them to a metagather-ing, why should they not quit the desire Person, in a Metagather-ing, and they were not prompted by any carnal desire, and

(1) Perenius
abn. Gen.
B. C. Quail.
I.

(2) C. roell- ia L. p. 102,
at 9. Gen. iii.
23.

3) August.
1. 9. de Ge-
neti ad lit.
p. 4.

nor in what Year of the World he he was slain by his Brother [C]. For the same Reason I shall not venture any Conjectures upon the Question, Whether he died a Virgin [D]; nor concerning the Reason of Cain's quarrelling with him. Some say, The Difference between them was a Religious Dispute [E]; others, that they quarrell'd about

(6) Corn. à
Lap. upon
Gen. iv. 2.

"Rabbini, & ex is Calvinus, putant ex eodem conceptu Evam peperisse gemellos, Cain & Abel (6).
"The Rabbins, and among them Calvinus, think "that Eve brought forth Twins, Cain and Abel."

But, tho' we should grant this, the Uncertainty would not wholly vanish; unless we could determine precisely the Year of Cain's Birth. But, farther, it does not appear, that Abel was the Twin-Brother of Cain; neither is it certain, that he was born after him. However we may conclude it highly probable, that Cain was born in the first Year of the World, and Abel the Year after. The Revelation ascribed to Methodius, is an apocryphal Piece, and meer Invention. It is said to have been revealed to him from Heaven, during his Imprisonment for the Faith

(7) See the Author of Hist. Scho-
last. in Libr.
Hist. Genes.
xxv. in Pererius upon Genesis.

(7), that Adam and Eve left Paradise in a State of Virginity; that they continued in it fifteen successive Years, wholly taken up with lamenting their Fall; that, at the end of this time, they begat a Son and Daughter at once, whose Names were Cain and Calmana; after which they returned to a State of Continency for fifteen Years more; after which they begat a Son and a Daughter, as before, named Abel and Debara; and that the Murthor of Abel by Cain fell out in the one hundred and thirtieth Year of Adam; which threw Him and Eve into a Fit of Grief, which lasted an hundred Years; after which they begat Seth. The Inhabitants of the Island of Ceylon pretend, that the Jalt Lake, found on Mount Colombo, is a Collection of Tears, shed by Eve, during an hundred Years, for the Death of Abel (8). The Rabbins will have it, that Adam lamented his Son's Death an hundred Years, in the Valle of Tears; near Hebron, without any carnal Commerce with his Wife (9); which probably would have continued longer, had not an Angel from God commanded him to cohabit with Eve, because the Messiah was not to descend from the Family of Cain. Idle Tales! The State of the World was so far from requiring such a long fit of Sorrow, that, on the contrary, it demanded, that they should comfort themselves by repairing the Loss: So that it is highly probable, that Adam and Eve presently mollify'd their Grief by the mutual Satisfaction of procuring themselves another Son, in the room of Abel, who was slain. Yet one would hardly believe, how indolently this Fable of Adam and Eve's long Divorce from the Marriage-bed has been preached up. We shall treat of it under the Article LAMECH.

[C] In what Year of the World he was slain by his Brother.] Some have thought it probable, that this Murthor was committed the same Year that Seth was born; i. e. in the one hundred and thirtieth of Adam: It has been thought probable, I say, because Eve, in giving the Name of Seth to the Child he had brought forth, assigns this as a Reason: For God hath appointed me another Seed instead of Abel, whom Cain slew (10). But it must be granted, that this is rather a Proof, that Seth was the first Child which Eve bore after the Murthor of Abel, than that his Death was immediately followed by the Birth of Seth. St Austin even denies the Right of Eldership to Seth over all the Children of Adam and Eve, born after the Death of Abel. He interprets the Words of Eve to imply, not the Appointment of another Son, but the restoring of Virtue; i. e. that Seth was considered as Successor to the Piety and Sanctity of Abel.

(8) See Chevreau's History of the World,
Tom. 4. p.
255. Dutch Edition, in 1687.
(9) In Sal-
m. Tom. 1.
p. 190.

[D] Whether he died a Virgin.] Some Fathers of the Church have maintained the Affirmative (11); and the Heretics, taken notice of below, who took their Name from Abel, are of the same Opinion: but those who believe, that Abel lived an hundred and twenty nine Years, think it improbable he should die a Bachelor. The World stood too much in need of being peopled, for Continency to be a Virtue. Father Salian makes no Difficulty to declare, that the Celibacy of Abel is absolutely improbable; and shews, that St Jerome and St Austin did not doubt of his Marriage (12); and that St Ireneus is not to be charged with the Expression imputed to him by Genebrard (20), namely, that Abel was a Maid, a Priest, and a Martyr: upon the Account of which three Qualifications the Church is said to begin in him. There is another Author, who ascribes these three fine Qualifications to him (21). But if we may depend upon the Tradition of Eutychius, produced below, we can no longer question the Virginity of Abel, since, according to that, his Death preceded the Marriage of his two Brothers.

[E] Was a religious Dispute.] The Targum of Jerusalem relates, that Cain and Abel being in the Field, the former asserted that there was no Judgment, nor Judge, nor Life Eternal, nor Rewards for the Good, nor Punishment for the Wicked; and that the World was neither created, nor governed, by the Goodness of God; For, says he to his Brother, my Oblation was not received, but your's was. Abel answered him in his own Words, substituting only the Affirmative for the Negative; and, as to his principal Complaint, his Answer was, that His Works being better than those of Cain, were the Occasion of the Preference given to his Offering. The Dispute growing warm, Cain fell upon Abel, and slew him (22). This was the impious beginning of Disputes in Religion; and a fatal Preface of the terrible

(10) Gen.
iv. 25.
(11) Austin attributes to Adam,
quod, according to the Scripture, saves the Words of Eve.

(12) August.
de Civit.
Dei. l. 15. c.
15.

(13) The Scripture speaks of but one Oblat. of the two Brothers; & that the Supplication of Salian,
Tom. 1. p.
282. that Cain did not perceive, till after a long Time, and repeated Offerings, that he was rejected, and his Brother in favour with God, is groundless.

(14) See the Reference to the Targum of Jerusalem, and the Annals of Euty-chius in the Remark [F].
(15) *Cunga-
sus* de Rep.
Hebr. l. 3.
c. 1.
(16) St Ro-mund's Abridg. Chronol.
(17) Ovid.
Metam. B.
v. 15.
(18) St Jerome, St Basil, St Ambrose, in Corn à Lapide upon Gen.
iv. 2. but *St Sa-
lian*, in his Annals,
Tom. 1. p.
282. & St Austin, that St
himself set out of this O.
(19) Salian in Annals.
(20) Genebrard.
B. 1.
(21) The Action of Minas.
Sacr. Scrip-
t. in August.
Tom. 3. B. 1.
chap. 3. St
him's Creation of the Annals,
Tom. 1. p.
134.
(22) Salian.
Creation of Paradise.
Hierol. de Evangelio.
Tom. 1. p.
188.
See, Augustine
Salian, the Christian Dissert. of John B. B.
on a Gen.
iv. 2. B. 1.
p. 224. &c.

killing his Brother. He murthured him, then, before the Age of sixty; for it was in the fiftieth Year of the World, according to Eutychius, that Adam allotted to his Sons the Manner of Life he intended they should follow. There was time enough, we are told, for Deliberation in this Affair; since, at that time, the Length of Childhood must have been proportionable to the Length of Life. With all my Heart; I shall not dispute it. I will allow, that Cain and Abel were not capable before the Age of fifty, the one to till the Earth, the other to keep Sheep; but pray let them be capable at that Age. Now, upon this Supposition, can any thing be more natural, than to believe they made their Offerings at the end of two or three Years at latest; and that in a like interval of time the envious and jealous Cain got rid of his Brother? Can any thing be more improbable than the common Opinion, that the two Brothers began to exercise their Occupations in the fiftieth Year of the World; that they made their Offerings in the hundredth, and that Cain was slain in the hundred and thirtieth? Neither Reason nor Scripture lead us to imagine, that Cain stifled his Remorsement for so long a time in his Breast (14). A very judicious Author has fixed the Birth of Seth to about an hundred Years after the Death of Abel (15). Some Authors place Abel's Death in the Year of the World 102 (16). But the Generality are for the Year 130; which is thought to be the same with the hundred and twentieth ninth of Abel. I might, in support of this Opinion, refer to Cajetan, Torniel, Pererius, Cornelius à Lapide, Salian, and many other Commentators, whose Works may be compared to Children of the same Family;

— Facies non omnibus una,
Nec diversa tamen, qualem decet esse sororum. (17)

Tho' various Features did the Sisters grace,
A Sister's Likeness was in every Face.

ADDISON.

Thus all Parties, all Bodies, all Societies, have a Variety of Authors, who copy after each other.

[D] Whether he died a Virgin.] Some Fathers of the Church have maintained the Affirmative (18); and the Heretics, taken notice of below, who took their Name from Abel, are of the same Opinion: but those who believe, that Abel lived an hundred and twenty nine Years, think it improbable he should die a Bachelor. The World stood too much in need of being peopled, for Continency to be a Virtue. Father Salian makes no Difficulty to declare, that the Celibacy of Abel is absolutely improbable; and shews, that St Jerome and St Austin did not doubt of his Marriage (19); and that St Ireneus is not to be charged with the Expression imputed to him by Genebrard (20), namely, that Abel was a Maid, a Priest, and a Martyr: upon the Account of which three Qualifications the Church is said to begin in him. There is another Author, who ascribes these three fine Qualifications to him (21). But if we may depend upon the Tradition of Eutychius, produced below, we can no longer question the Virginity of Abel, since, according to that, his Death preceded the Marriage of his two Brothers.

[E] Was a religious Dispute.] The Targum of Jerusalem relates, that Cain and Abel being in the Field, the former asserted that there was no Judgment, nor Judge, nor Life Eternal, nor Rewards for the Good, nor Punishment for the Wicked; and that the World was neither created, nor governed, by the Goodness of God; For, says he to his Brother, my Oblation was not received, but your's was. Abel answered him in his own Words, substituting only the Affirmative for the Negative; and, as to his principal Complaint, his Answer was, that His Works being better than those of Cain, were the Occasion of the Preference given to his Offering. The Dispute growing warm, Cain fell upon Abel, and slew him (22). This was the impious beginning of Disputes in Religion; and a fatal Preface of the terrible about a Woman [F]. Nor is there a less Diversity of Opinions concerning the Manner, in which this horrid Murthor was committed [G]. But it is not so much controverted, in what Manner they discover'd the Preference which God gave to Abel's Offering. The common Opinion is, That Fire from Heaven fell upon Abel's Sacrifice [H]; but that nothing of that kind happen'd to the Offerings of Cain. But, as we are very apt to fancy we discover the Marvelous in every Story of this Kind, some have said (b), that there appeared the Figure of a Lion, in the middle of the Fire, which fell upon Abel's Sacrifice; which, say they, had relation to the Lion of the Tribe of Juda, whose coming was then already promis'd. I have thrown together in the Remarks a great Variety of Opinions, in relation to Abel's Story. It is indeed a Heap of absurd Notions and Errors; but the Reader, in passing his Judgment upon them, must remember, that such a Collection answers the End and Design of this Dictionary: which Caution I here give once for all.

(b) In Sallian, Tom. I. p. 19; and in Badius's Ruiner. II. lib. v. Deced. 11.

Confusions they were to cause in the World. It affords us likewise an Instance of the foolish Vanity of Man; who is never so much led to doubt of a Providence, as when Things do not succeed according to his Wishes. Give him but Prosperity; his Doubts vanish: The Reason is, he thinks he holds too considerable a Rank in the Universe to be overlooked by an equitable and judicious Dispenser of Good and Evil. "Elli's to Superi, ait Status, cum convalesceret a periculo morbo vir extimie probitatis Rutilius Gallicus. At contra, ubi quid contigerat contra quam annum esse conceperat, Deos aut nullos esse, aut crudeles & injustos esse dicebant. — Itaque in morte Titulli Ovidius.

Cum repant mala fata bonas, ignoscite falli,
Solicitor nullos esse putare Deos.

"I acknowledge ye, O ye Gods! cry'd Statius, when
"Rutilius Gallicus, a Man of distinguished Honours, "had recovered from a dangerous Disease. On the "contrary, if any thing fell out, which they did not "like, they either denied the Being of the Gods, or "charged them with Cruelty and Injustice. Hence
"Ovid, upon the Death of Tibullus,

When, snatched by cruel Fate the Good and Just,
Perish, and seek untimely to the Duſt,
(May I the bill Conſignion be forgiven)
I almost think there are no Gods in Heaven.

This is the Language of one of the best Orators of the XVth Century (23).

[F] Quarrelled about a Woman.] Eusebius, Patriarch of Alexandria, tells us in his Annals (24) that Eve brought forth, together with Cain, a Daughter named Azura; and, together with Abel, a Daughter named Oswine; and that, the time of marrying these two Sons being come, Adam bestowed Oswine to Cain, and Azura to Abel; and treated Cain with Severity for desiring his Twin Sister, who was the most beautiful of the two. Eusebius adds, that the two Brothers going to present their Offering upon the top of a Mountain, by the Order of Adam, who desired they might perform this religious Act before their Marriage, and that the Success of their Sacrifice might decide their Quarrel; the Devil fiercely prompted Cain to murder his Brother for the Love of Azura; which, preventing his Offering from being agreeable to God, so enraged Cain against his Brother, that they were scarce come down from the Mountain, when Cain, with a Stone, dashed out his Brother's Brains. The beautiful Azura, whom Cain immediately after married (25), and carried with him into Exile, was indeed the Cause, but the innocent one, of Cain's Crime; and verifies the Assertion of the Latin Poet concerning the Antiquity of Wars raised upon the Account of Women;

Nam fuit ante Helenam Cunnus teterima belli Causa (26).

E'er Grecian Helen's love, the false, the fair, Beauty has been the fatal Source of War.

The Archbishops (27), and the Cabbalists (28), agree with this Tradition of Eusebius. I have read in the Commentary of Father Merjense upon Genesis, Page the 1431st, and 1431st, that there are some Rabbins, who say, that Abel had two Twin-Sisters, and that

Cain desired to marry them both. This, say they, was the ground of their Quarrel. The Inclination then to Polygamy, must be very old. Lastly, it appears by the Citation from the Targum, and that from the Patriarch of Alexandria, that the Death of Abel ensued immediately upon the Sacrifice, wherein God had declared in his Favour. This Chronology is a thousand times more probable, than that which places thirty Years between the Offerings of the two Brothers, and the Murthor of Cain.

[G] The Manner in which this horrid Murthor was committed.] We have seen, that it was with the Blow of a Stone, according to some Authors. Others say, that Cain tore him in Pieces with his Teeth. Hebraeorum nonnulli tradunt cum fuisse morbosus à Cain dilaceratum (29). Others, that he knocked him down with the jaw-bone of an Ass: The Painters are directed by this Hypothesis. Some pretend, that he made use of a Pitchfork. St Chrysostom puts a Sword into his Hand; St Irenaeus arms him with a Scythe; Prudentius gives him a kind of HEDGE-BILL.

Frater probatæ sanctitatis remulus
Germana curvo colla frangit sarculo (30).

Envious of his Brother's approved Sanctity, he broke his Neck with a crooked Hedge-Bill.

See Sallian and Bisellius; the one, Page 185 of the first Volume of his Annals; the other Page 234 and 235 of the first Tome of his Histor. Ruiner. "It is certain, says an Author (31), that Abel was "neither drowned, nor strangled; for the Scripture "witnesses, that he died with Effusion of Blood." Some suppose, that he defended himself bravely; and that at first he had the Advantage: that he threw Cain upon the Ground, and gave him his Life; but that Cain got up, and slew him. Father Merjense reports this Dream in the 1431st Page of his Commentary on Genesis.

[H] That Fire from Heaven fell upon Abel's Sacrifice.] St Jerom has preserved this Tradition (32), and confirms it from Theodotion, who follows him in his Version of the Scripture. "Nisi illa Interpretatio vera esset, quam Theodotion posuit, & inflammavit Dominus super Abel, & super Sacrificium ejus; supra vero Cain & Sacrificium ejus non inflammavit (33). — If the Interpretation of Theodotion be true, and God sent Fire upon Abel and his Sacrifice, but not upon Cain and his Sacrifice." It is generally approved of by the Fathers of the Church; and is a probable Opinion, because Fire from Heaven has frequently been the Signal of God's Approbation of a Sacrifice. At the Consecration of Aaron, God gave this Mark of his Approbation (34). Gideon, David, Salomon, (some add Nehemiah), were honoured with this extraordinary Favour in some of their Sacrifices (35). Cornelius à Lapide says, that Cain and Luther hugg'd at this Descent of Fire from Heaven upon Abel's Sacrifice, as a Jewish Fable (36); but Mr Heldinger quotes a Passage of Luther against him, which plainly proves the contrary. "Eni Moies illud signum, quo Deus cœdedit illi Abel munera grata esse, non ostendit, tamen verisimile est fuisse ignem cœlo demissum, quo oblatio haurita & confumpta in oculis omnium (37). — Teague Moies does not record by what Sign God declared his Approbation of Abel's Offering, yet it is probable that Fire descended from Heaven, and consumed the Offering in the Sight of all. The Presbiter Demetrius

(29) Prudentius in Germania, lib. v. ch. iv.

(30) Prudentius in Germania, lib. v. ch. iv.

(31) Prudentius upon Genesis, ch. iv. ver. 5. and 9.

(32) Hieron. Epist. ad Galat. ch. i.

(33) Hieron. Epist. ad Galat. ch. i.

(34) Leviticus, ch. ix.

(35) 1 Kings, ch. vi. 1 Kings, ch. xiii.

(36) Cornelius à Lapide, ch. vii.

(37) Cornelius à Lapide, ch. vii.

(23) Moretus in editione Vol. 2. (24) Eusebius in Annals. I. lib. v. ch. i. (25) Eusebius in Annals. I. lib. v. ch. i. (26) Ovid. Fast. 1. p. 192. (27) Præcipuus.

(28) Eusebius in Histor. lib. i. ch. i.

(29) Hieron. Epist. ad Galat. ch. i.

(30) Prudentius in Germania, lib. v. ch. iv.

(31) Prudentius in Germania, lib. v. ch. iv.

(32) Hieron. Epist. ad Galat. ch. i.

(33) Hieron. Epist. ad Galat. ch. i.

(34) Leviticus, ch. ix.

(15) See also declare in Clouds for this Hypothesis [38], and some of them are confirmed in it by the Words of one of the Palms (39), which Clement Marot has thus translated:

De tes offertes & services
Se veuille souvenir,
Et faire tous les sacrifices
En cendre devenir.

May be remember thy Offerings, and Services, and reduce thy Sacrifices to Ashes.

The Pagans boast of such kind of extraordinary Marks of the Approbation of Heaven in some Places, as we shall show under the Article EGNATIA. We know very well that the Devil mimicks the True God.

ABELARD (Peter) in Latin Abalaridus, was one of the most celebrated Doctors of the XIIIth Century. He was born at Palais [A], a Town four Leagues distant from Nantes in Brittany: and, as he was of a very subtle Genius, there was nothing in his Course of Studies, to which he apply'd himself with greater Success, than Logic. He travell'd to divers Places with no other view, than to exercise himself in that Science; disputing wherever he came, throwing about his Syllogisms, and greedily catching at every Opportunity of distinguishing himself against some Thesis. Never did Knight-Errent more eagerly seek occasion to break a Lance in in Honour of the Ladies. Abelard finish'd his Studies at Paris, where he met with a celebrated Professor in Philosophy, nam'd William Champeaux (a). He became soon his favourite Disciple: but this continu'd not long: the Professor found it so difficult to answer the subtle Objections of his Scholar, that he conceiv'd a Disgust and Hatred towards him. Immediately it became Matter of Party: the older Scholars, envious of Abelard, seconded their Master's Dislike. This increased the Assurance of the young Logician so much, that he resolv'd to set up for a Teacher himself. He chose a large Theatre to act this Part on; for he erected a School at Melun [B], where the Court of France resided at that Time. Champeaux did all he could to prevent the setting up of this School; but, as he had very powerful Enemies, his Opposition was the principal Cause of his Rival's Success (b). The Reputation of this new Master of Logic, made so surprizing a Progress, as to eclipse that of Champeaux. Abelard was so elevated with this Success, that he remov'd his School to Corbeil, in order to press his Enemy close with frequent Disputes; but the great Application, with which he follow'd his Studies, threw him into an Indisposition, which obliged him to retire to his native Air. He stay'd some Years in Brittany, and then return'd to Paris; where he found that Champeaux, who had resign'd his Chair to another, and embrac'd the Religion of the Regular Canons, continued teaching among them. He disputed against him, with such force of Argument, concerning the Nature of Universals, that he obliged him to give up his Opinion

(a) Colletmus Campanellensis. He was Aristotelian of Paris.

(b) Quoniam de potentibus terra nonnulli ibidem habebat nemulos; fretus eorum auxilio voti mei compos extitit, & plurimum mihi assensum ipsius invidia manifestata conquirit. Abelardus Epist. l. p. i.

As he had, there, some Enemies among the great Men, I succeeded by their Assistance; and his manifest Envy procured me the Approbation of many.

[A] He was born at Palais. His Father had applied himself a little to his Studies, before he bore Arms; and took great Care of the Education of his Children, particularly the eldest. Whether Abelard was this eldest, is uncertain; for he speaks of this Matter so ambiguously, as to give Occasion to two different Opinions. These are his Words: "Primum genitum suum, quanto chariorem habebat, tanto diligentius erudire curavit. Ego vero, quanto amplius in studio litterarum profeci, tanto ardentius in his inhaesi, & in tanto eorum amore illectus sum, ut militaris gloriae pompam cum hereditate & prerogativa primogenitorum meorum fratribus derelinquens, Martis curiae penitus abdicarem, ut Minervae gremio educarer. — The more he lov'd his eldest-born, the more Care he took in his Education: For my own Part, the farther Progress I made in my Studies, the greater Desire I had to pursue them; and so fond was I of them, as to leave the Pomp of Military Glory, with the Inheritance and Privileges of Eldership, to my Brothers; and, renouncing the Court of Mars, to be educated in the Bosom of Minerva." Pasquier, upon the Authority of these Words, makes no doubt of calling him the eldest Son (1): but others positively affirm, that he was a younger Brother. This is the Opinion of Father Alexander. "Militaris Gloriam pompam cum hereditate primogenitis fratribus derelinquens, says he (2), speaking of Abelard, i. e. leaving the Pomp of Military Glory, with the Inheritance, to his elder Brothers." Some make him the youngest of the Family (3). If I might chuse, I should not prefer the last Interpretation to the former. Doubtless the Surname of Palatinus, which he bore, was deriv'd from Palatium, the Name of the Place of his Nativity. He was so well known by the Name of Peripateticus Palatinus, that Johannes Sarrisenensis never tiles him otherwise (4). Some imagine, that this Epithet was given him on Account of some magnificent Building, where he deliver'd his Lectures (5). But this is without Foundation,

[B] A School at Melun. I have not found, in comparing the Relation of Abelard with the Abridgment of it, given us by Pasquier, that it is abridg'd with great Exactness. The Series of his Adventures, according to the Abridgment, is as follows. Abelard went and settled at Corbeil, when he first left Paris: he returned to Paris, when Champeaux became a Monk; he was obliged to quit it a second time: and then he retired to Melun: he returned to Paris again, being informed, that Champeaux was gone to reside at his Bishoprick of Châlons: Champeaux, apprized of his Return, came back to Paris to oppose Abelard: This latter was at length obliged to quit his Design, and became a Disciple of Anselm, Lecturer of Divinity at Paris: He became afterwards himself Lecturer of Divinity; and was intreated by a certain Canon to employ one Hour every Day in instructing his Niece. He complied with this Request; and having continued this Occupation for some time, Love made himself of the Party with them. There are many Faults in this Narrative. I. Abelard did not settle at Corbeil till after he had been at Melun. II. When he left Melun the second time, Champeaux was retired to a Village near Paris, and not to his Bishoprick of Châlons, which was not yet given him; he being then but a Regular Canon: and I am surprized that Pasquier was not sensible how absurd it was to suppose a Bishop should leave his Episcopal See to dispute with a Regent of Philosophy at Paris. III. Abelard was not conquered in this Dispute; he quitted Paris only to pay a Visit to his Mother, who was going into a Convent. IV. Anselm read Divinity at Laon, and not at Paris. V. The Canon did not request that his Niece might be instructed; Abelard himself entreated to be entertained in the Canon's House. VI. Abelard desired the Enjoyment of Eloisa, before he gave her any Lessons. With what Distrust ought we to read a great Number of Books, when Pasquier stumbles so often in so plain a Road?

(1) Pasquier's Recherch. de la France. B. 6. ch. 17.

(2) Natal. Alex. Graec. xi. & xii. part 3. p. 2.

(3) De Pin's Biblioth. T. 9. p. 108.

(4) See his Poliraticus, p. 111. and his Metalogicus, p. 745, 802, 814, &c. Leyden Edit. 1639. 8vo.

(5) Jac. Thomassin's Life of Abelard. See below the Citations (13).

nion, which at the bottom was a disguis'd Spinozism [C]. This brought the Monk into such Contempt, and rais'd the Character of his Antagonist so high, that Champeaux's Logic Lectures were entirely forsaken, and the Professor himself, to whom Champeaux had resign'd, thought fit to become the Scholar of Peter Abelard. This latter was no sooner in possession of the Chair, than he saw himself expos'd more and more to the darts of Envy. The Regular Canon manag'd it so, that, on pretence of some sinister Management, the Resignation made to Peter Abelard was declared void, and a profess'd Enemy appointed to succeed him. Upon this Abelard left Paris, and retired to Melun, to teach Logic there, as before. He continued there not long; for, hearing that Champeaux had retired, with his whole Fraternity, to a Village, he came and settled upon Mount St Genevieve, and erected his School, as a kind of Battery [D], against the Parisian Doctor. Champeaux, seeing the Creature of his own raising thus besieged in his School, brought back the Regular Canons to their Convent: but, instead of relieving his Friend, it occasioned all his Scholars to forsake him: This Desertion was follow'd some time after with the Retirement of this poor Philosopher to a Convent. From that time the Contest lay wholly between Abelard and Champeaux: they alone disputed the ground; but superior Age was not attended with Victory. Whilst this Struggle yet continued, Abelard was obliged to pay a Visit to his Mother, who, after the example of her Husband, was preparing to embrace a Religious Life. Returning to Paris, he found his Rival made Bishop of Châlons: therefore, as he could now give up his School, without the Imputation of flying from the Field of Battle, he determin'd to study Divinity; for which reason he remov'd to Laon [E], where his Schoolmaster Anselm read Lectures in that Science

[C] A disguis'd Spinozism. I appeal for this to the Judgment of those who understand the following Words. "Erat in eâ sententiâ de communitate universalium; ut eandem essentialiter rem totam simul singulis suis inesse aliteret individuis, quorum quidem nulla esset in essentiâ diversitas, sed solâ multitudine accidentium varietas. He was of that Opinion, concerning the Sameness of Universals, which asserts, that the same Thing exists essentially and wholly in every one of its Individuals, among which there is no Difference as to Essence, but only a Variety arising from a Number of Accidents (6)." The Scotists, with their universalis formale à parte rei, or their unitas formalis à parte rei, are not wide of this Notion. Now I say, that Spinozism is only carrying this Doctrine farther: for, according to the Followers of Scotus, Universal Natures are indivisibly the same in every one of their Individuals: The Human Nature of Peter is indivisibly the same with the Human Nature of Paul. Upon what Foundation do they say this? Why, because the same Attribute of Man, which is applicable to Peter, agrees with Paul. This is the very Fallacy of the Spinozists. The Attribute, say they, does not differ from the Substance, of which it is predicated: therefore, wherever the same Attribute is found, there is the same Substance; and, consequently, since the same Attribute is found in all Substances, there can possibly be but one Substance. There is, then, but one Substance in the Universe; and all the Variety we see in the World is but different Modifications of one and the same Substance. Abelard's Antagonist had nothing of Weight to reply to this; and I cannot see what Answer the Cordelier Fraassen (7), who adheres strictly to the Doctrine of Scotus, amidst the Lights of Philosophy, which brighten this Age, could have given to Spinoza. But the rest of the Schoolmen had nothing more to do, in order to overthrow this false System, but to distinguish between Identity in Number, and Identity in Species or Likeness. Peter and Paul have not the same Nature, nor the same Attribute, if by same you mean any thing else than like.

[D] As a kind of Battery. It will be proper to hear his own Account of this Matter. "Quia locum nostrum ab emulo nostro secerat occupari, extra civitatem in monte S. Genovefæ Scholarum nostrarum castra posui, quasi cum obseffus, qui locum occupaverat nostrum. Quo audito, Magister noster statim ad urbem impudenter rediens, Scholas, quas tunc habere poterat, & Conventiculum Fratrum, ad pristinum reduxit Monasterium, quasi militem suum, quem deseruerat, ab obseffione nostra liberaturus (8). — The Place, I enjoyed, being usurped by my Rival, I encamped my School, without the City, upon Mount St Genevieve, as it were to besiege my Successor: upon the News of which, my Preceptor, returning confidently to the City,

"brought back what Schools he could at that time procure, together with the whole Brotherhood, to their former Monastery, as it were to relieve his own Soldier, whom he had deserted, from my Siege." The Life of Abelard, published by M. Thomasius (9) in Germany, informs me of one Particular, which Andrew du Cbône, Francis d' Amboise, and perhaps all who have ever spoke of Abelard, were ignorant of. It is, that, in the midst of his Troubles and Persecutions, and after he had placed Eloïsa in the Paraclet, he returned to the Reading of his public Lectures on Mount St Genevieve. Johannes Sarisburiensis confirms this past a Doubt. "Cum primum, says he (10), adolescens admodum, studiorum causa migrassem in Gallias, anno altero postquam illustri Rex Anglorum Henricus, Leo Justine, rebus excessit humanis, contuli me ad Peripateticum Palatinum, qui tunc in Monte S. Genovefæ clarus Doctor & admirabilis omnibus præsedebat. Ibi ad pedes ejus prima aris hujus rudimenta accepi, & pro modulo ingenio mei quicquid excidebat ab ore ejus totâ mentis aviditate excipiebam. Deinde, post discessum ejus, qui mihi præproperus visus est, adhuc Magistro Alberico, qui inter ceteros Dialecticos ceniebat, & erat re verâ nominalis sectæ acerrimus impugnator. — When I first travelled into France, being very young, in order to prosecute my Studies, a Year after the Death of Henry King of England, the Lion of Justice, I betook myself to the Peripatetic of Palatum (11), who at that time was a celebrated Doctor, and in great Reputation upon Mount St Genevieve. There, at his Feet, I was instructed in the first Principles of this Science, and received, to the best of my Abilities, whatever fell from his Lips, with the utmost Eagerness. After his Death, which to me seemed too hasty, I was a constant Follower of the Teacher Albericus, who was the most eminent Logician of the Times, and indeed, the most violent Opposer of the Nominal Self." This plainly points out the Year 1136. Abelard therefore must have been returned to Paris long time after the Council of Soissons, and have left it a few Years before the Council of Sens.

[E] He removed to Laon.] Orbo of Frisingen has misplaced Facts, when he says, that Abelard studied first under Rozelin, then under Anselm of Laon, and William des Champeaux, Bishop of Châlons (12). The Order of Time is not observed: besides this William was not a Bishop, at the time when Abelard was his Scholar. I have met with a Book (13), in which the Author supposes, that Abelard succeeded this William in the Divinity-Chair, in the Year 1119: But first, it does not appear, that this pretended Predecessor taught that Science. And it is farther certain, that Abelard read Theological Lectures at Paris, before the Year 1119: for it is not possible, that all his Adventures, from his first Lectures to the

(6) Abelard's Epist. l. p. 5.

(7) See the Capucin Confessor of Toulouse in his Atom. Peripatet. l. 5. p. 130.

(8) Abelard's Epist. p. 6.

(9) He is the Son of Jacques Thomasius, Professor at Leipzig, Author of this Life of Abelard, printed at Hall, in 1633. See Citation below (13).

(10) Jn. Sarisburiensis. Metaph. lib. 3. c. 10. p. 802.

(11) i.e. Abelard, as the Author himself explains it, p. 814. In hac opinione, says he, deprehensus est Peripateticus Palatinum Abelardus notiter.

(12) Orbo of Fris. de Geogr. Frider. l. lib. 1. cap. 47.

(13) The History of William and Folly, collected by Charles Thomasius, Tom. 1. p. 81. In this see full the Life of Abelard mentioned above, viz. that received from Thomasius copy.

Science with great Reputation. He was not greatly satisfy'd with this Person's Capacity [F]; and, instead of attending his Lectures, he undertook to read himself to his School-Fellows. He explained to them the Prophecies of Ezekiel in so pleasing a manner, that in a short time his new Auditory was crowded. The Jealousy of Anselm did not long permit this: he forbid this new Master to continue his Lectures. Abelard return'd to Paris; explain'd there publicly the Prophet Ezekiel; and acquired in a short time as great a Reputation in Divinity, as in Philosophy: besides which he gain'd a great deal of Money. To perfect the Pleasures of Life, he began to think of a Mistress, and cast his Eyes upon Eloisa, Niece of a Canon, whom he prefer'd to an hundred other Ladies, whom he had it very much in his Power to charm [G]. This Canon, named Fulbert, lov'd Money, and was passionately desirous, that his Niece Eloisa should be a Scholar. Abelard laid hold of these two Foibles to ensnare him. Admit me to board with you, says he, and fix your own Price. The Good Man, imagining he had found an excellent Tutor for his Niece, who, far from being an Expence to him, would pay him well for his Board, ran headlong into the Snare (c). He intreated Master Abelard to instruct the young Girl fully, both Night and Day, and gave him permission to use correction, if she did not perform her Lessons. Our pretended Tutor ill answer'd the Expectation of Fulbert: he soon began to talk Love to his fair Scholar; and amus'd himself more in toying and kissing her [H], than in explaining an Author to her. He indulg'd

(c) Eam totam nostram magisterio committens, ut quædam mihi Scholæ revereretur vacaret, tam in die quam in nocte ei docendæ operam darem, & eam si negligentem sentirem vehementer castigarem.
On going her up entirely to my Auditory, that, as often as she was at leisure, upon my return from the Schools, to receive me, I might instruct her both by Day and Night, and if I found her negligent, might severely correct her.
Abelard's Epist. p. 11.

the Council of Soissons, could have fallen out in two Years: Now there is good Proof, that this Council was called in the Year 1121. Add to this, that William des Champeaux was made Bishop of Châlons in the Year 1113 (14); and that this Promotion removing him from the Schools of Paris, Abelard went to Laon, to study Divinity there. I see no Foundation for the Assertion of others, that he engaged in this Study at Châlons (15).

(14) See Du Chêne's Notes upon Abelard's Narrative, p. 2147.

(15) Dupin's Biblioth. Tom. c. p. 100. Dutch Edition.

[F] Satisfied with this Person's Capacity. He was an old Man, who never had any great Genius; in so much, that he was easily non-plus'd, when put out of his Rote. When he was pass'd home, as he frequently was by the acute and subtle Abelard, he defended himself with meer empty Words: but his Character will be best known from what I am going to transcribe. "Accessi ad hunc fenem, cui magis longævus usus, quam ingenium vel memoria, nomen comparaverat: ad quem si quis de aliquâ Questione pulsandum accederet incertus, redibat incertus. Mirabilis erat in oculis auscultantium; sed nullus in conspectu questionantium. Verborum usum habebat mirabilem, sed sensu contemptibilem, & ratione vacuum. Cum ignem accenderet, domum suam fumo implebat, non luce illustrabat. Arbor ejus, tota in foliis, aspicientibus à longe conspicua videbatur, sed propinquantiobus & diligentius intuentibus infructuosa reperiebatur. Ad hanc itaque cum accessissem, ut fructum inde colligerem, deprehendi illam esse ficuleam, cui maledixit Dominus, seu illam veterem quercum, cui Pompeium Lucanus comparat, dicens,

— Stat magni nominis umbra, Qualis frugifero quercus sublimis in agro.

"I applied myself to this old Man, whom long Practice, not Genius or Memory, had made famous; who always sent an Enquirer back more uncertain than he came. He was the Admiration of his Hearers, but the Contempt of his Examiners. He had a wonderful Flow of Words, but void of Sense and Reason. He was a Fire that filled the House, not with Light, but Smoke: A Tree, that appeared Fair at a Distance, but, on a nearer View, bore nothing but Leaves. When I approached it, in hopes of gathering Fruit, I found it to be the Fig-Tree which was cursed by our Lord, or that old Oak, to which Lucan thus compares Pompey:

Still seem'd he to possess, and fill his Place,
 But stood the Shadow of what once he was.
 So in the Field, with Ceres' Bounty spread,
 Uphears some antient Oak his reverend Head.

Rowe.

This Passage deserves to be copied: It shows Abelard's turn of Wit, and is a true Picture of a great many Persons.

[G] Whom he had it very much in his Power to charm. Vanity was our Hero's distinguishing Foible:

However, being an handsome young Fellow, and in the Flower of his Age; and having a knack at Poetry, a great Reputation, and Money in his Pocket; it is not so strange that he flattered himself with a kind Reception, wherever he should make his Address: "Tanti quippe tunc nominis eram, & juventutis & formæ gratia præminebam, ut quancumque seminarum nostro dignarer amore, nullam vereretur repulsam (16). — Such was my Reputation, my Youth, and Beauty, that I feared no Repulse from any Woman, whom I should think worthy of my Affections." For a Philosopher, who had lived in great Continence (17), he reasons like a Man of no small Experience in these Matters, when the Conquest of Eloisa seems to him more easy, than that of any other Woman; and for this Reason, because Eloisa's Learning gave him the Opportunity of a regular Correspondence with her by Letters, in which he could make more open Declarations, than in Conversation. "Tanto facilius hanc mihi puellam consensuram credidi, quanto amplius æque litterarum Scientiam & habere & diligere novebam, nosque etiam absentes scriptis internuntiis invicem liceret præsentare, & pericula audacius scribere, quam colloqui. — The more I found this Girl improve in Learning, and the sonder she grew of it, the greater Hopes I had of her Consent: and it was in our Power to be present, even in Absence, by the Interchange of Letters, and to write more freely, than converse (18)." Love-Letters, and Amorous Verses, are no weak Instruments in Love; especially when the Lover himself can sing the passionate Songs he has composed. Abelard in this Manner touched the Heart of Eloisa, and fired her so by his charming Pen, and enchanting Voice, that the poor Lady could never overcome her Passion. "Duo, says she to him (19), factor tibi speciales iter iterant, quibus seminarum quarumlibet animos mos statim allicere poteras, discendi & cantandi gratia. — Two Qualifications, I confess, you was particularly Master of, with which you could immediately charm the Soul of any Woman. The pleasing Manner of dictating, and singing, your Verses." See the Remark [F] under her Article, where this Passage, cited more at Length, demonstrates the great Influence of these Things upon that Sex.

[H] In toying and kissing her. The better to disguise his Design from the Uncle, he pretended sometimes to make use of the Liberty given him of correcting Eloisa. He tells us, that Love, not the Anger of a Teacher, prompted him from time to time to whip his Pupil; but that the Lashes he gave her, were the softest in the World. He has left us the following Plan of the Lectures he gave this young Lady.

"Sub occasione disciplinæ amoris penitus vacabamus, & secretos recessus, quos amor optabat, studium Lætionis offerebat. Aperitis itaque libris, plura de amore, quam de lætione, verba se ingerbant, plura erant oscula, quam sententiæ; Sæpius ad Sinus, quam ad libros, reducebantur manus: crebrius oculos amor in se reflectebat, quam lætio in Scrip-turam

(16) Abelard's Works p. 10.

(17) Frana libidinis laxare cepi, quæ antea vixem cunctissem.
I began to give loose to my Passion, which before had been extremely strict.
Abelard's Works p. 9.

(18) Ibid. p. 10.

(19) Ibid. p. 46.

this Pleasure the more, as he had never before tasted it. He neglected his public Functions, and employ'd his time in writing nothing but Love-Verfes [I]. His Scholars soon perceived that his Lectures declined, and they presently guess'd the Cause. The last Person, that heard the Report of Peter Abelard's Amours, was the good Canon Fulbert, at whose House the Scene of them was laid. For some time he gave no credit to it; but at length he open'd his Eyes, and dismiss'd his Boarder from his House. Some time after, his Niece found herself with Child, and writ to her Gallant, who thought it proper she should leave her Uncle. He sent her into Brittany to a Sister of his, where she was brought to bed of Son (d); and, to appease the Canon, he propos'd to him to marry Eloisa privately. This Proposal was more pleasing to the Uncle, than to the Niece: for Eloisa, through an Excess of Passion not common, chose rather to be the Mistress, than the Wife of Abelard, as we shall relate elsewhere (e). At length she consented to this private Marriage; but she affirmed, upon occasion, with an Oath, that she was not married. Fulbert, who chose rather to cover the Disgrace of his Family, by divulging the Marriage, than to keep his Promise with Abelard not to discover it, often express'd his Anger at his Niece, when he perceived her Obstinacy in denying that she was Abelard's Wife. Upon this her Husband sent her to the Monastery of Argenteuil, and oblig'd her to take the Habit of a Nun, except the Veil. The Relations of Eloisa imagin'd, that he was laying a new Scene of Treachery in that place, and were so enrag'd, that they employ'd certain Persons, who enter'd his Chamber by Night, and dismember'd him of those manly Parts, with which he had dishonour'd the Canon's Family. This Disgrace made him retire, and conceal his Misfortune in a Monastick Life; and therefore it was not Devotion but Shame, which prompt'd him to take the Habit of a Monk in the Abbey of St Dennis (f). The Disorders of this Abbey, in which the Abbot was as much superior to the rest of the Monks in all manner of Impurities, as in Dignity, were the Cause of Abelard's leaving it: he cou'd not forbear censuring them; and render'd himself by this means so odious to them, that they were overjoy'd to get rid of him. He chose his Place of Retreat upon the Lands of the Earl of Champagne [K], and erected there a School, where

(d) He was named Altro-labius.

(e) In the Article ELOISA.

(f) In tam misera me conditio possum confusio, futor, pudoris potius, quam devotio conversionis ad monasticorum latibulum claustrorum compulsi. In this miserable State of Penitence, the Confusion of my Shame, I confit, rather than Devotion, drove me to take Shelter in the Indiscreet of a Monastery. Abelard's Epist. p. 18.

"tutam dirigeat: Quoque minus suspicionis haberemus, verbera quandoque dabat amor, non furor, gratia non ira, quæ omnium unguentorum suavitatem transcendit. — Under the Pretence of Instruction we gave a loose to Love, and a Lecture pro-cur'd us that Privacy, which our Passion desired.
"When we open'd our Books, we talk'd more of Love,
"than of reading; we repeated Kisses oftener than Sentences; my Hands were employ'd in her Bosom, more than on her Books; and Love oftener turn'd my Eyes on her, than the Intention of reading directed them to the Scripture: And the more to prevent Suspicion, Love, not Rage, Favour, not Anger, gave her Labours, which were sweeter than "the richest Perfumes (20)." But it sometimes hap-pen'd, that he had recourse to Punishment in good earnest; either when she was out of humour, or the Solemnity of a Festival inspired him with some Scruple.
See the Remark [E], under the Article ELOISA.
We must not pass by Abelard's Reflexion on the Simplicity of the Canon. "Quanta ejus simplicitas effet vehementer admiratus, non minus apud me ob-stupui, quam si agnam teneram famelico Lapo committeret. Qui cum eam mihi non solum docen-dam, verum etiam vehementer confringendam, traderet, quid aliud agebat, quam ut votis meis licentiam penitus daret, & occasionem etiam non posset, ut quæm videlicet blanditiis non pos-sem, minis & verberibus facilius flecterem? —
"I was as much astonish'd at his Folly, as if he had trusted a tender Lamb to the Care of a ravening Wolf. In committing her not only to my Instruction, but even Correction, what was it but to "licence my Wishes, and to give us Opportunities, even against our Inclination; and to put it in my Power,
"if I could not prevail on her by softer Methods, to force her to Compliance by Threats and Labours." As this Author often cites the ancient Poets, I wonder his Thought of the tender Lamb, and ravening Wolf, did not put him in Mind of these Verses of Virgil;

Eheu, quid volui misero mihi? Floribus Austrium Perditus, & liquidis immixti Fontibus Apros (21).

What have I done? —

The Boar amidst my Crystal Streams I bring,
And southern Winds to blast my flow'ry Spring.

DRYDEN.

(21) Virg.
Ecl. 2. v. 68.
Sectæ Nouæ Litteræ. against the Calvin. of Maimbourg,
p. 41.

[I] Nothing but Love-Verfes.] After he had tasted the Pleasures of Enjoyment, he grew weary of reading Lectures, and stay'd in his Auditory as little as possible. The Night was quite lost to his Studies (22): he was otherwise employ'd: he therefore desired to dedicate the Day to Study. This was the Reason why his School was uneasy to him. He repeated only his old Lectures; and if any new Thought came into his Head, it turn'd, not upon any Philosophical Difficulty, but upon amorous Sonnets, which were sung a long time after, in several Provinces. "Ita negligentem " & tepidum lectio tunc habebat, ut jam nihil ex in-genio, sed ex usu cuncta proferrem, nec jam nisi re-citatior pristinorum essem inventorum; & si qua in-venire liceret carmina essent amatorum, non Philosophiæ secreta. Quorum etiam carminum, sicut &
" ipse nostri, frequentantur & decantantur regionibus,
" ab his maxime quos vita similis oblectat. — Se-
" carelesus was I, and negligent, in reading, at that " Time, that I produc'd nothing new, but was satis-
"fy'd with barely reciting my old Compositions; my " Invention was employ'd on Love Songs, not on the " Secrets of Philosophy; many of which Songs are still " Favourites, as you very well know, and sung in the " Provinces, by those especially, who are delighted " with the same kind of Life (23)." It is certain then, that he had a Genius for Poetry; but I cannot believe, that he was Author of the famous Romance of the Rose, nor that he drew the Picture of his Eloisa, under the Name of the Beauty. Yet this is what I have read in a Book, reprinted in Holland (24). I should rather give Credit to him (25), who has taken so much pains to collect, and collate, the Manuscripts of Abelard. Now he asserts peremptorily, that the Romance of the Rose was wrote by William de Loris, all but the Conclusion, of which John de Meun was the Author. Other Writers, who were well informed, declare the same. The History of Abelard and Eloisa was inserted in this Romance.

[K] Upon the Lands of the Earl of Champagne.] This appears, by comparing two Passages. The first is, "Ad Cellam quondam recessit, Scholis more solito
" vacaturus. — I chose a Place of Retreat, that I " might be at leisure to attend my School as usual (26)." The other is, "Nocte haterent aufugi, atque ad ter-
" ram Comitum Theobaldi proximam, ubi antea in " Cella moratus fueram, abessi. — I stole away by " Night, and retreated to the Estate of Earl Theo" bald, which lay near, and was the Place of my " former

(22) The tum mihi vehementer erat ad Scholas procelestes, vel in iis
morari pariter & laboriosum, cum nocturnis amori vigi-lias, & diurnas studio consecrarem.
It was both very redigious and inconvenient to me, to attend in the School, or to stay in them; for my Nights were devoted to Love, and my Days to Study.

(23) Ibid.

(24) The History of Abelard
and Eloisa, in 1693,
in 12mo.
(25) Francis
d'Ambolse.
See the Appendix to the Preface at the beginning of Abelard's
Works, Paris
1715, in 4to.

(26) Abelard's
Works,
p. 19.

where he gain'd so great a Number of Auditors [L], that the Envy of other Masters, who saw themselves deserted by their Scholars, upon his account, began to raise new Persecutions against him. He had made himself two formidable Enemies at Laon (g) who no sooner perceived the Prejudice, which their Schools at Rheims receiv'd from his great Reputation, than they sought occasion to ruin him. This was afforded them by a Book, which he wrote upon the Mystery of the Trinity [M]: they pretended to discover in it a shocking Heresy; and prevail'd, by the Interest of their Archbishop, to have a Council call'd at Soissons, about the Year 1121 [N]. This Council, without giving Abeldard leave to defend himself, condemn'd

(e) Albericus of Rheims, and Rotulphus Lombard. The latter is called Leutaldus Novariensis by Otho of Frisingen.

(27) Abeldard's Works, p. 26.

"former Retirement (27)." Pasquier did not understand the former; which he confutes thus; "retiring to the deepest Cell of a Monastery, he read Lectures, sometimes in Philosophy, sometimes in Divinity." Abeldard by no means erected a School within the Walls of the Abbey of St Denis: if he had, he would not have been more favourable to the Monks, whose Irregularities he censur'd, and which was the Reason they were so desirous of getting rid of him, than he had formerly been. Mr du Cange explains the Word Cella very learnedly, as he does every thing. See the Remark [A], on the Article PARACLET, where I explain the different Situations of Peter Abeldard.

[L] So great a Number of Auditors. Concerning the great Number of Scholars, which he had, see the Remark [A] of the Article FOULQUES, Prior of Deuil.

[M] The Mystery of the Trinity. The occasion, which induc'd Abeldard to write upon this Subject, was, that his Scholars demanded from him a Philosophical Account of it. "They were not satisfi'd with Words; they desired Ideas; and declar'd loudly, that it was impossible for them to believe what they did not understand; and that it was an Imposition upon Mankind, to preach up a Doctrine equally incomprehensible to the Teachers and the Hearers; which was as if the Blind should lead the Blind, according to our Saviour himself. — Humanas & Philosophicas rationes requirebant, & plus quæ intelligi, quam quæ dici possent, effragitabant; dicentes verborum superfluum esse prolationem, quam intelligentia non sequeretur, nec credi posse aliquid nisi primitus intellectum; & ridiculosum esse aliquem aliis prædicare, quod nec ipse, nec illi quos doceret, intellexit capere possent, Domino ipso arguente quod cœci essent duces cœcorum (29)." Upon which he set himself to explain to them the Unity of God, by Comparisons drawn from human Things. Pasquier accuses him of maintaining, "That we ought not to believe a Thing, of which we can give no Reason; which, addi'd be, is, in plain Terms, to destroy the general Foundation of our Faith (30)." I do not ask this Author, who told him that a Professor approves all the Conceits of his Scholars, when he is so complaisant as to prevent, to the utmost of his Power, the ill Consequences of them. It is indeed probable, that Abeldard did not disapprove of the Maxims, which he ascribes to his Hearers; but the Passage, quoted by Pasquier, is no Proof of this; we ought rather to found it upon these Words of St Bernard: "Quid magis contra fidem, quam credere nolle quicquid non possis Ratione attingere? Denique exponere vultus (Abeldardus) illud Sapientis, qui credit cito levis est corde, cito credere est, inquit, adhibere fidem ante rationem. — Can any thing be more contrary to Faith, than, to refuse assent to every thing, which Reason cannot reach? Abeldard being to explain the Saying of the Wise Man, He, who believes hastily is light of Heart; to believe hastily, says he, is to give Assent before Reason (31)." The Treatise, which Abeldard wrote upon this Subject, was universally approv'd, except by those of the same Profession with himself; I mean the Divinity-Professors. They were so chagrind, that another had explain'd and illustrat'd what they could not, that they cry'd out, he was an Heretic, and alarm'd the People so much, that Abeldard narrowly escap'd being ston'd.

(29) Ibid. p. 20.

(30) Pasquier's Recherch. de la France. B. 6. ch. 17.

(31) Bernard's Epist. 290.

"Duo illi prædicti Emuli nostri ita me in Clero & Populo diffamaverunt, ut pene me populus paucoque qui advenierant ex discipulis nostris, prima die nostri adventus, lapidarent, dicentes me tres Deos prædicare, & scripsisse, sicut ipsis persuasum fuerat. — My two foremention'd Rivals; so blacken'd me, both to the Clergy and Laity, that, upon the first Day of my Arrival, with a few of my Scholars,

"the People were near stoning us; crying out, as it has been insinuated to them, that I both preach'd and writ, that there were three Gods (32)." Their Cabals were so powerful, as to extort from the Pope's Legate (33), the Condemnation mention'd in the Body of this Article. They made it believ'd, that Abeldard admitted of three Gods: Nevertheless, it is certain that he was very orthodox in the Mystery of the Trinity, and that all the Accusations brought against him in this Affair, were wretched Chicanery, and proceeded either from Malice or Ignorance. The Comparison he fetch'd from Logic (for Logic was his Strong hold) tended rather to reduce the divine Persons to One, than to multiply the Essence of God into Three; and yet he was accus'd, not of Sabellianism (34), but of Tritheism. His Comparison is, that, as the Three Propositions of a Syllogism, are but One Truth; so the Father, the Son, and the Holy Ghost, are but One Essence. "Sicut eadem Oratio est Propositionis, Assumptio, & Conclusio; ita eadem essentia est Pater, Filius, & Spiritus Sanctus (35)." The Inconveniences arising from this Analogy, are not equal to, at least do not exceed, those, which flow from a Comparison of the Trinity with the Three Dimensions of Matter. Therefore, as no one disputes the Orthodoxy of Mr Wallis, the Oxonian Mathematician, who laid great Strefs on the Analogy of the Three Dimensions, neither ought we to doubt of Abeldard's, on account of his Comparison of the Syllogism. This is certain, that neither the Syllogism, nor the Three Dimensions, account for the Mystery of the Trinity. Observe, that a certain Protestant Divine made use of the Parallel of the Three Dimensions, in the Year 1685. This appears from the Novelles de la Republique des Lettres, Article the 3d, for July; Article the 10th, for August; and Article the 12th, for September. It was answered by another Protestant Divine, in the Year 1694. See the Examen of Mr Jurieu's Theology, by Mr Saurin, pag. 83.

(32) Abeldard's Works, p. 10.

(33) Conan, Bishop of Prebete. He presided at the Council of Soissons.

(34) Otho of Frisingen, in his de Gest. Frider. lays, ne articulo, that he was accus'd of the Heresy of Sabellianism, at the Council of Soissons.

(35) Abeldard's Works, p. 10.

[N] About the Year 1121. Father Alexander (36) proves this strongly, as well against John Picard, a Canon of St Vitor, who places this Council in the Year 1116, as against Binius, who fixes it in 1136. The Chronological Errors of Binius, and some others, have been already censur'd in the Preface to the Works of Peter Abeldard. We are there told, that Platina had plac'd the Synod, which condemn'd Abeldard, under Pope Lucius II; that Binius gave into the Mistake of Platina; that he is guilty of another, in placing the Council of Soissons, and that of Sens, in the Year 1140; and that Genebrard supposes but one Year to have pass'd between these Councils. To prove these to be Mistakes, it is asserted, that the Pontificate of Lucius, which continu'd not a whole Year, is to be referr'd to the Year 1145, and that twenty Years pass'd between the holding of the Councils of Soissons and Sens; and that the Bishop of Prebete, who presided at the Council of Soissons, in quality of the Pope's Legate, left France about the Year 1120, and never return'd thither. We may observe more Mistakes than one, in these Words of Platina, there cited. "Qui (Abeldardus) præsentem etiam Lodovico Rege, rationibus victus, non modo sententiam mutavit, sed etiam monasticam vitam & religionem induit, ac deinceps una cum discipulis quibusdam in loco deserto sanctissime vixit. — Who, (Abeldard) in the Presence of King Lewis, being overcome by Arguments, not only renounc'd his Opinion, but took upon him the monastic Life, and Religion, and afterwards retiring, with some of his Scholars, to a desert Place, liv'd a most holy Life." First, it is certain, that Abeldard became a Monk, before any Council was held against him. In the second place, it was at the Council of Sens, that Lewis VII. assisted, to be Witness of the Transactions in this Heretic's Cause. Now it is false, that Abeldard submitdenn'd him to throw his own Book into the Fire, and to shut himself up in the Cloyster of St Medard. He was commanded soon after to return to the Convent of St Denis; where the Liberty, he had taken of censuring the corrupt Manners of the Abbot and the Religious, had exposed him to the Hatred of them all. He happen'd to say, that he did not believe their St Denis to be Dionysius the Areopagite mention'd in Scripture. This was immediately laid hold of, and carry'd to the Abbot, who was greatly pleas'd at it, as having a Pretence to accuse him, not only of False Doctrine, but even of offending against the State [O], an Artifice, which these Gentlemen never fail to put in practice, the better to secure their Revenge. The Abbot assembled his Chapter, without loss of time, and declared that he was going to deliver up to the King's Justice one, who had the Assurance to trample upon the Glory and Crown of the Kingdom. Abelard, judging that these Menaces were not to be slighted, made his Escape into Champagne, and obtained, after the Death of the Abbot, permission to live a monastic Life, wherever he pleas'd. The Political Reasons, which concurr'd to this, are something curious [P]. In consequence of this Per- mission, ted to the Reasoning of his Adversaries, and abjur'd his Opinions, in this Council. He appeal'd, from the very first, to the Pope. In the third place, it is no less false, that from that time he liv'd in a desert place, with some of his Disciples: for he pass'd the remainder of his Days amidst the Monks of Clugni. It is evident, that Platina has confounded what pass'd in the two Councils held against Abelard. Most of the Errors, which I have rectify'd, are objected to Bellefret, in the abovementioned Preface; in which he is farther justly censured for having criticiz'd upon the Epitaph of Abelard, as if the extravagant Praises, there given him, were a Proof of his Imprudence, and intolerable Vanity. It is certain, that this Epitaph was compos'd by the Abbot of Clugni, after the Death of Abelard. Many Historians have not rightly distinguish'd between the two Councils, which proceeded against this great Man. Paulus Æmilius says, he was examin'd for the first time in that of Sens (37): Du Haillan confirms this Mistake, and adds several others to it (38); as that Abelard was afraid to appear; that all his Works were condemn'd to be burnt; and that, the second time he was summon'd to appear, the Bishops disputed a long time, before they condemn'd him. Philip of Bergame maintains, that the Heretic (39) being confuted, in the Presence of King Lewis, by the powerful Arguments of the Learned and Catholic Bishops, renounc'd his false Doctrines, became a Monk, and pass'd the remainder of his Life, most Saint-like, in a Desert, with some of his Disciples. We meet with a great many Writers of Chronicles, who have copied the same false Stories. A little Book (40), which I have already quoted, put these Words in the Mouth of Eloisa, "What did not those two false Prophets assert, who 'declaim'd so vehemently against you at the Council 'of Rheims?' These two false Prophets were St Bernard, and St Norbert. Eloisa never mention'd their declaiming in any Council; and, if she had, it could not be that of Rheims.

(36) Nat. Alexand. Eccl. Hist. Cent. 11, 12, Part 3. p. 43, &c.

[O] Of offending against the State. This Artifice has been so often made use of, since the Jews employed it against our Saviour (41), that it is strange any one should venture at present to put it in practice. Should it not be expected, that so worn out a Contrivance as this should be incapable of Success? No: The World is too unteachable, to profit by the Follies of past Ages. Every Age behaves, as if it were the first; and, as the Spirit of Persecution and Revenge has hitherto endeavour'd to engage Princes in it's private Quarrels, so will it endeavour to do to the end of the World: and we may apply to this Purpose the Saying of Salomon; The thing that hath been, it is that which shall be; and that which is done, is that which shall be done; and there is no new thing under the Sun (42). Our Posterity may say, as well as we,

Qui méprise Cotin, n'estime point son Roi, Et n'a, selon Cotin, ni Dieu, ni Foi, ni Loi (43).

Who slights Cotin, affronts his Master too;
No Pardon to such Insolence is due.
All Crimes into that one Cotin can draw;
The Wretch, says he, regards nor God, nor Law.

[P] Something curious. Abelard, not being able to obtain from the Abbot of St Denis permission to retire, had recourse to the Engines of Policy. He knew, that the more the Monks of St Denis plunged themselves into Irregularity, the more Authority the Court exercised over this Abbey, and drew the greater Profit from it. He therefore gave the King to understand, that it was not for his Majesty's Interest, that a Religious as he was, who was perpetually censuring the bad Lives of these Monks, should continue long among them. The Meaning of this was understood at half a Word; and Orders were given to one of the great Men at Court, to demand of the Abbot, and his Brethren, why they would keep by Force a Monk, whose Life was unsuitable to theirs, and who, for that Reason, could be of no Use to them, and might easily bring upon them some Disgrace. The Consequence was, that Abelard had leave to retire. * I remember, upon this Occasion, that I one Day asked a Gentleman, who was relating to me numberless Irregularities of the Venetian Clergy, how it came to pass, that the Senate suffered a thing so little to the Honour of Religion, and the State. He replied, that the public Good obliged the Sovereign to use this Indulgence; and, to explain this Riddle, he added, that the Senate was well pleas'd that the Priests and Monks were held in the utmost Contempt by the People, since, for that Reason, they would be less capable of causing an Insurrection among them. One of the Reasons, says he, why the Jesuits there are disagreeable to the Prince, is, because they preserve the Decorum of their Character; and thus, being the more respected by the inferior People, are more capable of raising a Sedition. I could scarce give Credit to so shocking a Disorder. What would become of us, if the Sovereign Power should have Occasion to support itself by such an Expedient, and if the Clergy should become more formidable by their good, than their bad Morals? This Confusion would be a thousand times more terrible, than that mentioned by Tacitus, when he says, that under a bad Government, a great Reputation is as much exposed to Danger as an ill one. "Intravit animum militaris 'gloriz cupidus, ingrata temporibus, quibus finistra 'erga eminentes interpretatio, nec minus periculum 'ex magnâ famâ, quam ex malâ. — He was eager 'after military Glory, an Ambition odious to the 'Times; in which an ill-natured Interpretation was 'put upon the Actions of eminent Men, and a great 'Character was as much in Danger as an ill one (44)."

But let us hear Abelard's own Words: "Intervenientibus amicis quibudam nostris, Regem & 'Concilium ejus super hoc compellavi, & sic quod volebam impetravi. Stephanus quippe Regis tunc 'Dapifer, vocato in partem Abbate & familiaribus 'ejus, quævisit ab iis cur invitum retinere vellent, 'ex quo incurere facile scandalum possent, & nullam utilitatem habere; cum nullatenus vita mea & 'iporum convenire possent. Sciebam autem in hoc 'Regii Consilii sententiam esse, ut quo minus regularis Abbatia illa esset, magis Regi esse sub- 'jecta & utilis, quantum videlicet ad lucra temporaria. Unde me facile Regis & suorum assensum 'consequi credideram, siquæ actum est (45). — 'By the Interposition of some of my Friends, I ap- 'plied to the King and his Council, and by that 'means obtained what I desired. For Stephen, the 'King's Cup-bearer, demanded of the Abbot and his 'Brethren, why they detained me against my Will; 'since

* THE REASON why the Senate of Venice is said to be pleas'd with the Irregularities of the Clergy.

(44) Tacitus, in his Life of Agricola, c. 5.

(45) Abelard's Works, p. 27.

(37) P. Æmilii History of the France, in Lewis VII.

(38) Du Haillan's History of France, in Lewis VII.

(39) They call him Bailardus in the Supplem. Chron. ante Tiar 1135.

(40) History of Abelard and Eloisa, with the passionate Letter, which she wrote to him. Printed at the Hague, in 1703, in 12mo.

(41) Luke xxiii. 2.

(42) Ecclesi. i. 9.

(43) Baillet Suppl. IX. v. 345, 366.

(B) Incidi in Christianos, atque Monachos, gentibus longe leviores &
piores.
I fell intire hands of Christians, and Monks, more cruel, and more, than Gentils.
Abelard's
Epist. p. 31.

(50) Ahelard's Works,
p. 39, 40.

(51) T. Raynaud. of Funuchs, p. 148.

(52) Virg.
Æn. L. 5.
v. 6.

DRYDEN.

*He knew the stormy Souls of Womankind, &c.
Dire Auguries from hence the Trojans draw.*

(*) See the Life of St Bernard by Henry a Hook of Clairvaux, 1603 3, Ch. c. and the 18th Letter of St Bernard, inserted in the Works of Abelard, p. 272.

(n) Letter the 194th ibid. p. 308.

(o) See this Abbot's Letter to Innocent II. in the Works of Abelard, p. 335.

(p) Plus solito scabie, & quibusdam corporis incommoditatibus gravatur. Abelard's Works, p. 341.

(q) See the Letter of Peter the Venerable to Eloisa, in the Works of Abelard, p. 337.

his Misfortunes, in a Letter yet extant. The Remainder of his Life must be traced in other Writings; the most material Circumstance of which is, that he was prosecuted a second Time for Heresy before the Archbishop of Sens. He demanded leave to vindicate his Doctrine in a public Assembly; which was granted him; and a Council call'd at Sens, at which King Lewis VII. thought fit to assist in Person. It was in the Year 1140. St Bernard was sent thither in the Character of his Accuser. They immediately read before the Assembly certain Propositions extracted from the Books of Peter Abelard; the reading of which so terrify'd the Accus'd, that he interpos'd an Appeal to the Pope. The Council, however, condemn'd the Propositions (m); but they pass'd no Sentence against the Person accus'd, and gave an Account of the Matter to Pope Innocent II. desiring of him to confirm the Condemnation. The Pope did not fail to do it (n): he order'd that the Books of Abelard should be burnt, that he should be imprison'd, and forbid him to teach any more. He was appeal'd soon after, at the Solicitation of Peter the Venerable, who had receiv'd, with great Kindness, this Heretic into his Abbey of Clugni, and had reconcil'd him with St Bernard (o), the Promoter of that Injustice [U], which his Innocence had suffer'd in this Council. The Retirement of Clugni was the last, which Abelard had occasion for. He met with, there, every instance of Charity: he read Lectures to the Monks; he was equally humble and industrious. At length, becoming infirm, and being troubled with the Itch (p), and other Disorders, he was sent to the Priory of St Marcel, a very agreeable Place upon the Saône, near to Châlon. He died there the 21st of April, 1142 [X], aged 63 Years. His Body was sent to Eloisa [Y], who interred it in the Paraclet (q). We shall give some Account of his Writings in the Article of Francis d'AMBOISE; and as to what regards his Errors, and the Persecutions he met with from Councils, we shall take some Notice of them in the Article of BERENGER of Poitiers. It is remarkable, that he made no Secret of his Marriage, tho' he was a Priest, and a Canon (r). I am surpriz'd to find that he never mentions his Master (s) Roscelin [Z], who pass'd for a subtle Logician in those times, and is look'd upon as Founder of the Sect of the Nominals. He was himself likewise a Favourer of this Sect, which he found agreeable to that Vivacity of Temper, and that acute and fertile Wit, which he was Master of (t). By the help of this Science, he so puzzled and confounded People, and made use of such a Variety of Sophistry, and Syllogisms, that he left them not less astonish'd, than incapable of answering him. I am not of Opinion, that he ever engag'd in explaining the Civil Law [AA],

(r) Quid te Clericum & Canonicum facere oportet?

What ought you, who are both a Priest and a Canon, to do? Abelard's Epist. p. 16.

(s) Otho of Freisingen's de Res. Gest. Frid. Book 1. Ch. 47. Aventinus's Annal. Bejor. Book 6.

(t) Naudé's Additions to the History of Lewis XI. p. 160.

as

represent in some sort the Conduct of those, who feared that the Passion of Eloisa might have too great an Influence on the Chastity of her Abelard.

[U] The Promoter of the Injustice. I have considered this in the Article of BERENGER of Poitiers.

[X] The 21st of April, 1142. This shews, that the new Author of the Life of Abelard is greatly mistaken, in supposing him alive in the Year 1170. I mean the Author of a little Book, printed at the Hague, in 1693, where, beside the History of Abelard and Eloisa abridg'd, we find three other little Pieces.

[Y] His Body was sent to Eloisa. Pasquier affirms, that "Abelard, by his Will, ordered, that his Body should be buried in the Monastery of the Paraclet (53)." Francis d'Amboise asserts the same (54); but alleges no other Proof, than the Authority of Pasquier. What inclines me to disbelieve this, is, that Peter the Venerable makes no mention of it in his Letter to Eloisa, wherein he gives her an account of Abelard's last Moments (55). Farther still, the Abolition of Abelard makes it credible, that his Body was sent to the Paraclet, only to gratify Eloisa. Probably she might petition for the Favour. Besides, what right had the Abbot of Clugni to make that a matter of Favour, which was settled by Will? The Calender of the Abbey of the Paraclet is a strong Proof of this; for in that we meet with these Words: "VIII of the Kalends of January, died Peter, Abbot of Clugni, by whose GRANT our Church has the Body of "Peter our Founder (56)." The Silence of Andrew du Chesne, in his Notes upon Abelard's Epistle, in which he relates his Misfortunes, is a strong Reason with me, against Pasquier. Some, without mentioning his Will, say, that the Body of her deceas'd Husband was given to Eloisa, because, in his Letters to her, he had often express'd his Desire that it should (57): but they neither cite such Letters, nor any Writer who had cited them. I have met with such a Passage at the 53d Page of his Works. He was, then, at his Abbey of Ruys, and was in continual Dread of being assassinated. "Quod si me Dominus in manibus inimicorum traderit (writes he to Eloisa) scilicet ut ipsi prævalentes me interficiant, aut quocunque casu viam univerſe carnis abiens à vobis ingrediar, cadaver obsecro nostrum ubicunque vel

"sepultum vel expositum jacuerit, ad cœmeterium vestrum deferri faciat, ubi filie nostræ, imo in Christo sorores, sepulchrum nostrum cæpius videntur ad preces pro me Domino fundendas amplius inviter. — But, if Heaven should be pleas'd to deliver me into the Hands of my Enemies, and to suffer them to prevail over me, or by whatever Accident, in my Absence from you, I may chance to go the way of all Flesh, I intreat of you, that my Body, wherever either buried, or expos'd, may be convey'd to your Church-yard, where my Daughters, rather than my Sisters in Christ, having my Sepulchre frequently in view, may be the oftener prompted to pour out their Prayers to God for me." The Abolition of Abelard is as follows: it was intended to be inscribed upon his Tomb; and it was for that Purpose, that Eloisa desired it of Peter the Venerable (58). "Ego Petrus Cluniacensis Abbas, qui Petrum Abelardum in Monachum Cluniacensem recepi, & corpus ejus furtim delatum Heloise Abbatisse & Monialis Paracleti concessi, autoritate omnipotentis Dei & omnium Sanctorum, absolvo eum, pro officio, ab omnibus peccatis suis. — I Peter, Abbot of Clugni, who admitted Peter Abelard, a Monk of Clugni, and granted his Body to be privately convey'd to Eloisa, the Abbess, and to the Nuns, of the Paraclet, by the authority of Almighty God, and all his Saints, do, as is my Duty, absolve him from all his Sins (59)." Belleforest published a notorious Falshood, when he said, that the Bones of Abelard were dug up, and burnt (60). The Apologetical Preface of the Sieur d'Amboise proves demonstrably the contrary.

[Z] His Master Roscelin. Salabert, Priest of Argen, in his Dissertation on the Sect of the Nominalists (61), leaves it doubtful, whether Roscelin was the Preceptor of Peter Abelard. We shall examine his Reasons under the Article ROSCELIN.

[AA] That he ever engag'd in explaining the Civil Law. Francis d'Amboise seems to be mistaken, when he fancies, that Accursus spoke of our Abelard, in his Gloss upon the Law De quinque Pedum præscriptione. Accursus's Words are, "Sed Petrus Bailardus, qui se jactavit quod ex qualibet quantumcumque difficili litera traheret sanum intellectum, hic

(58) See Abelard's Works, p. 343.

(59) Abelard's Works, p. 345.

(60) Belleforest's Chronicle of France.

(61) The Title of it is, Philosophia Nominalium vindicta, printed at Paris, in 1651, in 8vo.

« dixit,

(53) Recherch. de la France B. 6. ch. 17.

(54) Apolog. Pref. to Abelard's Works.

(55) In Abelard's Works, p. 337.

(56) In Andr. Queret. du Chesne's Notes on the History of Abelard's Misfortunes, in his Works.

(57) Cave's Hist. Litt. &c. p. 52.

as some pretend. The Reader will see in the last Remark a Catalogue of the Mistakes of Mr. Moreri [BB]. You will find in a Work of Father Jacob (u) a long List of Authors who have spoken of Abelard.

(u) It is that invid, De claris Scrip toribus Cabi- lounensibus, p. 142.

"dixit, NESCIO.—But Peter Bailard who boasted that he could strike out a good Meaning from the most difficult Expression, upon this occasion confess'd his Ignorance (62). Alciatus commended the Modesty of this Peter Bailard, for so ingenuously acknowledging his Ignorance in this Matter: "Magnus ille Andreas Alciatus in illo, quem de quinque pedum præscriptione scripsit Tractatu, postquam Petrum Bailardum celebrem suâ tempestate Professorem laudavit, quod ingenue fastus esset, eam legem à se non intelligi, &c.—The great Andrew Alciatus in the Treatise which he wrote concerning the Law De quinque Pedum præscriptione, after he had praised Peter Bailard, a celebrated Professor of his Times, for frankly owning, that he did not understand that Law, &c. These are the Words of Francis d'Andouze (63): and he is sufficiently confuted by his own Expressions: for, to make Alciatus reason justly, the celebrated Professor, whom he commends, should have been a Professor of Law. Where is the Wonder, that a Professor of Logic should acknowledge, that he does not understand an intricate Passage of the Code? Besides, we find in Petrus Crinitus, that this Bailard was a Professor of Law: he calls him Johannes Bajardus. We may conclude, that our Abelard is out of the Question in that Place; and that Pasquier, who fancied he had remarked what ought not to have been passed over, in applying to him Accursius's Words, had better have said nothing about it (64). He ought, at least, to have observed, that, in the Passage of Accursius, it is not written Petrus Abelardus, as he pretends, but Petrus Bajardus. But, if it were true, that this Commentator had our Abelard in view, it must be granted, I think, that he was in an Error; for there is no Reason to believe, that Abelard ever concerned himself with Law. Consider the Words of Crinitus. "Quæsitum est superiori ætate à viris doctioribus quidnam in Jure nostro Civili præscriptio quinque pedum significaret, qualisque foret in eâ intellectus. Quam rem Laurentius Valla, & alii complures, cum non satis perciperent, hæc unâ ratione se defendebant, quod Johannes Bajardus, inter eos, qui Jus civile Profitentur, consultissimus, ingenue affirmavit, se illud ignorare. — It was matter of enquiry among the Learned of the last Age, what the Præscriptio quinque pedum, in our Civil Law, meant. Which when Laurentius Valla, and many others were at a loss to understand, they had only this to plead in excuse, that Johannes Bajardus himself, the most knowing among the Professors of Civil Law, ingeniously declared his Ignorance of it (65)." Thomasius ought not to have inferred from this Passage, that Peter Abelard was sometimes named Bajardus (66).

The following Observation was communicated to me by Mr De La Monnoie, after he had read my Remark [AD]. As I am certain the Reader will be better able to decide this Dispute, by comparing his Thoughts with mine; he will be pleased to have it in his Power to make the Comparison. I am satisfied says he, that Accursius, upon the Law, Quinque pedum, means Abelard. I agree, Abelard did not profess the Civil Law; but he passed for a general Scholar, and one that allowed nothing to be above his Abilities; qui totum scibile sciebat, who knew every thing that was to be known, as we are told in his Epitaph. Accursius, in the cited Passage, gives us no other Idea than this; and those, who imagine, from the Words of the Commentator, that Petrus Bajardus or Bailardus was a celebrated Professor of Law, are mistaken. There never was one of this Name. Bajardus is no other than Abelard, and it is one of the ten or twelve Ways, in which this Author's Name is written. The Italians, who are accustomed to this Manner of Contraction, pronounce Bajardus for Abelardus, as Ragona for Aragona, Naldo for Arnaldo, Berto for Alberto, or Limberto. At length, it cannot be denied, that James Philip of Bergame, an Augustin Monk, gave our Abelard the Name of Bailardus (67). This is the Observation of Mr De La Monnoie. I have one thing to add, which eluded me in the first Edition. I am of Opinion, that Abelard died before the Study of the Roman Law was introduc'd into France. It had been reviv'd in Italy, some Years before (68), and we must imagine, that the Infancy of it's new Birth continu'd some time. It is therefore improbable, that recourse should be had to our French Logician, for the Explication of a particular Law, of great Difficulty as to it's principal Point, and but little in use. Men seldom amuse themselves in unriddling such Matters, 'till they have clear'd up those of the greatest Importance, or when they endeavour to improve upon former Interpreters. If it were allowable to apply Mr Menage's Rules, we might say, that the Bailardus of Accursius is a Corruption from the Word Bulgarus; Bulgarus, Bailgarus, Bailgardus, Bailardus. A great Alteration may be introduc'd by Degrees in proper Names, both by transcribing, and by pronouncing them ill.

[BB] The Mistakes of Mr Moreri.] First, It is not true that Abelard taught Divinity at Corbeil, and at Melun. zdly, To alledge, that Authors are unanimous in declaring that Eloïsa was Niece to the Canon Fulbert, is a very weak Argument against Papirius Masson, who asserts that she was the natural Daughter of a certain Canon. Fulbert might certainly have a Sister, imprudent in her Conduct: I say a Sister; for he was Eloïsa's Uncle by the Mother's Side; her Avunculus. I am surpris'd, that Andrew du Clérge (69) could think of confuting Papirius Masson by the same Argument, which Mr Moreri had made use of. 3dly, It does not appear, that Abelard introduc'd himself into the Canon's House, on pretence of teaching Eloïsa Divinity: Why then is he particular in relating what Authors, whom he ought to follow, deliver only in general? The Words, "Erat cupidus ille valde, atque erga neptem suam ut amplius semper in doctrinam proficeret literatiorum plurimum studiosus. — He was very covetous, and at the same Time very desirous, that his Niece should make a Proficiency in Learning (70)" do not imply Divinity, more than any other Science. 4thly, It does not appear that Eloïsa had any great Esteem for Abelard, before they liv'd together in the same House. 5thly, It is not true, that, upon her leaving her Uncle, he carried her with him into Brittany: he sent her indeed into that Province, but continu'd himself at Paris, to guard, in the best Manner he could, against the Attempts of Fulbert, 'till he could appease him by offering to marry his Niece. Then he went to join her in Brittany, as we find in the Relation of his Misfortunes. The Abridgment of the History of Eloïsa and Abelard, lately publish'd (71), is not exact in this Point. The Author supposes, that Abelard left Paris, at the same time that he quitted the Canon's House; that he return'd thither, as soon as he was inform'd that his Pupil was pregnant, and that he carried her off by Night, in order to marry her privately, 'till her Relations should permit him to espouse her in publick. He had no Intention of marrying her, when he convey'd her away, nor did he ever pretend, that his Marriage was to be made publick. 6thly, Eloïsa did not tell him freely, that she intended not by this Marriage to rob the Church of a Doctor, who, in all likelihood, would soon become one of it's most illustrious Prelates. Nothing like this occurs in the long Detail, which Abelard has left us, of Eloïsa's Arguments against their Marriage. See the Article ELOÏSA, Remark [X]. 7thly, he does not declare, that he marry'd her for the quiet of his Conscience: Why will Mr Moreri pretend to know Abelard's Motives to this Marriage, better than himself? 8thly, The Marriage, and the Consent of Argenteuil, ought not to have been jumbled together: there was a Space between these two Circumstances. Eloïsa was sent to this Convent upon no other account, than the ill Usage of her Uncle, who was angry with her for peremptorily denying her Marriage. 9thly, It is, therefore, a very false account to say, that this Marriage was not so secret but Fulbert had notice of it; for they receiv'd the nuptial Benediction, at Church, in his Presence. "Post paucos dies, nocte secretis orationum vigiliis in quadam Ecclesia celebratis, ibidem fummo mane, avenzulo ejus atque quibusdam nostris vel ipsius amicus at-

(68) See the Article 1R-NERIUS.

(69) His Notes upon the Hist. of Abelard's Misfortune.

(70) Abelard's Works, p. 111.

(71) At the Hague in 1693. 12mo

(62) Fr. d'Amboise's Apology, Pref. to Abelard's Works.

(63) The Words of Alciatus are, Acco autem exilimata est difficultas, ut Petrus Bajardus, non incelebris tempestate sua Professor, ingenue fastus est, eam à se non intelligi. It was thought so difficult, that Peter Bajard, a celebrated Professor of his Times, ingeniously confess'd he did not understand it.

(64) Pasquier's Recherches de la France, B. 6. c. 17.

(65) Crinitus de Honorat. Discept. B. 23. c. 4.

(66) J. Thomasius in his Life of P. Abelard, No 3.

(67) See the Article 1R-NERIUS.

" silentibus, nuptiali benedictione confederamur —
 " After a few Days, having privately, in the Even" ing, celebrated Vespers in a certain Church; early " in the Morning we were there join'd in Marriage,
 " and receiv'd the nuptial Benediction, in the Pre" sence of her Uncle, and some of our, or his, Friends
 " (72.)" tothly, It is by no Means true, that Abe-

(72) Abell's Hyst.,
 p. 121.

lard read Lectures to a great Number of Scholars in Champagne, from the Time that the vitious Lives of the Monks of Ruiss, compell'd him to return thither, and at the Time that the Abbot Suger expell'd the Nuns from Argenteuil. Father L'Enfant has copy'd some of these Errors (73).

(73) L'Enfant, a Dminator, in General History of all Ages, to the 2^d of April.
 The World is in a Vain in 12mo. dedicated to the day of the Year,
 and printed at Paris in 1745.

ABELIANS, or ABELONIANS, a Sect of Hereticks who rose in Champagne, near Hippon, and who had been some time extinct in St. Austin's Days. They profess'd very odd Principles, and such as were not likely to continue long [A].
 They ordain'd that each Man should be in possession of his particular Woman; they thought it improper, and would not allow, that a Man should continue single; it was necessary, according to the Statutes of the Order, that he should have a Helpmeet like unto himself: but it was not permitted him to lean upon this Prop, that is, to be corporeally join'd to his Wife: She was to be to him the Tree of the Knowledge of Good and Evil, the Fruit of which was forbidden him under severe Penalties. These People were for regulating Matrimony upon the footing of the Terrestrial Paradise, in which Adam and Eve were united only in their Affections; or rather they followed the Example of Abel: for they pretended that Abel was married, but that he died without ever having any Knowledge of his Wife: and from him this Sect borrow'd it's Name (a). When a Man and a Woman enter'd into this Society, they adopted two Children, a Boy and a Girl, who succeeded to their Goods, and who married together upon the same Condition of not getting Children, but of adopting two others of different Sexes. They easily met with poor People in the Neighbourhood, to furnish them with Children. This Account is given us by St. Austin (b); and as he is almost the only Author, who mentions them, we must imagine, that this Sect was known but in a few Places, and of but a short Continuance. It is believed, that it begun in the Reign of Arcadius, and ended in that of Theodosius the younger. All those, who compos'd, it being at last reduc'd to one single Village, re-united themselves to the Catholic Church.

(a) See Bochart's Sacred Glogr.
 B. 2. Cl. 16.
 who thinks that Adam's Concubine,
 during 130
 Years after his Death of Abel, gave rise to the Name of these Here-ticks.

(b) Aug. de Hæres. cap.
 87. See there Lambert Danæus.

[A] Not likely to continue long.] Such a State of Continency between a Man and his Wife, who had every thing else in common, and whose Union was effected a true Marriage, was too great a Violence offered to Nature, to be of long Continuance. Nu-lum violentum durabile. Nothing violent is lasting.
 The Abelians were only a more moderate sort of Encratites and Novatians: these latter absolutely condemn'd Matrimony; the Abelians approved of, and retained it. It is true, it was barely the Name: they preserv'd it's Appearance, but deny'd it's Power.
 " *Hi nomen quidem conjugii & nuptiarum retine-
 " runt, vim autem & effectum earum prorsus sustu-* " lerunt (1)." Had they looked upon Marriage to be a Sacrament, their Opinion, in this Point, would have been like that of the Zuinglians concerning the Eucharist: they would have admitted the Figure, but not the Reality; and this must have contributed towards extinguishing the Sect. You will find in Fure-tier's Dictionary (2), that

(1) Danæus upon Austin's
 B. 2. de Hæ-
 res. ch. 87.

(2) Fure-
 tier on the Word Marriage.

Boire, & manger, coucher ensemble,
 C'est mariage, ce me semble.

Marriage consists in eating, and drinking, and lying together.

This is the natural Idea of that State: and, in this Description, the last Character passes for the principal, and the specific Distinction. This it is, which is called the Consummation of Marriage: without this,
 the most solemn Contract, the Betrothing, and the nuptial Benediction, pass for meer Preliminaries, which it is easy to be disengaged from. It is this which ties the Knot, and renders it indissoluble. It is the End, the Mark, and the Crown of the Work: It is the ad plus ultra. It is therefore very improbable, that such Numbers of People, even after the Notion became common, should chuse to submit both to the Name and the Restraint of Matrimony, and to renounce the most shining Honours of Celibacy, without taitling of the Fruits and the Joys of Marriage.

 When, therefore, I said that the Principles of this Sect were not calculated for a long Duration, it was not necessary, that I should allude to the witty Saying attributed to Sixtus the Fifth: " Non fit chiava
 " in questa Religione, non durara (3);" as much as to say, they would break thro' such a Precept of Religion as this, in spite of their Teeth. To adopt a Child, among them, supplied the Intention of getting one; and therefore we cannot apply to the Abelians the Remark of Florus on the first Inhabitants of Rome: " Res erat unius ætatis, Populus Viro-
 " rum (4). — It was an Establishment calculated to con- " tinue but for one Race, as consisting entirely of Men."
 For, if other Causes had not concurred, this Sect might have continued to the end of the World.
 " Per sæculorum millia (incredible dictu) Gens æter-
 " na est, in qua nemo nascitur. — They are a " Race of People, which (incredible to relate!) is
 " never extinct, tho' no one is born among them."
 This Pliny says of the Essenians (5), and is every Day applied to the Monks.

(3) Carlet, Confid. of Sancy, B. 1.
 c. 1.

(4) Florus,
 L. 1. c. 1.

(5) Pliny,
 B. 1. c. 17.

ABELLI (Anthony) Doctor of Divinity, a Jacobin, Abbot of Notre Dame de Livri, in Aulnois, Confessor to the Queen-Mother, and formerly her Preacher, publish'd Sermons upon the Lamentations of Jeremiah, at Paris, in the Year 1582. I only copy la Croix du Maine and du Verdier Vau-Privas, and if I do not correct their Errors, at least I will propose my own Doubts [A]. If Mr Moreri had done the same, perhaps by this time we might have arrived at the Truth. The Confession of Authors, that they are ignorant of such or such Particulars, is the surest way to excite the curious to communicate their Discoveries to the Public: A Consideration, which will frequently engage me to propose my Doubts. Mr Moreri had so many Opportunities, which I have not, of consulting those, who might rectify such things as these, that he ought to have done more upon this Occasion than barely copy la Croix du Maine.

[A] I will propose my own Doubts.] It seems to me a little strange, that a Jacobin should be in possession of an Abbey, and receive his Title from it. I know of no Part of France called Aulnois. If it should be read Lannoi, it is another thing, but still I find no Abbey in the Diocese of Loon named Livri (1). The

(1) See the State of France,
 a continued Table of the Abb-eys.

(5) Mr de Launoi's Hist. of the College of Navarre, p. 372. (3) This is too often the fault of Transcribers of Manuscripts. (4) Claud. Robertus, in his Nomenclatura Abbatum Gallicæ.

Abbey of this Name is in the Diocese of Paris. Lastly, I find, in the Act, by which the University of Paris swore Fealty to Henry IV. Apr. 22. 1594. among those, who subscribed it, one Francis Abely, Abbot of Iuvri, Preacher and Almoner to the King (2). Those, who have Leisure, may consider whether or no what relates to several Persons be not here collected, and applied to one (3).

My Doubts have procured me the following excellent Illustration of this Matter. "Aunoï, or Aulnoï, is very right. There is the Abbey of Notre Dame de Liuri in Aunoï, in Aunoï (4), of the Order of St Augustin, in the Deanery of Chelles, and Diocese of Paris. In order to obtain this Abbey, we must suppose, that Anthony Abelli transferred himself from the Order of St Dominic to that of St Augustin, which is very easily done, and practised every Day. As to Francis Abely, Abbot of Iuvri, I suspect it is a Mistake, and that this Francis, who was apparently the Successor of Anthony, ought to be styled Abbot of Liuri, there being no Abbey of the Name of Iuvri in France." This Illustration was communicated to me by Mr De la Monnoie. The Abbot Baudrand has informed me, that the Abbey of Liuri is three Leagues distant from Paris, as you go to Meaux, in a little District named Aulnoy, in which there are ten or twelve Villages, and that he knows nothing farther concerning its Boundaries. These two Accounts sufficiently clear up my Difficulties.

(a) The Measure Gaëlant, of Oct. 1691. (b) The 6th Edition is that of Paris, in 1651. A sixth was published in 2 Vols. in 1720. in 1659.

ABELLY (Lewis) Bishop, and Earl of Rhodés, who died October 4. 1691, aged 88 Years (a), was a Native of Paris, and Rector of St Josse, in that City. He wrote several Works, particularly a Treatise of Divinity, entitled Medulla Theologica (b), upon which Account Boileau gives him the Epithet of Moilleux, Pitby, or full of Marrow [A], and which differs widely from the Maxims of the Janseuists [B]. He

was

[A] The Epithet of Moilleux, Pitby, &c.] In reciting this Passage, I shall make no Scruple to begin it a little higher; for besides, that there is no Danger of any one's being displeased with the Length of the Quotation, it will serve to confirm what I shall advance in the following Remark.

If these Verses contain'd nothing more than the Agreement between Bauni and Abelli, they would sufficiently declare the Anti-Janseuist of the latter; but there are other Arrows in this Quiver, which are directed to the same Mark, and carry home. The Author has given us, in the Margin, a Note, to explain the Reason of the Epithet, and it was rightly done. When I reflect upon the Conjectures, which the Critics would form, should the French Language one Day meet with the Fate of the Latin, and the Works of Boileau be preserv'd, I represent to myself a thousand Whims. For, suppose that the Medulla Theologica of Mr Abelli were entirely lost, and scarce any Author extant, who takes notice of it, nor any Note in the Margin of the Latin, over against the Word Moelleux, what a stir would the Critics make to find out the Reason of this Epithet, and how many Mistakes would they run into (3)? I fancy to myself, that some one of them, ill satisfy'd with the Conjectures of all his Predecessors, would at length pretend to discover, that Abelli was distinguish'd by this Epithet, in allusion to the Offerings of Abel, which were not dry, like those of Cain, but a real Sacrifice of Beasts. Upon this Occasion he would quote the Sacrum pingue dabo, nec macrum sacrificabo: he would say, that the Parts of the Victim were not all of equal Efficacy, and that the Fat, under which is comprehended the Marrow, was of singular Use. The more learned he happen'd to be, the farther would he run on from one extravagant Conceit to another, and heap Chimeras on Chimeras. Upon this Occasion, as well as many others, we should see accomplish'd that Expectation in the ninth Satire of Mr Boileau,

(3) Compare what Father Bouchours says in the 4th Dialogue of his Maniere de bien penser, p. 399. on the subject of the Words of Boileau, Profane dans l'Ordre des Côtéaux.

(4) Nouvelles de la Rep. de Lett. 1684. Art. 6.

1 This Design has been executed since the Death of Mr Bayle, by Mr Brocette. He published in 1715, at Geneva, the Works of Boileau, with Historical Notes, communicated by the Author himself, in 2 Vols. 4to. It was reprinted at Amst. in 1718. in Fol. and 4to. and in 1722 at the Hague, in 4 Vols. 12mo.

(1) The Author means the Abbot Aubert, Canon of St Capell, a famous Molinist, Brother of that Mr Aubert, who wrote the History of Gard. See Suite du Mazarin, p. 8. Edit. Moli.

Alain touffe & se leve, Alain (1) ce savant homme; Qui de Bauni vingt fois a la toute la Somme, Qui possède Abelli, qui fait tout Raconis, Et même entend, dit-on, le Latin d'A Kempis. N'en doutez point, leur dit ce savant Canoniste, Ce coup part, j'en suis sûr, d'une main Janseuiste, Mes yeux en font temoins: j'ai vu moi-même hier Entrer chez le Prelat le Chapelain Garnier. Arnaud, cet Heretique ardent à nous de truire, Par ce ministre adroit tente de le séduire. Sans doute il aura la dans son Saint Augustin Quatrefois Saint Louis erigea ce Lutrín. Il va nous inonder des torrens de sa plume, Il faut, pour lui répondre, ouvrir plus d'un volume. Consultons sur ce point quelque Auteur signale; Voions si des Lutrins Bauni n'a point parlé. Etudions enfin, il en est temps encore, Et pour ce grand projet, tantôt, dès que l'Aurore Rallumera le jour dans l'onde enseveli, Que chacun prenne en main le MOELLEUX ABELLI (2).

(2) Boileau's Lutrín, Canto 4. 169, &c.

Then Allen rose, collected and prepar'd, He regularly bemo'd, then stroak'd his Beard, And claim'd as Prolocutor to be heard. The learned Seer Attention might demand, The only Scholar in the reverend Band. The learned Seer had oft Abelli read, And fill'd with Raconis his muddy Head. Nay, great A-Kempis he could construe too; And all his knotty Passages undo. Then thus he spoke: Believe me, Sirs! I know Some Janseuist must aim this fatal Blow. It must be so; we're in the Prelate's Snare; These Eyes saw Chaplain Garnier enter there. Arnaud endeavours, by this artful Friend, The Prelate to his Purposes to bend. Sirs, be most certainly has somewhere beard, That this litigious Deik St Louis rear'd. Then, grown polemical, he'll proudly think To drown us all with Deluges of Ink. Now 'tis our Duty timely to prepare, And stand a resolute defensor War, Consider then; does Bauni nothing say Of Deiks? None of the Fathers lean that Way? I find this Argument will ask much Oil, Close Reading, indefatigable Toil. Then, till Aurora kindles up the Day, And lights her Lamp, extinguish'd in the Sea; Let each in hand PITBY ABELLI take, And what the learned Diſtor diſputes, speak.

Et deja vous croiez, dans vos Rimes obscures, Au Saumaisiens futurs preparer des tortures.

Thy Rhimes, even now obscure, thro' learned Pains, Prepare the Rack for future Critics Brains,

It were to be wish'd, says some one, that a good Commentary were wrote upon the Satires of this Author (4) †. It is certain such Writings soon grow obscure in many Places. The Catholicon d'Espagne, and the Confession Catholique de Sancy, are a Proof of this. The Publick is very much indebted to the Author, who publish'd Remarks upon the last of these two Satires, in the Year 1693, and upon the first in 1696. He is a curious and discerning Writer, and very fit for this Work.

[B] From the Maxims of the Janseuists.] One of these Gentlemen complains bitterly, that Mr De la Berchere, Archbishop of Aix, had ordered the Director of his Seminary, to follow Abelly, and no longer teach the Moral Divinity of Grenoble (5). He asserts, that there are three false Principles in Abelly's Medulla Theologica, of which, The first overthrows that most certain Direction of a good Conscience, acknowledged by the Heathens themselves, which forbids the doing of an Action, the Lawfulness, or Unlawfulness, of which is doubtful. The second reduces to nothing the greatest of all the Commandments, namely, that which obliges us to love God above every thing. The third is directly repugnant to that Care, which the Cardinal Grimaldi took, to make Bishops

of Navarre.

was Author likewise of The Life of Vincent de Paul, Founder, and first Superior General, of the Congregation of the Mission; a Treatise on the Principles of Christian Morality; another on Heresies; another on the Tradition of the Church in relation to the Worship of the Virgin Mary, &c. This last Work, which was printed a second Time at Paris, in the Year 1675, gave great Pleasure to the Protestants, as it furnish'd them with good Weapons against the Converters, who would make them believe, that whatever there might be extravagant in this kind of Devotion, it was owing wholly either to Monkish Opinions, or to Abuses, which the Bishops were every day correcting: The same Book was useful to those of that Persuasion against the Bishop of Condom's Work (c). In truth, Mr Abelly became the Patron of the most extravagant Conceits, in relation to the Worship of the Blessed Virgin. This was destroying the Attempts of another Prelate, and the Intentions of those, who publish'd, or approved, The wholesome Advice of the Blessed Virgin to her indiscreet Votaries. Mr Abelly was a Doctor of Divinity of the Faculty of Paris; he resign'd his Bishoprick to another, when his Age would not suffer him to discharge the Duties of his Office, and retir'd to the House of St Lazarus. He discover'd a Secret in the Life of Mr Vincent, which was pleasing to many [C].

(c) Extr. d. An. Exposition de la Doctrine de la Catholique Church.

secure the Observation of the Rules of St Charles in the Sacrament of Penance, by distinguishing a great Number of Cases, in which the Confessors may either refuse, or defer Absolution. Mr Abelly therefore was accused of teaching, First, That one may follow an Opinion less probable and less certain, in doing that which is a Sin according to the contrary Opinion, which seems to us more probable: Secondly, That it is not certain, that the Precept of loving God above all things obliges us always, in virtue of itself, but only by Accident. Thirdly, That one may without Scruple constantly allow those, whose Life is a perpetual Vicissitude of Confinement and Sinning. See the Advertisements to the Reverend Fathers, the Jesuites of Aix, in Provence, concerning a printed Paper, entitled, "A Ball, danced at the "Reception of the Lord Archbishop of Aix." This Advertisement was published in 1687, in 12mo.

It is easy to see, that Mr Abelly's Book is meant in the following Passage of the Menagiana. "As they were talking of the Marrow of A— Mr 'L'Abbe le Camus, at present a Cardinal, said, that 'the Man was in the Wane, when he wrote it (6)'" A new Proof of the Contempt, which the Jesuits had for this Work.

[C] A Secret — which was pleasing to many] He informed the Public, that Mr Vincent had drop'd all Correspondence with the Abbot of St Cyran, after having heard him declare, that the Council of Trent was only a Cabal, and an Assembly of Schismatics, with the Pope at the Head of them (7). Whoever is convinced of this, cannot be a Roman Catholic.

(6) Memo. d'un pape. de la Lib. de la Duch. d'Orléans.

(7) Abelly's Lib. d'Hist. ecclesiastique, B. 2. c. 12. See the bound Preface to the second Edition, p. 1. 134.

ABERDEEN, an Episcopal City of Scotland, under the Archbishoprick of St Andrews, including an University. It may be considered as separated into two Cities; for there is Aberdeen at the Mouth of the Don, and Aberdeen at the Mouth of the Dee. The former is call'd Old Aberdeen, the other New Aberdeen. They are but a Mile distant from each other. The Bishop's See, and the University, are at Old Aberdeen: the other is a richer, and more trading, Place. The University was founded in Year 1480, the Bishoprick in the Year 1100: it was translated from Murthlac, as Hector Boëtius, a Scotch Historian (a) informs us. This City is call'd indifferently in Latin Aberdonia, Aberdonium, and Aberdona. Mr Moreri endeavours to refine upon this Article [A], but without Success.

(a) In Ba- drand's Lex. Xic. Geogr. p. 4.

[A] Mr Moreri endeavours to refine upon this Article. He quarrels with those, who say, that Aberdonia, or Aberdon, Aberdonia, Aberdona, or Devana, is a City. "There is not a City (says he) in all Scotland of this Name; but there are two Towns, one of which is called New-Aberdeen, and the other Old-Aberdeen: and if these Names are jumbled together, it must be in Books or Maps, that are very incorrect." It would be unnecessary to prove, that, not only in common Speech, the Distinction of Old and New Aberdeen is not made use of, but that, even in Books, it is very little observed. For what Authors ever said, The Bishoprick of Old Aberdeen, The University of New Aberdeen? What Historians are not satisfy'd with barely mentioning Aberdeen, when they speak of this Episcopical City? Mr Moreri plainly forgot his own Criticism, when under the Article SCOTLAND, he says, St Andrews has one University, and Aberdeen another; for, otherwise, he ought to have said Old Aberdeen.

ABGILLUS (John), Son of a certain King of the Frisons, led so exemplary a Life, that he gain'd the Surname of Priestre, or the Priest. He accompany Charlemagne in his Expedition to Palestine; and, instead of returning to Europe with Charlemagne, after taking of Jerusalem, he advanc'd as far as the Indies, made vast Conquests there, and founded the Empire of the Abyssins, which from his Name, was called The Empire of John the Priest *. He compos'd two Histories, one comprehending the Voyage of Charlemagne to the Holy Land, the other his own Expedition to the Indies. This last Work contains a Description of the Country, and of the different People, which inhabit it. If Suffridus Petri (a) was capable of imagining these Histories to have been any other than poultry Romances, compos'd in the Ages of Ignorance, and in which Charlemagne is introduc'd with such an extraordinary Bravery, as if he had been one of the imaginary Heroës, Palmerin of Oliva, Huon of Bourdeaux, or Geoffrey Great-Tooth: if, I say, Suffridus Petri was capable of conceiving this, he deserves all the hard Words, which Vossius has given him (b); for what can be invented more fabulous, than the Conquest of Jerusalem by Charlemagne?

* We call him in French, Priester John.

(a) H. speaks of this Abgillus, and his Works, in the Preface to the Scriptura. Frisica.

(b) O Holm-mium v. l. de Fris.

consequenter dixerim indignum, et vixit ut a publicis commentis haberet fidem! ----- O very great, and I had almost said, superfluous, note.

ABYDUS, a City of Egypt. Stephen of Byzantium calls it a Colony of the Milefians [A], which receiv'd it's Name from one Abydos. Strabo speaks of it, as a very ruinous Town; but he says, that it appears to have been very large, and the principal Town of the Country, next to Thebes (a). The famous King Memnon resided in it, and built there a magnificent Palace (b). The Temple and Sepulchre of Osiris are a great Ornament to this City, and recommend it extremely. The greatest Lords of Egypt affected to be buried there, that they might have their Monuments near that of Osiris (c). The Oracle of the God Besa was no small Ornament to this Place. All the neighbouring People were great Worshippers of this Deity, who gave his Answers in writing to those, who had not the convenience of consulting him in Person. It was sufficient at that time to inform him by Letter of one's Request (d). This Oracle was still in being in the Reign of Constantinus, Son of Constantin the Great, and was the Cause of great Disorders [B]. Abydos was 7500 Paces westward of the Nile (e) but a Canal was cut, which conducted the Waters of that River to it (f). It was above Diospolis and Tentyris (g), and below Ptolemais (b), which was the largest City of Thebais, and as big as Mempbis. The Inhabitants of Abydos had an Aversion to the Sound of Trumpets [C]. There has been much talk of certain Thorns, which grew in their Territory (D), and which are said to have constantly born Flowers of the Shape of a Crown. The Name of it is thought to be at present Abutich. John Leon does not say, what Mr Moreri ascribes to him, that it stood in the place, where the Patriarch Joseph was buried [E]. There was a City, called Abydos, upon the Side of the Hellepont, of which I shall take no Notice at present, tho' Moreri's Dictionary wants to be set right upon this Article.

(a) Strabo, L. 17. p. 559. Edit. 1587.

(b) Memnonis Regiæ & Osiris Templo in-elytium. Famosus for the Palace of Memnon, and the Temple of Osiris. Plin. L. 5. c. 9. Strabo, L. 17. p. 559.

(c) Ptoarch of Iris and Osiris, p. 35.

(d) Amm. Marcellinus. L. 19. c. 12. p. 227, 228.

(e) Plin. L. 5. c. 9.

(f) Strabo, L. 17. p. 37.

(g) Plin. L. 5. c. 9.

(h) Strabo, L. 17. p. 57.

[A] A Colony of the Milefians. This is not clear. I allow that they settled Colonies in Egypt; but it was near the Mouth of the Nile: Their Power consisted at that time in Naval Force; and their Trade did not require a Situation so distant from the Coast, as Abydos was. Besides, They did not settle in Egypt till the Reign of Cyaxares, King of Media (1): Whereas Abydos was a considerable City before that time; since Memnon not only kept his Court, but built likewise a magnificent Palace, there.

[B] Was the Cause of great Disorders. The Manner how is as follows: Those, who consulted the Oracle by writing, sometimes left their Letter in the Temple, after they had received their Answer (2). There were People so malicious as to send some of these Letters to Constantinus; who, being of a mean, suspicious, credulous, and capitious Disposition, threw himself into a terrible Passion. "Qui ut erat angustî pectoris, obfuscatâ in aliis etiam nimium feris, in hoc titulo ima, quod aiunt, auricula mollior, & fuscipax, & minutus, acri felle concaluit (3)." Immediately he signed a Commission for prosecuting those who were guilty, on pretence, that many of them had consulted their Deity concerning the Life of the Emperor, and the Name of the Person, who was to succeed him. The Head of the Commission, a violent and avaritious Person, found Means to involve whom he pleased in this Prosecution. This gave Occasion to numberless Acts of Violence, as you may read in Ammianus Marcellinus.

[C] Had an Aversion to the Sound of Trumpets. This we may learn from Ælian, provided we correct him according to the Conjecture of Berkelius (4). Ἐδὸν ἡγοῦντο ἵκεν βδελύσσονται θυσίαι, καὶ Ἀβυδοῦς ἡ Ἀγυρτία (it is in the Editions of Ælian Ἀβυ ἡ Ἀγυρτία) καὶ Ἀδύων πάλιν. — The Buzirizæ, and the Egyptian Abydos, and Lycopolis, abhor the Sound of a Trumpet (5). Strabo confirms this Conjecture, when he says, that the Use of Music, both vocal and instrumental, was forbidden in the Preludes to the Sacrifices, which were offered to Osiris in the Temple of Abydos (6).

[D] Thorns, which grew in their Territory. Athenæus mentions this (7): but we must substitute the Word Ἀβυδοῦς for Ἀβυδὼν in that Place, according to the very probable Conjecture of Berkelius (8). The Matter of Fact, according to Athenæus, is this. The Thorns, which grew about the Temple of Tyndium, were thought to be always in Bloom: but the Foundation of this Notion, according to Hellanicus's Remark (9), was that, whenever the People assembled in this Place, the Thorns were covered with Wreaths of Flowers of various kinds. Demetrius relates, that such kind of Thorns grew about Abydos, and that it was currently reported among the Egyptians, that the Ethiopian Soldiers, whom Tibron sent to King Priam, having heard that Memnon was slain, threw down their Chaplets of Flowers, before Abydos, upon these Thorns, whence it came to pass, that the Flowers, which they produced, resembled Crowns (10).

[E] The Patriarch Joseph was buried. Mr Moreri quotes John Leon, p. 8. At first Sight, one would think he meant Page the eighth; but we are to look for his Quotation in Book the eighth. Now what we meet with there is this: that it is a Mistake to believe, that the City Mesre Hatichi was the Residence of the Kings of Egypt in the Days of Joseph and Moses. He confutes this Opinion by alledging, that these ancient Kings dwelt on the West Side of the Nile; which he proves by two Arguments; the first is, the Situation of that City, which, the Scripture tells us, the Jews built for Pharaoh: the second is, the Situation of a very ancient Building, which is said to be the Sepulchre of Joseph. He remarks a few Pages after, that the Town, where this Sepulchre is, stands upon an Arm of the Nile, and is at present called El Fium. I do not find that he makes any mention of our Abydos.

(6) Strabo, L. 15. p. 62.

(7) Athen. L. 15. c. 7.

(8) Berkelius upon Steph. de Urbibus, p. 14.

(9) Upon the Ægyptiaca, in Athen. B. 15. c. 7.

(10) Demetrius upon the Ægyptiaca, in Athen. B. 15. c. 7.

(1) Strabo, L. 16. p. 552.

(2) Amm. Marcellinus. L. 19. c. 12. p. 227, 228.

(3) Amm. Marcell. at the Year 359.

(4) Berkelius upon Steph. de Urbibus, p. 24.

(5) Ælian. de Animal. L. 10. c. 23.

ABIMELECH, King of Gerar, in the Land of the Philistines, was cotemporary with Abraham. This Patriarch, being retired with his Family, into the Land of Gerar, his Wife Sara, tho' Ninety Years of Age (a), found herself expos'd to danger: she was taken away by Abimelech, who thought her so fair, as to desire to make her his Wife. Abraham might have avoided this Accident, by declaring himself to be Sara's Husband: but, fearing to be slain, he pretended, that she was his Sister, and desired her to say, that he was her Brother (b). This was the second Time he made use of this Artifice (c); which certainly does not deserve the Encomiums, bestowed on it by St Chrysostom [A]. It is believed, that the Philistine King was struck with a Distemper,

(a) See the last Remark on the Article SARA.

(b) Gen. xx.

(c) He made use of it, Gen. xii.

[A] The Encomiums, bestowed on it by St Chrysostom. We shall point out in another Place (1), what is blameable in this Dissimulation of Abraham. Every one may judge, as he pleases, of his second Fall. The Danger which Sara's Honour was expos'd to the first Time, seems, at first sight, to render a Repetition of the Fraud more inexcusable; but, on the other Hand, does it not seem more justifiable to make use

(1) In the Remarks on the Article SARA.

Distemper, which render'd him impotent [B]: but, however that be, it is certain that Divine Providence permitted him not to satisfy the Passion which he had conceiv'd for Sara. He was inform'd in a Dream, that she was married to a Prophet, and that he should die, if he did not restore her to her Husband. He fail'd not accordingly to restore her to him, and to reproach him for his Deceit. Abraham, in excuse for himself, among other Reasons, alledg'd that he was really the Brother of Sara, born of the same Father tho' of a different Mother. Thus the Scripture makes him excuse himself. Mr Moreri very improperly supplies the sacred Text with the Words of Josephus, who falsely supposes, that Abraham pretended, that Sara was his Brother's Daughter (d). He follows the same Author, in relation to a Fact, of which the Scripture speaks not a word; I mean, the pretended Alliance contracted between Abraham and Abimelech, upon the Restitution of Sara. The Scripture is content to say, that Abimelech made great Presents to this Patriarch, and offered him the Liberty of sojourning in what part of his Country he pleas'd. It is true, there was an Alliance between them; but it was not contracted till some Years after (e): I mean the Treaty of Beerseba. Josephus, as if he were possess'd of Memoirs

(d) Joseph.
Antiq. B. 1.
c. 11.

(e) Genes.
xxi. 31, 32.

(2) ὁ μὲν
τοὶ δικαίως ἐστὶν ἀλλοί-ων καὶ πάντα τοῖς ὅσιν
αἰς ἔργον
τὴν μοιχίαν
ἐν βίῳ καὶ Χριστῷ.
Homil. 32.
ὑπερ-Genes.

(3) Id. ib.

(4) Πάντα
τοῖς ὅσιν
τὸ δῶμα
λαλοῖν.
She did every thing she could, that the Fiction might be conceal'd.
Id. ib.

(5) Τὸ κατ' ἀντὶν ταύτων ἰπτικόν ἐστιν.
ἡ δὲ ματὶ τοσαύτην καὶ ἐν ἡλί-κῃ τοιαύτη, ὅταν
τὸ πέν δι-κασθὲν διασπῇται, ὅσον εἰς τὴν οὐρανὸν ὑψομην καὶ εἰς
μοιχίαν.
ἐαυτὴν ἑξ-ῶθεν, καὶ συνοχὰς ἡννοχίας βαρβαρι-
κῆς. Id. ib.

(6) Ambros.
de Abraham.
lib. 1. c. 2.

their Virtue, and all their Zeal, should be ignorant that it is unlawful to save either one's own Life, or another's, at the Expence of a Crime.

[B] Of a Distemper, which render'd him impotent.] To extinguish the Ardour of his Lust, God sent him a Disease, which put all the Physicians Art to a stand. God admonish'd him, in a Dream, to have nothing to do with the Wife of this Stranger. Abimelech, finding himself a little better, some time after, declared to his Friends the Cause of his Distemper, and restored Sara to Abraham. Thus Josephus relates the Affair (7); little solicitous, according to Custom, to adapt his Narration to that of Moses; or rather, bold enough to give him the Lie. For does not Moses say, that Abimelech, after his Dream, rose early in the Morning, and call'd all his Servants, in order to communicate to them, what he had learnt in his Sleep (8)? Could he have done this, had he been given over by his Physicians? Josephus was sensible of the Difficulty; but, in order to remove it, he boldly supposes, against the Authority of the Scripture, that this Prince did not communicate his Dream to his Friends, till his Distemper was a little abated, some time after his Dream. Some think Abimelech was not afflicted in his own Person, but in those of his Women (9): and that, when the Scripture relates that God heal'd him, it only means his taking off the Seal, which he had fix'd to all the Wombs of the House of Abimelech (10). I could soon be prevail'd upon to approve of this Interpretation; because I see no trace of Abimelech's Distemper in the whole 20th Chapter of Genesis, except these Words, God heal'd Abimelech, and his Wife, and his Maid-Servants, and they bare Children. But as the following verse mentions only the Affliction of these Women, it is sufficiently probable, that all the Evil, which God sent upon Abimelech, consisted in that. I shall, in another Place (11), answer a Question, which may be put to me: Why this Prince, if he was in perfect Health, did not gratify that Passion, which had prompted him to take away Sara. I am not surpriz'd at the fabulous Accounts, which the Jews have published, upon this Story: nor should I wonder at their Conduct, if they had invented a thousand Chimeras concerning our Abimelech. They say, that all the Channels of the Body were stop'd up, both of Man and Beast, both of Male and Female, so that nothing could either enter, or come out (12). They could no longer eat, nor drink; they could no longer void their Excrements, &c. The Men, besides, were seiz'd with such a Frigidity, that Abimelech was incapable of discharging the Duty of a Man, either to Sara, or to any other Woman. A celebrated Proteitant Divine (13) adopts this Tradition, as far as concerns the latter Part, and rejects the rest, as ridiculous, or superfluous. He says, that, as the Devil sometimes (14), by his Impediments, prevents married People from paying their conjugal Duty, it is not improbable, but that God might send such a kind of Affliction on the Family of Abimelech, for a good and holy Purpose; which was to preserve the Chastity of Sara, and to make it appear very evident, that she had received no Stain in the House of Abimelech. He believes, therefore, that the Domesticities of Abimelech were struck with the Disease of Barrenness: the Men, by an Impotency like that occasioned by Witchcraft; the Women, by an entire shutting up of

(7) Joseph.
Antiq. B. 1.
c. 11.

(8) Genes.
xx. 8.

(9) Sallian's
Annals, T.
1. p. 469.

(10) Genes.
xx. 18.

(11) In the Roman A. C. of the Antiquities SARA.

(12) Mer-curius. See Riveti Exer-
cit. in Genes.
Opusculum,
T. 1. p. 395.

(13) Rivet.
Heldburg.
Falsus in Steps. Hist.
Pat. iarch.
T. 2. p. 165.

(14) It is said in Sallid Nouer
l'egillatelle.

moirs preferable to those of Moses [C], ventures to place this Treaty before the Birth of Isaac, whereas the Scripture places it after the Rejection of Ismael, which did not come to pass, till after Isaac was weaned. Mr Moreri has follow'd the same Guide, when he assures us, that Abimelech shew'd great Kindness to Isaac, who had retired into the Land of Gerar. It is not indeed impossible, but this might be the same Abimelech; but it is more probable it was the Successor of him, who took away Sara [D]. It is certain that Isaac, on account of a Famine, which arose, re-

retired

the Gates of Life, or by a Contradiction of the Parts, which rendered them incapable of Conception. That's too much by half, some one may say, it was sufficient to the Design of Providence, that the Men were bewitch'd. But it must be reply'd, that the closing up of the Parts of the Women being a Fact, which Moses expressly mentions, it must by no means be drop'd as superfluous. This matter is explain'd two ways; neither of which entirely clears it up. Some say, that Moses's Meaning is, that the Wife and the Maid-Servants of Abimelech could not bring forth, when their Time was come: they had violent Pangs, and difficult Labour; but this must be at the time of which the Prophet Isaiah speaks: The Children are come to the Birth, and there is not strength to bring forth (15). Others say, that his Meaning is, that they did not conceive. The first Interpretation cannot be reconcil'd with Genesis, unless we can suppose that all the Women, which belong'd to Abimelech were with Child, when Sara was taken from her Husband (16): which is not likely. The other supposes Sara to have staid longer in this Prince's House, than she really did; for it could not be known in a very short time, whether so great a Number of Women had all lost the Faculty of Conception. This Difficulty oblig'd a very skillful Interpreter to say, that the Punishment, which God sent upon the Family of Abimelech, was known in a Manner, of which we have no Notion (17). Lastly, The Rabins make but little Difference between the personal Affliction of Abimelech, and the personal Affliction of the first Ravisher of Sara (18). They say of this latter, that he was seiz'd with the Disease Ratan, which is the most troublesome of all Ulcers, and the most destructive of the Joys of Love (19). Solomon Yarchi will have it, that the King of Egypt's Plague, was a Disease in his Head, caused by a Worm, bred in his Brain: "Morbus perturbati cerebri ob innatum ipsi Vermiculum, quo qui laborant, iis gravis sit concubitus, & liberi gignuntur ulcerosi" (20). —

(16) Isaiah

xxxvii. 3.

(15) Gad had entirely clos'd up EVERY womb of the House of Abimelech. Gen. xx. 18.

(17) Mercerus in Rivetius, Oper. Tom. i. p. 395.

(18) Pharaoh King of Egypt.

(19) Mercerus, ubi supra.

(20) Heidegger Hist. Patriarch. T. 2. p. 154.

"The Disease of a disturbed Brain, caused by a Worm bred in it; which whoever is troubled with, finds it difficult to perform the matrimonial Duty; and his Children are born ulcerous." Some think, these last Words spoil all; for they imagine, that, for the Honour of Sara, the Plague of Pharaoh must have render him absolutely impotent. See the Remark upon the Article of this holy Woman.

[C] Memoirs preferable to those of Moses. I have a long time conceived an Indignation against Josephus, and those who excuse him upon this Head. One, who made an open Profession of Judaism, the Belief of which is founded upon the Divinity of the Scripture, has yet the Assurance to relate things otherwise, than he must have read them in Genesis: he alters, he adds, he drops Circumstances; in a Word, he sets himself up in Opposition to Moses, in such a Manner, that one of the two must be a false Historian. Is this to be born, and ought we not to conclude, either that he did not scruple to scandalize his Nation, or that he thought the particular Opinion he entertained of the Falsity, and consequently of the Non-Inspiration of Moses, was common among the Jews? He deserves the following Rebuke of Theodore Beza very justly. "Hoc ego semel pronuncio, quod tu nunquam falsum esse ostendes, si verus est multis locis Josephus, mentium esse multis locis Mosen & sacros omnes Scriptores. Sed nos potius ipsos pro veris ipsius Dei interpretibus, illum vero pro sacerdote rerum sacrarum valde imperito, atque etiam negligente & prophano Scriptore, habebimus. — I pronounce this once for all, which you can never disprove, that if, in many Places, Josephus be in the right, Moses and all the sacred Writers must be in the wrong. But we will rather esteem them the true Interpreters of God himself, than him a very unskillful Priest of sacred Things, and even a careless and prophane Writer (21)." I am of Opinion, that all the ancient Historians have taken the same Liberty with regard to old Memoirs, which they consulted. They have tacked Supplements to them; and, not finding the Facts unfolded and embellished to their Fancy, they have stretched and dressed them up as they pleas'd; and this is what at present we receive for History.

[D] It was the Successor of him, who took away Sara. I do not build upon the long Life, which we must allow to Abimelech, if he was alive at the time when Isaac came to Gerar. This Journey was later than the Purchase, which Jacob made of the Right of Eldership: we may suppose therefore, that Isaac was then eighty Years old; for he was sixty when Ejau and Jacob were born: and Ejau was already a great Hunter, when he sold his Birth-Right. On the other side, Abimelech, who took away Sara, was a King, and married, before Isaac was born: He must then, at least, have been a good hundred Years old, when Isaac journey'd to Gerar. But is this much? Did not Men at that time live to above an hundred and fifty Years (22)? One would scarce believe one's own Eyes, that learned Men (23) should be capable of objecting these Words of The Preacher, Omnis potentatus vita brevis (24): As if, supposing the Canonical Authority of this Book, it was contrary to Revelation, that a Man's Reign should continue an hundred Years. Who does not see, that if this Passage has that Weight, which is attributed to it, we must deny the Truth of all Histories, which inform us, that there have been Reigns which continued upwards of fifty or sixty Years? What then is it which induces me to believe, that Abimelech, who took away Sara, was not the same who entered into Alliance with Isaac? why it is this: This latter Abimelech readily believed, upon Isaac's Word, that Rebecca was but his Sister; and when he was undeceived, not by the Words, but by the Actions, of Isaac, he reproved him mildly for his Deceit, without saying to him, You follow your Father's Example; Abraham heretofore played me the same Trick. Now is it probable, if he had been already imposed upon by Abraham, that he would have again fallen into the same Snare, or if he had, that he would not have pass'd a severe Rebuke upon Isaac, on Account both of his Father's, and his own Hypocrisy? He would hardly have forgot Abraham's, which drew such Misfortunes upon him. St Chrysostom thought this so likely, that he boldly declared from the Pulpit, that Abimelech actually did reproach Isaac with Abraham's Dissimulation. "Rex, adhuc habens recentem memoriam eorum, quæ tempore Patriarchæ rapta Sarâ tulerat, increbatur eum, & reumque argens dicebat, cur hoc fecisti? — Hanc deceptionem & olim sustinimus a patre tuo (25). — The King, having fresh in his Memory what he suffered for the Rape of Sara in the Patriarch's Time, reproached him, and charging him with his Guilt, said unto him, What hast thou done? — Thus was I heretofore deceived by your Father." But all this has no better Foundation, than Rhetorical Licence, which is sometimes carried as far as that of the Poets and Painters,

(21) Beza's Answer to Balmain. Oper. Tom. 2. p. 222.

(22) Abraham liv'd to 175. and Isaac to 180.

(23) Perronius upon Gen. l. xxvi. Pref. to Sallustian's Annals, T. 1. p. 52c.

(24) The Geneva Version renders it, All Tyranny is of short Continuance.

(25) Chrysostom's 119 and 120 Homilies.

(26) Hor. Art of Poetry, vers. 9.

— Pictoribus atque Poëtis

Quidlibet audendi semper fuit æqua potestas (26).

Poets and Painters equally may dare;

In bold Attempts an equal Power they share.

CREECH.

Two things seem to favour Moreri's Opinion. First, The King of Gerar, both in Abraham's and Isaac's Time, had the same Name; and there was a General of his Army, whose Name was Picol, at both these Times. Secondly, Rebecca, beautiful as she was, was not

(f) Turclin, in his Epist. Hist.
p. 10. Edit.
of Francker,
in 1792,
is gaily misquoting
the Words, Isaac, going to Gerar, for
Com. by the Providence of God, preserv'd his Wife's Chastity from the Lust of Abimelech.

(g) Genes.
xxi.

tired into the Land of Gerar, where one ABIMELECH then reign'd. The Beauty of Rebecca occasioned her Husband's making use of the same Policy, which Abraham had had recourse to, on account of Sara's Beauty. Isaac fearing to be slain, if it should be known that he was the Husband of the beautiful Rebecca, made her pass for his Sister. Abimelech discover'd the Cheat, by observing, as he look'd through a Window, a certain Sport [E] which pass'd between them; and having sent for Isaac, said to him, Behold of a surety she is thy Wife, and how saidst thou, she is my Sister?—What is this thou hast done unto us? one of the people might lightly have lien with thy wife [F], and thou shouldst have brought guiltiness upon us. At the same time, he forbid his Subjects, on pain of death, to offer the least Injury to Isaac, or Rebecca. This Remonstrance, and this Decree, must have been sincere; and we Moderns ought to be careful not to misrepresent these Matters (f). The Prosperity of Isaac caus'd a change in the Friendship of Abimelech. For, perceiving the great Wealth, which Isaac acquired, he very freely gave him to understand, that he must depart. He obey'd; and continuing to prosper, notwithstanding the Opposition made to him in several places, on account of the Pits, which he dug, his Alliance was courted by Abimelech, whose Offers were favourably receiv'd (g).

not taken away, as Sara had been; the Reason of which might be, that Abimelech was grown old, and remembered likewise the ill Consequences of the Rape of Sara. I answer, first, that the Kings of certain Countries affect'd all to take the same Name; as the Kings of Egypt did that of Pharaoh. Why then might not Abimelech be the common Appellation of all the Kings of Gerar? Pisot might perhaps be the Name of a particular Employ. Perhaps too this Employ might have descended from Father to Son. Secondly, I reply, that Isaac's Abimelech might not be a young Man, tho' he was not the same, who took away Sara. I frankly own, I believe he was a good old Man; because he form'd no Design upon the beautiful Rebecca, tho' he did not believe her to be married; and because he does not tell Isaac, that he had been in Danger from him, but from his Subjects; and, as these People were so debauched, that every beautiful Stranger, who was thought not to be married, was in great Danger; I can see no Reason more probable for Abimelech's Continuity towards Rebecca, than his old Age. There is a Time (say youthful Libertines) when one is too wise.

[E] A certain Sport.] Some have imagin'd, that the Scripture intended, under the Word Sport, to express, modestly, the conjugal Duty, which Isaac happen'd to be paying his Wife, at a Time when Abimelech was looking out of Window. "Putant quidam honestè significari eo vocabulo copulam carnalem. Sed non fit verisimile prudentissimum & sanctissimum virum tam incautè rem habuisse cum uxore, ut id per fenestram prospicere, ut Scriptura inquit, Rex posset Abimelech. Credibilis igitur est eo vocabulo significatos esse tales jocos & blanditias in amplexando & osculando, quales inter conjuges agitari turpe non est: extra conjugium vero nefas est (27).—Some think, that carnal Copulation is modestly hinted at under that Word: but it is not likely, that Isaac, a prudent and holy Man, would have to do with his Wife, in so unguarded a Manner, that King Abimelech, according to the Scripture, could behold it from his Window. It is more probable, that that Word implies only such kind of sporting and toying, by embraces and kisses, as is decent between married People, but out of Wedlock unlawful." Others will not hear of this sort of Explanation; they say, that Isaac was too wife, and too prudent, to take his Measures so ill; and that, upon such Occasion, he took care to be in a Place, where the Neighbours could not overlook him from their Windows. "We must therefore understand, say they, by the Word Sport, a certain Past-time, which, though it was not the last Act of the Play, was yet too familiar between Persons not married, however they might be otherwise a-kin." This Past-time must mean something else, than talking familiarly, jesting, and laughing together; for a Brother and Sister may do all this very modestly, and without giving occasion to such a Conclusion as Abimelech drew from the sporting of Isaac and Rebecca. This Explication appears to me incomparably more reasonable, than the former: and, yet, it must be allowed, that Fondness might sometimes hinder Isaac from observing that great Precaution, which rigid Moralists would have exacted from the Patriarch: for, in short, it cannot be denied, that Abimelech, looking through a Window, surpriz'd him diverting himself with Rebecca at a certain Game, whence he could not but certainly conclude they were Man and Wife. Take notice, that they had been marry'd forty Years: Isaac was, then, eighty Years old. St Austin, in his Book against Faustus the Manichean, a great Exploder of the Patriarchs, defends Isaac in a solid Manner (28); and, indeed, it is too rigorous to expect, that a Patriarch, or a Bishop, if he is married, should not recreate himself a little with his Wife, without closing all his Window-Shutters. For we must have this good Opinion of their Prudence, that if Nature inclines the greatest Men to a little indulgence, they will walk so cautiously upon this slippery Road, as to take care that no Observation shall be made of them from their Neighbour's Window. Cornelius à Lapide does not know what it is he is confusing, when he sets himself against the first Explication. "Jaded

"impuri, says he, jocum hunc intelligent copulam conjugalem. Sed apage hos Cynicos! Quis eredit Isaac publicè, & spectante Rege, tam inverecundum, lubricum, & cynicum fuisse (29)?—The unchrist Jews understand this Sport of matrimonial Copulation. But away with these Snarlers! Who can believe, that Isaac was so immodest, lewd, and brazen, publicly, and in the King's Sight?" This is not the thing: no one pretends, that Isaac was, then, in the middle of the Street: he was in his Chamber; and had not sufficiently fasten'd his Window-Shutters: This is the whole Matter; and, if this is too much, you will be obliged to condemn the Patriarch, and to act the Cato against him. It is well known that Cato expell'd one Manlius from the Senate, because at noon Day, and in the Presence of his Daughter, he had given his Wife a Kiss (30). This Manlius would have been Consul, probably, the next Election. Some pretend to discover an allegorical Mystery (31) in this Sport of Isaac and Rebecca, of which certainly neither they, nor the sacred Historian, in the least dreamt. I shall not place these Errors among those which I am compiling. It would be an Attempt like that of drinking the Sea dry. It were to be wish'd, that the greatest part of these mysterious Conceits had been unknown to the World.

[F] One of the People might lightly have lien with thy Wife.] The Philistines must have been furious Folks in Love-Matters; since Abimelech, their King, is surpriz'd, that no one had lain with Rebecca, who pass'd only for Isaac's Sister. We learn from hence, at the same time, their great regard for Marriage. As for unmarried Women, they seem, in this Country, to have thought they were the first Comer's Right. Witness Dina, the Daughter of Jacob, who was decoy'd by them, as she was taking a Walk. She was first enjoy'd, and then demanded in Marriage (32).

(28) Andrieu agens Faust. B. 22. Ch. 46. Mr Thien quotes part of this Passage, in the 4th Part of his Transit of Sports and Diversions.

(29) Corn. à Lapide upon Gen. xxvi. 8.

(30) Plutarch in his Cato Major, p. 316.

(31) See Pererius upon Genes. ch. xxvi.

(32) Genes. xxvii.

ABLANCOURT (NICOLAS PERROT, Lord of) See PERROT.

ABRABANEL (a) (ISAAC) a celebrated Rabin, was born at Lisbon [A], of a Family which pretended to be deriv'd from King David [B]. He push'd his Interest very far in the Court of Alphonso V. King of Portugal, and was there honoured with the highest Offices; which he enjoy'd till the Death of that Prince: but he found a great Alteration under the new King. Abraham was Forty five Years old [C], when John II. succeeded his Father Alphonso. All who were concern'd in the Management of Affairs in the preceeding Reign, were turn'd out; and, if our Rabin is to be credited, there was a secret Design of putting them to death, under pretence, that they had been contriving to betray the Crown of Portugal to the King of Spain. He was not appriz'd of this, when, in obedience to the Orders he had receiv'd to wait upon the King, he went to Lisbon with all haste; but being inform'd upon the Road of the Plot, which was hatching against his Life, he retir'd with expedition into the King of Castile's Dominions. All his Estate was confiscated, upon the Return of the Soldiers, who had Orders to bring him dead or alive. He lost, upon that occasion, together with all his Books, the beginning of a Commentary upon Deuteronomy, which he was much concern'd at. Some Christian Writers [D] do not agree, that the Cause of this Disgrace was so little owing to his Misconduct, as he pretended. They are of the same Opinion, in relation to his other Persecutions [E]. Be that as it will, being settled in Castile, he apply'd himself to teaching and composing. He wrote, in the Year 1484, his Commentary on the Books of Joshua, Judges, and Samuel: after which he was sent for to the Court of Ferdinand and Isabella, and had Employments conferr'd upon him during eight Years, namely till the Jews were driven out of the Territories of the Catholic King, in 1492. He did all he could by his Prayers and his Tears [F] to avert this dreadful Storm; but he did not succeed, and was obliged, as well as the rest, to depart with his Wife and Children. He retir'd to Naples, and there compos'd, in 1493, his Commentary on the Books of Kings. As he was a Courtier, he did not forget to recommend himself, by the Knowledge he had acquir'd in the Courts of Portugal and Arragon; insomuch that he insinuated himself into the good Graces of Ferdinand King of Naples, and afterwards of Alphonso. He follow'd the Fortune of the latter, when Charles VIII. King of France drove him from Naples; for he pass'd over with him into Sicily [G]. After the Death of Alphonso,

(a) He is called Isaac Abrahamiel, Abaraniel,
Abarinel,
Abravanel, Avravanuel, Abarbenel.

[A] Was born at Lisbon.] His Ancestors were of Castile. "E majoribus Castellam Hispaniæ, ex patribus Olyssiponem Lusitaniam agnovit patriam.—" He claimed Castile of Spain as the Country of his Ancestors, and Olyssipon Lusitania as the Country of his Parents." Thus the Journal of Letipic informs us (1). Don Nicolas Antonio will have it, that the Family of Abraham was settled at Seville for many Ages (2). He had it from Bartoloci; and he quotes the Rabin Solomon ben Virga (3), who has asserted almost the same thing in his History of the Jews (4), translated into Latin by Gentius, and quoted below.

[B] Pretended to be derived from King David.] Abraham has in part declared (5), that at the time of the Destruction of the first Temple, two Families of the Race of David passed into Spain, one of which settled at Lucene, and the other at Seville, where it left a Posterity. In another Place (6) he gives us the History of this Transmigration. The Rabin Solomon ben Virga introduces one Thomas, who makes a long Deduction of the same Story to Alphonso King of Spain, and relates, that the Family of Abraham descended from the Kings of Juda; but Alphonso would believe nothing of it, and raised insurmountable Difficulties against these Genealogies (7). The Jews, to get over the Difficulty, suppose, that Abraham lost his Genealogical Books in the Hurry of his Removal (8). Mr Huet relates (9), that Manasse ben Israél affirms in his Conciliator, that these two Families, sprung from David, retired into Spain, after the Ruin of the second Temple. This Rabin had a very particular Interest in this ridiculous Story; for his Wife was of the Family of Abraham (10). Farther, it is not easy to know who this Alphonso is, who converses so long with this Thomas, in the Book of Solomon ben Virga. Some call him a King of Portugal (11); and as they insist that the Abraham, whom Thomas mentions, is our Rabin, we cannot doubt but they take him for King Alphonso V. and that this Alphonso is the last King of Castile, who bore that Name (12). He might speak upon good Grounds thus far; but he is guilty of an Error, when he places near two Centuries between this King and our Rabin; for this latter was born in the Year 1437, and that King died in 1350, aged 38 Years.

[C] Forty five Years old.] Nicolas Antonio has inserted, at the end of his Bibliothèque d'Espagne what Father Bartoloci had told him concerning Isaac Abraham, correcting his Article of Abraham, upon the

Abraham. He has by that corrected some Faults which had been before printed in the Article of this Rabin: but he seems to me not to have express'd himself with Exactness, when he says, "Juvenis adhuc, sed bene doctus, in Castellæ regnum transit, cum Johanni II. Portugallie Regi parum esset gratus. — He was yet a Youth, but a good Scholar, when, being disagreeable to John II. King of Portugal, he went into the Kingdom of Castile (13)." He talks in that Place of an Age, which generally cannot have afforded time enough to acquire much Learning. This is what cannot be applied to forty five Years of Age. It is certain then, that the Author of the Bibliothèque d'Espagne believed that the Rabin was much younger than that, when he fled into Castile: he was therefore in an Error.

[D] Some Christian Writers.] They say that Abraham deserved the Treatment he met with; and that he would have been punished more severely, upon the Discovery of his ill Designs, if the good-natured Disposition of King Jehn had not been satisfied with banishing him. They add, that Remorse of Conscience made this Rabin take the Resolution of quitting Portugal, and eluding by Night into Castile, with an extraordinary Readiness (14).

[E] They are of the same Opinion, in relation to his other Persecutions.] They say, that he intruded himself into the Court of Ferdinand and Isabella, by means of a Bank which he established in the Kingdom of Castile; that he amass'd great Treasures, by making use of all the Artifices of his Nation: that he tyrannized over the Poor, that he was very furious; that he had the Vanity to aspire to the most illustrious Titles, and those which solely belonged to the great Families of Spain; and besides that, being a sworn Enemy of the Christian Religion, he contributed more than any one else to the Storm, which overwhelmed him and all his Countrymen (15).

[F] By his Prayers and his Tears.] He himself relates in one of his Books (16) what he did upon this Occasion. Solomon ben Virga gives an Account of it in his History of the Jews (17), with a tragical Description of the terrible Miseries, which fell upon three hundred thousand Jews, who were obliged, in one Day, to depart out of the Dominions of the Catholic King.

[G] He passed over with him into Sicily.] Nicolas Antonio, correcting his Article of Abraham, upon the

(13) Id. T. 2. p. 686.

(14) Afta
Lipf. Nov.
1686. p. 620.
See likewise
F. Bartoloci's
Bibl. Rabin. T. 3. p. 874.

(15) Ibid.

(16) His Comment. on the Books of Kings, in Nic. Anton.
Bibl. Hifp.
T. 1. p. 627.

(17) Nic.
Ant. Bibl.
Hifp. Ibid.

(1) Afta.
Lipf. for the Month of Nov. 1686.
p. 529.

(2) (5) N.
Ant. Bibl.
Hifp. Tom.
1. p. 627.
&c. Tom. 2.
p. 686.

(4) Or Scheveth Jehuda.

(5) (6) Comment. upon Zech. xi. p.
293, and upon 2 Kings
xxv. p. 305.
in the Afta
Lipf. Nov.
1686. p. 528.

(7) In Scheveth Jehuda,
§. 11, &c.
in the Afta
Lipf. Nov.
1686. p. 528.

(8) Afta
Lipf. Nov.
1686. p. 528.

(9) Huet's Demonstr.
Evang. p.
708. Edit.
Leipf. Ann.
1694. 4to.

(10) Id. Ib.

(11) Afta
Lipf. 1686.
p. 529.

(12) Nicol.
Anton. Bibl.
Hifp. T. 1.
p. 627.

Alphonso, he retired to Corfou, and there began his Commentary on Isaiah, in the Year 1495. He had the Satisfaction of recovering, by what Accident I know not, what he had formerly wrote upon the Book of Deuteronomy. He came back into Italy, the following Year, and went and settled at Monopoli in Puglia (b), where he wrote many books. He finish'd his Deuteronomy, and compos'd his Sevach Pefach (c) and his Nacalatb Avotb (d), in the year 1496. The following year, he compos'd his Majene Hajebua (e); and in 1498, his Majchmiab Jeshbua (f) and his Commentary on Isaiah. Some time after, he went to Venice, to make up the difference, which had arisen between the Venetians and Portuguese, concerning the Spice-Trade, and he shew'd so much Prudence and Ability, that he gain'd the Esteem and Favour of the great Men. At Venice he compos'd his Commentary on Jeremiah, in the year 1504. Some say, that he compos'd, likewise, at that time, his Commentary on Ezekiel and the twelve lesser Prophets. In the year 1506, he compos'd his Commentary on Exodus; and died at Venice in the year 1508, [H], aged 71 years. He left three Sons, Juda, Joseph, and Samuel [I]. The eldest was a Physician and a great Poet, and compos'd many Verses in Honour of his Father. It is said, that Samuel embrac'd Christianity at Ferrara, and receiv'd the Name of Alphonso, which was That of the Duke. Abraham wrote many other Books [K] of which we cannot determine the Date, and of which

(1) Chavers, that he came to Corfu in the year 1495. Bartolucci Bibl. Rabini. T. 3. p. 875.

(c) i.e. the Sacrifice of the Passover.

(d) i.e. The Inheritance of the Fathers.

(e) i.e. The Springs of Salvation.

(f) The Precious of Salvation.

the Conferences which he had with Father Bartolucci, says that this Rabin followed King Ferdinand into Sicily, whom Francis had dethroned, and that, after the Death of this Prince, he retired to Corfou (18). Here is certainly a Mistake; the Author takes Ferdinand for Alphonso: it was with Alphonso (19) that Abraham went into Sicily, as Father Bartolucci remarks (20), and not with Ferdinand. He continued at Messina till the Death of Alphonso in the beginning of the Year 1495, and then he went to Corfou (21). It was there he began his Commentary on Isaiah in 1495. If he had not pass'd over into this Island till after the Death of Ferdinand, we may be sure he could not be there in 1495. Thus the Appendix of Nicolas Antonio stands in need of another Appendix to correct it.

[H] In the Year 1508, Father Bartolucci gave D. Nicolas Antonio the Hint of this Year, who had already printed, that our Rabin was Professor of the Hebrew Tongue at Padua, about the Year 1510. We have here a Proof of Mr. Moreri's Negligence. He had by him this Author's Spanish Dictionary, and yet did not take the Pains to consult the Appendix, which makes a considerable Part of it, and which clear up, and correct, many Passages of the Work. Thus he has preserv'd the Mistake relating to this Professorship of Padua, without observing that the Author himself had corrected it at the end of his Book, and excus'd himself, as having been misled by Buxtorf: "Venetias inde profectus me moratur, ex qua urbe in Germaniam aut in Præfationem Patavinam Hebraicæ Lingux, quod Buxtorfium et alios secuti nos literis in Bibliotheca nostra mandamus, potuit conferre sc. Constat autem Venetis cum Septuaginta (22) annos natum superioris seculi anno octavo diem suum obiisse. Quo cum non bene convenit quod circa annum decimum Professorum, ut ibidem diximus, Patavinum egerit (23). — He is said to have gone from thence to Venice; whence he might proceed either to Germany, or to his Hebrew Professorship at Padua, as I have related in my Dictionary, upon the Authority of Buxtorf, and others. But it is certain, that he died at Venice, aged Seventy, in the eighth Year of the last Century; which does not agree with the Account I have there given of his discharging the Office of Professor at Padua, in the tenth Year." Thus Nicolas Antonio excuses himself. He does not absolutely deny this Professorship at Padua; he is satisfied with saying, that he had not exactly marked the Time. Mr. Moreri therefore ought not to have told us, that, in 1510, Abraham taught the Hebrew Tongue at Padua.

[I] He left three Sons, Juda, Joseph, and Samuel. At first sight he seems to have left four, if it be true what N. Antonio reports (24), that Leon, who wrote the Dialogues of Love, was his Son. But we must observe, that the Author of these Dialogues may very well be the same with Juda, the eldest Son of Abraham. This Juda was commonly call'd Majer Leone (25). His Book of Love is very well known: Denis Sauvage, and Pontus de Tiard having translated it into French. The Author is generally quoted under the Name of Leo Hebraeus. He is call'd Mestre Leon Abrahanel Medico Hebraeo in a Spanish Translation printed at Venice in 1568, in 4to.

Juda ABRABANEL left his Father, when the French conquered the Kingdom of Naples; and retired to Genoa to practise Physic there (26). Samuel ABRABANEL was alive in the Popedom of Julius III. as appears by a Petition, which he presented to Cardinal Sirlet, Protector of the Neophytes (27). He left Naples in 1540, and carried with him the Value of two hundred thousand Crowns (28). His Father dedicated to him the Commentary on Pirke Avotb, which he compos'd in the Year 1496 (29).

[K] Abraham wrote many other Books. The following are set down in the Leipfic-Journal (30): Commentaries on Genesis, Leviticus, and Numbers; Rafch Amara (31) Sepper Jeshbuot Mejbico, a Work on the Traditions concerning the Messiah; Zedek Olamim; this relates to the Rewards and Punishments of another Life: Sepper Jemotb Olam; it is an History from Adam: Masmar Macbif Schaddai; it is a Treatise of the Prophecy and Vision of Ezekiel, against the Rabin Maimonides: Sepper Ateretb Skenim: Miphalab Elobim (32): Sepper Schamaim Chadaschim: Lakakatb Nebhim. The Sieur Theophilus Spizelius remarks, that John Buxtorf, the Son, had shown him a great many Dissertations taken from the Words of Abraham, which he had translated into Latin (33). They must be like those of the same Rabin, which the same Buxtorf has translated and published with the Book Cefri. He shew'd him likewise other Translations, which he had made from some Books of this Rabin. The Commentary on Haggai was translated into Latin by Adam Scherzererus, and inserted in the Trifolium Orientale, publish'd at Leipfic, in 1663. In the same Town was publish'd, in 1686, the Commentary on Joshua, Judges, and Samuel. See what is said concerning this Edition, in the Leipfic-Journal, whence I have borrowed this Article. In the same Year, 1686, they printed at Leyden the Commentary on Hosea, with a Preface on the twelve lesser Prophets; the whole translated into Latin, with Notes, by Francides Hufen. M. de Veil, a converted Jew, publish'd at London, in 1683, Abraham's Preface to Leviticus. See the Leipfic-Journal, for the Month of January, 1684. N. Antonio will furnish you with the Titles of several other Works of this Rabin, sometimes with the Time and Place of the Impression, as far as the Rabbinical Dictionary of Plantavitus would inform him. Mr. Moreri ought not to have said, that Abraham wrote a Commentary on the Talmud, but a Piece of the Talmud, entitled Pirke Avotb. N. Antonio, his only Source, might have so well explain'd this to him, as not to suffer him to mistake. Father Simon, who tells us many curious Particulars relating to Abraham's Books, observes that the Book compos'd by this Rabin, under the Name of Nabalat Avotb, Profession of the Fathers, is a Commentary on the Treatise Pirke Avotb, and that both the one and the other were printed at Venice, in 4to, in the Year 1545: that there is a very learned Preface of this Author, at the beginning of his Book, Nahalat Avotb, in which he explains the Succession of Tradition among the Jews, which is a very obscure point (34).

(26) Ibid. p. 381.

(27) Ibid.

(28) Ibid.

(29) Ibid. p. 688. from R. David Ganz.

(30) Ibid.

(31) Act. Leip. Nov. 1686. p. 531.

(32) i.e. the Head of Faith, from translated in Latin by W. Vorstius, and printed with his Notes, at Amsterdam, in 1653. N. Ant. Bibl. Hip. Tom. 1. p. 629.

(33) i.e. the Works of God. It treats the Creed of the Christian of the World, and contains a notice of Moses and all that he has written in the Book of Genesis. Simon's Critical History of the Old Testament.

(34) Spizelius's Specim. Bibl. Univ.

(18) He was the friend of this Name. He married Ferdinand's Daughter, and died for Succession, Ferdinand II.

(19) Bartolucci Bibl. Rabini. Tom. 2. p. 875.

(20) Ibid.

(21) He was the friend of this Name. He married Ferdinand's Daughter, and died for Succession, Ferdinand II.

(22) N. Antonio Bibl. Hip. Tom. 1. p. 630.

(23) Ibid.

(24) Bartolucci Bibl. Rabini. Tom. 2. p. 875.

(34) Celsus's History of the Old Testament.

which some have not yet been printed. Many of the Noble Venetians, and the chief of the Jews, solemniz'd his Funeral with great Pomp. His Body was interr'd at Padua, in a Burying-Ground without the City. A little while after, the Rabin, Juda Mentz, Rector of the University, was buried in the same Place. The Siege of 1509 so destroy'd every thing about that Place, that this Burying-Ground was no longer to be distinguish'd. Abraham was Master of great Talents: he was upon a level with the famous Maimonides; and some even rank him above him. The Jews pretend, that he entirely overthrew all the Arguments and Objections of the Christians. These latter, justly condemning what he wrote in the Jewish Controversy, yet greatly esteem his other Interpretations. They find him to be a subtle, clear, learned, and honest, Commentator. He does not canonize the Opinions of his Masters; and censures very freely the Plagiarism, and other Faults, which he found them to be guilty of. His great Weakness was his being too sensible of the Persecutions, which the Jews suffer'd, and in which he bore a considerable part. The Memory of this Misfortune animated him with such Fury against the Christians, that he treated them with the utmost Indignation. He has scarce wrote one Book, in which his Anger and Thirst of Revenge is not to be trac'd; and the wretched Condition of his Nation is uppermost in every thing he compos'd. He hop'd by this means to revive the expiring Synagogue (g); and I suppose he found it a Relief from that Oppression of Choler, which would have choak'd him, had he not discharg'd it upon Paper. Nor is he the only one, who has found Relief from this Remedy. We know some, who have stood in great need of it, tho' they were not ignorant, like him, of the Precepts of the Gospel. I do not meet with his Professorship at Padua [L], nor his Journey to the East [M]. These are Facts in which Mr Moreri is grossly mistaken, as he is in what he relates concerning his Travels into Germany [N].

(g) From the Acta E-rudit. Lipf. for the Month of Nov. 1686. p. 528, &c.

Abraham was indefatigable in his Studies: he spent whole Nights in it; and was capable of fasting a long time. He wrote with great Ease: the implacable Hatred, which he shew'd in his Writings against the Christians [O], did not hinder his living with them in a civil, chearful, soft, and obliging manner.

[L] I do not meet with his Professorship at Padua. See the Remark [H]. The learned Gentlemen, who have given us an historical Abridgment (35) of the Life of Abraham, and who have trac'd him almost Year by Year, from his leaving Spain, to his Death, would not sure have pass'd over to remarkable a Circumstance: Whence I conclude, that, since they make no mention of it, the Author himself had said nothing of it. Now it is not probable, that, having mentioned so many things not so much to his Honour, as a Professorship at Padua, he should say nothing of this Employ, if he had been actually invested with it. And if other Writers had mention'd it upon any good Grounds, I believe the Leipfic Gentlemen would not have been ignorant of it, or pass'd it by in Silence. It is therefore a Fact a little apocryphal, to say no worse.

Add to this, that Father Bartoloci, who has given us an exact Series of this Rabin's Adventures, takes no notice of it.

[M] Nor his Journey to the East. I look upon it to be false, for the abovementioned Reason; namely, the Silence of these Gentlemen: Nay, though this Journey were real, Mr Moreri has still advanc'd a great Falshood. He supposes, first, that Abraham taught Hebrew at Padua, in 1510; and, in the second place, that the eager Desire he had to shew his hatred to the Christians induc'd him to go into the East, to live there with those of his own Sect, and that it was there he compos'd that great Number of Books, which are still extant. We have seen that he died in 1508; which is enough to convince us that all this is meer Chimeras.

[N] These are Facts in which Mr Moreri is grossly mistaken as he is in what he relates concerning his Travels into Germany. I did not dare to treat this as false, whilst I was perused, that D. Nicolas Antonio, had faithfully cited Buxtorf; for, supposing his Quotation just, we must believe, that Abraham had mention'd his own Travels into Germany, in his Commentary on Pirke Avoth. "Profugus ergo in Germaniam venit, quod ipse ait in Commentariis ad librum Talmudicum Pirke Avoth, — Buxtorfio teste, in tractatu de Abbreviaturis Hebraeorum, p. 100 (36). In his Exile, he retired to Germany, as he tells us himself, in his Commentaries on the Talmudic Book, Pirke Avoth, — according to Buxtorf, in his Treatise de Abbrev. Hebr. p. 100." All I could say, therefore, upon this Supposition, was, that, at least, it was certain, that Abraham did not visit Germany, after his Banishment from the Territories of the Catholic King: because, upon leaving them, he embark'd for the Kingdom of Naples, and arriv'd there soon after. I discover'd likewise Moreri to be in an Error; Abraham, says he, was in the Number of the Exiles: He retired, first, to Germany; and then to Italy. And I had the more Reason to be surpris'd at this Mistake, as I knew that D. Nicolas Antonio had corrected it, upon better Information, from Father Bartoloci. But, upon consulting the Book quoted, I found that the Author takes no notice, that Abraham mention'd his own Travels into Germany: See what Buxtorf says: "Hic titulus (Morenu, i. e. Doctor Noster) novus est, infra ducentos annos natus in Germania, inde in Italian traductus, quod valde miratus fuit Don Isaac Abraham ex Hispania in has terras veniens, ut ipsemet scribit in Commentario Pirke Avoth, cap. 6. (37) — This Title (Morenu, i. e. our Doctor) is new, having arose in Germany, within these two hundred Years, and from thence transplanted into Italy; whic Don Isaac Abraham was very much surpris'd at, as he himself writes in his Commentary on Pirke Avoth." I could no longer doubt, that D. Nicolas Antonio mistook Buxtorf's meaning; and it is an Error, which he does not retract in the Place where he informs us, what Father Bartoloci had told him concerning Abraham. Observe, that this Father proves demonstrably the Falshood of these suppos'd Travels into Germany, which, says he (38), some mention upon the Authority of Buxtorf. I doubt not but this will stop the Course of this erroneous Quotation.

(37) Buxtorf de Abbrev. Hebræ. Tom. 3. p. 115; Edit. 2.

[O] Which he shew'd in his Writings against the Christians. His Commentaries on the Scriptures, but chiefly those he made upon the Prophets, are so full of Venom against Jesus Christ, the Church, the Pope, the Cardinals, the Clergy, and all Christians in general, particularly the Roman Catholics, that Father Bartoloci was of Opinion, that the Jews ought not to be suffer'd to read them (39). Upon which he remarks, that the reading of the Commentaries on the lesser Prophets had been forbidden them, and that they dared not to keep them, "In his etiam pluribus in locis canino dente Christianum Religionem mordet & lacerat, indeoque merito illorum lectio & retentio Judæis interdicitur est, nec eos apud le retinere audent, publicè saltem & palam, propter metum Christianorum (40). — For in many Passages of these he tears to pieces the Christian Religion, in so enrag'd a Manner, that the reading and keeping of them is forbidden the Jews, nor dare they be in Possession of them, at least openly, for fear of the Christians."

(38) Bart. Bibl. Racin. Tom. 3. p. 688.

(39) Bibl. Rab. Tom. 3. p. 876.

(40) Id. ib. p. 878.

(35) A. B. Lipf. Nov. 1686, p. 528, &c.

(36) N. Ant. Bibl. Hip. Tom. 1. p. 623.

both in Chaldæa, and the City of Haran [C]? How many Sciences [D], and how many Books [E] have not been attributed to him? The Jews ascribe to him the Privilege both Sides, he ordered him to be thrown into the middle of the Flames, saying, Let your God deliver you. Haran, Brother of Abraham, waited impatiently for the Event, resolving in himself to follow the Party which got the better; to be of Nimrod's Religion, if Abraham was burnt, and of Abraham's Religion if he was not. Abraham came out whole and untouched from the middle of the Flames; and Nimrod thereupon having demanded of Haran, in whom he believed, and receiving this Answer, I believe in the God of Abraham, commanded him to be thrown into a Furnace. Haran was so roughly handled there, that he died soon after in the Presence of his Father (10). The Reason, why the Fire had such Power over him, was because his Faith was not so lively as that of Abraham, and that he was not predestinated to great Things, as Abraham was (11).

This is by no means a new Tradition; for St Jerom reports it; and he seems even to adopt it, as far as relates to the miraculous Preservation of Abraham in the midst of the Fire (12): For, as to the superstitious Cruelty of Terah, in acting the Part of an Informer to the Holy Office against his own Son, he says nothing of it. St Epiphanius, who is likewise silent as to this Matter, maintains on the contrary, that Terah surviv'd Haran, as a Punishment for his Blasphemy in making Gods of Clay; and, that before him, no Father had ever seen his Children die a natural Death (13). The Ambiguity of the Word Ur (14), may have given Occasion to these Fables. Those, who lay a Stress on the Words of God to Abraham, I am the Lord, that brought thee out of Ur of the Chaldees (15), imagine that he saved him from some great Persecution, because he makes use of the same Phrase at the beginning of the Decalogue, to signify the Deliverance from Egypt (16). But this is to search for Myteries unnecessarily. We meet with no Footsteps of this Persecution in Scripture; and therefore we may proportionably rank in the same Class of imaginary Notions the Fire, which did no Injury to Abraham, and that which Maimonides borrows from (17) a certain Treatise of the Agriculture of the Egyptians.

We find there, that Abraham, having maintained in a public Dispute against the Idolaters, that Fire was not worthy of Divine Honours, was thrown into Prison, despoil'd of his Effects, and condemned to Banishment. The King was afraid, lest the Authority and Eloquence of so great a Man should convert his People from the Adoration of Fire. Cerdrenus ascribes the Death of Haran to a very unlikely Cause; pretending that it was for endeavouring to snatch the Idols of Terah out of the Fire, which Abraham had thrown in. This Attempt must be vain, since he himself perished by the Flames.

[C] And the City of Haran. It is pretended, that he became there a Converter; and that, whilst he was labouring to make Profelytes among the Men, Sara was doing the same among the Women (18); and that we must understand in this Sense the Words of Genesis, where it is said, that Abraham went out of Haran, with Sara his Wife, Lot, his Brother's Son, all the Riches they had acquired, and all the Souls they had gotten (19). They will not have us understand this of the getting of Children, but of propagating the Faith: And they confirm this Explanation by a Metaphor, which the Apostle St Paul makes use of, at the 19th Verse of the 4th Chapter of his Epistle to the Galatians. My little Children, of whom I am in travail again, until Christ be form'd in you. It is more probable, that the Souls, which they had gotten, were the Slaves which they had purchas'd, together with the Children, who were born of these Slaves; not but that Abraham, without doubt, endeavour'd to instruct the Infidels, as far as his Zeal and his Prudence would permit him; and, if he converted any, they probably follow'd him into the Land of Canaan.

There are, who think, that his Father did not serve false Gods, till after his arrival at Haran (21). But this seems absurd: for, as it is very probable, that (22) this Family abandon'd Chaldæa, to avoid a Persecution, which it had reason to fear, on account of it's deserting Idolatry; it would be very strange, if it's Head should not have been tainted with it, till in that very Country, to which they fled for Refuge.

[E] And how many Books. There is a Book of the Creation, which was for a long time ascrib'd to him (32). It is mention'd in the Talmud (33): The Rabbins Chanina and Hoschaia, were accustom'd to read it on the Eve of the Sabbath. The Author of a Book, entituled Cosiri, says, that this Work of Abraham is very profound, and stands in need of a long Interpretation; that it teaches the Unity of God; that, in one light, it seems to contradict itself, but, in another, that it is very consistent. All the Jews do not attribute this Book to this great Patriarch. Some of them declare loudly, that it is a spurious Work, and condemn the boldness of the Rabin Abi-

But the worship of Idols, of which Abraham had cur'd Terah, before they left their Country, might possible revive in the Mind of the good old Gentleman: for, in those times of Ignorance, few Men had Strength enough to master their natural Inclination to Idolatry entirely. It is even believ'd, that Nachor, the third Son of Terah, was never quite converted, but that, however, he left his Country, in order to join his Father at Haran (23). Perhaps it might be he, who reviv'd the Veneration for Idols, in the Mind of the old Man, which Abraham had effac'd. It is certain that Laban, Grandson of this Nachor, was an Idolater. Some of the Fathers of the Church have thought, that Terah was neither a Believer in his Life time, nor at the point of Death. See the 31st, and 37th Homilies of St Chrysostom. How will they prove this? And how shall the contrary be proved to them? The History of Abraham is attended with numberless Difficulties, in which both Sides of the Question do not want for Reasons. But poor Father Bolduc, who believ'd that this Patriarch built Monasteries at Haran, and carry'd with him into Palestine only the youngest of the Monks (24), is not one of those, who can allege any Reason for his Opinion.

[D] How many Sciences. They say, he understood Astronomy. This is what Berosus relates of him, without naming him, if we may believe Josephus (25). Some will have it, that he taught Arithmetic and Astronomy to the Egyptians. Josephus affirms this (26); and Nicolas Damascenus would have confirm'd it, had he said that Abraham taught Geometry and Arithmetic to the Egyptians; but he says no such thing. Mr Heidegger, at the 144th Page of his second Tome, cites the 4th Book of Nicolas Damascenus's History, as if this were to be found there; but he mistakes the Words of Josephus for those of Nicolas, in the 16th Chapter of the 9th Book of Eusebius's Præparatio Evangelica. This Patriarch communicated Astronomy to the Phœnicians, and Egyptians, according to Eupolemus, and Artapan (27); but, after all, these Things are not Articles of Faith. The Authors, who attribute such sort of Things to him, weaken the Force of their own Testimony, by the Fallshoods which they mix with them. One says, that Abraham reign'd at Damas (28); another, that he sojourn'd twenty Years in Egypt, with his whole Family, in the Court of King Pharathon (29); a third does him the Injustice to think, that the Motive of his Journey into Egypt, was a Desire to be acquainted with the Opinions of the Egyptians, concerning the Deity, with a Design of following them, if they were better than his own, or to undeceive that People, if their Belief was erroneous (30). Some Moderns think, that he did not teach Mathematics to the Egyptians (31); but the Reason they give appears to me to be false. They say, that the Detention of Sara by the King of Egypt, made Abraham so uneasy, that he was not capable of reading Lectures on such abstract Sciences as these, which, like Poetry, require ease and freedom of Mind:

Carmina secessum scribentis et otia querunt.

From Noise and Care the Poet must be free.

But we must carefully observe, that Josephus has well distinguish'd the Times; he says that Abraham's Conference with the wise Men of Egypt was after the Restoration of Sara, and when he was contented in his Mind, as well on account of the Favours, which Pharaoh heap'd upon him, as because he was satisfy'd that his Wife had brought back her Honour untouched.

[E] And how many Books. There is a Book of the Creation, which was for a long time ascrib'd to him (32). It is mention'd in the Talmud (33): The Rabbins Chanina and Hoschaia, were accustom'd to read it on the Eve of the Sabbath. The Author of a Book, entituled Cosiri, says, that this Work of Abraham is very profound, and stands in need of a long Interpretation; that it teaches the Unity of God; that, in one light, it seems to contradict itself, but, in another, that it is very consistent. All the Jews do not attribute this Book to this great Patriarch. Some of them declare loudly, that it is a spurious Work, and condemn the boldness of the Rabin Abi-

(10) They found this Circumstance upon Gen. xi. 28.

(11) The Jews, in Lyræus, and Tostatus, in Sallian's Citation, Ann. Tom. 1. p. 402.

(12) Hieron. Hebr. in Gen. c.

(13) Epiph. Hebr. B. 1. p. 8.

(14) It is the proper Name of a Town, and signifies likewise, Fire. In Eldas B. 2. c. 9. the Latin Version says, Qui elegit cum de igne Chaldeorum.

(15) Gen. xi. 7.

(16) Paulus Burgensis, in his Add. to the Postil. of Lyræus upon Genesis.

(17) Ibid. See his Mor. Nevochim, Pars 3. c. 29.

(18) See Onkelos, the Chaldee Paraphrase, and Fagius, who translates it.

(19) Gen. xli. 5.

(21) Tell. in Pererius upon Gen. xi.

(22) This is built upon the Testimony of Josephus, and the Book of Judith, ch. v. St Austin affirms it in his de Civit. Dei. Lib. 16. c. 13.

(23) See St Austin, Ibid.

(24) See Heidegger's Hist. Patriarch. Tom. 2. p. 38.

(25) Antiq. B. 1. c. 7.

(26) Ibid. c. 8.

(27) Alex. Polyhist. cited by Eusebius. Præp. Ev. c. 17, 18.

(28) Nic. Damasc. in Joseph. Antiq. B. 1. c. 7. Justin says the same, B. 36. c. 2.

(29) Artap. in Eusebius. Præp. Ev. B. 9. c. 18.

(30) Joseph. Antiq. B. 1. c. 8.

(31) See Sallian, Tom. 1. p. 44.

(32) See Remiz A. of the Antiq. AKIBA.

(33) See St. Heidegger's Hist. Patriarch. Tom. 2. p. 143.

(c) J. Hottinger's Oriental Hist. B. 1. c. 6.

vilege of having been born circumcis'd (c), and to have had the same Soul with Adam (f). They believe that this Soul belong'd afterward to David, and that it will be That of the Messiah, as Bartoloci remarks in his Rabbinical Dictionary. The Mabometans likewise have related several idle Stories concerning this Patriarch, as may be seen in Al-Koran, and in one of their principal Authors, named Keffeus. They make him take a Journey to Mecca, and pretend, that he began there to build a Temple [F]. See the Bibliothèque Orientale of Mr d'Herbelot, from page the 12th to the 16th; we meet with many curious Particulars there. If we had the Book, which Hecataeus compos'd, about Abraham (g), we should perhaps see many things, which at present have never been heard of. The Christians resolv'd not to be the only Persons, who have invented no idle Stories concerning Abraham; they have made him plant Trees of a singular Virtue [G].

(g) Joseph. Antiq. B. 1. c. 7.

I shall here mention a few more of the Dreams of the Rabins. They say, that the Egyptian Bondage was a Punishment for some Faults which Abraham had committed; for he had constrained the Disciples of Wisdom to take up Arms, and had suffer'd Persons instructed in the Law of God to relapse into Idolatry. Thus they understand those Words of the Scripture, where it is said, He arm'd his trained servants, which were ere born in his house, three hundred and eighteen (b); and that he restor'd the Persons (i), which the King of Sodom demanded back (k). Father Bartoloci makes a great Bustle about this matter, but does not confute it well [H]. They say likewise, first, that the fight of a precious Stone, which hung about Abraham's Neck, cur'd all Diseases; and that God hung this Stone in the Sun, after the Death of Abraham (l): secondly, That this Patriarch taught his Children Magic, whom he had by his Concubines (m).

(b) Gen. xiv. 24.

(i) Ibid. 21.

(b) Bartol. Bibl. Raban. Tom. 3. p. 529.

(i) Ibid. p. 502.

(m) Ibid. p. 594. Tom. 3. p. 703.

(34) Abr. Zachut. in the Book Ju. chafin. p. 52. in Heidegg. ibid.

(3) Preface of Zohar. Mantuan. in Heidegg. ib.

(36) Epiph. Hærel. p. 256.

(37) Origen. Homil. 35. upon Lu. c. 11. in Heidegg.

(30) Kircherus's Traktat de Biblioth. p. 14. Paris Edit.

(40) It should be four.

(41) Spizel. Specim. Biblioth.

(42) Pocock's Notes upon the Specim. Arab. Hist. p. 115.

ba, whom they look upon to be the real Author of the piece (34). "Quis dedit Potestatem Aquibæ scribendi librum Jézira, nomine Abrahami Patris nostri (35)? — Who gave Aquiba the Liberty of writing the Book Jézira, under the Name of our Father Abraham?" The Supplement to Moreri has a very curious Article upon this Subject, taken from the Critical History of Father Simon. Consult it, at Page 48, and 536, of the Rotterdam Edition. In the first Ages of Christianity, the Heretics, the Setbians, vented an Apocalypse of Abraham, as St Epiphanius remarks (36). Origen has quoted a pretended Work of this Patriarch, in which a good and a bad Angel are introduc'd disputing concerning his Salvation, or Damnation (37). The Library of the Monastery of St Croix, upon Mount Amara in Ethiopia, contains, they say (39), the Books, which were compos'd by Abraham, in the Valley of Mamre, where he taught Pythagorism to those, by whose help he had defeated the foe (40) Kings, who had taken Lot his Nephew. The Work of the Creation was printed at Paris, in the Year 1552, translated into Latin by Poffel, with Notes. Rittangel, a converted Jew, and Professor at Konigsburg, gave a Latin Translation of it, with Notes, in 1642 (41).

[F] That he began there to build a Temple.] They contend, that Adam, being driven from Paradise, begg'd of the good God, to permit him to build a House on the Plan of that which he had seen in Heaven; a House, I say, which might be a Place for him to direct his Prayers to, and about which he might march in Devotion. Upon which God let fall a Tent, resembling the House, which Adam had seen. Adam apply'd this Tent to the Uses he desir'd. After his Death, Setb built a House of Stone and Mud, upon this Model; the Deluge destroy'd it; but Abraham and Ismael rebuilt it, by the Order of God. Others successively repair'd it, in proportion as it fell to decay; and, at length, Hejazus, in the Year of the Hegira, 74, put it into the Condition it is now in; and it is the Oratory of the Temple of Mecca (42). See the Remark [I] of the Article AGAR.

[G] Of a singular Virtue.] Gresler testifies, that he read in a Greek Manuscript, in the Library of Augsbourg, that Abraham planted a Cyprus, a Pine, and a Cedar; which united themselves into one Tree, each, nevertheless, retaining it's proper Root and Branches: That this Tree was cut down, when they were preparing Materials for Solomon's Temple; but that they could not possibly fit it to any Part: That Solomon, seeing this, resolved to make a Bench of it: that a Sybil, being brought thither, would not sit upon it; and prophcy'd that the Redeemer of Mankind should die triumphantly on this Wood: That Solomon encompass'd it with thirty Crosses of Silver; and that it continued in this Situation 'till the Death of Jesus Christ (43). This puts me in mind of the Oak of Mamre, under which Abraham is said sometimes to have cooled himself. This Oak, they tell you, was standing in the Reign of Constantinus (45). "Drys, i. e. Quercus Mambre juxta Hebron, in qua, usque ad ætatem infantie, meæ & Constantii regis imperium, terebrynthus monstrabat peretvus, & annos magnitudine indicans, sub qua habitavit Abraham. Miro autem cultu ab Ethnicis habita est, & velut quodam insigni nomine consecrata (46). — The Oak of Mamre, near Hebron, where not many Years ago, when I was a Child, and in the Reign of Constantius, was stem'd a Turpentine-Tree very old, and declaring it's Age by it's Bulk; under which Abraham dwelt. The Heathens bore a surprising Veneration for it, and distinguish it by some honourable Appellation." And some have carried the Matter so far, as to say, that it has been seen within these three hundred Years. We must not they say, distinguish it from that Reed of Setb, which the Traveller Mandeville (a rare Evidence I saw near the Town of Hebron (47)).

[H] But does not confute it well.] He pretends that these Words of the King of Sodom, Give me the Persons, and take the Goods to thyself (48), signify in the literal and true Sense, Suffer those, whom you have instructed in your Belief, to return to the Worship of Idols; but that Abraham protested before the People, that he would not do it. The Author quotes the 22d, and 23d Verses of the 14th Chapter of Genesis; and then he accuses the Talmudists of Impudence and Blaphemy, in saying that the Patriarch agreed to the Request of the King of Sodom. He had reason to condemn them for supposing, that this Prince demanded back Persons converted to the true Religion; for he did not require the Domestics of the Patriarch, but only those Subjects, whom the four Kings had taken in the Pillage of Sodom (49). But Father Bartoloci is greatly mistaken in supposing that Abraham did not restore them. What he quotes from Scripture is manifestly against him.

(f) The name of the Soul of the Jews, which was the same as Adam's.

(b) Bartol. Bibl. Raban. Tom. 3. p. 529.

(i) Ibid. p. 502.

(m) Ibid. p. 594. Tom. 3. p. 703.

(43) Cædric of the Crs. B. 1.

(45) Ibid. B. 17. c. 7. in Bonifacio's Hist. Ludic. p. 285. He had better have cited St Jerom, as I have done.

(46) Hieron. in Locis Hebr. Litt. D. See Remark [G], of the Article BARCHUS-CHEBAS.

(47) See Bonifacio's Hist. Ludic. p. 289. His Book was printed at Venice, by Balconius, in 1652, in 4to. and reprinted at Brussels, for John Mummartius, in 1656. in 4to.

(48) Gen. xiv. 21.

(49) It is said at the 16th Verse, that Abraham brought back Lot his Brother, and likewise his Wife, and the People.

ABRAM (NICHOLAS), a Lorrain Jesuit, born in the Diocese of Toul, in the Year 1589, enter'd into the Society in 1606; and profess'd the fourth Vow in 1623. He was a polite Scholar; and appear'd to his Superiors so good a Divine, that he was rais'd to the Professorship of Divinity, in the University of Pont-a-Mousson. He exercised this Employ seventeen Years; and died the seventh of September 1655. He taught the Belles Lettres, before he enter'd upon the Study Study of Divinity (a). He publish'd several Books [A]. It is something strange, that, being an Author of Distinction, he should be so little known in foreign Countries [B].

(a) Taken from Nathan. Sorel's Bibl. Script. Societ. Jesu. p. 622a

[A] He published several Books.] Notes on the Paraphrase of the Gospel of St John, compos'd in Greek Verse by Nonnus: A Commentary on some of Cicero's Orations: A Commentary on Virgil: A Collection of Theological Tracts, entitled, Pharus veteris Testamenti, five sacrarum questionum, Libri XV. Maxims of a Christian Life; and a Hebrew Grammar in Latin Verse. He translated into French, from the Italian of Bartoli, The Life of Vincent Caraffa, The Man of Letters, and The Contented Poverty (1). His Commentary on Cicero is a Work of great Labour; his Analysis of Logic is good and exact; the Notes are filled with much Learning; but as he has scattered with great Profusion the Fruits of his Lucubrations, he has fallen into a Prolixity, which is tiresome to the least lazy. This Commentary comprehends only the last Volume of Orations, as far as the second Philippic inclusively; and yet it is in two Volumes in Folio. They were printed at Paris in 1631. The Commentary on Virgil is much shorter; which makes it more useful for Schools. We find, at the end of his Pharus Veteris Testamenti, a long Treatise of Truth and Falshood (2); in which he does not give into the Maxims of the rigid Casuists.

Mr De la Monnoie has informed me, First, That this Jesuit has supplied, in seventy one Greek Verses, after his manner, the History of the Adulteress, which was wanting to the eighth Chapter of Nonnus's Paraphrase (3): Secondly, That Reinsius speaks of this Nicolas Abram, in the 155th Page of his Letters to Hoffman and Rupert. I have consulted that Place, and I find there this Elogium: "Si me cum tot rationibus audire hic noles, vel hujus (Nic Abram) auctoritati cede. Est enim sane quam doctissimus, & maxime idoneus explicando Tullio.—If you will not listen to these many Reasons of mine, at least submit to the Authority of this Author (N. Abram). For he is indeed a very learned one, and the best qualified to explain Tully."

ABSTEMIUS (LAURENCE) born at Macerata, in the Territory of Ancona, applied himself to the Study of the Belles Lettres, and made a considerable Progress therein. He taught them at Urbino, and was Librarian there to the Duke of Guido Ubalde (a); to whom he dedicated a little Book, in which he explain'd some difficult Passages of Antient Authors (b). It was in the Pontificat of Alexander VI. that he publish'd this Work; and another entitled Hecatomythium, dedicated to Octavianus Ubaladini, Count of Mercatelli. The reason of this Title was, that the Work was a Collection of an hundred Fables. In the Sequel to it he doubled the Number. They have been frequently printed [A] with those of the Antient Fabulists, Ejop, Phaedrus, Gubrius, Avienus, &c. which Nevelet has collected in a body with Notes. Abstemius did not always confine himself to an Imitation of those Antient Originals; he mixes sometimes among his Fables some Droll Tale, and does not always spare the Clergy [B]. We meet with his Conjectures on some Passages of the Antients in the first Volume of Gruterus's Critical Thesaurus; we meet with them, I say, under the Title of Various Annotations. They are but few in Number, and fill but 15 Pages. There is a Preface of his at the beginning of Aurelius Victor, in 1505 (c). I know not whether he surviv'd this Edition long. He is one of those, whom Laurentius Valla has censur'd.

Take notice of the Remarks communicated to me [C] since the first Edition.

[A] They have been frequently printed.] Gesner takes notice of the Edition of Strasbourg in 1522. That, which Nevelet made use of, is more modern by eighty eight Years. The Notes, which he has added to it, are but few: and certainly it is not for their sake, that the Impression has been so often repeated. He wrote none upon Abstemius's Fables; as they wanted none.

[B] And does not always spare the Clergy.] The following is a Proof of it. The 104th Fable is this: A certain Priest was intrusted by his Bishop with the Care of a Convent, where there were five Nuns, by each of which he had a Boy at the Year's end. The Bishop, hearing this News, was in a great Passion, sent for the Priest, chid him severely, and called him Traytor, and a sacrilegious Wretch, for daring to defile the Temple of the Holy Ghost. My Lord, says he, you intrusted me with five Talents; and lo, I have gained five others. The Bishop was so well

Add to this Testimony that of another learned Person of the same Country. "Ad intelligendas, atque ad usum transferendas, Orationes Ciceronis sufficit Commentarius Jo. Thomæ Freigii, nisi quis addere malit prolixos Commentarios Nic. Abrami Jesuitæ, multâ rerum varietate intrudidos (4). — The Commentary of Jo. Thomas Freigius is sufficient for the understanding and applying of Cicero's Orations, unless any one chuses to add the long Commentaries of Nic. Abraham the Jesuit, which are fraught with a great Variety of Matter."

[B] So little known in foreign Countries.] His Notes upon the Paraphrase of Nonnus were printed at Paris, for Stephen Cramoisi, in 1622; and it does not appear, that Heinsius had any Knowledge of them, when, in 1627. he published the same Paraphrase with a large Commentary. It is that, which he calls Aristarchus facer. Neither had Mr Cave heard of this Jesuit's Notes, since he takes no Notice of them in that Passage, wherein he reckons up the several Editions of Nonnus (5). Aubert le Mire and Father Oudin are as silent concerning them: the one, in his Auxilium de Scriptoribus Ecclesiasticis, printed in 1639; the other, in his Supplementum de Script. Ecclef. printed in 1686. The Manner, in which Mr Simon often quotes this Work of Father Abram (6), shewed that he esteem'd it, and that it is a Book, which does not deserve to be unknown. But there is something still more remarkable. Martin Schoockius, whose principal Employ was an immense and prodigious Reading, declared in his old Age, that he had never before heard of such an Author, as Nic. Abram. "Hanc si tuitus fuisset nescio quis Nic. Abramus (jam primitus cum nosse incipio) prolixo examine haud opus fuisset (7). — Had one Nic. Abram (this is the first time I ever heard of him) seen this, it would not have stood in need of a long Discussion."

(4) J. And. Boetius, de Prædientia & Eloquentia comparanda, p. 400.

(5) Hist. Liter. p. 290... London Edit. in 1688, in Folio.

(6) Hist. Crit. of the Commentary on the New Testament, ch. 23.

(7) Sch. de Fænoterunciariorio, p. 107a printed in 1668.

(a) See Græter's Thes. Crit. Tom. 1. p. 878.

(b) Censuræ Nonnullis locis obscuris. See the Epistle dedicatory of his Hecatomythium.

(c) Epist. Bibl. Gesneri.

(1) Fabula indicat, peccata, cum ratione nequeant, urbane diluenda. Abstem. Fab. CIV.

(2) See the Quæstion (b) of this Article.

[C] The Remarks communicated to me.] "The Conjectures of Abstemius, inserted in the first Volume of the Thes. Crit. of Gruter, are only an Extract of a Work, entitled Obscurorum locorum (2), dedicated to the Duke of Urbino. Gruter, who has given us this Extract, has placed at the beginning a little marginal Note, in which he says, that Laurentius Valla had critic'd upon Abstemius.

"Abstemius. I doubt much of the Truth of this; there not occurring any Footsteps of this pretended Criticism in the Works of Laurentius Valla, whom besides Abstemius has greatly praised in the Preface to his second Hecatomymbium, and with whom he could not have much Contention, as "he surviv'd him at least forty eight Years. He is the first, I believe, who wrote the Fable of the Multiply'd Talents. Le Bandel, Verville, and others, have related it after him." This is taken from a Letter sent me by Mr De la Monnoie.

ABUCARAS (THEODORE) was a Prelate [A] very zealous for Orthodoxy, which he shew'd in more than forty Dissertations which he wrote, either against the Jews or the Mabometans, or the Hereticks, or in general on Religious Subjects. Genebrard translated into Latin, and publish'd, fifteen of these Dissertations. Gretser, adding these to the rest [B] which Father Turrien, or himself, had translated, publish'd an Edition, which seem'd complete (a). But he forgot something; for Mr Arnold printed at Paris, in 1685, a Treatise by Abucaras, which had never yet appeared from the Press. He found it in the Oxford Library. He did not accompany it with Notes, not daring to meddle with the grand Mysteries, which the Author examines in that Treatise (b): viz. the Incarnation, and the Hypostatical Union. It is uncertain when Abucaras liv'd. The Jesuit Turrien believes he was the Disciple of Johannes Damascenus. This places him in the VIIIth Century. Gretser places him a little earlier [C], not distinguishing him from that Abucaras, who was so far engaged in the Troubles of the Church of Constantinople, in the Time of the Patriarch Ignatius and of Photius. This Abucaras followed the Party of Photius, and undertook to go upon an Embassy for him, with Zachary, Bishop of Chalcedon, to the Court of the Emperor Lewis II. His Business was to present to this Prince the Book, which Photius had composed against Pope Nicolas, and to exhort him to shake off the Pope's Yoke. But he had scarce began his Journey, when Basilus the Macedonian, who had usurp'd the Empire, after having murder'd the Emperor Michel, recalled him, and commanded him to stir no farther in the Affair. Two Years after (c) he appeared before the Council of Constantinople, and humbly begg'd Pardon for having been in the Interests of Photius, and protested that he was drawn in to espouse them by Violence and Artifice. He gained his Ends: the Patriarch reconciled him to the Church, and gave him a Place in the Assembly (d). Mr Arnold was acquainted with a learned Man in England, who believed that Abucaras liv'd in the VIIth Century (e). The Works of this Author were inserted in the Supplement to the Paris Edition of the Collection of the Fathers, in 1624.

(a) It is in Greek and Latin, and printed at Ingolstadt, in 1606, in 4to.

(b) Arnold's Preface.

(c) Ibid.

(d) Nicet. Paphlag. in the Life of Ignatius, in Cave's Hist. Liter. p. 557.

(e) In 869.

[A] A Prelate.] Some stile him Archbishop of Caria (1), others Episcopum Carie, Καπὼν Ἐπίσκοπος, Bishop of Caria (2). Mr Arnold thinks, that Abucaras was Bishop of Charron in Mesopotamia: this was likewise the Opinion of Jofas Simler (3). Photius had design'd him for the Bishoprick of Laodicea, as Mr Cave observes.

[B] Gretser, adding these to the rest.] The Journal des Savans gives us a wrong Notion of this Jesuit's Edition. Genebrard (say they) has translated and published fifteen Dissertations of this Author, and Gretser had added them to his Collection of the Works of Anastafius the Sinaite, in two Manuscripts in the Bavarian Library. Had they understood the Latin of Mr Arnold, they would not have been guilty of this Mistake. "Theodori Abucaræ Dissertationes quindecim jam diu Latine vertit & edidit Genebrardus, deinde Theodorum Anastasio Sinaitz ob argumenti similitudinem conjunxit Jacobus Gretserus, deditque ex duobus codicibus Manuscriptis Ducis Bavarie Maximiliani. — Genebrard had, some time before, translated into Latin, and published fifteen Dissertations of Theodorus Abucaras; afterward Jacob Gretser joined Theodorus with Anastafius the Sinaite, on account of the Resemblance between their Subjects, and published them from two Manuscripts of Maximilian Duke of Bavaria (5)." There are three Particulars in this Passage: First, That Gretser publish'd the Works of Abucaras, after the Publication of fifteen of the Pieces by Genebrard: Second, That Gretser published them from two Manuscripts of the Duke of Bavaria: Third, That he joined them with Anastafius the Sinaite. There is nothing of all this in the Journal de Savans. We are not there told, that Gretser published more Pieces than Genebrard, nor that the Bavarian Manuscripts were affixing to the Editions of Abucaras: it only says, that they were of use to the Edition of Anastafius, of which Mr Arnold made no mention. Farther, we must not imagine, that all the Works of Anastafius the Sinaite were published with Theodore Abucaras: there is only the Treatise, entitled Omnes, The Guide, added to the Works of Abucaras, in Gretser's Edition.

[C] Gretser places him a little earlier.] In reading Mr Arnold's Preface, one is almost convinc'd, that this Jesuit did not dare to advance any thing concerning the Age of Abucaras. "Gretserus vero, quis fuit erit Abucaras, quo sæculo floruit, ab Antonio Velfero, S. S. Theol. D. Ecclesiæ Frisingensis Canonico, Præposito Spaltenfi, cujus honori librum suum dedicavit, discere volebat (6). — But Gretser desired to be inform'd, who Abucaras was, and when he flourish'd, from Antony Velferus, Doctor of Divinity, Canon of the Church of Frisingen, and Prouost of Spalta, to whose Honour he dedicates his Book." Mr Arnold, by saying nothing more of Gretser, plainly insinuates, that we need look no further in the Preface of this Jesuit. But we find it otherwise: namely, that Abucaras, whom he mentions in the Life of St Ignatius, Patriarch of Constantinople, is the same who compos'd the Dissertations.

(6) Arnold's Preface.

ABUDHAHER. It is the Name of the Chief of the Karmatians [A], under whose Conduct they profaned and laid waste Mecca, in the Year of the Hegira

[A] The Karmatians.] It is the Name of a Sect, which rose in Arabia, about the Year of the Hegira 278 (1). The first Head of this Sect was a Blasphemer, and an Impostor; who, drawing to his Party those among the Inhabitants of the Fields and Deserts, who had least Religion, gain'd an absolute command over them.

We meet with several Etymologies of the Name Karmatians, in Pocock (2). The Sect was but small at first; but it made an incredible Progress. They possess'd themselves of the greatest Part of the Provinces of Eraki, and Hejazi; and spread themselves over Syria, and as far as the Gates of Grand Cairo (3).

(1) According to us, the Year 894.

(2) Pocock's Notes on Specim. Hist. Arab. p. 371. This Specimen was printed at Oxford in 1650.
(3) Ibid.

Hegira [B] 317. They robb'd the Pilgrims, and murder'd 1700 of them, within the very Walls of the Caaba (a) whilst these poor superstitious Wretches were marching round this sacred Oratory, as their Form of Prayer directed them. The Karmatians were not satisfy'd with this Slaughter; they carry'd away out of the Temple a piece of black Marble, which was had in Veneration there, as a Present from Heaven (b); they pull'd down the Gate of the Temple, and fill'd the Pits Zamzam, one of the most sacred parts of the Place, with the dead Bodies. To encrease the Calamity, Abudhaber affronted the Mabometan Religion many ways; he led his Horse to the Entrance of the Caaba, that he might lay his Dung there; and he told the Mabometans, they were Fools to call that Building by the Name of God's House; for, added he, if God had any regard to this Temple, he would have immediately crush'd me with a Thunder-bolt for profaning his House in so outrageous a manner [C]. The Veneration of the Mabometans for this Temple was not lessen'd upon that Account: they continu'd to go in Pilgrimage thither every Year. When the Karmatians were inform'd of this, they determin'd to send back the black Marble, which they had kept twenty-two Years. Some time after they rallied the Folly of their Devotions: This People, said they, believe they are in possession of the black Marble: but we sent them another in it's room: the Object therefore of their Veneration is a false and supposititious Being. They had a more important Design [D] in these Words, than the bare Pleasure of an Insult. They receiv'd for answer, that they need only be witness of the Proof, and that, if the Stone swam upon Water, they might be convinc'd it was genuine. Accordingly it did float in the presence of the Karmatians; and by this means all those Doubts and Scruples, which the jesting of these prophane Wretches might raise, were remov'd (e). This is a little Specimen of the Legends of the Eastern People. You will meet with many curious Particulars relating to Abudhaber, and the Karmatians, in the Oriental Dictionary of Mr d'Herbelot (d). He calls them Carmatians, and he writes the Name of their Chief Abu-Taber.

(a) The Name of a Part of the Temple design'd for Adoration and Prayer.

(b) See the Remark [K] of the Article AGAR.

(c) Pocock's Notes upon Spec. Hist. Arab. p. 118, 119. from Abulfeda, and Ebn Yusef.

(d) In the Article C. A. R. M. A. T. H. p. 256, &c.

[B] The Year of the Hegira, 317. Abulfeda, and Abmed Ebn Yusef, point out this Year; and say, that the Stone was not recover'd, till 339: But Saffoddin shortens the Time: he places this carrying away of the Stone in the Year 319, and the Relitition of it, in 335 (4).

[C] In so outrageous a Manner. Abmed Ebn Yusef says, that the Mabometan Religion never suffered a Calamity comparable to that (5).

[D] A more important Design. They were in Hopes of inviting the Caravans of Pilgrims to them; imagining, that these good People would go where the Stone was kept. This is the Reason, why they would not accept of a Ransom for it: they were deaf to Prayers and Promises. But, finding that Mecca was as much frequented as ever, and that no one came to pay their Devotions to the Stone, which they preserv'd, they return'd it. This they did, with a Reserve of some Right in it to themselves; for, when they gave it out that they had return'd only a counterfeit Stone, they intended without doubt to raise Scruples in Mens Minds, and to share the Pilgrimages, at least, sooner or later. The People of Mecca foresaw the Consequence; and thought proper to give it out, that the Stone had been put to the Proof, and it's Genuineness confirm'd.

(4) Pocock's Notes upon Specim. Hist. Arab. p. 139.

(5) Ibid.

ABULFEDA, (ISMAEL) Prince of Hamab, a City of Syria, succeeded his Brother, in the Year of the Hegira, 743 [A], which answers to the Year of Christ 1342, and died three Years after, at about the Age of 72 Years (a). He was a Lover of Study, and particularly that of Geography, as may be gather'd from a Work entitled, Chorasmie & Mawaralnabre, hoc est, Regionum extra fluvium Oxum descriptio, ex tabulis Abulfede Ismaëlis, Principis Hamab; i. e. A Description of Chorasmia, and Mawaralnahre, or the Regions beyond the River Oxus, from the Tables of Abulfeda Ismaël, Prince of Hamah (b). It was printed at London in 1650. The Author quotes a great many Arabian Writers. It was compos'd long before he ascend'd the Throne; for it is remark'd at the end of the Book, that it was finish'd in the Year of the Hegira 721, which is the 1321 of Christ. We are oblig'd to the learned John Gravius for the London Edition. He added to the Original, which is in Arabic, a Latin Translation, and a Preface, in which he informs us, that he consult'd five different Manuscripts;

(a) Pocock in his Notes on Specim. Hist. Arab. p. 363. says that he was born in the Year of the Hegira 672.

(b) The Arabic Title signifies Canon, or rather Rectificatio Terrarum, according to Gravius. For Arabic reason König was not in the wrong to say that Abulfeda wrote a Geographical Work entitled Directorium Regionum.

[A] The Year of the Hegira 743. This we are assured of from the Arabian Author of a Book entitled Al Sacerdan (1). Therefore the Jesuit Blancanus was mistaken, when he places Abulfeda in the IVth Century of Christianity (2). This Error ought to have kept him from another Mistake, in giving this Geographer the Title of Prince of Syria, Affria, and Perfia. A little Attention might have shewn him, that an Arabian Author and a Mabometan could not be King of Perfia 400 Years after Christ. Vossius, having related the Opinion of Blancanus, is content to say, that Abulfeda was not so antient by a great deal: but, for the rest, he allows him the Style and Title of Prince of Syria, Affria, and Perfia (3). He comes pretty near the Truth, as to his Chronology: when he says that it is three hundred Years since Abulfeda flourish'd (4). Instead of this, Mr Moreri charges him with believing, as Blancanus did, that this Prince of Syria liv'd in the IIIrd or IVth Century: But it is certain, adds Mr Moreri, that he lived much later; perhaps in the VIIIth or IXth, or even in the Year

1200. He might have omitted the Word perhaps; he might have asserted, that he liv'd in the XIVth Century; since his Work was finish'd in the 721st Year of the Hegira, as is declared at the end of it. There is a false Print in the Dutch Edition of Moreri in this Place. They make J. Gravius say, that our Abulfeda lived in the beginning of the XIIIth Century; and yet he has placed the Death of this Prince in 1345. What I am most concerned at is, that the learned E. Pocock asserts, that Abulfeda took possession of the Government of the Province of Hamab, in the 710th Year of the Hegira (5). This cannot be reconcil'd with what J. Gravius has asserted. It is more reasonable to depend upon this latter, than the other, because Abulfeda is Gravius's principal Subject; whereas Pocock speaks of him only by way of a short Digression. But is it not very hard, that we cannot depend upon Men of such great Abilities in the Eastern Learning, as Pocock; and that at the same time that they publish any thing, one of their Colleagues shall shew the Fallacious of it?

(1) Gravius's Preface.

(2) He calls him Abulfeda in his Chronol. Mathem.

(3) Vossius de Mathem. Discipl. p. 250.

(4) He calls him Abulfeda, and Abulfedzes. See the Epitome. Bibl. Gell.

(5) Pocock's Notes on the Specim. Hist. Arab.

(c) It follows from hence, that Fabricius, in his Specimen-Ling. Arab. p. 99, was wrong in saying, in Konig, that Schickard had transferred into Latin a Work of Abulfeda. Spizelius in his Specim. Bibl. cites the same Fabricius, as saying, that Schickard had transferred all this Work.

manuscripts; the first is Erpenius's Transcript from the Copy in the Palatine Library; the second is the same Copy, which is now in the Vatican; two others belong'd to Pocock; the fifth was bought at Constantinople. We learn farther in this Preface, that Ramusius is the first, who commended this Work of Abulfeda, and pointed out the Use of it; that afterward Casaldus made use of it to correct the Longitudes and Latitudes of several Places; that Ortelius often mentions it in his Theſaurus Geographicus, not as having seen it, but upon the Authority of Casaldus; that Erpenius, out of concern that no one had given it to the World, resolv'd to publish it, and would have done it, if Death had not taken him off in the middle of his Design; that Schickard was the first, who borrow'd from it several Remarks of profound Learning, and 'till then unknown, which he insert'd in his Tarich Persicum: but as the Copy belonging to the Imperial Library, which was lent him by Tengnagelius, was not legible in several Places, he left the greatest part of the Pains and the Honour to John Grævius (c). It is surprizing, that Mr Moreri could heap together so many Mistakes in one Article [B], as he has done in this of Abulfeda. Spizelius did not know in 1668; nor Konig in 1678, that Abulfeda had been in England (d).

(d) Spizel. Specim. Bibl. Univ.

[B] Mr Moreri could heap together so many Mistakes in one Article.] We have already seen some of them. The rest are as follows. First, When he says, that some are of Opinion, that Abulfeda was of Nubia, he manifestly confounds him with the Author of the Geographia Nubiensis, of whom we shall treat in his proper Place. At least, he betrays his Ignorance that these two Authors ought to be distinguished; for, had he known it, he would not have related this Opinion, and let it pass uncensured. Secondly, He confirms this first Observation, by adding that Abulfeda dispos'd his Geography into Climates. This agrees better with the Author of Geographia Nubiensis than with Abulfeda. This latter has given us only a Description of some Parts of Asia, situated beyond the Oxus, which he places under the 25th and 26th Climates. The Nubian Geography is dispos'd in a very different Manner. It makes but seven Climates, and adheres to this Division of the Antients; referring all the Description it gives of the known World to That. Let me observe by the way, that Abulfeda fixes his first Climate in Arabia, and not, as the Nubian Geography does, on the most western Coast of the Atlantic Ocean; and that his first Meridian passes thro' Cape St Vincent. Thirdly; We have seen, says Mr Moreri, at present, but the first Climates of Abulfeda; we are put in Hopes of the remaining ones this Year: This is a downright Falshood: what is published of Abulfeda relates not to the first Climates, but to the 25th and 26th. Fourthly; An Author should not make use of so indeterminate a Phrase as This Year; for his Reader, at the end of ten Years, will not know what Year he means; he must have recourse to the Date of the first Impression: this is to be met with but in few Books: and, where it is to be found, it is not always a good Guide, since there often pass many Years between the Composition and the Publication of a Book. This is an Instance of the Difficulty, into which a Reader is led by the Expression this Year. Where is the Person, who, in reading Moreri, can guess in what Year the other Climates of Abulfeda were promised? It is a very long Year; it has reigned to the sixth Edition inclusively. Fifthly, William Postel was the first who brought this Work into Europe, of which he published an Abridgment in Latin. Here are two new Errors of Moreri. Simler is the only Author he quotes, who has any Relation to this. But all that Simler says, is, that Postel, having brought this Work from the East, left an Abridgment of it, which he had translated at Venice, with Ramusius (6), who had a Design of publishing the second Tome of his New World. There is a great deal of Difference between bringing a Book from the East, and being the first who brought it from thence; between publishing a Book, and leaving the Manuscript for another's Use. It is certain, that Ramusius did not publish what Postel left with him; and if it be true, that Abulfeda, which was in Arabie in the Palatine Library, as Moreri observes, had been brought into Europe by Postel, and that this was the first Copy we had in the West, this does not acquit Mr Moreri of ascribing more to Authors than they really say; and we have reason to complain of such Falsifications. They deserve to be particularly censured.

(6) Simler calls him Rhamnusius by mistake; and Spizelius the same.

ABULPHARAGE (GRZOOBY) the Son of a Physician named Aaron, was himself likewise a Physician, and acquired a great Reputation in this Art; inasmuch that they came to consult him from the most distant Countries. He was of Malatia [A], near the Euphrates, and would at this time have been but little known, had he confin'd himself to the Knowledge of Medicine: but he understood History; and there is a Work of this kind, after his manner, still extant, which does honour to his Memory. Not that our Age judges so favourably of it, as the Eastern People do. They are extravagant in their Commendations, either because they have but few truly learned Men among them, or because it is to their Taste. However that be, there are an hundred Historians in the West, whose Compositions are not inferior to those of Abulpharage, whom no one has yet thought fit to dignify with such Titles, as are given him [B]. He liv'd at the end of the XIIIth Century, and profess'd Christianity

[A] He was of Malatia.] I have in vain looked for this Town in Pocock's Prefaces, in Ortelius's Theſaurus, and Mr Bouquet's Geography. But Chance has been more favourable to me than Enquiry; for in turning over, with other Views, that which is called the Nubian Geography, I found, that Malatia is a fortified Town, fifty one Miles from Samosata, towards the Sources of Euphrates (1).

(1) Geogr. Nub. Clim. 4. p. 5, & 297.

Mr Bouquet has informed me, that he mentions this Town under the Word Mellon and Mellene. It is true: he places it in lesser Armenia, upon the Euphrates, and says, it is called at present Malatinah.

[B] Such Titles, as are given to him.] Pocock met with this Passage at the beginning of a Copy of Abulpharage, wrote in the gooth Year of the Higira:

"Dixit Dominus noster, Pater Sanctus, eximius, doctrina & eruditione insignis, doctorum Rex, excellentium excellentissimus, temporum suorum exemplar, sæculi Phoenix, sapientium Gloria, Doctor divina ope fultus, Mar. Gregorius Abulpharai, filius excellenter sapientis Aaronis, Medici Malatensis. — These are the Words of Mar. Gregory Abulpharai, (Son of the excellently-wisè Aaron, Physician of Malatia) our Lord, and Holy Father, most excellent of the Excellent, famous for Learning and Knowledge, King of the Learned, Pattern of his Times, Phoenix of the Age, Glory of the Wise, a Teacher favoured by Heaven." At the end of another Copy he met with the following: "Pater & Dominus noster, Rex doctorum, & corona virtutum Christianity [C]. This did not hinder several Mahometans from studying under him [D]. The current Report of his abjuring his Religion, when he found himself near Death, ought to be rank'd among the numberless Fables of this kind, which are rais'd among all Sects [E]. He has divided the History, which he compos'd in Arabic, into Dynasties. It is an Abridgment of Universal History from the beginning of the World to his own Time. The Division consists of ten Parts. The Subjects of each may be seen in the Supplement to Moreri. Edward Pocock (a) publish'd this Book of Abulpharage, with a Latin Translation, in 1663. He added to it a Supplement, which contains a short Sequel to this History with regard to the Eastern Princes. He had before publish'd, in 1650, a short Extract from the ninth Dynasty of this Author, with many learned Notes. The Title of it is, Specimen Historiæ Arabum, sive Gregorii Abul Farajii, Malatensis, de Origine & Moribus Arabum succincta Narratio: i. e. A Specimen of the Arabic History, or a succinct Relation of the Origin and Manners of the Arabians, by Abulpharage, of Malatia. Abulpharage could not be so exact in the Affairs of the Greeks and Romans, as those of the Saracens and Tartar-Moguls. This latter piece is the best of the Work. It relates, in a very instructive and credible manner, the prodigious Conquests of Zingis-Chan. All that Abraham Zacutus says of them, in his Juchasin, is stoln, together with other Matters, from the History of Abulpharage. We cannot guess why Abraham Ecchellenensis (b) gives our Author the Name of Gregorius Bar Hebraeus Syrus (c) [F].

(a) Regius Professor of Hebrew at Oxford, and Arabic Lecturer.

(b) Prof. Biblicus. Polygraphus, Paris.

(c) Pocock's Preface.

"rorum virtute præstantiam, dubiorum in Theologia occultorum." Ἐνδούρειν, Christianorum Princeps primarius, scilicet Jacobiticæ Medulla, Mar. Gregorius, dominus, Pater, unicum avi decus, & sæculi Phoenix. — Our Lord and Father, King of the Learned, and Crown of the Virtuous, Solver of Doubts in Divinity, Chief Head of the Christians, Marrow of the Jacobite Sect, Mar. Gregory, Lord, Father, sole Glory of the Age, and Phoenix of the Times. Add to these what he met with at the beginning of a Syriac Grammar, compos'd by this Author: "Pater noster sanctus, Rex Doctorum, Mar. Gregorius, Doctor Orientis, qui idem est Abul-Pharai, filius Ahronis, Medici Malatimensis, i. e. Malatensis.

[C] Professed Christianity. He was, we see, of the Sect of the Jacobites. This is more probable, according to Pocock, than what a learned Jew has advanced, that Abulpharage was of the Sect of the Melchites. "Cui potius fidem habemus, quam docto cuidam Judæo, qui eum vocat Ebnol Koff, Christianum Malatensem, secta Melchitum (2).

[D] This did not hinder many Mahometans from studying under him.] One of Pocock's Copies contains these Words of a Mahometan: "Author Libri est Abul-Pharai Ebn Hocima, vir multæ lectionis varique Scientiis instructus, & penitus imbutus, præcipue autem medicinæ gloriâ sæculo suo clarus, adeo ut ad eum de plagis Orientalibus frequenter conducerent. Christianus erat, à quo tamen didicerunt multi à Muslemorum eximie doctis. Ferunt ipsum morti propinquum à fide Christiana deservisse. — The Author of the Book is Abul-Pharai Ebn Hocima, a Man of great Reading, and thoroughly vers'd in many Sciences, but particularly famous in his Time for his Skill in Physic; inasmuch that People came in Crowds to him from the Eastern Countries. He was a Christian; and yet many of the learned Muslem were his Disciples. He is reported to have renounced the Christian Faith, when he was near Death." Ebn Chalecan, a famous Author, who wrote the Lives of illustrious Men, was the Writer of these Words, if we may believe the Remark written by another Hand in the same Place of the Copy (3).

[E] Which are raised among all Sects.] We have mentioned the Report concerning the last Hours of Abulpharage. The Mahometans could scarce believe, that so great a Man was inwardly a Christian; they chose rather to think, that he concealed his real Sentiments, 'till the Approach of Death put an end to his Reasons for dissimbling them. This Prejudice universally prevails. Every one imagines, that the Truths of his Religion are so clear, that the Men of Genius of another Party cannot but be convinced of them; and that it is only worldly Motives which prevent their making an open Profession of them. They flatter themselves, that at the fatal Hour, when the eternal Doom affects the Mind most strongly, these Dissimblers will give Truth the Glory, and throw aside the Mask.

Dii longe noctis, quorum jam numina nobis
Mors infans majora facit (4)!

Ye Deities of everlasting Night,
Whose Forms, in Death, rise larger to the Sight!

For, according to Lucretius,

— Veræ voces tum demum pectore ab imo
Ejiciuntur, & eripitur persona manet Res (5).

Truth then breaks forth, extorted by our Fears,
And all the Man, without Disguise, appears.

It is from this wrong Principle so many idle Stories arise, which are inserted in Moreri's Dictionary, relating to Peter du Maslin, Joseph Scaliger, &c. It is likewise the Source of I know not how many Discourses, in which certain Persons are made to say, The Religion I profess is the best for this World, but not in the Article of Death. See the Remark [DD] of the Article MAHOMET.

[F] The Name of Gregorius Bar Hebraeus Syrus.] Upon this Occasion, I shall make this short Remark. Pocock repeats two Passages, in which our Author is named Mar Gregorius; and one, in which he is called Mar Gregorius; he makes no Reflexion upon the first of these Names; he never says, that Abulpharage was called Mar. Upon which I say, the Supplement to Moreri must be mistaken, in saying that the Name of this Author was Mars Gregory. The Word Mar, which is a Title of Honour as Mr in our Language, might be mistaken for the Christian Name Marc. I observe the same Fault in the Perpetuity of the Faith defended (6): the Patriarch of Babylon, who renounced himself to the Church of Rome, under Pope Paul V. is there styl'd Marc Elias; but the Author, cited for it, calls him Mar Elias (7).

(4) Dido in Silius Italic. lib. 8. v. 140.

(5) Lucret. lib. 3. ver. 57.

(6) B. 5. c. 10.

(7) Petrus Strouza, de Chalcedon. Dogm. See Acta Miraculorum Polit. Eccles.

ABUMUSLIMUS (a) General of the Army under the first Caliphs of the Race of Abbasi. The Province of Cborasan surrender'd to Abbasi in the Year of the Hegira 125 (b). He accepted it, and died the same Year. Ibrahim, his Son and Successor, sent Abumuslimus into this Country, at the Age of Nineteen. These tender Years did not hinder him from driving out Nafrus, who govern'd the Province in the Name of Caliph Merwan. After the Death of Ibrahim, which came to pass in the Year of the Hegira 131, Saffabus, his Brother, was raised to the Dignity of Caliph. He left the Government of the Province of Cborasan to Abumuslimus, and made use of him

(a) Mr d'Herbelot, who makes a long Article of him, calls him Abou-Moslem.

(b) It is 742.

(2) Pocock's Pref. to Specim. Hist. Arab.

(3) Pocock's Pref. to Compend. Dymek.

52 ABUMUSLIMUS. ACACIA. ACAMAS.

him to get rid of his Counsellor Abumuslimus, who became suspected by him. He died in the Year 136, and was succeeded by Almanfor, his Brother, who, after he had receiv'd the most important Services from Abumuslimus, treacherously caus'd him to be murthur'd. Abdalla had revolted in Syria: Abumuslimus, being sent against him at the Head of a gallant Army, entirely routed him. Almanfor, more touch'd with the Scandal he pretended Abumuslimus had utter'd against him, than with the Importance of the Victory, sent for him, in order to put him to death. Abumuslimus, justly distrustful him, refus'd to wait upon his Master; but, suffering himself to be deceiv'd by the Caresses made to him, he put himself into the Power of Almanfor, who threw him into the Tigris. This was in the 137th Year of the Hegira, which answers to our 754. It is computed, that Abumuslimus caus'd the death of 600 Persons. He pass'd for one a little vers'd in Magic, and he was of a Sect, from which That of the unfortunate Spinoza was not very different [A]. Erpenius did not understand the Words of Elmacin upon this Subject [B]. What I have here advanc'd (c), and the two Remarks below, are what I will not pretend to warrant. I report them on the Authority of another. Only the Parallel of Spinozisme is my own; and I am not over satisfied, that he who criticizes Erpenius, knows more of the Point in question, than Erpenius himself.

(c) Taken
fr. m. Elma-cin's Hist.
Saracen. B.
2. c. 1, &c.

[A] Spinoza was not very different. The Sect, which Abumuslimus professed, taught a kind of Metempsychosis, but not like that of Pythagoras (1). His did not destroy the Soul; it only sent it from one Body to another; but the other Metempsychosis is thus described by the famous Traveller Peter de la Valle, in the Place, where he mentions certain Mahometan Heretics, who called themselves Ehl Elrub-kik, Men of Truth and Certainty. "They believe (say; be) no other God, but the four Elements — that there is no Rational Soul, nor another Life after this; but that every Man is but a Mixture of the four Elements, of which he is compos'd during his Life, joined together and animated by that strict Union, which keeps them connect'd together, and which, upon his Death, is dissolved and dispers'd among the four simple Elements, and consequently returned to God, out of which it was created; and the same, with regard to every thing else in the Earth, and in the Heavens: in a Word, that the four Elements are the whole of every Thing, even God and Man;

"and consequently the elements are Eternal, and the World, with all it's Vicissitudes and Changes, is eternal (2)." Whatever Difference there may be between this Opinion, and the System of Spinoza, the Foundation of them both is the same: It is maintained on both Sides, that the Universe is but one single Substance, and that all That, which we call Generation and Corruption, Life and Death, is nothing more than a certain Combination, or Dissolution of Modes. Elmacin calls the Metempsychosis, which Abumuslimus believed, the Metempsychosis of Resolution.

[B] Erpenius did not understand the Word, of Elmacin upon this Subject. He makes him say, that Abumuslimus follow'd the Sect of the Descending Succession, profitebatur sectam successione descendente (3). He ought to have said, that he follow'd the Sect, which taught the Metempsychosis of Resolution, profitebatur sectam eorum quæ credunt Metempsychosim resolutionis. It is thus, the Sieur Belpier ventures and corrects the Translation of Erpenius in this Place (4).

(2) Peter de la Valle, T.
3. p. 39.
cited by Bel-
prier tom. 1.

(4) Elmacin
Hist. Arab.
B. 2. c. 3.
p. 100.

(4) Belpier's Remarks on Ricaux's
State of the Ottoman Empire, p.
665.

ACACIA or AKAIA (MARTIN). See AKAKIA.

ACAMAS, Son of Theseus (a), follow'd the rest of the Grecian Princes to the Siege of Troy. He was deputed with Diomedes, on an Embassy to the Trojans, to demand back Helen. This Embassy was fruitless, as to the principal Design of it; but it turn'd to the Advantage of Acamas, in what is call'd Good Fortune in Affairs of Gallantry. Laodicea, Daughter of Priam, fell in Love with him, and having in vain summon'd to her Assistance Honour and Modesty, was obliged to open her Mind to Philobia, Wife of Perseus, and to beg her Assistance in an Affair of the utmost Importance (b). Philobia, touch'd with Compassion for her, entreated her Husband to procure Laodicea the Completion of her Desires. Perseus took pity on the poor Lady; and, being besides desirous to oblige his Wife, he made a Friendship with Acamas, and obtain'd a Visit, from him in the City, of which he was Governor (c). Laodicea did not fail to be present there, attended by some Trojan Ladies. There was a magnificent Feast; after which Perseus put her to bed with Acamas, pretending to him, that she was one of the King's Concubines. Laodicea return'd home very well satisfy'd; and, at the end of nine Months, was deliver'd of a Boy, which was brought up by Æthra, Aunt of Acamas by the Mother's Side [A]. This Child was call'd Munius [B]: we shall see in the Remarks what became of him (d).

Acamas

(1) Schol-
ast. Euripid.
in Herculi.
See Pau-sanias, l. 10.
p. 342.

(2) Quintus
Calaber, lib.
23. v. 496.
See Paulanius, ib.

(3) Tzetzes
in Lycoph.
cited by Metastasis, on Ovid's Epistles, p.
143.

[A] Was brought up by Æthra, Aunt of Acamas by the Mother's side. You must know that Castor and Pollux, making an inroad into Attica to recover their Sister Helena, took the City of Aphidna, where that fair one was sent by her Ravisher. Æthra, the Mother of Theseus, had been sent there at the same time. They took her Prisoner, and brought her to Lacedæmon. She was there when Paris carried Helen away, and was sent from thence to Troy. Demophoon and Acamas follow'd the (1) other Greeks, chiefly to deliver the good old Lady, either by paying her Ransom, or by taking the City. They met her in the Streets, during the ransacking (2) of Troy; and having understood who she was, they mutually embrac'd each other. It was then that Æthra (3) made Munius known to his Father Acamas. She had educated him; for Laodicea had trusted her with the Secret of what had pass'd in Perseus's House. John Cornarius made a gross Mistake in his Translation of Parthenius: He render'd those Words, ἐν ᾧ αἰδοῦσα τραπεζῇ παρὰ Τροίας ἀνακτὴν διαδουλοῦσιν ἐν οἴκῳ, by these, quem sub dio enutritum post Trojæ captivitatem transportavit in domum. i. e. whom, having been brought up in the open Air, he carry'd home, after the taking of Troy. He ought to have said, having been educated by Æthra. We shall cite Plutarch presently, who says, That some have called all this a fabulous Story.

[B] This Child was call'd Munius. He follow'd his Father into Thrace, where he died by the bite (4) of a Serpent. Plutarch calls him Munycus, Μυνυκος, in the Life of Theseus; but, since Parthenius, Lycophron, and Tzetzes call him constantly Munius, Μι-νιός

(a) Pausan.
lib. 1. p. 5.
& lib. 10.
p. 343, &
343.

(b) Παρθενίου το ἀντιφάσι ἐν τῇ ἀποστολῇ τῇ Παρ-θενίᾳ Ερ-otic. c. 16.

(c) It was called Dar-danus.

(d) Taken
fr. m. Hege-stipp. de Robus Miel.
lib. 1. cited
by Parthen.
in his Erot.
c. 16. and from Tzetzes upon Ly-cophron.

(4) Parthen in Eroticus,
c. 16.

Acamas was one of the Heroes, who were hid in the wooden Horfe (e). He had, afterwards, an Adventure in Thrace, something like the former, but attended with very unfortunate Consequences. Phyllis, the King's Daughter, fell in love with him: He immediately offer'd her Marriage: the Fair was promis'd to him, with the Dowry of a Crown. He demanded permission to return home. Phyllis oppos'd it with the utmost Intreaties; but obtaining only an Oath from him, that he would return, she presented him with a Box, consecrated, as she said, to Rhea, Mother of the Gods. She recommended to him not to open it, till he should have no Hopes of seeing Thrace again. Acamas landed in the Isle of Cyprus [C], and resolv'd to settle there. Phyllis, upon this, hang'd herself, uttering imprecations against the Traytor. He open'd the Box, and found himself seiz'd with strange Visions. He mounted his Horfe, and spurr'd him so unluckily, and in so violent a manner, that they were both thrown to the Ground, and Acamas accidentally fell upon his own Sword. Tzetzes relates this Story (f); but he has confounded Acamas with Demophoon (g); for, it is with the regard to the latter, that all Authors relate the Fate of the unhappy Phyllis. See her passionate Letter to Demophoon, invented by Ovid. It appears by this Epistle, that their Marriage had been consummated:

Turpiter hospitium lecto cumulasse jugali
Pœnitet, & lateri consenuisse latus (b).

But, to admit thee loosely to my Breast
Is Treason, fatal to my present Rest.

Mr E. LLOYD.

We must not forget, that one of the Tribes of Athens was named Acamantis [D] from the Name of our Acamas (i), and that by the Appointment of the Oracle. Stephen of Byzantium makes him the Founder of a City in Phrygia the Greater [E], and makes him

wtot; it must be believ'd that Plutarch's Text has been alter'd in that Place, or that the Author did not well remember the true Pronunciation of that Word. Does it not happen daily, that when we cite any Author by Memory, we confound sometimes one or more Syllables in his Name? I shall consider this farther in the Article EPHORUS. I do not know whether it ought not to be imputed to forgetfulness what Plutarch says, that it was Demophoon who lay with Laodice. But perhaps he had read it in some Author unknown to us. Tzetzes too might have found in some of these Authors, which are lost, that the Adventures of Phyllis related to Acamas: However it be, neither of the Brothers have been Loofer, at the Foot of the Account; for if, on one Side, Plutarch takes from Acamas the delightful Moments he pass'd with Laodice, and bestows them on Demophoon; Tzetzes, on the other Side, deprives the latter of the agreeable Nights he pass'd with Phyllis, and gives them to Acamas. But, to be serious; if Meursius had well weigh'd the Passages, where the Son of Laodice is called Munitis, he would not have made (g) use of Plutarch's Words, to prove that the Harbour of Munychia had not taken it's Name from Munychus the Son of Pantacles, as is commonly said, but from Munychus the Son of Demophoon and Laodice. Plutarch's Words are (6), *Οὐ δὲ καὶ τὸ τὸ ἐπὶ τοῦ διαβέλλουσι, καὶ τὴν παρὰ Μυνυχὴν ἀνδολεῖαν, ὅν ἐν Ἀμφισθενὶ Λαοδίκης πρόβα τεινὴς ἐν Ἰλίσσῳ συνεκρίψαν τὴν Ἀδραν λέγουσι. i. e. some reject this Verse, ('tis that where Homer says that Helen brought Æthra with her to Troy) as also the Story of Munychus, who, being the spurious Child of Demophoon and Laodice, is said to have been brought up at Troy, under the Care of Æthra.*

[C] Acamas landed in the Isle of Cyprus.] There was a Mountain in that Island, which was called Acamas, from the Son of Thesclus. Hesychius attests it, and remarks, That the River Bocarus, which pass by Salamina, had it's Source in that Mountain. Geographers (7) speak of Cape Acamas, very famous in thence, that his Chastity was so extraordinary, as to procure him divine Honours? If all those on whom Homer bestows the Epithet θεοειδής, God-like, had been Deified, what would have become of poor Atlas's Shoulders?

[E] Stephen of Byzantium makes him the Founder of a City in Phrygia the Greater.] He calls it Acamantium. Geographers say nothing at all of it. The Abbeviator of that Writer, or the Copyists, have main'd

(c) Tryphiodorus de Excid. Troie. See also Paulan. lib. 1. p. 21.

(f) Up'n Lycophon.

(g) Who was likewise the Son of Theclus.

(b) Ovid. Phyll. ver. 57.

(i) Paulan. lib. 1. p. c. & lib. 10. p. 32. See likewise Suidas, and Stephen of Byzant.

(10) The other Faults that were mark'd in the first Edition are suppress'd here. As these Faults occur in most of the Editions of Meursius, it is thought proper to let them down in this place. They are as follow: 1st. he cites the 14 Book of Strabo, in relation to the Promontory Acamantis, in the Isle of Cyprus: where it is ought to have cited the 14th. 2dly, he calls Acamante the Son of Theclus. 3dly, he says, that Suidas mentions one Acamantides, a Philopoleis of Eliopolis; whereas Suidas calls him Acamantium.

(11) Illad. lib. 6. v. 7.

(12) See Ilad. lib. 4. v. 474.

(13) Juven. Sat. 13. v. 47.

CREECH.

(c) Meursius, lib. 1. c. 14. left. Atticer. cited by Meursius. who repeats the same Mistake in his Comment. on Ovid's Epistles, p. 144.

(6) Plut. in Thebes, sub fin. p. 16.

(7) Strabo, lib. 14. Prot. lib. 5. c. 14. Plin. lib. 5. c. 31.

(8) Philonides apud Plin. ibid. Stephanus on the Word Κυπρος.

(9) History of CYPRUS, p. 4. & 29.

him war with the Solymeans. I will not pretend to determine, whether Phædra or Ariadne [F] was the Mother of Acamas, upon which point Mr Moreri behaves as usual.

maim'd that Passage in such a Manner, that no Sense can be made of it, without supplying something. But supply it as you please, you will be never the better inform'd by it of the War between Acamas, and the Solymeans.

[F] Whether Phædra or Ariadne. I find two learned Men of a contrary Opinion in this Question. Meziriæ (14) affirms that Acamas was the Son of Phædra; but all the Proof he seems to give for it, is, That Demophoon the Brother of Acamas was the Son of Phædra; which he proves by the Letter that Sa- linus writ to Phyllis under the Name of Demophoon. Mr de Valois (15) pretends, That Ariadne was the Mother of Acamas, and cites the Scholiast (16) of Homer for it; he adds, that Demophoon was the Brother of Acamas, according to that Scholiast; and that Euripides (17) confirms it. Neither of those Gentlemen remark'd, That it signifies nothing to the Question, whether Acamas and Demophoon were Brothers; for they might be so, altho' the one was the Son of Ariadne, and the other of Phædra.

(14) Henr. Valefius in Harpocrat. P. 4. & 5.
(15) In O. ducc. O.
(16) In lo. na.

(14) On Ovid's Epil. p. 137.

(a) Strabo, lib. 10. p. 317.
(b) Id. ib. p. 318.

(c) Id. ib.

(d) Strabo, lib. 10. p. 317.

(e) Macrobius, Saturn. lib. 1. c. 12. p. 242.

ACARNANIA, a Country situated on the Ionian Sea, between Ætolia and the Gulph of Ambracia. It is said that the Tapbians and the Teleboans were the first Masters of it; and that Cephalus conquer'd it, after he was establish'd in the Lordship of the Islands near Tapbos, by Ampbitryon (a). They add (b), That Alcmeon, the Son of Ampbiaraus, made himself Master of it, after the second Theban War; and that he gave it the Name of his Son Acarnan. He had associated himself with Diomedes, and they had conquer'd Ætolia, which fell to the share of the latter. Some time after, they were summoned to accompany the Expedition to Troy: one of them, viz. Diomedes, went to join the other Greeks, but Alcmeon kept himself quiet in Acarnania (c). This was of service to the Acarnanians several Ages after; for they made a great Merit of it at Rome [A], having represented there, that, among all the Greeks, their Ancestors alone did not go to the Siege of Troy. This notable Reason was alludg'd by the People of Rome, when they embrac'd their Party against Ætolia [B]. So true it is, that, on certain Occasions, Policy does not refuse to make use of the most ridiculous Pretences. The Ætolians and the Acarnanians kept (d) a long time united, either to repulse the Macedonians and the other Greeks, or to maintain their Liberty against the Roman Arms; but at last they were tired, and lost their Courage. The Year consist'd of but six Months (e) in Acarnania. The Inhabitants of that Country were very lascivious, if we may believe some Dictionaries [C]. It is more

(1) Strabo lib. 10. p. 318.

(2) Id. ib. (3) Horre describes only their Country, and does not mention it by the Name of Acarnania.

(4) Justin. lib. 28. c. 1. See La Mothe Le Vayer Letter 95. Tom. 2. p. 325.

[A] They made a great Merit of it at Rome.] The Historian Ephorus furnished them undesignedly with an Opportunity of doing this: for, being informed of what he related concerning Alcmeon, they ingeniously turn'd it to their own Advantage with the Romans, who pretended that the Founder of Rome descended from Æneas. This is Strabo's Conjecture (1): Τὸν δ' ὡς εὐχὸς τοῖς Λόγοις ἀπαλοῦνται τὰς δὲ Ἀκαρνάνων ἐπιθέσεις λέγονται Ῥωμαῖοι, καὶ πρὸς αὐτὴν ἰσχυρὰν παρ' αὐτὸν ἱκανοῦσθαι λέγοντες, ὡς ἡ μετέσχεον μὲν τῶν ἐν τῇ προέροντι τῇ ἑαυτῶν κρατίας, ὅτε γὰρ ἐν Ἀιτωλῶν καταλόγῳ φησὶντο, ὅτι ἰδίᾳ αὐτοὶ γὰρ ὅλως τὸν μὲν τῶν ἐμφέροντο ἐν τῇ ἑαυτῶν. It is probable the Acarnanians, taking the Hint from this Story, artfully prevailed upon the Romans to allow them the free Use of their Country Laws; pretending, that they alone were not concerned in the War against the Ancestors of the Romans, as not being mentioned either in the Ætolian Catalogue, or separately, or indeed at all in Homer's Verses. But this Pretence was groundless; for Strabo (2) shews by the Catalogue (3) in the second Book of the Iliad, that the Acarnanians supply'd their Quota for the Expedition to Troy.

[B] Was alludg'd by the People of Rome, when they embrac'd their Party against Ætolia.] After the Death of Alexander, the Son of Pyrhus, King of Epirus, Acarnania had every thing to fear from the Ætolians, and did not confide much in that Prince's Widow, who was Guardian of her two Sons; wherefore they implored the Assistance of the Romans, which was not refused them. Word was sent to the Ætolians, that they should not molest a People, who alone had not assisted the Greeks against the Trojans (4). "Acarnanes quoque diffusi Epirotis adversus Ætolos auxilium Romanorum implorantes, obtinuerunt à Romano senatu, ut legati mitterentur, qui denuntiarent Ætolis, præsidia ab urbibus Acarnaniz deducere; paternitque esse liberos, qui soli quondam adversus Trojanos, auctores originis suæ, auxilia Græcis non miserint. — The Acarnanians, distrustful the Epirotes, implored the Assistance of the Romans against the Ætolians, and obtained from the Senate an Embassy to be sent to the Ætolians, to demand of them, that they should withdraw their Garrisons from the Cities of Acarnania, and suffer a People to enjoy their Liberty, who alone gave the Greeks no Aid against the Trojans, from whom the Romans were descended." Plutarch reports two as ridiculous Facts as this (5). Agathocles the Tyrant of Syracuse — laugh'd at those of Corfu, who ask'd him, for what Reason he ravaged their Island; Because, said he, your Ancestors formerly received Ulysses. And when the Inhabitants of the Island of Ibica complained to him, that his Soldiers took their Sheep: And your King, said he to them, being arrived in our Country, did not only take our Sheep, but also put out our Shepherds' Eye. But the following Account is more ridiculous still (6). "Maborn, the second of that Name, Emperor of the Turks, in a Letter to Pope Pius the Second, said, I wonder the Italians should league against me, seeing we have our common Original from the Trojans; and that 'tis my Interest, as well as theirs, to revenge the Blood of Hector upon the Greeks, whom they favour against me." Thus chimerical Evils, forged by the Poets, have served as an Apology for real Evils.

[C] Very lascivious, if we may believe some Dictionaries.] We shall quote Mr Lloyd first, "Molliciter & lascivie notati leguntur (Acarnanes) teste Luciano in Dial. Meretricibus, unde proverbium Porcellus Acarnanians in lascivos. i. e. The Acarnanians, as Lucian witnesses in his Dialogue of Harlots, are branded in History with Effeminacy and Wantonness, whence that proverbial Character of the Lascivious, An Acarnanian Swine." Mr Hofman transferred this whole Passage into his Dictionary; and Moreri's Account is this: "The Acarnanians were accused of being too lascivious and too finical. This was the cause of that reproachful Proverb of the Antients, Porcellus Acarnanians." You may meet with the same Account in Pinedo's Notes (7) on Stephen of Byzantium. I have consulted the Dialogue of the Courtizans of Lucian, and do not find there that the Inhabitants of Acarnania past for voluptuous and effeminate. It is true, the Courtizan Mufarium, in answer to her Mother, who reproached her for making no Advantage of the Favours the granted Chereas, and who thought it very strange that she should not hearken to a Peasant of Acarnania,

(5) Plutarch de fera Nummis vinctis.

(6) Montagne's Esquisses, B. 2. c. 36. p. 763.

(7) The de Pinedo in Steph. Byzant. p. 300.

sisted these Temptations a long time, in consideration of the Sweetness he enjoy'd at Sienna: But the Attack was renew'd so often, that he was at last overcome, and prevailed upon not to persist in the Resolution he had taken to die in his first Post: A Resolution scarce to be parallell'd among Persons of his Character [A]. It was Rainuccio Farnese, Duke of Parma, who made him yield to the Temptation, by adding to the Promises he made him, and to the Glory of succeeding Sforza Oddus, and Philip Marini, the Title of His Counsellor, wherewith he honour'd him. The Great Duke would not suffer Accarisi to continue long in the Service of another Prince, but made him soon return [B], by giving him the first Professorship in Law in the University of Pisa; so that Accarisi left the Duke of Parma, and went to exercise the Employ which was given him at Pisa, in which he continu'd 'till his Death, which happen'd four Years after; he died, at Sienna, Oct. 4. 1622. The Author (b), who furnishes me with this Article, and who is the only Person cited by Mr Moreri, does not say that Accarisi writ divers Treatises of Law, nor that Rainuccio Farnese endeavour'd in vain to draw him to him. They are two Mistakes of Mr Moreri; who besides did not understand the meaning of IV. Non. Octobris, which he interprets to mean the 26th of September. We take notice of another Mistake of his in the second Remark.

(b) Janus Nicius Ery-threus Pila-coth. 2. c.
25.

[A] Scarce to be parallell'd among Persons of his Character.] One of the most common Faults among Professors is their not fixing in the Universities where they have their first Employ. Instead of looking upon that first Vocation as a kind of Marriage, they consider it only as a transient Engagement, as an Interim, and a resting Place: They only stay there in expectation of something better: They have no more Affection for the second Call than for the first, and are not for pitching their Tents for the last time, 'till they have attained the best Professorships. It has been said of some Persons, that they make the Tour of all Religions in a little time; others run through all the Universities as soon as they can. Some of those who do not remove, take care to be well paid for their Constancy. It costs those, who desire to retain them, a considerable Addition of Wages. Tacitus, who doubtless comprehended many Defects under the Phrase Professoria lingua (1), would not have excluded him, of whom I speak, if he had known him. Churchmen are not exempt from this little Infirmary; we know the Complaints of rigid Moralists against certain Prelates, who, beginning with a Bishoprick of a mean Revenue, rise by Degrees to the most eminent Metropolis Cities. This is a Spiritual Polygamy, or something worse: For according to the Sense of the ancient Canons (2), a spiritual Marriage is contracted between the Pastor and his Flock. The Christian Societies, which belong to the smaller Benefices, are sensible of the Effects of this Humour.

Parcius ista viris tamen obijcienda memento (3).

(3) Virgil.
Ecc. 3. ver.

See the Remark [H] of the Article ALCIATUS (ANDREW).

[B] But made him soon return.] This was the Success of all that Solicitation and Bribery, which the Duke of Parma made use of to procure Accarisi. I confess he gained him at last, but he was soon taken from him again by the same Means he had made use of to take him from others. Yet Mr Moreri says, that Accarisi did not go to the Duke, and that he would have done too much Violence to his Inclination, if he had left his Country; where he was detained by the Favour of Ferdinand, Great Duke of Tuscany. A new Fault, which cannot be excused! for we read in Nicius Erythreus, that when Accarisi went to serve the Duke of Parma, it was at least twenty Years since the new Office, which the Great Duke Ferdinand had caused to be created in the College of Sienna, had been bestowed upon him. We read also in the same Author, that Accarisi was Professor but four Years at Pisa, whither he was called a little after his Engagement at Parma. But he died in 1622. four Years after he had accepted the Professorship of Pisa; so that the Duke of Parma must have compassed his Design about the Year 1616. at which time there was no Great Duke of the Name of Ferdinand. Mr Moreri says himself, in his Article MEDICIS, that Ferdinand I. died in 1609, and that Ferdinand II. succeeded him in 1621.

(1) Annal.
lib. 13. cap.
24.

(2) Ne Virginalis pauperculæ So-cietate contempta di-ctoris adulteræ querat
amplexus.
Hieron. Ep-
ad Oceanum,
Tom. 2. p.
744.
See the Author of a French Book, entitled, A-vice to the Jesuits of Aix on an Interlude, p.
37.

(3) Aub.
Mireus.
Script. Eccl.
Sæc. 17. p.
251.

ACCARISI (JAMES) a Native of Boulogne, and Doctor of Divinity. I have but two Particulars to add to Mr Moreri's Account of him. The first is, that the Speeches, which he has published, are Compositions, recited by himself at Rome, Cologne, Mantua, and other Places: The other, that he was four Years Professor of Rhetoric at Mantua, in the University founded by Duke Ferdinand, Ann. 1627 (a).

(a) Jovius
in Eleg.
ch. 16.

(b) Vola-terr. B. 21.

(c) Jovius
in Eleg. c.
26.

(d) Varillas
Anecd. de
Florence. p.
169.

(e) Jovius in Eleg. ch.
16.

(1) Vossius
de Hist. Lat.
p. 624.
(2) Konig.
Bibl. Vet.
Nov. p. 4.

ACCIAIOLI (DONATO) a Person celebrated as well for his Learning, as the great Offices he discharged at Florence, the Place of his Nativity. He flourished in the XVth Century. This great Man would have been more eminent for Learning, if the public Affairs had permitted him to dedicate more Time to his Studies, and if the Tenderness of his Constitution had not shortened his Life (a). There can be no greater Proof of his Honesty and Disinterestedness than the small Patrimony he left to his Children. His Daughters were portioned for Marriage at the public Expence (b), as were formerly those of Aristides; which demonstrates, at the same time, how well satisfied the Public was with the Services he had done it. He was sent into France to demand Succours against Pope Sixtus IV. who extremely harassed the Florentines; but he died, before he had passed the Alps (c), at Milan, in the Month of August, 1473, in the 39th Year of his Age (d). His Body was carried to Florence, and interr'd in the Church of the Carthusians (e). The Inscription on his Tomb is in the Style and Manner of Politian. His Works are principally A Translation of some of the Lives of Plutarch [A] into Latin; The Life

[A] Some of the Lives of Plutarch.] He should be the Author of Four, if Vossius (1) and Konig (2) are to be credited; namely, those of Hannibal, Scipio, Alcibiades, and Demetrius: but as it does not appear, that Plutarch compos'd either the Life of Scipio, or that of Hannibal; it is more probable, that Acciaiolus was originally of Charlemagne; and Commentaries on Aristotle's Ethics and Politics. This Life of Charlemagne, being sometimes join'd with those of Plutarch, has led George Wicelius into a surprizing Blunder. He speaks of this Life as if it were the Work of Plutarch himself (f); so wholly taken up was he in the Learning of the Times. Some have accus'd Acciaoli of Plagiarism [B] in his Commentary on Aristotle's Ethics: others, on the contrary, are extravagant in the Praises [C] they bestow on him for this Work. He was highly esteem'd by the Cardinal de Pavia, as appears by the Letters he receiv'd from him, which are to be found in a printed Collection of the Cardinal's Letters.

The Reader will find below a considerable Supplement to this Article [D].

(3) Poccian-tius de Script. Flor.
p. 51. says expressly, dictavit pro-prio Marte viam Anni-balis & Scipionis.

He had no Assistance in writing the Lives of Hannibal and Scipio.

(4) See the Journal des Savans,
Sept. 2.
1697. p.
654.

(5) Sim. Simonii Comment. in A-ristot. Ethic.

(6) Naud.
Bibliogr.
polit. p. 16.

(7) Voss. de Hist. Lat. p.
624.

(8) Conring.
Introd. in Polit. Arist.
p. 649, 659.
in Thomae-sus's Plag.
Literar. p.
253.

nally the Author of the Lives of these two famous Commanders (3), than that he translated them from the Greek. Vossius does not seem to be aware of this. He was plainly misled by the Abridger of the Bibliotheca of Gesner. Father Menétrier is positive, that Acciaoli impos'd upon the Public, in pretending to have translated the Life of Hannibal, from the Greek (4).

[B] Some have accus'd Acciaoli of Plagiarism. It is asserted, that he borrow'd his Commentary on Aristotle's Ethics, without acknowledging the Debt. "Scripta, quæ sub nomine Acciaoli ea de re circumferuntur, non Acciaoli commentaria, sed Argropyli Prælectiones Florentinæ habitæ, & ab Acciaoli descriptæ: editæque, à peritæque existimantur. — It is generally thought, that the Commentary, which is bandied about under the Name of Acciaoli, is not his own, but transcrib'd, and publish'd, from the Lectures of Argropyli, deliver'd at Florence." After this manner Simon Simonii speaks of it in his Dedication to a Book, printed in 1567 (5). Gabriel Naudé renew'd this Accusation a long time after in very positive Terms. "Argropylius Byzantinus, says he (6), cuius Prælectiones, Florentinæ habitas, non absque manifesto plagii crimine, sibi postea vendicavit Donatus Acciaoli. — Argropylius, the Byzantine, whose Lectures, read at Florence, Donatus Acciaoli claim'd to himself, not without the manifest Guilt of Plagiarism." Mr Moreri has confounded the Ethics of Aristotle, with the Commentary upon them. "It has even been thought, says he, that the Ethics of Aristotle, address'd to Nicomachus, which Donatus has publish'd, were in the Style and Manner of the same Argropyli; though Volaterran maintains the contrary." Observe this Author's Skill in translating the easiest Latin, I mean the Latin of Vossius. He had read these Words in Vossius; "Imo, Commentaria illa in Nicomachia Aristotelis multi arbitrantur non ipsius esse Acciaoli, sed Prælectiones esse Argropyli, ab Acciaoli autem descriptas, inque lucem emissas. Nihil tamen de eo Volaterranus (7). — Nay, many are of Opinion, that Acciaoli himself was not the Author of the Commentary on Aristotle's Piece to Nicomachus, but that he compos'd, and publish'd it from the Lectures of Argropyli. Yet Volaterran mentions no such thing." This is doubly to confound Things: it is to take the Commentary for the Text; and to confute the Silence of an Author into a formal confutation of a Charge. The learned Conringius has justifi'd Donatus against Naudé: not by shewing, that Argropyli did not furnish Materials for the Work, but by alleging, that Acciaoli acknowledged to whom he was indebted (8). Can we desire a more authentic Confession, than the following? "Johannes Argropylius Byzantinus, cum Florentinæ inter cætera Philosophiæ opera Aristotelis libros, qui ad Nicomachum de moribus scribuntur, misisset esset complexus, eos tuo nomine Latinos fecit, publiceque deinde explicuit, non sine magna audientium approbatione: habent enim libri duo summam dignitatem, admirabilemque doctrinam, ordinem vero prope singularem. Itaque si accurata & exquisita quædam explanatio accedat, magnum auditoribus afferret fructum; quod ego jam inde ab initio mecum considerans una cum plerisque aliis, qui huius quoque præceptoris disciplinam sequuntur, in his audiendis præcipuam curam diligentiamque adhibui. — Postea vero cum viderim hos libros à te, & ab his omnibus, qui ingenio vehementer excellent, libentissime legi, ulterius progrediendum ratus, EXPOSITIONEM HUIUS DOCTORIS, accommodatam præcipue menti Philosophi, literis mandare constitui, ut ii, qui adesse non potuerunt — hæc, quæ nos ex ejus ore accepimus, percipere & ipsi pro arbitrio possent; quare translationem

"illius ac ordinem explicandi pluribus verbis secuti sumus, lata interdum & diffusâ oratione utentes, ut explanatio aperta magis magisque omnibus esset communis (9). — John Argropylius, the Byzantine, having, at Florence, among other Philosophical Works, finely introduc'd the moral Writings of Aristotle, address'd to Nicomachus, translated them, under your patronage, into Latin, and afterwards read public Lectures upon them, not without great Applause from his Hearers; for the Subject of these two Books is very noble, the Instruction admirable, and the Method almost peculiar to them. And therefore the Hearers must receive great Benefit from them, when accurately and judiciously explain'd; which Consideration, from the beginning, induc'd me, and several other Pupils of the same Master, to attend his Lectures, with the utmost Care and Diligence. — But afterwards, when I perceiv'd that those Books became in great Request with you, and all Men of exalted Sense, I determin'd to publish this great Master's EXPLANATION, accommodated chiefly to the taste of Philosophers; that they, who could not attend his Lectures, might, whenever they thought fit, understand what we RECEIV'D FROM HIS OWN MOUTH. I have therefore given his Translation, and method of Explanation at large, making use frequently of a copious and diffuse Style, to render his Interpretation the more intelligible and familiar." If Vossius had ever heard of this Passage, would he have been satisfi'd with opposing the Silence of Volaterran to the Accusers of Acciaoli? He might have read it in Gesner's Works (10). Is it not very strange, that a poor Author, who has so solemnly declared in his Preface, that he publishes only a paraphrastic Translation of the Lectures of Argropylius, should for so long Time be accus'd of Plagiarism?

[C] Extravagant in the Praises. This appears by comparing the Text of Paul Jovius, with the Paraphrase of Mr Varillas. "Eruditi & pereleganti Moralibus Aristotelis, explosis scilicet sophistarum Interpretum ineptiis, quàm, Eustratii Græci placita, secutus, certiore ubique vestigio niteretur (11). — He is thought to have given great Light into Aristotle's Ethics, by a very learned and elegant Commentary: in which he explodes the foolish Glosses of the Schoolmen, and follows the Opinions of Eustratius the Greek, as the more certain Foundation." This is the Text; the Paraphrase is as follows: "He did not fail to translate the Morals of Aristotle, with much greater exactness, than his Predecessors in that Work; and so clear them of those ridiculous Interpretations, which both the ancient and modern Schoolmen had put upon them. This he did in an excellent Commentary ||, in which he shew'd, that, whoever engages in this Labyrinth with any other Guide †, than the famous Eustathius, cannot avoid going out of his Way (12)." I need not apprise the Reader, that the Author of the Anecdotes goes farther than his Original, as well with respect to Acciaoli, as Eustratius (13); and that, instead of paying a Compliment to the latter, as was his Intention, he degrades him to the lowest Rank of Interpreters: he should have said, avec un autre, not sans un autre. Besides, what would Father Bouhours say to his par un admirable Commentaire? These Words are so ill plac'd, that one would think the Schoolmen had given their ridiculous Interpretations, by an excellent Commentary.

[D] The Reader will find below, a considerable Supplement to this Article. I may venture to give it this Character, since it is a Memoir communicated to me by a very able Writer (14). "The Treatise, which Matthew Palmieri has left, of the Origin of the Family of the Acciaoli, may be of considerable

(f) Hagio-log. fol. 178.
apud Voss.
de Hist. La-
p. 624.

(9) Don-
Acc. Prof.
to Cofm-Med. Comment. in Eth. Arist.
ad Nicho-mach.

(10) Gefu.
Biblioth.
fol. 216.

(11) Jovius
Rel. cap.
16.

|| The Construction of the French is, — Interpretations ridicules, que les Sophistes leur avoient données, par un admirable Commentaire —

† The French
of Varillas,
by mistake,
says, sans un autre guide —

(12) Varill.
Anecd. de
Flor. p. 169.

(13) So it ought to be written, and not Eustachius.

(14) Mr de la Monnoie.

"Use in rectifying and supplying the Article of Donato Acciaoli. This Treatise, written in Latin by Matthieu Palmieri, was translated into Italian by Donato Acciaoli, Knight of Rhodes. The Original has not yet appear'd; the Translation alone was printed at Florence, in 4to, in the Year 1588, by Bartholomæus Sernatelli, as an Appendix to the History of the Ubaladini, and the Life of Nicolas Acciaoli, great Senschal of the Kingdoms of Sicily and Jerusalem. We are there told that our Donato was born in 1428; that he was buried at the public Expence; that Christopher Laudin

"spoke his Funeral Oration". The other Particulars are too long to be repeated. — Sabellius, in his Dialogue de Reparatione Linguae Latinae, (a Dialogue, by the way, commonly cited as the Work of an anonymous Author) and Vives, in his 5th Book de tradendis Disciplinis, have spoken with Commendation, of the Life of Charlesmagne, by Donato Acciaoli. The Florentine History of Leonard d'Arezzo, translated from Latin into Italian by this Donato, was printed at Venice, in Folio, in 1473, according to Father L'Abbe's Account, p. 341. of his Supplem. Nov. Biblioth. M.SS."

* Porcianus de Script. Flo. p. 51.

ACCIAIOLI (ZENOBIUS) a Florentine, and Monk of the Order of St Dominic, distinguish'd himself by his public Writings. His Office of Librarian of the Vatican under Pope Leo X. proves him to have been a Man of Letters. He continu'd in this Employ from the Year 1518 to his death, which happen'd in 1520. He liv'd 58 Years. He was skill'd in Greek and Hebrew, and has translated some Pieces of the ancient Fathers into Latin: viz. Olympiodorus on Ecclesiastes; the Treatise of Eusebius against Hierocles; the twelve Books of Theodoret de Græcarum Affectionum Curaione; and Justin Martyr. As he was both a Poet and an Orator, he has exercis'd his Talent of Panegyric on every thing, both in Verse and Prose. There are extant his Poems, and Sermons on the Epiphany, besides Verses and Orations in Honour of Leo X. There are publish'd likewise some Letters, which he writ to Picus of Mirandola; a Treatise entitled de Laudibus Urbis Romæ; A Panegyric on the City of Naples, deliver'd in a general Chapter of the Order; and A Chronicle of the Convent of St Mark at Florence. He collected likewise in one Volume the Greek Epigrams of Politian, and publish'd them in the Year 1495. (a)

(a) Taken from Ambrosio d'Altamura Biblioth. Ord. Præd. cæc. p. 243.

Ambrosio d'Altamura, whom I have follow'd Step by Step in this Article, has evidently transgress'd the Laws of Accuracy, as appears from the following account of Mr de la Monnoie. Of all the Works of Zenobius Acciaoli there are extant only the Translation of Eusebius's Book against Hierocles, That of Olympiodorus upon Ecclesiastes; and Theodoret's Cure of the false Opinions of the Gentiles. The pieces of Poetry, mention'd by Gyraldus, whether Greek, or Latin, were never printed. Some think he did not dye till the Year 1537, because Jerome Alexander, his Successor in the place of Librarian of the Vatican, did not enter upon his Office till that year; in like manner as Zenobius began his employ in the Year 1518, after Philip Beroaldus the younger, who died the same Year.

ACCIUS (LUCIUS) a Latin Tragic Poet, Son of a Freed-Man [A], was born, according to the Chronology of St Jerom, in the Consulship of Hostilius Mancinus, and Atilius Serranus, in the year of Rome 583. But it will appear below, that this Authority is not to be depended upon [B]. He distinguish'd himself before the death

[A] Son of a Freed-Man.] The more I consider these Words of Moreri, "Marcinus and Serranus, "whom ancient Rome saw rais'd to the Dignity of "Consuls, were his near Relations," the more difficult I find it to assign any other Reason for his Blunder, than this. He had read in Charles Stephens the following Words, "Natus parentibus libertinis, Marcino & Serrano Consulibus," and, not sufficiently attending to the Terms parentibus and libertinis, he thought he might affirm, that the Poet was related to these two Consuls. He ought, however, to have chang'd Marcinus into Mancinus. See how St Jerom expresses himself. "Lucius Accius, Tragediarum "Scriptor clarus, natus, Mancino & Serrano Consulibus, parentibus libertinis (1). — i. e. Lucius "Accius, a famous Tragic Poet, born in the Consulship "of Mancinus and Serranus, of free Parents." Father Briet attributes to A. Gellius two or three Particulars relating to Accius, which St Jerom has a right to (2).

(1) In Chron. Eusebii, the 2d Year of the 26th Olympiad.

(2) Brietius de Poët. Lat. p. 50.

[B] That this Authority is not to be depended upon.] I say this, without having demonstrative Reasons against this Chronology: I have only Difficulties to alledge on both Sides. Cicero often convers'd with Accius. This I prove in Remark [H]. Now Cicero was born in the Year of Rome, 647; and it is not likely that he had convers'd much with this Poet before the Age of 20. Accius, therefore, must have been alive in the Year of Rome 667. He should be at that time 84 Years of Age, according to the Chronicle of Eusebius. I confess there is nothing impossible in this; but there is little Appearance of Probability; since Gyraldus could not believe, that the Poet, with whom Cicero had so often convers'd, was the same Lucius Accius, so many of whose Tragedies are quoted. He thinks these were two Poets of the same

Name. Add to this, that Corradus, who allows not this Distinction, scruples to carry the 20th Year of Cicero, higher than the 70th of Accius: inasmuch, that, on account of a Passage in Cicero, he places the Birth of Accius 40 Years later, than St Jerom has fix'd it (3). But this is not all: Cicero, in his First Philippic, informs us, that one of Accius's Tragedies was perform'd during the Celebration of the Games, which Brutus had given, and at which he was not present, having retir'd from Rome, upon the Murthor of Julius Cæsar. This Piece was greatly applauded; but the People's Approbation was more in favour of Brutus, than Accius. The Applause was too distant in Time, to belong to the Poet; "Nisi forte Accio "tum plaudî & hexagesimo post anno palmam dari "putabatis, non Bruto. — Unless you thought, that, "after an interval of 60 Years, Accius, and not "Brutus, received the Applause and the Palm." If you reckon these 60 Years from the Death of Accius (4), he must have died in the Year of Rome 650; and, consequently, we are not to believe Cicero, when he pretends to have heard some things from Accius's own Mouth. If you count them from the Time, when this Piece first appear'd upon the Stage, you will make the Orator a very weak Reasoner, in supposing that a good Performance on the Stage is never applauded but at the first Representation; which is entirely false. However this Side of the Dilemma is more eligible, than to fix the Death of Accius to the 3d Year of Cicero. If then the Passage in the First Philippic does not prove, that Accius died before the Year of Rome 667, let us extend the Poet's Life to that Period; but, as we have no sufficient Assurance (5) of St Jerom's Accuracy, let us not scruple to assert, that Accius might then be between sixty and seventy Years of Age; and that, if he liv'd to the death of Pacuvius; one of his Plays being acted the same year that Pacuvius [C] brought a Performance of his own on the Stage. This latter was then eighty years old, the former but thirty. The name of Accius's Play, which was presented that year, is not recorded; but some Authors, who have quoted this Poet (a), have furnished us with the Names of Several of his Tragedies. He made choice of the noblest Subjects, that ever appear'd on the Atenian Stage; such as Andromache, Andromeda, Atræus, Chlyemnestra, Medea [D], Meleager, Philoctetes, The Siege of Thebes, Tereus, The Trojan Matrons, &c. He did not always borrow the Subject of his Plays from the Greeks: He compos'd one, the Story of which is entirely Roman: It was call'd Brutus [E], and treated of the Dethronement of Tarquin. If it be true, that He was Author of a Piece entitled The Wedding, and another call'd the Merchant (b) we shall have reason to rank him likewise among the Comic Writers [F]. His Genius was not confin'd to the Stage. He wrote some other Books, particularly Annals, which Macrobius, Priscian, Festus, and Nonnius Marcellus, refer to. His Friend and Patron was Decimus Brutus, who was Consul in the year of Rome 615, and who gain'd several Victories in Spain, which procur'd him the honour of a Triumph some time after (c). This Brutus was so fond of the Verses, in which Accius celebrated him, that

(3) Corrad. upon Cicero's Brutus. p. 198.

(4) P. Minucius upon the first Philippic, owns it; having first what Cicero says of his Conversations with Accius, Observe by the by, that the Opinion reported in the Judgements of Savans, &c. Tom. 2. p. 10. is false; namely, that Accius died in the Year of Rome 618, in the 6th Olympiad.

(5) See the Remark [O].

(a) Nonnius Marcellus, Varro, A. Gellius, &c.

(b) Volturnus de Poet. Lat. cites these two pieces, and refers them upon the Authority of Varro: but I have not been able to find it in Varro.

(c) In the Year 633. See the Fall of Sigonius.

Age of Pacuvius, there is no reason why we should not apply to him and Cæsar, the Story related by Valerius Maximus. "Is (Poeta Accius) Julio Cæsari amplissimo & florentissimo viro in Collegium Poëtarum venienti, nunquam affurrexit, non majestatis ejus immemor, sed quod in communium studiorum comparatione aliquanto superioriorem se esse confideret. Quapropter insolentem crimine caruit, quia ibi voluminum non imaginum certamina exercebantur" (6). — When Julius Cæsar came into the College of Poets, he (the Poet Accius) refus'd to rise from his Seat, though to the most renown'd Hero of the Age; not that he forgot the Respect due to his high Rank, but because he was conscious of some Superiority over him, in their common Attainments. This Behaviour, therefore, was not thought insolent, because in that Place they did not contest the Prize of Birth, but of Learning." This last Thought is not unlike that, which the Author (7) of the Satire against the French Academy (8) makes use of. I confess, that there is some Difficulty in extending the Life of the Poet Accius to the height of Julius Cæsar's Prosperity; and it is this which oblig'd Corradus to suppose, that Valerius Maximus meant in this Passage Sextus Julius Cæsar. But why may we not suppose him to mean that Caius Cæsar, who was kill'd by Marius's Soldiers, and who had to great Credit, though but an Edile, that his Disputes with Sulpicius the Tribune rais'd a Civil War (9)? He was one of the principal Orators of his Times, and a good Tragic Poet. But, however that be, let it be remembered, that Cæsar had a happy Genius for Poetry. "Fecuratur & a puero & ab adolescentulo quadam scripta, ut Laudes Herculis & Tragedia Oedipus" (10). — He is said to have been the Author of "some Pieces in his younger Days, as The Prailes of Hercules, and The Tragedy of Oedipus."

[C] The same Year that Pacuvius. Cicero relates it upon the Authority of Accius himself. "Ut Accius iisdem Adilibus ait se & Pacuvium docuisse Fabulam, cum ille octoginta, ipse triginta annos natus esset (11). — As Accius reports, that he and Pacuvius taught Dramatic Poetry in the same Edileship, the latter being eighty, himself but thirty Years of Age." Cicero's Words are iisdem Adilibus; but, some Manuscripts giving a false Reading, it has been asserted, that these two Poets published their Works in iisdem Adilibus, in the same House, paucis quidem annis interpositis, a few Years the one after the other (12); which is manifestly a double Mistake. Corradus thinks, that Accius mentioned this Circumstance of his Life in his Annals (13); but Vossius is of Opinion, that it was in a Work entitled Didascalica (14). The Reason he gives for it is, that Accius in this Work expressly treated of Poets and Poetry, as may be gathered from what Charissus and A. Gellius have cited from it. But this Reason is of no Weight: Vossius in proving against Corradus, relieves himself. This Writer had recourse to the Annals of Accius, because, says he, a Poet never speaks of himself in a Dramatic Piece. But Terence's Prologues prove the contrary. How came Vossius, who alleges this Reason, not to see, that Accius might very naturally acquaint his Audience in a Prologue, that a Play of his was brought upon the Stage, at the same time with one of Pacuvius's? Add to this, that, besides his Annals and Didascalica, Accius was the Author of some Books, which had no Relation to the Stage.

[D] Medea. The Conjecture of Father Lescapier, that the Verses, quoted by Cicero, in the second Book of The Nature of the Gods, are borrowed from the Medea of our Poet, is highly probable (15). These Verses describe the Astonishment of a Shepherd, who, having never seen a Ship, discovered, from the top of a Mountain, That which carried the Argonauts. The good Father Crinitus, in consequence of this Passage, imagined that Cicero had quoted a Tragedy of Accius entitled The Argonauts (16). But, though this Poet had compos'd such a Tragedy, Crinitus is still to be blamed for building upon to uncertain a Foundation. The Author, whose Conjecture I have just mentioned, need not have proved to us, from the Testimony of Crinitus, that the Grammarians mention the Medea of Accius: he might at once have quoted Nonnius Marcellus for it. I have found, in the Fragments of the Tragic Poets, collected by Scrivenerius, that the Lines relating to the Ship Argo, belong to a Tragedy called Medea.

[E] It was called Brutus. Manutius without Reason believes, that it was acted at the Celebration of the Games of Apollon, at which the Brother of Marce Antony presided in the Room of Brutus, who absented himself from Rome (17); but it is plain, from Cicero's Epistles, that it was the Tereus of Accius, which was then represented (18). It is surprising, that the greatest Part of the Commentators on Cicero should be ignorant of this. Maturantius thinks they acted the Atræus: Beraldus and Higendorn are for the Brutus.

[F] Among the Comic Writers. Donatus, the Grammarian, will not suffer us to doubt of it: for he reckons it among the Perfections of Terence, that he was content to write Comedies without falling under the Temptation of becoming a Tragic Poet; Which, among other things, adds he, was above the Reach of Plautus, Afranius, Accius, and almost all the great Comic Writers. As I have not servilely translated my Author Word for Word, it may be proper to let him speak for himself. "Hæc cum artificiosissima Terentii fecerit, tum illud est admirandum, quod et morem retinuit, ut Comœdium scriberet, et temperavit affectum, ne in Tragediam transiret, quod, cum aliis rebus minime obtentum esse, à Plauto, & ab Afranio, & ab Accio, & multis fere magnis Comicis invenimus (19)." We may gather from hence, that, at first, Accius confin'd himself to Comedy; but, his great Reputation arising from his Tragedies, Donatus seems not to have been so accurate as he should have been, in ranking him among the Comic Poets. Mr Dacier knew very well that he was a Tragic Poet, and has expressly asserted it in his Remark on this Verse of Horace:

Nil comis Tragicæ mutat Lucilius Atti (20)?

Notwithstanding which he translates it after this Manner: Lucilius — ne proceps-t-il rien à changer dans les Comédies d' Attius? — Does Lucilius find nothing to alter in the Comedies of Attius?

[G] Hung

(*) Valer. Maximus, lib. 3. c. 79.

(-) St Erremont, according to some. See the Hist. of the Fr. Acad. p. 69. but in the Chevreana this Satire is ascribed to the Count d'Étalon.

(8) Enriched The Comedy of the Academics: in which Godeau having said to Colletet, I perceive you to be an excellent Musician; responded thus Answer, We are all equal, being the Sons of Apollon.

(9) Afron. Ped. in his Orat. pro M. Scuro.

(10) Suetonius, in his Life of Cæsar.

(11) Cicero in Bruto.

(12) Crinitus de Poet. Lat. ch. 5. Cyndorpi. Onomast. p. 3.

(13) Corradus, apud Cicero's Brutus.

(14) Vossius de Hist. Lat. p. 30.

(15) See Lescapier. Commentar. in Cicero. de Nat. Deor. p. 382.

(16) Crinitus de Poet. Lat. lib. 24. ch. 7.

(17) P. Manutius upon Cicero's 1st Epistle.

(18) Cicero's Epistle to Atticus, B. 16. Epist. 2, 54.

(19) Donatus de Trag. & Comed.

(20) Horat. Sat. x. lib. 1. ver. 53.

that he hung them up at the entrance of the Temples, and Monuments [G], which he built with the spoils of the Enemy. This might, indeed, be owing to a Principle of Vanity rather than of Friendship, and may prove, that, if he was fond of the Poet, he was more so of the Praises he bestow'd upon him: but, in any light, it shews that Decimus Brutus thought Accius's Poetry excellent. Besides, he was a Person well qualify'd to judge of this kind of Writing [H]. I do not find, that Cicero accuses Accius of Harshness, and too much Affectation in his Stile: this relates to another Poet [I]; as Mr Moreri might easily have perceiv'd, had he not servilely copied after others. Not that Accius, who, in other respects, was greatly esteem'd as a Poet, (d) was never reproach'd with Ruggedness of Stile. A. Gellius has a very just Reflexion in answer to this Cavil [K]. The Answer he return'd those, who ask'd him, why he did not plead at the Bar, since he met with such success upon the Stage, carries

(12) See Remark [N].

[G] Hung them up at the Entrance of the Temples.] Cicero and Valerius Maximus relate this. "Decimus quidem Brutus, says the former (21), summus ille vir & imperator, Accii amicissimi sui carminibus templorum & monumentorum aditus exornavit suorum.

"That great Commander, Decimus Brutus, adorned the Entrance of his Temples and Monuments with the Verses of his dear Friend Accius."

Valerius Maximus gives this Account: "Similiter honoratus animus erga Poetam Accium D. Bruti, suis temporibus clari ducis, exitit, cujus familiari cultu & prompta laudatione delectatus, ejus versibus templorum aditus, quæ ex manubus consecraverat, adornavit (22). — Decimus Brutus, a famous General of his Times, shew'd great Favour to the Poet Accius, with whose easy Address, and ready Talent at Panegyric, he was so well pleas'd, as to adorn the Entrance of the Temples, which he consecrated with the Spoils of War, with this Poet's Verses." — Scrivener has quoted another Passage in the following Terms:

"Amatus etiamnum in tantum Attius, a Decimo Bruto fuisse dicitur, ut Attiani versibus templorum & monumentorum frontes & aditus exornare consueverit (23). — Decimus Brutus was so fond of Attius, that he was wont to hang up his Verses as Ornaments to the Fronts and Entrances of his Temples and Monuments." These he gives us for the very Words of Cicero in his Brutus; but I am sure they are not to be found there. Very likely some modern Author deceived him in this manner. He had quoted Cicero's Brutus in relation to the Age of Pacuvius, and Accius; then he had reported what relates to D. Brutus, and had contented himself to express the Sense of Cicero's Words, and had cited for it idem Cicero. Hereupon Scrivener, I suppose, imagined that Cicero's own Words were cited; and that they were taken out of the same Book which was quoted before; without taking the trouble of examining into the Truth of the Quotation. Thus you see how the most laborious and the most ingenious Compilers love to find their Work done to their Hands. Vossius (24), being doublets deceived by Scrivener, cites Cicero pro Archia & in Brutus, in relation to this Action of D. Brutus. The Illusion is perhaps still more ancient than this: Scrivener might not have it at first Hand. How careful soever he was to collect all that has ever been related of Accius, yet he forgot the Passage of Colamella, which we shall produce presently (25).

[H] Qualified to judge of this kind of Writing.] Paterculus (26) has given a great Encomium of this Brutus in few Words, in relation to his Military Virtues: But the following is Cicero's Eulogium on his Learning: "D. Brutus M. filius, ut ex familiari ejus L. Accio poeta sum audire solitus, & dicere non inculte solebat, & erat cum literis Latinis, tum etiam Grecis, ut temporibus illis, satis eruditus (27). — Decimus Brutus, the Son of Marcus Brutus, was wont to express himself with great Politeness, as I have been inform'd by his intimate Acquaintance, the Poet Accius; and was well versed (considering the time he lived in) both in the Learning of Rome and of Greece."

[I] This relates to another Poet.] To wit, Attilius, whom Cicero mentions not only in one of his Letters to Atticus (28), Hoc enim Attilius, poeta durissimus, but also in another place. That other Passage deserves to be produced at length, because it shews what Judgment ought to be pass'd upon those who despise their own Tongue, and the Authors of their own Nation (29). "A quibus tantum dissentio, ut cum Sophocles vel optime scripserit Electram, tamen male conversam Attilii mihi legendam putem, de quo Licinius, (29) Id. de Finib. lib. 1.

Ferream scriptorem opinor, verum scriptorem tamen Ut legendus fit (30).

"Rudem enim esse omnino in nostris poetis aut in eritissimæ segnitie est, aut fastidii delicatissimi. Mihi quidem nulli satis eruditi videntur quibus nostra ignota sunt. — With whom I so far differ in Opinion, that, however beautiful the Electra of Sophocles may be in the Original, I still think the ill Translation of it by Attilius deserves to be read; whom Licinius called An harsh Writer, indeed, but a Writer worthy of being read. If our Poets are rough and unpolish'd, it proceeds either from the most slothful Neglect, or the most delicate Niceness. For my own part, I think no Man Scholar enough, who is unacquainted with our own Authors." Suetonius mentions the Electra of Attilius, as we shall make appear in that Poet's Article. Doubtless the Electra was a Tragedy; yet Attilius is only counted in the number of Comic Poets in the Catalogue of (31) Volatius Sedigitus; and, according to Vossius's Remark, the Fragments, which Cicero, Varro, and Macrobius (32) cite of him, relish more of the Sock, than the Buskin. Whoever should pretend to make a difficulty of this, would be greatly deceived. Are not Corneille and Racine Tragic Poets only and absolutely? yet they have compos'd Comedies; and if Moliere had taken it into his Head to compose a Tragedy, as it is said Starron had a Mind to do at last, would he immediately have ceased to be a Comic Poet? A majori parte sumitur denominatio. — A Thing takes it's Name from that, which particularly distinguishes it. See the Remark [F]. But to return to the pretended Accusation against Accius's Style: It must be observed, that Cicero cited this Poet often; and that in his Oration pro Sextio he considered him as a great Poet: Summi Poeta ingenium non solum arte sua, sed etiam dolore exprimebat. — He expressed the Genius of this great Poet not only by his Art, but by his Concern. The Passage is curious: We learn from it, that the famous Actor Eso made use of Accius's Verses which had some Relation to Cicero's Exile; I say he made use of them to make the People sensible of that Injustice. The Romans were very apt to apply particular Sentiments of a Play to the present Times. See Suetonius (33), and the first and the tenth Phlippic of Cicero: They teach us that while a Tragedy of Accius was performing, the People did not cease to testify the Friendship they had for Brutus by their Applauses.

[K] A very just Reflexion, in answer to this Cavil.] Accius, going into Asia, pass'd through Tarentum, where he saw Pacuvius, who was retired thither in his old age. He shew'd him the Tragedy of Atreus, which he had in his Pocket, and read it to him. Pacuvius found it to be partly very sublime and poetical, and partly very rough and indigested. Accius acknowledg'd the friendly Criticism, and promis'd himself from thence Success in his future Productions; the Minds of Men being like Apples, which are never good, if they are not hard and green, before they are ripe. But it is better to weigh the Words of the Original (34). "Tunc Pacuvium dixisse aiunt sonora quidem esse quæ scripsisset & grandia, sed videri

(30) Vossius de Poët. Lat. p. 7. places the Words of Licinius in this order.

(31) Apud A. Gell. lib. 15. c. 24.

(32) I believe that Vossius de Poët. Lat. p. 8. is deceiv'd in what relates to Macrobius.

(33) Sueton. in Cæs. c. 14.

(34) A. Gell. lib. 13. cap. 2.

(21) Cicero pro Archia Poët. cap. 11.

(22) Valer. Maxim. lib. 8. cap. 14.

(23) Scrivener. in Testim. de Attio.

(24) Vossius de Poët. Lat. p. 7.

(25) In the Remark [N].

(26) Vell. Patercul. lib. 2. cap. 5.

(27) Cic. in Brut. p. 197.

(28) Id. E. p. 14. ad Attic.

carries no less good Sense with it [L]. Tho' he was short of Stature, he caus'd a very large Statue of himself to be erected in the Temple of the Muses (c). The Respect paid to him was so great, that a Player was punish'd [M], only for mentioning him by Name upon the Stage. We shall see, in the Remarks, whether Valerius Maximus's Account of one Accius, a Poet, who refus'd to rise, and pay his Compliment to Julius Cæsar, in an Assembly of the Poets, be applicable to our Accius. Cicero speaks very contemptibly of one Accius, who wrote an History; and, as our Tragic

(c) Notatum ab auctoribus & L. Accium Poëtam in Camenarum æde maximam formam Statuam sibi posuisse, cum brevissimum fuisset. Plin. Hist. Nat. lib. 34. cap. 5. Charles Stephens is mistaken, in saying that Dec. Brutus erected this Statue to him. Lloyd and Hoffman have adopted this Mistake.

Poet

videri ea tamen sibi duriora paulum & acerbiora. Ita est, inquit, Accius, uti dicis, neque id sanè me pœnitet, meliora enim fore spero quæ deinceps scribam. Nam quod in pomis est, itidem, inquit, esse aiunt in ingeniis, quæ dura & acerbata nascuntur, post sunt mitia & jucunda: sed quæ gignuntur statim vieta & mollia atque in principio sunt uvida, non matura mox sunt, sed putria. Relinquendum igitur visum est in ingenio quod diè & atque ætas mificet. This puts me in mind of a piece of Advice Lipsius gave to young Men. The extravagant Fondness he had conceiv'd for I know not what consciousness of Style, which disgusts the Readers of that great Man's Letters, or makes them laugh, did not hinder him from condemning those young Men, who affect Brevity. He said it was the direct Road to a meagre, thin Style; and that they ought to have many Superfluities at that Age, which might be pruned, as they advanc'd farther in Years (35). "Adeo

(35) Lipsius in Epist. Inuit. Epist.

"juventutem ad brevitatem non voco; ut etiam absterream, five quia tuo adfumere vix potest; & brevitas imitatio facillimè ætatem hanc decipit: five quia nec utiliter potest, & juvenili illo brevitas studio aridus plerumque & exsiccus stilus evadit, nec facile ad laudatam illam temperiem venit, nisi initio ubertas quædam & luxuries sit quam ætas paulatim depascit. — I am so far from advising Youth to Brevity, that I deter them from it as much as possible; either because it is unsafe, and apt to deceive tender Years; or because it is useless, and by this juvenile Affliction of Brevity, a Style becomes dry and insipid; nor is it easy to arrive at that happy Temperament in Writing, unless at first there be some redundancy and luxuriancy of Style, which Time, by little and little, may wear off." Balzac

(36) Balzac in Epist. select.

(36) was of the same Opinion. "Amputanda plura sunt efflorescenti illi ætati, quam inferenda; facillime est remedium ubertatis; sterilia nullo labore superantur. — That Age requires more pruning; that cultivating: Redundancy is easily remedied, but Barrenness with great Difficulty." But to return to Accius, it has been well observ'd in the Dictionary of Charles Stephens, and in those that were built on the same Foundation, That Quintilian excus'd him, by laying the Blame on the Time in which he liv'd (37). "Tragediæ Scriptores Accius atque Pacuvius clarissimi gravitate sententiarum, verborum pondere & autoritate Personarum. Cæterum nitor & summa in excolendis operibus manus magis videri potest temporibus quam ipsi desuisse. Virium tamen Accio plus tribuitur, Pacuvium videri doctorem, qui esse docti affectant, volunt. — Among the Writers of Tragedy, Accius and Pacuvius are the most famous, for the Weight of their Sentiments, the Energy of their Expressions, and the Dignity of their Characters. The want of Polishing and Finishing was owing rather to the Times, than to the Poets themselves. The Learned attribute more of Genius to Accius, and of Learning to Pacuvius." One would think that Quintilian copies these Verses of Horace:

(38) Horat. Epist. 2. lib. 2. ver. 55.]

Ambigitur quoties uter utro sit prior, autest Pacuvius docti famam senis, Accius alti (38).

When Accius and Pacuvius are compar'd, Both are esteem'd; both meet with great Reward. Pacuvius all the Critics Voices gains For Learning, Accius for his lofty Strains.

CREECH.

There is a Passage of Ovid, which seems to charge I know not what of Savage and Brutal upon Accius's Style; but, everything considered, I should rather understand by it the cruel Actions describ'd by him in his Tragedies. Ovid's Sentiment is, that if one were to judge of a Man's Manners by his Writings, Accius must be accounted Brutal; Terence a Lover of good Cheer; and those who treat of warlike Matters, brave and valiant Men.

VOL. I.

Accius esset atrox; convivæ Terrentius essent, Essent pugnaces, qui sæta bella canunt (39).

For Cruelty would Accius censur'd be, And Terence prais'd for Mirth and Jollity. Who Wars alarms, and Martial Deeds indite, Of course must be the Dev'l and all in Fight.

[L] Carries no less good Sense with it.] Quintilian has preserv'd this little Circumstance. "Aiunt (40) "Accium interrogatum cur causas non ageret; cum apud eum in Tragediis tanta vis esset, hanc reddidisse rationem, quod illic ea dicerentur quæ ipse vellet, in foro dicturi adversarii essent quæ minime vellet. — In my own Tragedies, answered he, I say what I please, but at the Bar, I am oblig'd to bear what I dislike." I know a Man of Wit, who made use of a like Reason, to divert his Son from the Study of the Law, and to encourage him to the Study of Divinity. "What is more convenient, said he to him, than to speak before Persons who cannot contradict you? This Advantage have Preachers. And what more inconvenient than, when you have done speaking, to hear yourself confuted, and oblig'd, without Mercy, to give an Account of all you have said? This the Condition of an Advocate." This puts me in mind of a Thought of Mr Montagne: "As for the Gift of Eloquence (41), says he, some have a Facility and Readiness, and which may be called Gift of Utterance, so easy that they are ready upon every Occasion: Others are slow, and speak only what is premeditated and elaborate. — If I were to give my Opinion in these two different Advantages of Eloquence, of which Preachers and Lawyers now a-days make the chief Profession, the slow speaker seems to me the best qualify'd for a Preacher, the other for a Lawyer; because the Employment of the former gives him as much time, as he pleases to prepare himself; and he goes on with the Thread of his Discourse, without any interruption: But the Lawyer is oblig'd to enter every Moment into the Lists, and the unforeseen Answers of his Adversary disconcert his Measures in an Instant (42). — The Advocate's Business is more difficult than the Preacher's, and yet we find more tolerable Advocates; in my Opinion, than Preachers, at least in France.

(39) Ovid. Trist. lib. 2.

(40) Quintilian. Institut. Orat. lib. 5. cap. 15.

(41) Montagne's Essays, B. 1. chap. 10. at the beginning, p. 52, 53.

(42) The same, p. 54.

[M] A Player was punish'd.] Being brought before the Judges to give Satisfaction for this Injury, he said in defence of himself, that it was lawful to name a Man who gave his Pieces to be represented on the Stage. Publius Mutius, before whom the Cause was try'd, condemn'd him. The satyric Poet Lucilius, had not the same Success; for the Comedian, who had offended him, by naming him on the Stage, was acquitted. So true is it, that all Judges are not of the same Humour, or that some Persons are more considered than others. The Author, who reports these two Cases, expresses himself thus (43): "Mimus quidam nominatim Accium poetam compellavit in scena: cum eo Accius injuriarum agit: hic nihil defendit, nisi licere nominari eum cujus nomine scripta dentur agenda. — Caius (44) Coelius judex absolvit eum injuriarum qui Lucilius poetam in scena nominatim læserat, Publius Mutius eum, qui L. Accium poetam nominaverat, condemnavit. — A certain Player mention'd the Poet Accius by Name, upon the Stage: Accius sued him for Damages: the other only pleaded in his Defence, that it was lawful to name a Person, who wrote for the Stage. — Caius Cælius, the Judge, acquitted him, who had affronted the Poet Lucilius, by naming him on the Stage; Publius Mutius condemn'd him, who had offered the same Insult to Accius." Glandarius did not know where this Story

(43) Autor Rhetoricor. ad Herenn. lib. 1.

(44) Ibid. lib. 2.

Poet compos'd Annals, some will have it, that Cicero abus'd him in this Place. Others deny it [N]. At the same time liv'd an Orator; of no ill Reputation, named Accius, against whom Cicero defended Cluentius. He was of Pisaurum; which might make him pass for one of our Poet's Relations [O]. It is not true, that Cicero speaks likewise of another celebrated Orator of this Name, surnam'd Navius. Mr Moreri blunders here. He did not consider, that this Accius Navius is no other than a famous Augur, whom he takes notice of, a few Pages after, under the Article ACTIVS NÆVIUS (f). He is no less deceiv'd, when he distinguishes between the Tragic Poet, and the Analist, cited by Macrobius. What he adds, that Aulus-Gellius speaks likewise of Accius the Historian, distinct from the Writer of Tragedies, ch. 9. Book 3. is doubly false. This Author mentions no Accius, in that place; and wherever he speaks of Accius, he must be understood to mean the Tragic Poet. Some Authors have expos'd themselves to Ridicule for having imitated, or admir'd, the Latin of this Accius [P], in an Age, when the Language was in much greater Purity.

(7) Cic. de Divin. lib. 1. mentions him. Moreri cites lib. de Divin. in Verr. but he is a false Reporter.

(45) Glind. Oroniat. p. 3.

(46) Catullus, from whom Glindorp does not cite the Passage; but it is found in the Commentary on Plin. 3. Epist. lib. 5. p. 291.

(47) In the Remark [K].

Story was to be met with, but (45) reports it only on the Credit of a (46) modern Author, whose false Gloss he copies, to wit, that the Defendant was condemn'd, because he had not prefix'd any Titles of Honour or Respect to Accius's Name. Sine præstatione honoris nominaverat.

[N] Others deny it. I am inclin'd to be of their Opinion; for, besides that Cicero, who was so often nam'd, and so often cited our Accius, either with Commendation, or, at least, without blaming him, would, with an ill Grace, abuse him in his 11th Book of Legibus; I observe, that these Abuses are altogether opposite to the Character of him, who is the Subject of this Article. Elevation, Grandeur, and Force, were the Character of Accius; and we have seen (47) the Testimony of Horace and Quintilian, concerning him; to which we may add two Verses of Ovid, and a decisive Decree of Paterculus.

Ennius arte carens, ANIMOSIQUE Accius oris
Casurum nullo tempore nomen habent. (48)

(48) C. 14. Amer. lib. 1. Eleg. 15. ver. 19.

Ennius, the Artless, Accius the SUBLIME,
Shall stand, unmot'd, the rude Attacks of Time.

(49) Paterc. lib. 2. cap. 5.

" Clara (49) etiam par idem ævi spatium fuere ingenia, in togatis Afranii, in Tragediis Pacuvii atque Attii usque in Græcorum comparisonem EVECTI, magnique inter hos ipsos facientis operi suo locum; adeo quidem ut in illis limæ, in hoc pene plus videatur fuisse SANGUINIS. — About the same time flourish'd, in Oratory, Afranius, in Tragedy, Pacuvius, and Accius, whose Reputation rival'd that of the most famous Greeks; inasmuch that there seem'd to be more Correctness in the latter, but more Life and Spirit in the former." If this new Evidence, which I have produc'd, be as strong as the foregoing; this, which follows, goes beyond all I have already reported; for here Accius is preferred to the great Euripides; " Accius poeta (50) suo ingenio præcellit Euripidem, qui fuit altus et ingenio sublimis. — The Poet Accius had a Genius superior to That of the lofty and sublime Euripides."

(50) Acron. upon Horace, Epist. 1. L. 2.

(51) Columella de Re Rustica, lib. 3. Præf.

Another (51) celebrates Accius and Virgil for the two most excellent Poets of Rome: " An Latine Musæ non solos adytis suis Accium & Virgilium recepere, sed eorum & proximis & procul à secundis sacras concessere sedes? — Did the Latin Musæ receive not only Accius and Virgil into their Temple, but even Poets of an inferior Class?" Is it likely that such a Man wrote an History worthy of this Censure of Cicero (52): " Nam quid Accium memorem, cuius loquacitas habet aliquid argutiarum, nec id tamen ex illa erudita Græcorum copia, sed ex librariis olis Latinis? In orationibus autem multus & ineptus, ad summam impudentiam. — Why should I mention Accius, in whose wordy Style there is indeed some Wit; but a Wit borrow'd from the trifling Productions of the Latins, not from the learned Græcian Stores? Besides, in his Speeches he is tedious and impertinent, even to the biggest Degree of Assurance." Observe well, that the Annals of the Tragic Poet Accius were in Verse; and that Cicero speaks here only of those who had writ Histories in Latin Prose; for he says nothing of Ennius. Our best Critics think that this Passage of Cicero is corrupted; and that we must not read Accium, but Macrum. So that the Censure will fall on the Historian Licinius Macer. Vossius (53) embraces this Opinion; but when he brings for a Proof the Friendship that was between Sisenna and him, whom Cicero abus'd, when, I say, he concludes from thence, that Cicero did not speak of Accius, he is mistaken; for, by his good leave, Accius and Sisenna, were very near of the same Age. (54) Sisenna was old after the Civil War of Marius and Sylla; that is to say, about the Year 672 of Rome, and Accius was not dead in 665.

[O] Pass for one of our Poet's Relations.] St Jerome observes (55), speaking of the Poet Accius, That he was carried to Pisaurum, when the Romans sent a Colony there; and that there was a spot of Ground near the City, called Fundus Accianus. It was his Share of the Land, which was divided among the Inhabitants of That new Colony. Scaliger observes (56) upon this, That the Colony of Pisaurum was not settled 'till four Years after that of Bologna; that is, in the Year of Rome 568, fifteen Years before Accius was born. We may say, therefore, that St Jerome was mistaken. Rome was a proper place of Residence for a Poet, who was the Glory of the Theatre in those Times, than a Colony: But we must not imagine this Mistake to be without any Foundation. Perhaps the Father of Accius follow'd those, who conducted the Colony to Pisaurum; and perhaps The Patron to whom he ow'd his Liberty, was one of the chief Commissioners of That new Settlement. Now (supposing he follow'd his Patron, he might have had That Land to his share, which was afterwards call'd Fundus Accianus, and, among other Children, he might have left the Father of the Orator Accius. See how Cicero (57) speaks of This Orator. " T. Accium Pisaurensem, cujus accusationi respondi pro A. Cluentio, qui & accurate dicebat & latius profuse, eratque præterea doctus Hermagoræ preceptis, quibus etiam ornamenta non satis optima dicendi, tamen ut huius velutibus amentate, sic apta quadam & parata fingulis causarum generibus argumenta traduntur. — Titus Accius of Pisaurum, to whose Accusation I answer'd, in Defence of A. Cluentius; who spoke accurately and fluently enough, and was besides vers'd in the Precepts of Hermagoras, which, though destitute of the Pomp of Rhetoric, yet, like the Darts flung by light-arm'd Soldiers, furnish us with apt and ready Arguments, in every kind of Cause." Scaliger does not censure St Jerome, for having confus'dly (58) placed the great Reputation and Death of Pacuvius, in the third Year of the 156th Olympiad, and the great Reputation of Accius, in the second Year of the 160th Olympiad. This can only serve to confound those, who know that Pacuvius was fifty Years older than Accius. For if it should be suppos'd, that Pacuvius died about 90 Years of Age, in the Year in which St Jerome speaks of his Death, it must be said that Accius was about 40 Years of Age, in the third Year of the 156th Olympiad; and yet, according to St Jerome, he was born in the Consulship of Mancinus and Serranus, which falls under the second Year of the 152d Olympiad. So that, as I hinted in the second Remark, we must not depend entirely upon That Chronologist in this Case.

[P] The Latin of this Accius.] Perfius and Martial were very severe upon People. (59)

Est nunc (60) Brizii quem venosus liber Acci, Sunt quos Pacuviusque & verrucosa moratur
Antiopa, ærumnia cor ludificabile fulta.

Some fond are grown of Fustian Accius' Rage,
Or love Pacuvius' antiquated Page.

(53) Vossius de Hist. Lat. lib. 1. c. 10.

(54) Vell. Patercul. lib. 2. c. 9.

(55) In Chron. Eccles. n. 1876.

(56) Scalig. Anim. in Ensch. lib. 1. ex Patercul. lib. 1. cap. 15.

(57) Cicero in Brut. c. 3. See also the Orator pro Cluentio.

(58) Pacuvius' Reputation was not made a fine Writer of Tragedies: He liv'd at Rome, was a little profuse in Pointing and Dramatic Poetry. Afterwards returning to Tarentum, he died about 90 Years of Age. Ensch. Chron. n. 1685.

(59) Perf. Sat. 1. v. 76.

(60) Casaubon upon this Passage says, that it should be read Brizii, and that it was the Title of a Tragedy of Accius. Scriverius, in Testimonium de Attio, it mischance in bel. eving, that Perfius does not speak of the Tragic Poet.

*So great Antipain's Grief appears,
The Tragic Tale dissolves them into Tears.*

Here what Marital says of them in the 91st Epigram of the 11th Book.

Attonitufque legis Terrai frugiferai, Accius & quidquid Pacuviusque vomunt.

You are extremely fond of obsolete Expressions, such as Terrai frugiferai, and whatever Accius and Pacuvius pour forth.

Had they imitated those old Authors, in the manner our finest Wits imitate Marot at present, and the other Poets of the XVth Century, in Fables, Ballads, Pindaric Odes, Stanzas, &c. compos'd designedly in their antiquated Style, I do not see that any Body could reasonably have found Fault with them. But I suppose they made use of that obsolete Style in good earnest, and took it for a Standard of Eloquence, either entirely adopting it, or mixing it with the Language of their own Times. See (61) the good Advice which Phavorinus gave a young Man in this Way of thinking. We are not subject at present to this Distemper. More Persons are disgusted even with a common Expression, or run too eagerly after new coin'd Words, than affect to retain obsolete Expressions (62). Whenever the old Language is made use of, it is by way of Pleasantry in Salles of Wit, and Burlesque Works. It is only in Latin, that Authors are yet found, who are fond of the oldest Phrases. Doubtless there was another sort of Men among the ancient Romans, when Latin was come to it's Perfection. There were perpetual Admirers of the old Poets, without using, or intending to make use of, their superannuated Expressions; their Attention was only to mortify the Writers of their own Time, by extolling those of Antiquity above them. Horace apprehended their Design perfectly, when he said,

*Sic fautor veterum, ut tabulas peccare vetantes,
Quas bis quinque viri sanxerunt, fœdera regum
Vel Gabii, vel cum rigidis æquata Sabinis,
Pontificum libros, annosa volumina varum
Disstitet Albano Mufas in monte locutas.*

*Jam Saliare Numæ carmen qui hædat, & illud
Quod mecum ignorat, solus vult scire videri,
Ingenii non ille facit, plauditiq; sepultis,
Nostra sed impugnat, nos nostraque lividus odit.* (63)

*So fond of all that's ancient are we grown,
Nothing, forsooth, of modern Date will down.
Or's the Decemvirs Laws devout we pore,
And ancient Leagues, with Sabines made, adore.
The Augur's Leaves transported we admire,
And Bards, grown obsolete, can never tire.
These flow'd not, sure, from any human Skill:
The Muses gave them from th' Aonian Hill.*

*When Numa's Song above our Verse you raise,
And, what you understand not, dare to praise,
'Tis not, that fond of ancient Bards you're grown;
Every forbids you to applaud our own.*

This is a Distemper from which our Age is also exempted. We are contented to place Greece and ancient Rome above our own Age; but we do not prefer the Speeches and Poems of the XVth and XVIth Centuries, before those which are made at present.

ACCO. Charles Stephen reports that she was an Old Woman, who ran mad with Vexation, by seeing in a Looking-glass how homely old Age had made her. He cites the 15th Chapter of the 6th Book of Cælius Rhodoginus, but (a) nothing like it is to be found there. The Continuator of Moreri adds, That this Woman pleas'd herself with speaking to her Image before a Looking-Glass; and that oftentimes she seem'd to refuse, what she most desired. Plutarch adds, continues he, that Mothers us'd to frighten little Children, and keep them to their Duty, with her Name. He cites the 16th Book of Cælius Rhodoginus, and Cicero's Second ad Atticum. I shall criticise on this Passage [A] below. In the mean time let us hear what Rhodoginus says in a Passage, which is not (b) cited. Acco doated in such a manner, that when she look'd in her Glass, she entertain'd herself with her Reflexion, as if it had been another Woman; she was seen to make use of Signs, Promises, Threats, Smiles, and of all that is practised in Conversation. Others write, that she endeavour'd sometimes to drive a Nail with a Sponge as if she had held a Hammer. Rhodoginus says no more of her. As for Plutarch, he (c) only says, that Chryssippus did not approve of frightening us from our Sins by the Divine Justice; For, said he, we don't want Arguments against what is said about Divine Punishments, which shew that such Discourses resemble those of good Women, who frighten little Children with Acco and Alphito [B], to binder them from idling away their time. Plutarch shews afterwards that Chryssippus contradicted himself.

[A] Criticise on this Passage.] First, None of the three Authors mentioned have said, That Acco ran mad with Vexation, for having seen herself ugly in a Looking-glass; and that she seem'd to refuse what she most desired. This is ascribed to Plutarch by Name, and for this Reason, because, after having reported Acco's Folly, her being deceiv'd by her own Image, and her Dissimulation, the next Words are, Plutarch adds.—But I. This is to assert that Plutarch reported these three Facts; and consequently is to deceive the World, since that Author only relates what I have cited of him. II. How careless is it to cite only Cicero 2d ad Atticum? Does he mean the 2d Letter or the 2d Book? must the Reader be left to guess which? Must he be at the trouble to examine what Letter, what Book it is? They, who shall have the Patience to look for it, will yet lose their Labour. They will find in the 19th Letter of the 2d Book. Cerri sumus perijisse omnia: quid enim benequædam tam diu? My third Censure is, that Cicero is falsely cited; He says nothing of Acco. The Greek Word he made use of, and which many other Authors use to signify what we call wheedling, evading, raising Difficulties about things, which we heartily wish for; that Word, I say, which Erasmus (1) plac'd among his Proverbs, gave occasion to suspect that Acco was an Hypocrite; but it is only a Conjecture; and it ought not to be permitted an Author to cite Plutarch, or Cicero, or Cælius Rhodoginus, for Conjectures which other Persons have advanc'd.

[B] Who frighten little Children with Acco, and Alphito.] I do not believe there is any Country in the World where there is not the like Custom. I have heard it condemn'd by very ingenious Doctors. The ancient Romans had their Manducus, wherewith they threaten'd Children, as I shall observe under that Word.

ACCORDS (STEPHEN TABOÛROT, Lord of) Advocate of the Parliament of Dijon, and afterwards the King's Advocate of the Bailiwick and Chancery of the same Town, was born in the Year 1549 (a). He was a Man of Wit and Letters, but too fond of Trifles. This appears from a Work of his, entitled Bigarrures (The Miscellaneous), (61) Horat.

Epist. 1. lib.
2. ver. 23.

(a) Lloyd altered nothing, except that he cites Rhodo- ginus at the 16th Book,
chap. 2.

(b) The 2d chap. of the 16th Book.
He says, that he read this in the Epi-tome of the Adages of Tarræus and Dydimus.

(c) Plutarch.
de Stoicorum repugnanti-
p. 1040. B.

(1) See Ac-
cittare, in Adag. chil.
2. cent. 2.
n. 99.

(a) It appears from an Inscription found in France, that in 1584 he was 35
Years of Age.

(b) See the Table of Matters in the Word ACCORDS

Miscellany), the first Edition of which is of Paris, in 1582 [A]. I have quoted it upon some occasions (b). This was not his first Performance; for he had printed some Songs (c): which la Croix du Main, and du Verdier Vau-Privas, were not aware of. His Work, which he calls Les Touches (The Touches), was printed at Paris in the

Year

(c) See the 4th Book of his Miscellany, the Paris Edition, for Maucroy, in 1662, in 12mo. p. 477.

[A] A Work of his, entitled—The Miscellany, the first Edition of which is of Paris, in 1582.] He points out this Year in the Preface to the second Edition, and he ought rather to be believed, than La Croix du Main, and Du Verdier Vau-Privas, who place the first Edition of the Miscellany, in 1583. The first Book of the Miscellany is divided into twenty two Chapters, which treat, among other Matters, of the Rebus's of Picardie, of Puns, of Antistrophes, of Allusions, of Acrostics, of the Eccho, of Leonin Verses, and other Sorts of Measure, pleasantly and ingeniously contrived, of Epitaphs, &c. All these are full of Mirth and Gaiety, as La Croix du Main assures us (1). The Printer does not diffeble, that he published this Work without the Author's leave, "Who de-

(1) Biblioth. Fr. p. 80.

(2) A. Pasquier's Advertisement to the Reader, at the beginning of the Miscellany.

(3) The Author's Preface to the Edit. of the Miscellany. It is dated at Veronney, Sept. 15, 1584.

(4) The same, fol. A. v.

clared publicly, (says he) (2) that Age, Time, and his Profession, had altered his Humour and Inclination; and that it would ill become him to lay claim to what he composed in his early Years, and in the Flower and Gaiety of his Youth; being then scarce eighteen Years old; and that, when he shall have given proof of his Abilities, in some noble and learned Subject, he would advise not to strangle his natural and illegitimate Offspring, got out of Marriage; for so he used to call his three first Books. Whence I judged that he was only looking about for an Excuse; which determined me to publish this Copy." Our Author, on his part, does not fail to pretend Ignorance. "I was very much surprized, says he (3), when I saw the first Impression of this Book, the Memory of which I thought was extinct. But, upon reading it again, as a new Work, not having seen it these fourteen Years, I presently discovered my own Genius and Style, at a time, when I composed it, first, for my own Diversion, and afterwards for that of others; in which I observed no Method, but threw together my Thoughts, without Connexion, as Whim and Fancy directed. The Book consists of loose detach'd Pieces, written upon Scraps of Paper, adjust'd together at different Times, a great part of which I always believed was lost. But, as every one is fond of his own Work, I had some Thoughts, at that time, of sending the Remainder of my Papers, which have increased since that time, together with those, which had been omitted." Notwithstanding this He adopts and owns this second Edition. "Upon which account, continues he (4), I have read over this idle Book from one end to the other, which I never did before, in order to re-publish it according to my own true Conception of it. And as since that time I have recollected some little Pieces of a curious Nature, and others have been kindly communicated to me by one of the most learned Men in France, on the same Subject, I have added them to it in the Manner of an Appendix by the Author."

Pasquier disapproved of Talbourot's making Additions to his Miscellany. It was staying too long, he thought, in places which ought only to be pass'd by; and which ought to be considered as a Traveller's Inn, not as his Lodging. Such a Work should be looked upon as an Excursion, not as a fix'd Abode. Youth is an excuse for spending a few Hours in such Trifles; but if, some Years after, an Author applies himself to retouch them, and to make Additions, it seems as if he intended tantum ad Sirenium scopulos consensuere, to grow old at the Sirens Rocks. After this manner Pasquier express'd himself in a Letter to the Sieur Talbourot, in the Year 1584. "I have read over your entertaining Miscellany, and I read it with Pleasure, not only on account of that Friendship I bear you, but likewise for that genteel and lively Wit, with which it abounds; or rather because it is something whimsical, and diversify'd with a great Variety of fine Strokes. I could wish there had been no Additions made to the first Impression. If I judge right, many of the Additions do not relish of your Wit; and I should easily be persuaded, that some other Hand has bestowed these ill-tim'd Alms upon you. We should consider such Subjects as matter of meer Diversion, not as a Duty incumbent on us, and which requires our whole Attention. You will find by this, that I love and honour you, since I take the Liberty, for the first time, to address myself thus freely to you (5).

I believe Des Accords did not regard this Advice; and that he made still farther Additions to his Miscellany, when he reprinted it. I have the Paris Edition of 1614, where we find not only the fourth Book of the Miscellany; but likewise the facetious Tales of the Sieur Gaulard, &c. collected by the Sieur Des Accords. This fourth Book is not preceded either by a second or third; nevertheless the Author gives many Reasons why he calls it the fourth (6), and, among other things, says, that "this whole Volume would not have been new and uncommon enough, if he had followed the Example of the generality of Authors." He confesses, that he added the Tales of the Sieur Gaulard to promote the Sale. "They, says he (7), who have purchased only the first Book, in order to laugh and be merry, will be induced to buy this likewise for the sake of the entertaining Pieces I have mixed with it; such as the Apophthegms, or designed Blunders, or absurd Reflexions of Mr Gaulard; which have been imitated by several others in France; but it is unjust to rob our Burgundian of the Glory of the Invention. By this means I act like the Widow of a certain Capitain, who would not sell his Horse, without his Cat.

Observe, that the fourth Book of the Miscellany is more serious than the first. It is divided into three Chapters. The first contains certain Observations useful in the Education of Children; the second relates to the Change of the Sir-Name; the third contains many particular Remarks on the French Poetry. The Work ends with a Discourse on pretended Sorcerers, and their Impostures. The whole abounds with curious Matters, and may be read with profit. This particular Character of the fourth Book is one of the Reasons, which the Author alleges in justification of his having published it before the second or third. It will be proper to produce his own Words. They will convince us, that he had not given up his ludicrous way of writing, upon Pasquier's Letter to him, since he apologizes for continuing it. "I did this (8), says he (9), chiefly with a Design of shewing by the Stile of this Book, that my Mind is disposed to other Subjects, as well as Burlesque ones, and to stop the Mouths of a Set of ignorant Detractors, who have maliciously objected this to me. And as to those who disapprove, that a Man of my Profession should descend to such Trifles both in Prose and Verse, I refer them to the learned preliminary Letter of the great Pasquier's French Epistles, who has shewn, as well from strong Reasons, as Examples, that we ought not to confine our Genius so obstinately to one single Profession, as never to allow it to unbend itself in more lively and gay Studies. I certainly commend those, who, like the Germans, can restrain themselves from following more than one Profession at once; but we must not therefore blame others, who, having a Genius for several, are able to manage them so well, as in every one to be little, if at all, inferior to the particular Professors of each. It is well known, that the French Genius is full of this Vivacity and Variety, and it is against our Inclinations when we are tied down to one Science. Why then should it be thought wrong in me, that I spend That Time (which others trifle away) in this honourable Employ, which is not empty and fruitless if we examine it nearly?

But he gives another Reason, which particularly shews, that he submitted but a little time to the Attacks of his Critics, and that he had no Intention to suppress the second Book, tho' a little too loose. "In the second, says he (10), I treat in the same manner of Periphrases, Hyperboles, Metonymies, Metaphors, Synecdoches, &c. and That in the perfect French Terms I could choose, and with such entertaining

(5) Pasquier's Letters, B. 3. Tom. 1. p. 472, 493.

(6) Preface to the 4th Book of the Miscellany.

(7) The same, fol. A. iii.

(8) i. e. publishes the 4th Book before the 2d and 3d.

(9) Preface to the 4th Book of the Miscellany, fol. A. ii.

(10) Pref. to the 4th Book of the Miscellany, A. iii.

Year 1585 [B]. It is a Collection of ingenious Pieces of Poetry, it must be confess'd; but for the most part on obscene Subjects, which he handled too freely, according to the vitious Practice of those Times. The same Vein runs thro' his Miscellany. He was reproach'd with this, which oblig'd him to justify himself [C]. Some ascribe to him A Dictionary of French Rhimes [D]. Lastly, The Lordship of Accords is an "entertaining Examples, as must give the Reader Pleasure. At present I shall take no notice of what may appear in it too loose and offensive to the Ears of our present squeamish Critics, as well as those formerly; and shall pass on directly to the fourth, in order to satisfy those of a more serious turn of Mind, who will have reason to thank me for some Discoveries never touched on, I believe, before."

[B] His Work which he calls — The Touches; was printed at Paris, in 1585.] He divided it into three Books and dedicated the first to a Prelate, namely Pontus of Tyard, Lord of Blissy, and Bishop of Chalon. He boasts of having compos'd them (11) in two Months, at Verdun upon Saone, in the Year 1585 (12); and tells us they are a kind of Epigrams, to which the Name of Touches is properly apply'd; "For it is a kind of light Fencing, in which with my Foil I give only a Touch, which scarce scratches the Skin, and cannot wound the Flesh" (13). In another place he tells us (14), "That the Touches is a Term borrowed from Fencers, who call the Thrust given with their Foils a Touch, the Mark of which appears upon the Cloaths of him that was hit, by reason of the Chalk; with which the Foil is whiten'd, &c." The Touches of Des Accords, which are generally printed at the end of the Miscellany, are different from those I am here speaking of.

[C] He was reproach'd with this, which oblig'd him to justify himself. I have quoted his Apology (15) in another place; and shall add here, that his Printer has thought fit to confirm it. "I have published, says he (16), the whole Copy, not caring any of those Expressions, which may be thought too loose and indecent, provided they were witty; for, notwithstanding the Author would have regard paid to chaste Ears, and would designedly have suppress'd several Passages, yet, having heard him hint, that it was ipsum evitare Priapum, and that an infinite Number of fine Strokes would lose all their Beauty, without this Liberty, I chose rather to follow his Opinion, than his Advice. He will pardon me for diving so far into his Thoughts; and let the following Lines of Catullus apologize for me;

Castum esse decet piūm Poētam
Ipsum, vericulos nihil necesse est;
Qui tum denique habent salem & leporem,
Si sunt Molliculi, & parum Pudici *

*Chaste must the Bard in every Action be,
Whilst his gay Muse from this Restraint is free.
Then only Verse can Wit and Humour know,
When wanton and scarce chaste the Numbers flow.*

"And I will venture to affirm, that this ought to be so far from offending any Person (some Hypocrites excepted) that, on the contrary, it will serve to put our Youth in mind, not to amuse themselves so much in these curious Enquiries, since they are to be met with in such Abundance, as is enough to create a Disgust towards them; and will occasion their applying themselves to the reading of good Books, whence they may reap Advantage: for I am fully perswaded, that the Multiplicity of Books, which we have at present, must prevent the mind from examining into, and carefully perusing, the best; even tho' we were sure to meet with Authors, who could teach us to find out a Hare's Form, or tell us where ready-chaw'd Meat was to be had. As to the Smut, I cannot imagine it will be so offensive, as Virgil's Priapeia, the Epigrams of Catullus and Martial, Ovid's Amours, Terence's Comedies, Petronius Arbiter, and

VOL. I. N^o III.

"in short, the finest Pieces of Antiquity, which are propos'd to our Youth as Patterns of Excellency; whereas our Author's Immodesty can never be consider'd in such a Light. But farther, every thing in this Book is curious, genteel, and ingenious; and the Author need not apologize for himself, by alledging the Levity of the Subject." The meaning of all this is, that Des Accords did not take this Liberty, in order to favour the Passions of the Heart, but purely to amuse the Imagination, and not to rob his Poetry of that Seasoning, which would render it more agreeable and high-flavoured, according to the Taste, which prevailed for many Ages. He was not ignorant of the Maxim, that coarse Smut is less dangerous than that which is delicate: for thus he applies it, in his own Vindication.

"Des Amadis (17).

"Qui voudra voir ces Ecrits,
Les life aupres de Samie,
Car ils donneront envie
A tous deux d'être lascifs.

Of The Amadis.

*You who would know the Force these Lines impart,
Read them before the Mistress of your Heart,
The tender Tale the melting maid will move,
And both dissolve in Extacies of Love.*

D'un Lecteur d'Amadis, qui blâmoit les Bigarrures

Toi, qui permets les lectures
D'Amadis, & ne veux pas
Qu'on life les Bigarrures, Cautelement tu as Appercu que les mot gras
N'entrent vivement dans l'ame,
Pour suborner une dame,
Comme les mignards appas.

On a Reader of the Amadis, who found fault with the Miscellany.

*Whilst you with wanton Amadis engage,
But shun the Miscellany's sportive Page,
Wisely your nice Discernment you approve,
That coarse Expressions less the Passions move,
Than those soft Touches, which the Fair inspire, Spight of themselves, with loose and warm Desire.*

This puts me in mind of a Thought of Sorel. "The Poets, says he (18), who compose Works liable to the Censure of the Magistrate, and which are usually burnt by the Hands of the Executioner, are very great Fools, in imagining, that they are pleasing to Debauchees; whereas it is impossible to read their obscene Collections without desiring to quit the Sport, they being so leud and wicked, as to create Horror in the Reader." But, not to disseminate any part of his Sentiment, I must observe, that he qualifies this a little. "But, when I give this as my Opinion, parlez he (19), I am aware, that it may be said, that we ought not then to forbid the reading of them, since they inspire Men with a hatred to Vice. But generous Minds only find the Effect: and we ought not to enjoin such Penances, as expose Men to Temptation. There are but too many, who take a Pleasure in being conversant with Filth."

[D] Some ascribe to him A Dictionary of French Rhimes.] La Croix du Main had made him Author of a Book, entitled French Rhimes (20); but he corrected himself, and acknowledged (21) that it ought to be ascribed to John le Fevre, a Native of Dijon,

R

(17) Des Accords in the Touches, printed with the Miscellany, at Paris, for Maucroix, in 1662. 12mo pag. 82.

(18) Sorel's Remarks on the Extravagant Shepherd, B. 11. p. 379. Edit. of Roüen, in 1646. in 2 Vol. 8vo.

(19) The same, p. 379.

(20) Biblioth. Francoise, p. 156.

(21) The same, p. 222. and observe, that he says, this Dictionary of French Rhimes was printed at Paris for Gallot du Pre, 1572.

(11) In the Epistle Dedicated.

(12) This is a Proof that he did not regard Pasquier's Preface.

(13) Epistle Dedicated.

(14) Adversus the Touches, printed with the Miscellany.

(15) In the Remark [M] of the Article M A R O T.

(16) Andr. Palaequet.

* Carm. 16. ver. 5.

(4) See la Croix du Main, p. 151.

(5) See his Epitaph in his Sonnet Miscellany.

(22) Bignures, B. 4. c. 3. p. 494.

(24) Pref. to the Dictionary.

an imaginary Fief, founded upon a Device of his Ancestors [E]. Observe that WILLIAM TABOUROT, his Father, who was Advocate of the Parliament of Dijon, King's Council, and Master extraordinary of the Chamber of Accounts, is much commended by Peter of St Julian, in his Work Of the Origin of the Burgundians (d). He died the 24th of July 1561, in the 46th Year of his Age (e).

(24) Pref. to the 4th Book of the Miscellany.

(25) Ibid. c. 2. B. 4.

Secretary of the Cardinal de Givri; and Canon of Langres. This Retraction is just; for Des Accords declared, that this Work did not belong to Him. These are his Words, at the end of his Chapter on French Poetry: "I shall hereafter, says he (22), give my Opinion more fully, in the Collection I am preparing of the French Poetics; in which I find the way smooth'd for me, with great Learning and Labour, by Pelletius, divinely and much to the Purpose by Ronsard (as he does every thing), and with great Address (considering his Time) by Quintil the Critic, and several others: whose Affiance I shall make use of, mentioning their Names, and referring to their Text, in compiling a Sequel to the Dictionary of French Rhimes, by my Uncle, Mr Le Fevre, which I shall shortly publish." What inclines me to believe he kept his Word, is a Passage which I meet with in the Dictionary of French Rhimes, printed at Paris, in 1596, by the Heir of Eustace Vignon, in Octavo. The Author begins thus: "At first, says he (23), I collected this Dictionary, by way of Amusement, almost as it is at present, as to the Quantity of Words, being desirous to affix the Defect of a treacherous Memory. Afterwards meeting with That of the Sieur Des Accords, enriched with several Remarks upon Rhime, I was prompted to review my own, and to philosophize a little upon this Subject; which I have not done without Success." [E] The Lordship of Accords is an imaginary Fief, founded upon a Device of his Ancestors. Let us hear his own Account: "Since in my Discourse, says he (24), on changing the Sir-Name (25), I blame those who do it; and since, by assuming the Title of Lord of Accords, I declare myself worthy of the same Censure; I must inform you, that my Name is composed of the first Letters of the several Chapters of my first Book, by way of Acrostic (26); and after the same manner the second Book informs you of it's Age, and the Place where it was composed. But to raise the Subject, I did not put my real Name, but a Lordship framed upon a Device of my own, which was a Drum * (27), round which I put these Words A tous Accords, which had been constantly my Father's, Grand Father's, and Great Grand Father's Motto. In the Chapter of particular Remarks on the French Poetry; you will find the Occasion of erecting this Device into a Lordship." It is proper to produce what he relates in the Chapter to which he refers us. He had sent a Song to a beautiful and virtuous young Lady, Daughter of the late learned President of Bourgoigne, Mr Begat, who, says he (28), did me the Honour to be in Love with me. — And whereas, continues he, I had subscribed the Sonnet only with the Words of my Device A tous Accords, she was the first, who, in her Answer, christen'd me Seigneur des Accords, as her Father often afterwards called me; for which Reason, in all my Writings since that time, I have made choice of this Sir-Name, and even in these Books." He gave himself likewise, by way of Anagram, the Name of Torvobatus, as Mr Baillet assures us (29).

(26) The 1st Letter of the 1st chapter is an E; that of the 2d an S; and so on to the 1st of the 16th chap. which is a T; and all together they make ESTIENNE TABOUROT (Stephen Tabourot). This had been done by others before. See Mr Baillet, in his Disquisition on the Author, pag. 442, 446.

* In French Tambour.

(27) It was then a Speaking Device, and a plain Allusion to his real Name Tabourot.

(28) Miscellany, B. 4. c. 3. p. 491. 492.

(29) Ubi supra, p. 442, 607.

ACCURSIUS, Professor of Civil Law in the XIIIth Century, was a Florentine. He acquired a very great Reputation by the Comments he composed on the Body of the Law. It is said that he begun but late to study the Law; and that he was 40 Years of Age [A] when he first attended the Lectures of the famous Azo. He had applied himself before that time to other Studies. The Progress he made in the Civil Law was so great, that he became a famous Professor in that Science, which he taught at Bologna; and, afterwards burying himself in Retirement, he compos'd A Perpetual Comment on the whole Law, which appeared so convenient and useful to young Students, that the former Glosses were no more spoken of, which doubtless were not so well disposed, nor so compleat. Some think that the Contradictions, which are observ'd in Accursius, do not proceed from his Inconstancy, or a Defect of Memory, but from this, viz. that in reporting the different Opinions of those, who had preceded him, he had distinguished them only by the initial Letters of their Names: Which Letters disappearing in several Places, was the Cause of his Readers taking that for His Opinion, which he only produced in Proof of another's Sentiments. His Authority was formerly so great [B], that some call'd him the Idol of the (31) Pancir. de clar Leg. Interpr. lib. 2. cap. 29.

(2) Pope Blount's Conf. Celeb. Autor. p. 236.

(3) Fortier's History of the Civil Law, lib. 3. c. 12.

(4) Raphael Fulgo'us de Action. & Oblig. apud Fr. Hortmannum, Pref. Conf. Morum.

[A] And that he was 40 Years of Age. Others say that he was but 28. "Jam quadragenarius, vel, ut 'alli scribunt xxviii. annos natus ius civile ab Azone' audivit. — At the Age of 40, or as others write 'xxviii, he learnt Civil Law from Azo.'" These are Pancirallus's Words (1), in the 147th Page of his second Edition, which is That of Venice, 1655. Sir Thomas Pope Blount (2), citing Pancirallus, and Koenig, puts 37, and not 28 Years. The Citation of Koenig is good, but that of Pancirallus is not, unless my Edition differs from the first. Forster would have been more properly cited (3); for he reports, that Accursius became a Disciple of Azo, at 37 Years of Age. See the Remark [F].

[B] His Authority was formerly so great. I cannot cite any thing more proper or entertaining, in this Place, than a Passage quoted by one of the modern Civilians, with whom the Glossographers were least in Esteem. "Nostris (4) quanta fit autoritas glossatoris. 'Nonne heri dixit Cyn. Glossam timendam propter preceptum Idololatrum pro Advocatis, significans quod sicut Antiqui adorabant Idola pro Diis, ita Advocati adorant Glossatores pro Evangelistis. Volo enim potius pro me Glossatorem quam Textum; nam si allego Textum, dicant Advocati diversimodum

'partis & etiam Judices, credis tu quod Glossa non ita viderit illum Textum, sicut Tu, & non ita bene intellexerit, sicut tu? Ego recorder (& sit illud pro novo) quod dum essem Scholaris, eram satis acutus, & dum semel essemus multi Socii in una collatione, ausus fui unum Textum allegare contra sententiam Doctoris mei: tantum audaciam habui. Dixit unus Socius, Tu loqueris contra Glossam, quae dicit sic. Et ego respondi, est Glossa dicit sic, ego dico sic; ignarus auctoritatis Glossatorum. Credebam enim quod essent quales sunt in libris Grammaticae, sicut super Virgilio & Ovidio, sed tamen non ita est; fuerunt enim Glossatores maxime scientiae viri & auctoritatis. Magis ergo standum est eis qui viderunt totum corpus Juris, quam nobis qui non vidimus. — 'You know the great Authority of a Commentator. Was it not said yesterday by Cyn. that a Comment was a terrible thing, on account of That Idolatry always paid to it by the Advocates; intimating, that as the Antients adored Idols for Gods, so the Advocates adored Commentators for Evangelists. I had much rather have the Comment, than the Text, favour my Opinion; for, if I appeal to the Text, the Advocates, on the other side, and even the Judges, cry out, Do you think the Advocates (a). Most Interpreters have taken as much (b) or more (c) Care to explain his Gloss, as to comment on the very Text of the Law. Some Critics, great Lovers of polite Language, have exclaim'd with great vehemence against the barbarous Style of this Author [C], but the general Opinion is, that he was a great Genius; and that his Defects proceeded from the Age wherein he liv'd [D]. He liv'd very much at his ease, having both a fine City and Country-House, and two Sons, who were very studious, as we shall see presently. Some Persons say, that he had a very learned Daughter [E], and initiated in the Profession of the Civil Law. He died in the Year 1229, at 78 Years of Age [F]. His Tomb is to be seen at Bologna, in the Church of the Cordeliers, with this (d) very short and plain Inscription, Sepulchrum Accursii Glossatoris Legum, & Francisci ejus filii.—The Tomb of Accursius, the Commentator of Law, and his Son Francis. He said there was no need of Theology [G] to teach us Divine Things, since the Roman Laws sufficiently instructed

(a) Taken out of Pancirollus, lib. 2. cap. 2. de claris Legum Interpret. p. 147. &c.

(b) Arth. Duck of the Life and Authority of the Roman Civil Law, lib. 1. cap. 1. in Pope Blount's Cent. celebr. Autor. pag. 286.

(c) Forster's History of the Civil Law, lib. 3. c. 12.

(d) Pancirollus lib. p. 149.

"think the Comment did not see the Text, and understand it, as well as you? I remember, that, when I was a School-Boy, I was very acute; and that, many of us being together at the same Lecture, I had the Courage to cite one Text, against the Opinion of my Master. One of my School-fellows immediately said, You speak against the Comment, which says thus. I reply'd, Though the Comment says so, I say otherwise; so ignorant was I of the Authority of the Commentators. For I considered them in the same Light, as the Commentators upon Grammatical Books, such as Virgil and Ovid: but the Case is otherwise; for the Commentators were Men of the greatest Learning and Authority. It must therefore be safer to rely upon their Authority, who had a full View of the whole Body of the Law, than upon our own Judgment, who have not." Hottomanus cites some other Passages of the same Author, which confirm the same thing; and informs us, that the Comment, put in Balance against the Opinion of any two Doctors, carried it always before the Judges. Si sententia Glossatoris duobus Doctoribus est contraria, profecto in judicis prævaleret sententia ipsius Glossæ (5).

[C] Exclaim'd with great Vehemence against the barbarous Style of this Author.] Ludovicus Vives (6) was one of them. See Bernardus also in his Treatise of the Profit that reading of History brings. Many Authors have been found among the Civilians of the XVth Century, who have censur'd This Barbarity of Style. It seems Alciatus rous'd them up, and gave them the first taste for uniting Polite Literature with the Civil Law. Budæus, one of the warmest Censurers of Accursius, contributed also to it (7). It cannot be denied, but that the Ignorance of good Literature, made the Commentators fall into divers Mistakes. Albericus Gentilis declar'd himself much their Partizan; he (8) would not own that Accursius put this Maxim in use, Græcum est, non potest legi, with which he (9) was reproach'd. He believes that those Words are no where to be found in this Commentator; and makes him more learned in the Greek Tongue, than is generally thought. However it be, the Proverb Græcum est, non potest legi, passes for having deriv'd it's Original from these Commentators. It is pretended that, when they met with a Greek Word, they pass'd it over, and gave for a Reason, that it was Greek; and could not be read; and having thus leap'd over this Ditch, they refus'd the Explication of the Latin.

[D] That he was a great Genius, and that his Defects proceeded from the Age wherein he liv'd.] I shall only cite two Authors (10). "Hanc significationem in animo habuit Fr. Accursius, Glossatorum veterum Coryphæus, homo ingenii profusus stupendi, qui in tantis disciplinarum tenebris ipsam disciplinarum disciplinam accuratissime intellexit; cum non jurisditionem, sed jurisdictionem scribendum censuit. — This was the Sense of Francis Accursius, the Coryphæus of antient Commentators, a Man of a prodigious Genius, who, in such a dark Age of Learning, thoroughly understood all the Principles of Literature; for he was of Opinion it should be wrote Jurisdictionem, not Jurisdictionem." This is the Testimony of a German: let us hear a Frenchman next (11). "Antiqui (Interpretes juris) inter quos Accursius & Bartolus principatum tenent, de sermone non valde anxii, rerum quas tractant curam solam habuerunt: quas cum nolissent, quantum in illa barbarie & codicum depravatione nosse poterant, explicare nisi inconditè & barbarè nequiverunt, quod non

"tam eis quam sæculo illi tribuendum, quo linguæ & bonæ literæ profusus jacebant. — The Ancients (the Commentators on Law) among whom Accursius and Bartolus claim the Precedence, regardless of the Language, employ'd their whole Concern upon the Matter of their Compositions; which as they understood no farther, than That Age of Barbarity, and corrupt Copies of Books, permitted them; it was impossible they should explain otherwise, than in a rude and barbarous Manner; but this is not so much to be ascribed to them, as to the Age, in which Languages and Learning were at a very low Ebb." Note, that Barthius gives Accursius the Christian Name of Francis, and he is not the only (12) Person that does it: I follow'd these Authors in the first Edition, but I reject their Authority in this.

[E] A very learned Daughter.] Pancirollus (13) mentions her only by hear-say. "Filiam quoque habuisse dicitur, quæ jus civile Bononiæ publice docuit. — He is reported likewise to have had a Daughter, who taught the Civil Law publicly at Bononia." When a Fact of this Nature is doubtful, it is very likely to be false; for such Things are too remarkable to remain in uncertainty, if true. So that I do not give much Credit to what I have just now read in the Theatrum of Paul Freherus (14), that Accursius had Daughters, who for their excellent Erudition, were employ'd to read publick Lectures at Bologna. I hope Freherus will not take it ill that I should distrust John Frauenlobius; of whom he cites a German Book.

[F] He died in the Year 1229, at 78 Years of Age.] You see nothing like it in the Theatrum (15) of Paul Freherus, which was compil'd with so much Labour, and during such a long Time. But you will find, on the contrary, that Accursius flourish'd in the Year 1236, that he died in the Year 1279, and that he wrote a Comment on the Authenticæ, in the Year 1236. He is himself cited for this last Particular, by (16) John Fichardus, in his Lives of the Civilians.

But that Citation is false, as appears from the following Observation communicated to me from good Hands (17). "Volaterranus says (18), That Accursius began to study the Law at 40 Years, and that he died in the Year 1279, in the seventy eighth Year of his Age; from whence it should follow; that he was born in the Year 1201. In the mean time Accursius himself informs us, in the Authenticæ, Ut præp. nom. Imper. at the Word inditiones, that he actually writ in the Year 1220. and on the last Law but one in the Code De Accusationibus, that he writ in the Year 1227. which he could not have done, if the Calculation of Volaterranus were true: Otherwise Accursius must have profess'd the Law a long time before he studi'd it. These Epochs of 1220, and 1227, exclude that of 1236, which is faulty, and cannot be admitted by those, who place Accursius's Death in 1229."

[G] There was no need of Theology.] Conringius (19) censur'd him for it, as he ought to do; these are his Words: "Ridiculus est Accursii gloriatio in gl. ad l. 10. sect. 2. ff. de j. & j. nihil opus esse Theologie studio ad cognoscenda divina, ut quæ ex legum Romanarum libris affatim quaerit peti. — Accursius's Boast (in gl. ad l. 10. sect. 2. ff. de j. & j.) that the Study of Theology was of no use towards the Knowledge of Divine Things, they being abundantly contained in the Books of the Roman Laws, is very ridiculous.

[H] Mr

(5) Raphaël Fulginius, Id. ib. ubi supra.

(6) Ludov. Vives, de cautis corrupti artium, lib. 7. p. 52. & lib. 7. p. 206. See also Brancianus inter Epistol. Eobani Heili.

(7) See Paquier's Recherch. de la France, l. 9. c. 39. p. 901. ubi gives the first Place to Budæus, and the second to Alciatus.

(8) Alb. Gentilis de Juris Interpretibus, fol. 29.

(9) See Siches in præf. ad Cod. Theod. & Alciatum, cap. 10. l. 2. Disputat.

(10) Barthius in Animadv. in Claudian Rustin. lib. 2. v. 85. pag. 1200. & 1201.

(11) Rolandus Marcius Epist. 40. lib. 1. p. 176, 177. Edit. Lips. 1687.

(12) Arth. Duck, ad Pope Blount do it also. See Pope Blount, ubi supra.

(13) Pancirollus ubi supra, p. 149.

(14) Paul. Freher. Theatr. Erudit. pag. 784.

(15) Id. ib.

(16) Apud Freher. ib.

(17) Mr de la Monnaie.

(18) Volat. lib. 21. pag. 781.

(19) Conringius de Civili Prudent. c. 3. in Pope Blount, ubi supra.

(*) Albericus Gentilis in his Disputatio de Juris Interpretibus, fol. 6c.

frustrated us in them. Mr Moreri is very much out in quoting [H] the Sieur Catel. Francis Hotomanus had no reason to say that Odofred taught Azo and Accursius, for Odofred and Accursius were both Scholars of Azo, and afterwards Professors at the same time at Bologna. Albericus Gentilis remark'd this Mistake of Francis Hotomanus (e).

(*) Catel's Memories of the History of Languedoc, p. 295.

[H] Mr Moreri is very much out in quoting.] Let us compare these two Authors Texts with each other, which will be sufficient to demonstrate the Mistake. Catel having said that Montpellier was one of the principal Cities of France (20), in which the Roman Law was read publicly, adds, "For we find that the great and ancient Civilian Placentinus, who lived before the Commentator Accursius, read the Law publicly in the City of Montpellier, of which he makes frequent mention in his Summa, which he composed (he tells us in the Institutes) during his abode at Montpellier, as those have observed who wrote his Life. He died at Montpellier the twelfth of February 1192, and lies buried in 'St Bartholomew's Church-yard.'" Now hear Moreri. The Sieur Catel maintains that Accursius died at Montpellier in 1192. That which he adds stands in great need of Correction; "Others, says he, as Fiscardus and Tribemius, place him in the following Century; nay, the last says, that he professed at Bologna in 1240. But they may be mistaken, in confounding that Great Man with his Son Francis Accursius, who was a Man of Merit and Learning; and who was Professor of Law at Bologna, and Counsellor to Richard King of England." The Father ought to have been placed in the XIIIth Century, and then they would not have been in danger of confounding him with the Son: So that Mr Moreri's Doubt is very ill grounded: There was no King of England at that time, whose Name was Richard.

(*) Panciroli de clar. Leg. Interpret. lib. 2. c. 19.

(*) Id. ibid.

ACCURSIUS (CERVOT) Son of the Foregoing, was more in haste to take his Degree than his Father: For he desired to be Doctor of Law before the Age of Seventeen Years, and obtain'd his Request, after it had been a long time discuss'd, whether the Laws (a) permitted it. He apply'd himself to composing Comments, and added them to those of his Father; but they were not much esteem'd. Deterior Interpretes ineptas glossas, & longe à vero distantes, paternis addidit; quæ Cervotianæ vocatae ut plurimum rejiciuntur, (b)—Being a worse Interpreter, he added his own Glosses to those of his Father: they were call'd from him Cervotian, and are generally rejected.

(*) Ex Panciroli. Ibid. p. 147.

ACCURSIUS (FRANCIS) elder Brother of the Former, was so esteem'd by the Bolognese, that when they heard, that he intended to follow the King of England into France, to teach the Law, they forbid him to absent himself, and threatened to confiscate all his Estate, if he went out of their City. He thought he had outwitted them, by selling all his Estate to a Friend; but his Cunning prov'd ineffectual, for they confiscated it nevertheless. This oblig'd him to return; and he obtain'd the Restitution of his Estate. He had taught at Toulouse, and found himself one Day very much puzzl'd on the Subject of Interests. James of Ravenna, one of the most learned Civilians of his Time, crept in among his Auditors incognito, pretending to be one of the Scholars, and urged such Objections to him, as were not easily answered. Some have said that Accursius, at his return to Bologna, was Professor of Law there with Bartolus, and that having had a Dispute with him on the reading of a certain Law, they sent to consult the ancient Manuscript of the Pandects at Pisa about it. But what probability is there, that he lived 'till the Time of Bartolus's being Professor [A] (a)?

(*) Panciroli de clar. Leg. Interpret. cap. 67.

(*) Id. ib. cap. 23.

(*) Id. ibid. cap. 42.

[A] 'Till the Time of Bartolus's being Professor.] Bartolus was born in the Year 1133, and was admitted Doctor of Law at the Age of twenty one Years; that is, in the Year 1154 (1). So that Accursius, the Son, must have lived at least 120 Years, if he had seen Bartolus in his Profession; for he had been (2) emancipated by his Father. Let us suppose, that he was but fifteen Years of Age, when he was emancipated, and that the Year of his Emancipation was the last of his Father, yet we shall find that in 1134, he must have been 120 Years old. Panciroli's Conjecture is probable enough; (3) which is, that Accursius, who was Bartolus's Colleague, was the Son of one Accursius, who taught the Law at Reggio, his native Country, about the Year 1273, and that he taught likewise at Padua. William Duranti makes frequent mention of him.

Let me add here another Observation of Mr De la Monnoie. "Antonius Augustinus speaks in several Places (4) of his Emendations on that Dispute of Bartolus in relation to the reading of a certain Word in the last Paragraph of the Law Si creditor at D. de Disposit. pign. and is inclined to believe, that Bartolus had that Dispute rather with Baldus, than with Francis the Son of Accursius. Alexander of Imola, cited by the same Antonius Augustinus, believed also, that the Contest happened between Baldus and Bartolus. But Bartolus himself having positively declared in Writing, that it was with Francis the Son of Accursius, the Expedient, which Panciroli had found out, seems rather to be admitted: and I own myself of the same Opinion.

(*) Particularly in the 17th chapter of the 4th Book.

ACCURSIUS (MARIANGELUS) was one of the Critics, who lived in the XVth Century: He was of Aquila [A], in the Kingdom of Naples. His ruling Passion

[A] He was of Aquila.] Besides the Testimony of Toppi, approved by the Silence of Leonard Nicodemus; the following Verses confirm this,

Ut volucrum Regina supervolat æthera, & alti
Immotum lumen solis in orbe tenet;
Sic illa genitus Mariangelus Urbe —
Alite quæ à Jovia nobile nomen habet,
Felicis ingenio solers speculatur. —

As, soaring high in Air, with steady gaze,
The Queen of Birds the Sun's bright Orb surveys,
So Mariangelus,

Sprung from That Town, which bears the Eagle's Name,
On Learning's Wings soars to Immortal Fame.

They are to be met with in a Piece of Francis Arfilius (1), printed at the end of a Collection of Verses, entitled

(1) Leonard Nicodemus mistakes in calling him Aquilus. Addis. alla Bibl. Napol. p. 172.

Passion was to search for and collate old Manuscripts, in order to correct the Passages of the Ancients. The Diatriba, which he printed at Rome, in Folio, in the Year 1524, on Aufonius, Solinus, and Ovid, shew his Capacity in that kind of Learning. He had taken a great deal of Pains about Claudian [B], but That Work was not publish'd, though the Author assures us he had corrected above seven hundred Passages of it from the Ancient Manuscripts. Barthius (a) has express'd his Concern, that a Work of this nature was not printed, nor the others (b) reprinted. He does not think Accursius contemptible on the score of Wit, and finds him often to be very judicious. This Critic compos'd Latin and Italian Verses [C]; he understood likewise both Music and Optics, and he travell'd to the North [D]. They who inform us of this, might add, That he understood the French, Spanish, and German Languages (c) perfectly: That he collected a great number of Antiques, which were reposit'd in the Capitol, and that he spent 33 Years in the Court of Charles V. to whom he was very agreeable, and from whom he receiv'd many Favours. It must not be forgot that his Edition of Marcellinus (d) is larger [E] by five Books than the preceding. That Edition is of Ausburg, 1533. He pretends to have corrected five thousand Faults in that Historian (e). In the same Year, and in the same City, he publish'd the Letters of Cassiodorus in Twelve Books, with the Treatise of the Soul added to it; and we are (f) oblig'd to him for the First Edition of That Author. As there were some Latin Writers in his time, who affect'd to make use of the most antiquated Terms, he ridicul'd them very pleasantly in a Dialogue [F], which he published

(a) Barthius upon Statius, Tom. 2. p. 399. Tom. 3. p. 1602. upon Claudian, p. 826. See also the 18th Clasp. of the 20th Book of his Adversaria.

(b) It was done with regard to Aufonius, in the Edition of Arn. 1671. b. 1 not according to the Extent of the Title, which permits Notae integras Accursii; etc. emere Notes of Accursius.

(c) He was a German, whose Name was Coritus, according to Mr. de la Moignon.

(3) Lib. 4. Amorur, apud Leon. Nicodemum ubi supra.

(4) Ipse Salustii civis, Amiternum nempe, Barth. in Stat. Tom. 2. p. 399.

(5) Mariang. Accursi in Teftitudine.

(6) Accursius's Diatribe in Aufonius. These Words are reprinted in the Edition of Aufonius of 1671.

(c) Nicolo Toppi Biblioth. Napolet. p. 226.

(d) Henry Valefius's Preface to Ammian. Marcell.

(e) Teppi, ubi supra.

(f) Leonard Nicodemus's Addition to the Biblioth. Napolet. p. 170.

entitled Coryciana, which was published at Rome in the Year 1524. There is in that Collection, a Protreption of our Accursius ad Coritium (2), which contains eighty seven Verses. The Title of Arifullus's Piece is, De Poëtiis urbanis ad Paulum Jovium. Picrius Valerianus, cotemporary with Accursius, firnames him Aquilanus, not only in his Commentary on the 12th Book of the Æneid, but also in some Latin Verses, which he addresses to him (3). We may be certain therefore, that Barthius was mistaken in the native Country of Accursius. He supposed him to be born at Amiternum (4). Konig, not being aware of this Mistake, adopts it all along. What led Barthius into the Mistake, was the following Sentence of Accursius: "Nec placuit reticere, ne quis (quod Salustius civis ait meus) modestiam in conscientiam duceret (5). — I thought proper not to conceal it, lest (as my Fellow-Countryman Salust says) any one should construe my Modesty into "Diffimulation." The Reason why Accursius called Salust his Countryman, Salust, I say, who was born at Amiternum, is, because the City of Aquila rose upon the Ruins of Amiternum, and was in some manner substituted in its Place. It is but five Miles from the Ruins of Amiternum. Consult Mr Bau-

"unworthy of a Philosopher to play on the Violin, and understand Music; and how furiously they attack'd me for joining Optics to the study of Letters, and the Poetry of our own Language to that of the Latin." He says likewise, that he was writing the History of the House of Brandenburg from the Memoirs with which he was supply'd.

[D] And he travell'd to the North.] We have already heard his own Account of the great Number of Passages, which he corrected on his Saddle, as he cross'd Germany and Poland. That, which follows, will inform us, that he remarked the most trifling Things, even the Songs with which Children were lulled to sleep; but he drew no very good Consequence from them; as we shall see: "Nuper non in Pannonia solum, atque adeo apud septentrionales plerique populos, verum etiam ultra Sauromatas, non sine admiratione audivimus ad suadendum nutricio more infantibus somnum dici Li lu, Li lu, tum & La lu, La lu, & La la, La la; Quod nostrates fere Nan na, Nan na, & Ni na, Ni na, etiam mora quadam vocem suspenderes, passim dicere confueverunt. Movit porro nos majori quadam admiratione quod infantes ipsi & horriduli & sordiduli vix dum fari incipientes mammam atque tatum Latine balbutiunt, ipsis quoque matribus non intellecti. Ut videri possint & hæc quoque voces naturales magis quam arbitrarie (7). — Lastly, says he, not only in Pannonia, and among most of the Northern People, but even beyond the Sauromatæ, I have been surpris'd to hear Children lulled asleep by their Nurses, with a Li lu, Li lu, and La lu, La lu, and La la, La la; which those of our own Country every where call Nan na, Nan na, and Nin na, Nin na, with a short Pause of the Voice. But what surpris'd me more was, that the little dirty Brats, scarce beginning to speak, hiss'd out, in Latin, Manima and Tata, which is not understood even by the Mothers themselves: whence it should follow, that these Words are Innate, and not Arbitrary." He was in the wrong to think, that the Mothers did not understand what their little Children would say, for it was they who taught them these Words.

(7) Id. ib.

[E] He had taken a great deal of Pains about Claudian.] Since the Fatigue of his Travels in Germany and Poland did not hinder him from correcting near seven hundred Faults in That Poet, we may imagine, that he apply'd himself, with great Diligence, to the same Task, at his more leisure Times. "TALIS, says he (6), non ALES, legitur in codicibus CLAUDIANI etiam novissime recognitis. Qui tantum abest ut non etiam nunc veribus sint claudi ac deforme, ut eos ex vetustis exemplaribus, dum Germaniam Sarmatiamque nuper peragravimus, septingentis fere mendis inter equitandum elucimus. — We read it TALIS, not ALES, in all the Editions (of CLAUDIAN) even the latest revis'd; as an Author, so mutilated and deform'd, even at present, in his Versification, that, in my Passage thro' Germany and Sarmatia, I corrected near seven hundred Faults out of the ancient Manuscripts, as I travell'd on Horse-back."

[C] Latin and Italian Verses.] Hear what Accursius himself says of this Matter, in a Fable entitled Tessudo, which he added to his Diatriba. He relates in it the Persecutions he suffer'd at Rome from his Detractors, who imputed the most innocent Things to him as a Crime. Addressing himself to two young Princes of the House of Brandenburg, to whom he dedicated his Book, he says, "Novissis ipsi principes, quam mihi vestitum prope militarem probro verterint; tum sibus scire, muscen callere, philosopho indignum prædicant, quantumque infastrint, quod & Opticen cum literarum studiis, vernaculofque cum Latinis numeris, conjunxerim. — Your Highnesses know, how they even reproach'd me with the Military Garb I wear; then they cry'd, it was

[E] His Edition of Marcellinus is larger.] Toppi had no good Memoirs relating to this Fact: He has omitted what he ought to have said, and advanced what he ought not to say. He has not said that Accursius added five new Books to those which were already printed, and mentions only the sixth. But it is not true that the sixth was found; the thirteen first Books of that Historian are yet wanting. Leonardo Nicodemo censur'd Nicolas Toppi, as he deserv'd, for it (8).

[F] In a Dialogue which he published in the Year 1531.] Because all those who will have my Book may not have that of Leonardo Nicodemo, let us copy the Title of that Dialogue at large: "Osco, Volscio, Romanoque, Eloquentia, interlocutoribus, Dialogus ludis Romanis actus. In quo ostenditur verbis publica

(8) Leon. Nicodem. ubi supra.

A C H Æ U S, Cousin German of Seleucus Ceraunus, and of Antiochus the Great [A], Kings of Syria, became a Powerful Monarch, and held the Dominions, he had seiz'd, a considerable time; but at last his Usurpation was punish'd in a terrible manner. At first he serv'd his Master with wonderful Fidelity; for having accompanied Seleucus Ceraunus in his Expedition against Attalus (a), he caus'd the two Captains, who had kill'd Seleucus, to be put to death, and regain'd all the Provinces, which Attalus had conquer'd, and refus'd the Title of King, which the Suffrages of his Troops, and Favourable Circumstances, put into his Hands. He resisted those Temptations generously, and would only conquer for the Lawful Successor of the Monarch, whose Death he had revenged; that is, for Antiochus, the younger Brother of Seleucus. But his Good Fortune blinded him; for, as soon as his Victories had made him Master of all Attalus's Dominions, except only the City of Pergamus, he assum'd the Title of King. He maintained this Usurpation with much Prudence and Courage, and no Prince on this side the Taurus made himself so much feared, as He (b). The Great and Noble Provinces, which he possess'd on this side of That Mountain, did not satisfy his Ambition; He projected likewise the Conquest of Syria, when he heard that Antiochus was gone to make War upon Artabazanes (c). He was in hopes either that Antiochus would perish in That Expedition, or that it would continue so long, that He should have time to take Syria, before the return of that Monarch. He relied also much on the Rebellion of some Provinces which had but just revolted. He departed, then, from Lydia with a great Army, and in his March he writ to the Subjects of Antiochus; but when he drew near Lycaonia, he perceived that his Soldiers refus'd to bear Arms against their Ancient King. This made him declare to them, that he would desist from his Enterprize. He returned back, and, having plundered Pisidia, he distributed such a considerable Booty among them, that he entirely regained their Affection (d); we may infer from hence by the way, that those, who say, that he declared himself King of Syria, speak without exactness. Antiochus, having gloriously finish'd the War against Artabazanes, sent Ambassadors to Achæus to complain of his taking the Title of King, and openly favouring the Egyptians (e). This Reproach was not altogether ineffectual; for we find, that Antiochus (f) made a Truce with their Prince, because he knew that Achæus, his Ally in appearance, was really in their Interest. This shews, that the Usurper had some regard to the Complaints of Antiochus, and that he made a shew of joining with him against Ptolemy King of Egypt. This latter endeavoured in vain to include him in the Treaty of Peace; for Antiochus always reject'd the Proposal, and could not bear, that the King of Egypt should plead in favour of Rebels (g). As soon as he was at Liberty, he apply'd himself diligently to recover the Dominions, which Achæus had usurp'd: He gain'd his point, and oblig'd the Usurper to take Shelter in Sardes, where He block'd him up, and after a long Siege made himself Master of the City (h). Achæus fell into his Hands by Treachery: Being prevailed upon to fall out of the Citadel of Sardes, He was delivered up to Antiochus, who caus'd him to be cruelly and ignominiously put to death. He cut off the Extremities of his Members, and afterwards his Head, which was sew'd in an Ass's Skin, and ordered the remainder of his Body to be hung on a Cross (i). This happened in the Year of Rome 540. It was a fit Example to be made, and doubly useful [B]. I shall not remark Mr Moreri's Faults; they may be easily known by only comparing his Narrative with mine; but I shall distinctly point out the Mistakes of Francis Patricius [C].

(a) It was towards the end of the 130th Olympiad, and in the Year of Rome 533. Calvisius Chronol. p. 276.

(b) Taken out of Polybius, lib. 4. cap. 13. p. 322.

(c) A Prince, whose Dominions were situated near the Caspian Sea. See Polybius, lib. 5. cap. 13. pag. 418.

(d) Polyb. lib. 5. cap. 13. pag. 409.

(e) Id. ib. p. 409.

(f) Id. ib. cap. 15. pag. 416.

(g) Id. ib. pag. 418.

(h) Id. ib. 7. cap. 3.

(i) Id. ib. 8. cap. 5. & 6.

(j) Id. ib. 8. cap. 6. p. 532.

(k) Id. ib. 8. pag. 518. Edit. Caub.

* Homo sum, Humanum nihil me alienum put. Ter. Adelphi.

(l) Francis Patricius, lib. 4. de Regis Institutione, tit. 9. pag. 242.

(x) Polyb. lib. 4. cap. 23. pag. 324. & lib. 8. cap. 6. pag. 531.

(2) Id. lib. 4. cap. 3.

(3) Id. lib. 8. cap. 6. p. 531.

(4) Id. lib. 15. cap. 17. pag. 525.

[A] Cousin German of Seleucus Ceraunus, and of Antiochus the Great.] He was the Son of Andromachus, who was the Brother of Laodice, Wife of Seleucus Callinicus (1), and Mother of those two Princes. Let us observe, that he was a good Son, for knowing that Andromachus was imprison'd in Alexandria, he forgot nothing to release him out of that Captivity. The Rhodians, knowing his Disposition, sent Ambassadors to King Ptolemy, to demand Andromachus of him. Their Design was to make a Present of him to Achæus, to engage him to break the Promise he had made with the Byzantines to assist them. There was at that time a strong War between the Rhodians and the Byzantines. The King of Egypt made some Difficulty to give up Andromachus; he knew that such a Prisoner might be useful to him in Time and Place, for he was yet embroil'd with the King of Syria, and he was not ignorant of the great Power of Achæus. But at last, to oblige the Rhodians, he was willing to deliver up his Prisoner to them, that, if they judg'd it fit, they might send him to his Son, which they did. And by this, and some other means, they procured Achæus's Friendship, and took from the Byzantine the chief Foundation of his Hopes (2). Note that Achæus was married (3) to Laodice, the Daughter of King Mitridates, who had been very well educated by Logobolus (4), an Inhabitant of Selge, a City of Pisidia. This Lady maintained the Siege of Sardes, with her Husband, and was constrained to surrender herself, after he was put to Death (5).

[B] It was a fit Example to be made, and doubly useful.] For it was a Lesson to Men, not to be too credulous, nor to abuse the Favours of Fortune. We will transcribe the Words of Polybius, the Author of this Piece of Morality. (6) Κατὰ δύο πρότερος ἐν ἀνιστοῦσι ἀνδράσι γινώσκουσιν τοῖς ἀποβάνουσιν, καὶ ἕνα μὲν πρὸς τὸ μὴδὲν περὶ τὴν τύχην, καὶ ἕτερον δὲ, πρὸς τὸ μὴ μεγαλαυχεῖν ἐν ταῖς ὑπερλίαις. αὗτοι δὲ προειδοῦν ἀνθρώπους ὄντας. — An Example of double Use to Posterity; teaching us, first, not to give Credit hastily to any one; and, secondly, that we should not be too much elevated with good Fortune, but expect every thing, as we are Men*.

[C] I shall distinctly point out the Mistakes of Francis Patricius.] He pretends, that the Subjects of Achæus, overburthen'd with Taxes, revolted, and murdered him, with all his Family, and cast his Body into the Pactolus, in order to make him drink Golden Waters (7). "Acæus, Lydiæ Mæonizque Rex, gentilitio avaritiæ crimine ardebat: is squidem crebra ac gravia populis tributa semper imperabat, in quibus exigendis sævus, improbus atque inexorabilis erat: verum cum tantam injuriam diutius populi ferre nequirit, nocturna tessera inter se data, subito hominum concursu illum cum omni familia trucidaverunt, & regia incensa ejus cadaver unco tractum in Pactolum flumen demerserunt, ut

"ut auriferas aquas semper potaret. — Achæus, King of Lydia and Mæonia, was very avaritious, a Vice peculiar to his Family: he imposed frequent and heavy Tributes upon his People; in collecting of which he was cruel, unreasonable, and inexorable: but his Subjects, unable to bear such injurious Usage any longer, conspired together by Night, and the Multitude, surrounding him on a sudden, massacred him and his whole Family, and, setting fire to the Palace, dragged his dead Body, and threw it into the River Pactolus, that it might drink Golden Waters for ever." Observe first that he is mistaken in pretending that our Achæus was a Lydian issued from the ancient Kings of the Country, and Heir of their Avarice. He had in his Thoughts the Riches of Cræsus, and the Request of Midas (8). He had better have remembered that Achæus was a Syrian. But this Fault is small in comparison of the rest; for all the Circumstances of this Narrative are false. Mr de Boissieu is persuaded that the bad Interpreters of these Words of Ovid, (8) See Ovid's Metamorph. lib. 11. v. 103.

*Morte vel intereas capti suspensus Achæi,
Qui miser, aurifera teste, pendens, aqua (9).*

(9) Cvidius in Ibin, v. 301.

Or base Achæus's Sentence mayst thou share,
Suspended on a Gibbet, high in Air,
Whom rich Pactolus from his Banks beheld Aloft exalted o're the Lydian Field.

ACHÆMENES was the Father of Cambyſes, and Grandfather of Cyrus, first King of Persia, if we may believe Herodotus (a). There are other Passages, wherein That Author seems to speak of an Achæmenes much antecedent to the other; for he says that the Persian Nation (b) was divided into different Families, whereof the most Illustrious were composed of the Pasargada, under which were comprehended the Achæmenide, from whom the Kings of Persia descended. In another Place (c) he introduces Cambyſes, the Son of Cyrus, exhorting the Chief Lords of Persia, on his Death-bed, and above all the Achæmenide, not to suffer the Medes to recover the Kingdom. This seems to give us the Idea of an Achæmenes, the Stock of those Achæmenide, much antecedent than the Grand-father of Cyrus. Stephen of Byzantium makes mention of one ACHÆMENES, the Son of Ægeus, who, he pretends, gave his Name to a Province of Persia, call'd Achæmenia. Others say (d) that this Achæmenes was the Son of Perſeus; others infer it from the Kings of Persia being descended from Perſeus [A]. Almost all the Commentators of Horace are unanimous in asserting, that the Achæmenes, whom he mentions in the 12th Ode of the 2d Book, as a very wealthy Person, was a King of Persia [B]; but if so, he must have reigned before the Medes had subdued the Persians; for from the Foundation of that great Monarchy by the Medes, which was the second distinguished by the Name of Universal, we do not meet with any King of this Name amongst them. Cyrus passes constantly for their first King; and They, who pretend there were Two before him (e), distinguish them very plainly both from his Father Cambyſes, and from his Grand-Father Achæmenes. However it be, the Epithet of Achæmenians is often given the Persians in the ancient Latin Poets; and even at this time Persia is call'd Azemia (f), and the Persians Agemis (g).

[A] The Kings of Persia being descended from Perſeus. Mr Chevreau (1) gives it as Herodotus's Opinion, "that the Persiæ, that is, those of the House of Perſus, or Perſeus, were descended from the Achæmenide, Allies of the Pasargada." He assures us in the same Page, "that, according to the Testimony of Herodotus, the Kings of Persia came from Perſeus or Perſus, and that the Persiæ were descended from the Achæmenide, that is, from the first who had the Name of Achæmenes in that Family." This is a very confused Account. Herodotus does not say in general, that the Persiæ descended from the Achæmenide; he says (2) it only of the Kings of Persia, that is, of (3) Cyrus, and of those who reign'd after him. He distinguishes the Persians into different Classes, one of which he particularly distinguishes by the Name of Persians; another he calls Pasargada, under which he places the Achæmenide. He says in another Place (4) indeed, that the Persians acquire'd that Name, from the time that Perſeus, the Son of Jupiter and of Danaë, left them his Son Perſeus, whom he had by Andromeda; but he does not say, as Mr Chevreau supposes, that the Kings of Persia were descended from Perſeus. Mr Chevreau's Argument proves thus far, That Cyrus was not inferior in Birth to the Kings Media, or to the Kings of Persia, seeing these descended from Achæmenes, as well as Cyrus; he proves that they descended from him, because the Persiæ did. Besides the Mistake I have already remark'd, he supposes farther, That the first, who bore the Name of Achæmenes, was antecedent than Perſeus the Son of Jupiter. Mr Dacier perfectly retain'd what he repeated from his Memory only of this Passage of Mr Chevreau (5). [B] Was a King of Persia. Mr Moreri says in plain Terms, That Achæmenes was the first King of the Persians; and that all the Princes, who governed that Monarchy to Darius, were descended from him. But first of all I would ask him, Why, in speaking of Cyrus, he attributes the first Foundation of the Persian Monarchy to him, and why in giving us a List of the Kings of Persia, he does not place Achæmenes before Cyrus, but the latter before all the rest? Besides, I would fain be inform'd, of what Darius he speaks; for there were two or three Kings of that Name in Persia. Does he mean him, who was conquered by Alexander the Great? In That Case he would be too decisive; the Ancients do not agree that That Darius was of the Royal Family. If he means Darius, the Son of Hyſtaſpes, he expresses himself improperly; the Phrase all the Princes is not proper, when we would speak but of two Persons out of more than twelve. I cannot tell why Mr Dacier (6) limits the Epithet of Achæmenide to the (10) Dionys. Salvaſt. Notæ in Libellum Ovidii in Ibin, p. 63.

(11) Id. ib.

(12) Paterculus, ib. p. 243.

(a) Herod. lib. 7. cap. 11.

(b) Id. lib. 3. cap. 125.

(c) Id. lib. 3. cap. 65.

(d) Nicolaus, lib. 2. Histor. apud Magni Eymol. Autorem.

(e) Marſham, Chron. Can. p. 605. Edit. Lipſ.

(f) Bizarus Hist. Pers. lib. 1. p. 5.

(g) Teixeira in Itiner. Indiar. cap. 6. apud Pinedo in Steph. pag. 143.

(1) Chevreau's Hist. of the World, Book 1. ch. 5. p. 95. 96. Edit. of Holl. 1687.

(2) Herod. lib. 1. cap. 125.

(3) Plato in 1. Alcib. pag. 440.

(4) Herod. lib. 7. cap. 61.

(5) Dacier on Horace, Tom. 2. p. 243.

(6) Dacier, ib.

ACHÆMENES. ACHERI. ACHILLES. 73

the time of Darius, the Son of Hystaspes; when he says, That the Descendants of Achæmenes, King of Persia, bore his Name unto That Darius. I do not question but they bore it after him. For, besides that his (7) Son Xerxes carries up his Lineage in a direct Line to Achæmenes; we meet with one Tigranes, General of the Medes (8), distinguished by the Appellation Achæmenides; and we find an Achæmenes, mention'd above, who was the Brother of Xerxes. I say nothing of Sapor, called Achæmenes in Ammianus Mar- cellinus (9); it is a corrupted Passage. Mr Chevreaux, wondering, without doubt, to see five Generations between This Xerxes and Cyrus, believ'd that This Prince counted his paternal Ancestors on the one Side; and his maternal on the other; inasmuch that he pretended to descend from Achæmenes only by the Mother's Side; but this is not to be found in Herodotus; unless we alter the Greek Text, according to a very probable Conjecture of Mr de Saumaise (10).

(9) See Valesius upon Amm. lib. 19. cap. 2.

(10) Sal. maf. Exerc. Plinian. p. 113.

(7) Herod. lib. 7. cap. 11.

(8) Ib. cap. 62.

ACHÆMENES, the Son of Darius I. of that Name (a), King of Persia, and Brother of Xerxes (b) by Father and Mother, had the Command of Egypt (c) after Xerxes had again reduc'd it under the Yoak of Obedience, which it had the Boldness to shake off. Some time after he commanded the Egyptian Fleet (d), in the famous and fatal Expedition against Greece. We do not find what other Employments he had during the Life of the King his Brother; but we find that, Egypt being again revolted, after the Death of that Monarch, Achæmenes was sent thither to reduce it. This Undertaking was unfortunate; for he was beaten by Inarus, Head of the Rebels, assisted by the Athenians.

(a) Herodot. lib. 7. cap. 97.

(b) Ib. c. 7.

(c) Ib. c. 97.

(d) Ib. lib. 3. cap. 12. Died. Sicul. lib. 11.

ACHERI (LUKE de) a Benedictine of the Congregation of St Maur, was Born at St Quentin in Picardy, in the Year 1609. He made himself Famous by the Publication of several Books, which lay hid a long time in Manuscript in the Libraries. He began, in 1645, with the Edition of the Epistle attributed to St Barnabas. Father Hugh Menard, Monk of the same Congregation, had a Design to publish This Epistle, and had already illustrated it with several Notes; but, Death preventing him from executing his Resolution, Father Luke d'Acheri undertook it. So that, by his Care, the Epistle of St Barnabas was printed in Greek and in Latin, with Father Menard's Notes in the year 1645. At Three Years end Dom. Luke publish'd the Life, and Works, of Lanfranc, Archbishop of Canterbury, and the Chronicle of the Abbey of Bec. In 1651, he publish'd the Life and Works of Guibert, Abbot of Nogent, with some other Treatises. Having afterwards collected several rare and curious Pieces, and hoping to get a great many more such, he formed the Design of publishing a most ample Compilation of them that he could, under the modest Title of Specilegium. He publish'd his first Volume in the Year 1655. That Volume was followed by Twelve others; the last whereof was printed in the year 1677 (a). That Collection, in thirteen Volumes in Quarto, is very much esteemed by those, who endeavour to clear up Ecclesiastical Matters in every particular: But we meet with no Pieces in it, but such as have been composed since the Decay of the Roman Empire in the West. The same Author publish'd the Rule of the Solitarians, composed by the Priest Grimlaic; and some Ascetic Works [A]. His Prefaces, and small Notes, shew that he had some Learning. He had a hand in the critical Work, which appeared in the first Volume of the Acts of the Saints of St Benedict's Order; and it is to him, and to Father Mabillon, that the Title of those Acts attributes the Labour of having Collected and Publish'd them. Luke d'Acheri died at Paris the 29th of April 1685, in the Abbey of St Germain's, where he had been Library-Keeper (b).

(a) See in the Journal de Savans of Feb. 28. 1678, why Tissot's Specilegium was not continu'd.

(b) See the Journal des Savans of Nov. 26. 1685, and Mr Bailler, Tom. 3. of his Judgement des Auteurs, p. 318.

[A] And some Ascetic Works. He did not put his Name to the Collection, which he published of them, and of which I am going to give the Title, as I find it in the Bibliotheca Bibliotecarum of Father L'Abbé, "Asceticorum, vulgo spiritualium, opusculorum, quæ inter patrum opera reperiuntur; Indiculus Christianæ pietatis cultoribus ab Asceta Benedictino Congregationis sancti Mauri digestus, Parisiis

"in 4to. 1648. — An Index of the Ascetic, commonly called Spiritual Tracts, which are found among the Works of the Fathers; digested for pious Christians, by a Benedictine Ascetic of the Congregation of St Maur. Paris, in 4to. 1648." Mr Tejssier says, in his Additions to that Work of Father L'Abbé, that Luke d'Acheri publish'd the Life of St Augustin at Paris, in the same Year.

ACHILLES. There have been several of this Name. The first who bore it, had no other Mother than the Earth, and did Jupiter a very good Office; for having received the Goddess Juno in his Cave, when she fled from the Amorous Pursuits of that God, he entertained her with such persuasive Discourses, that she consented to consummate the Marriage [A]. We are not informed in what manner she testified her Gratitude to her Host, who had inspired her with such Tractableness; but we know that Jupiter, in Acknowledgment of this Service, promised Achilles, that thenceforth whoever should bear his Name, should be famous. For which Reason, the Son of Thetis became an Hero. The Name of the Preceptor of Chiron was ACHILLES; and from thence it was that Chiron gave the Name of ACHILLES to the Son of Thetis, his Pupil. This is sufficient to overthrow all those cold and forced Etymologies of the Word ACHILLES, which depend on the personal Qualities of the Son of Thetis [B]. The Inventor of the Ostracism among the

(1) Father Schottus translated them wrong by ad Jovem redire.

[A] That she consented to consummate the Marriage. These Words of Photius; εὐκαταβέτο τῷ Διὶ, signify so much (1), as appears by what follows; καὶ τῷ τῷ μαιῶν Ἡραὶ καὶ Διὶ; ταύτης γίνεσθαι φασί. — And it is said, that This was the first time that Jupiter enjoy'd Juno.

[B] Etymologies — which depend on the personal Qualities of the Son of Thetis. It is diverting enough

(1) See the end of the Tab book of Prolomy the Son of Hephaestion, Novæ ad variam eruditionem Historicæ apud Photi-um, n. 196.
page 488, 489.

the Albanians was named ACHILLES. A Son of Jupiter and of Lamia bore that Name. He was so handsome a Man, that, by the Sentence of the God Pan, he carried the Prize of Beauty, which was disputed with him. Venus being displeased with that Judgment, caused Pan to fall in Love with Eccho, and metamorphosed him in such manner [C], that he became a frightful Object. Another ACHILLES, the Son of Galata, was born with white Hair. There were fifty four others of the Name of Achilles, all very famous; two of which were remarkably brutish (a). I am going to make a separate Article of the most celebrated Person of this Name.

(2) *Græca
mundi.*
Juven. Sat.
10.

to read the Inventions of Greece on that Subject. It not only deserves the Epithet of lying (2), and (3) fabulous upon that Account, but also That of male feriata, which the French Term oiseuse does not fully come up to.

(3) Mythologia Erandæ, Græcæ et Latine de Fœlis. N. in Dionys. lib.
1.

Ask the Greek Grammarians, why This Hero was called Achilles; some will answer you, because he was very troublesome to his Mother, and to his Enemies: Others, because he haras'd the Trojans greatly: Others, because, having learned the Secrets of Physic, he quieted Pain: Others, because he had but one Lip: Others, because he was qualified to command: Others, because he had never fuck'd; and others, because he went away from his Preceptor Chiron, without ever having eat of the Fruits of the Earth. If we were to shew by what Analysis of Grammar they found so many Etymologies in the Name of Achilles, we should make this place, as it were, stand an end with Greek. For which Reason, I refer the Reader, if he pleases, to the great Etymologicum, to Eustathius (4), to Tzetzes (5), &c. Mellicurs Lloyd and Hofmann, who, following the Examples of Fuggerus, and others, have enrich'd the Article of the Son of Peleus with their Etymological Observations, ought at least to have appriz'd us, that much Pains had been taken in vain by those, who will have it, that the Word Achilles depends on the personal Qualities of the Hero of the Iliad. They might have refuted that Pretension, by shewing that there were Achilles's before him, and given us a Reason a thousand times more natural than all the rest, why this Hero was called Achilles; I mean That which I have already reported, to wit, that the Preceptor of his Preceptor was called by this Name.

(4) Eustath. in lib. 1. I-liad.

(5) *Tzetzes
in Lycophon.*

(6) *Photius Bibliothecæ.
n. 196.*

[C] And metamorphos'd him in such manner. Photius (6), who preserv'd some Fragments of the seven Books, which Ptolomy, the Son of Hephaestion, has filled with the most curious Trifles of fabulous Antiquity, has named what regards Achilles, the Son of Jupiter and of Lamia, in such manner, that a Man must give himself the trouble of guessing that it was with the Goddess Venus he contested the Prize of Beauty. This Conjecture is grounded on the Indignation of Venus against the Judge, who conferred the Prize on Achilles. Venus, to punish that Judge, made him in love with Eccho, and withal so ugly, that his Figure alone made him the Object of Hatred. Thus Schottus understood the Text of Photius. But Mr de Meziriac (7) divides the Effects of Venus's Anger, between Pan and Achilles; the former became in love, and the latter the ugliest Fellow in the World. It signifies nothing to consult the Original, to know whether the Translation of Andrew Schottus is preferable to that of Meziriac: For if, on the one side, it may be said, that the Rules of exact Grammar are in favour of Schottus, it may be said, on the other side, that the Greek Authors do not subject themselves to such Rules; and that it is no uncommon thing, when several Persons are concern'd in the same Period, for the Pronoun He, Him, to relate indifferently, either to the remotest, or to the nearest Person. The Latin Authors are not more scrupulous in this Particular. The Grammar of the French Tongue is most wonderfully exact in this Matter; for it requires the same proper Name to be repeated two or three times in a few Lines, rather than to leave the Reader's Mind in suspense. If we consult Reason, either for or against Meziriac, and Father Schottus, we shall hardly know how to determine the Point. A Person, who has lost his Cause, may, perhaps, revenge himself only on his Judge. Thus Apollo was satisfied with punishing Midas (8), who had blamed the Sentence of Superiority pronounced in favour of Apollo, and in prejudice of Pan. Upon this Supposition Meziriac would lose his Cause: But a Person may revenge himself sometimes, both on his Judge, and his Rival (9); and upon this footing Father Andrew Schottus should be mistaken in his Translation; for, according to him, Venus being displeased, takes no Revenge on him, who obtains the Victory. It is true also, that, according to the other Interpreter, she does no great harm to the unjust Judge: she is satisfied with making him in love with a Nymph, who, according to the Tradition of the Ancients (10), had a Daughter by him. When all is done, it seems as if Meziriac were in the wrong; and if he were not, Photius or his Ptolomy would be to blame, for not having declared, that the same Venus, who had made Pan in Love with Eccho, made him unfortunate in his Love. That Circumstance ought particularly to have been mentioned; and there would not have been wanting some, whose Opinion would have confirm'd it; for this Nymph's Rigour towards the God Pan has been mentioned by some Authors. Of all the Labours of the Pen, That of abridging well, is, perhaps, the most difficult; it requires more than a common Discernment, to judge what are the Circumstances, the Suppression whereof makes an Abridgment obscure or not. Justin is not the only Person that wanted This nice Discernment. I have made use of this Thought in some other parts of this Work.

(8) *Ovid.
Metam. lib.
11.*

(9) *Arche-ne, Marcius, Thamyris,
the Daughters of Pierus, are a Pr. of that Revenge is also sometimes taken of a Conqueror.*

(10) There was a different tradition from this; I shall take notice of it in the Article PAN.

(7) *Meziriac's
Commentary on the Epistle of Achilles, p.
253.*

In the former Edition I have prefix'd a kind of Preface to the following Article, which I suppress with Regret. It contained an Elogium of the late Mr DRELINCOURT, Professor of Physic at Leyden. It was the general Opinion, that I had offended so strangely against Custom, and had introduced this Piece so improperly, that, in order to put a stop to so general a Censure, I am obliged to blot it out. But I declare it my Intention, that this Testimony of my Gratitude and Esteem be considered as given in this Place, in the same manner as if it were repeated Word for Word.

(a) *Servius in Æneid.
lib. 2. ver.
197.*

(b) See the Remark [A]
Numb. V.

(c) *Dionys.
Cret. lib. 2.
Dares Ptolemaeus Hephaest. lib. 6.
apud Phot.
ubi supra.
Eustath. in Odyss. 11.*

ACHILLES, the Son of Peleus and Thetis, was one of the greatest Heroes of Ancient Greece. He was born (a) at Phthia in Thessaly; and in his Infancy was dipt in the Waters of Styx to make him invulnerable: and he would have been so in every part, if his Mother had had the Precaution to hold him by one Heel, after having held him by the other (b), but, as she forgot that, one of her Son's Heels remained capable of being wounded; and it was in that place that Death seized him. Yet we must not imagine, that all Authors agree in this Story; for we meet with some, who mention several Wounds receiv'd by Achilles, in different parts of his Body (c). I shall mention another Precaution of Thetis in the Remarks; which is, that, to make her Son immortal, she anointed him with Ambrosia (d), and put him under live Coals. He was educated under the Care of the Centaur Chiron; it was the best School in the World in those Ages. Chiron educated him in a very singular manner; since,

(d) See the Remark [A]
Numb. V.

instead

instead of Milk, or Bread, or such kind of Food, he fed him with Lions Marrow [A], or [A] Fed him with Lions Marrow, or with that of some other Beasts. Libanius (1) in three Places, and Priscian (2) in one, speak only of Lions Marrow: Gregory Nazianzen (3) adds the Marrow of Stags; the Scholiast of Homer (4) that of Bears: The Author of the great Etymologicum (5) mentions only the Marrow of Stags: Apollodorus (6) speaks of that of wild Boars and Bears, and adds the Entrails of Lions to it: Statius (7) joins the Entrails and Marrow of Lions together; or according to the reading of some old Manuscripts, the Entrails of Lions, and the Marrow of She-Wolves. See Num. II. below. Philostratus (8) adds to Milk and Honey, the Marrow of Fawns of Hinds, and the Marrow of Roe-Bucks. Tertullian (9) speaks only of the Marrow of wild Beasts in general. Eusebius (10) expresses himself in a more indefinite manner, speaking only of the Marrow of Beasts. Suidas (11) says only Marrow.

Words of Priscian (13), as a further Confirmation of the matter of Fact: "Deinde sequitur victus, ut in 'Achille, quod MEDULLIS LEONUM pastus esset. This Evidence is as strong, as That, which Mr de Girac produces to prove, that Achilles was brought up with another kind of Food.

It must not be dissembled, that Barthius deprives us of Statius's Evidence for the Marrow of Lions: For instead of lubens, he pretends it must be read lupæ, in the Passage, where Achilles speaks thus:

Dior &, in teneris & adhuc crescentibus annis,
Theſſalus ut rigido senior me monte recepti,
Non ullas ex more dapes habuisse, nec alnus
Uberibus faſſiſſe famem, ſed ſpiſſa leonum
Viſcera, ſemianimeſque lupæ (14) traxiſſe medullas.

Nurs'd in a Cave by the Theſſalian Sage,
No common Food ſuſtain'd my tender Age;
Nor Mother's Milk did e'er my Thirſt allay:
But the fierce Lion's Entrails, raw in Blood,
And the Wolf's Marrow, were my ſavage Food.

What Mr de Girac makes Plutarch ſay, diſcovers to us, that he did not conſult the Greek: and as he alledges ſome of the Remarks, which Vigenere made uſe of in his Notes on Philoſtratus, it is very probable he was miſled by theſe Words of That Author (15): Plutarch ſays that Chiron nurs'd Achilles, from his Birth, with things, which had no Blood (16). Meziriac ſhewed, many Years ago, that Amiot had led Vigenere into this Miſtake; and that inſtead of ſaying with Amiot (17), But this Philinus, like a new Chiron, feeds his Son, in like manner as Achilles was brought up, from his Infancy, with Food, from which no Blood was drawn; to wit, with the Fruits of the Earth, it ſhould be ſaid, But this new Chiron nourishes his Son in a manner quite different from That, in which Achilles was brought up (ἀντιπρόσθετος τῷ ἀναστά) to wit, with Meat without Blood. Xylander may be involv'd in the ſame Miſtake; for his Latin Tranſlation imports, Noſtrum autem, quo paſſo Achillem Chiron nutrebat iſte ſtatim à natalibus SANGUINE CARENTIBUS. There is an Hiatus in the Paſſage of Plutarch; but the Word ἀντιπρόσθετος muſt ſtill be underſtood to mean CONTRARY, a Senſe commonly given to it by the Lexicons.

What I have urg'd in proof of the Validity of St Gregory's Teſtimony, ſhews that Mr de Girac cited Ælian, Pliny, and Ariſtote, to no purpoſe, to ſhew that Lions have no Marrow; or that if they have any, it is the leaſt imaginable. He might have appeal'd to Galen likewiſe, in his 11th Book of Uſu Partium, Cap. 18. And this Faſt ſhould ſeem paſt Diſpute, ſince the Moderns ſeldom call the ancient Naturaliſts to account for it, even when they are accuſing them of ſeveral Miſtakes, in relation to Lions. Conſult Voffius, in the 52d Chapter of his 3d Book, de Origine & progreſſu Idololatriæ: Franzius & Bochart in their Treatiſes, de Animalibus ſacris Scripturæ: Father Hardouin, in his Commentary on the 37th Chapter of the 11th Book of Pliny (18), &c. If Voffius were to be credited in this Matter, we might pretend that Athenæus found fault with Ariſtote upon this Subject. But when Athenæus (19) himſelf is conſulted, it appears, that he makes no mention of Marrow; and that he only attacks the pretended Hardneſs of Lions Bones, which Ariſtote made ſo great, that Sparks of Fire, he ſays, fly from them, upon Colliſion, as from a Flint. This might be denied, without diſputing whether they were deſtitute of Marrow. The Text, then, might be certain; and Mr Furetiere ſhould have inferred it among his other Remarks, under the Word LION, if the contrary had not been incontestably prov'd. Borrichius (20) mentions two Skeletons of Lions, anatomiz'd at Copenhagen, the one ſixteen, the other two Years before; and he affures us, that there was a great Quantity of Marrow, capiſſimæ medullæ, found in the Bones of that Animal; and he quotes Severinus, who relates, that Tiberius Cæſar brought up a Lion, whoſe Bones were found hollow and full of Marrow, like thoſe of other Beasts. But though it were certain, that Lions have no Marrow, Mr de Girac ſhould not have had recourſe

(13) In Progym. Rhetoricæ ex Hermogena.

(1) Progym. p. 70. D. p. 97. C. p. 129. A, &c.

(2) In Præexercit. Rhetor.

(3) Orat. 2. pag. 324. C.

(4) In Iliad. lib. 16.

(5) In 'A-τολλογ.

(6) Lib. 3.

(7) Achill. lib. 2.

(8) In Heroic. pag. 705. B. & in Icon. 2. pag. 781. C.
(9) De Pallio; See below Number VIII. (10) In Iliad. lib. 1. pag. 11.
(11) In ῥαλλ.

I. It is ſo common a Tradition among the Ancients, that Chiron fed Achilles with the Marrow of Lions, that we cannot enough wonder, that ſo learned a Man as Mr de Girac ſhould accuſe Mr Coſſar (12) of a groſs Ignorance, for having made uſe of theſe Words: You was nourish'd from your Infancy with the Juice, the Subſtance, and the Soul of good Beasts, in like manner as Achilles was with the Marrow of Lions. Mr de Girac upon this puts a Queſtion unbecoming an exact Critic, ſeeing it alters the State of the Queſtion, and imputes to Mr Coſſar more than he really ſaid. Where did he find, ſays he, that Achilles was nourish'd only with Lions Marrow? But what follows is worſe ſtill. Having alledg'd among other Reaſons to ſupport his Opinion, that according to Plutarch, Achilles was fed with things which have no Blood; he adds, that he does not believe that any Author of Credit ever affirm'd, that Achilles was nurs'd with the Marrow of Lions: And yet, immediately after, he himſelf cites St Gregory Nazianzen, who remarks, that St Baſil had not, like Achilles, A Centaur near him, to preſent him with the Fabulous Marrow of Lions and Stags. Which ſhews, continues Mr de Girac, that St Gregory look'd upon it as a ſiſtitious and impoſſible Story. Be it ſo: He will ſtill be a credible Witneſs for all that. For to be ſo in things of this Nature, it is neither neceſſary we ſhould be convinc'd of the Truth of the Faſts we report, nor that they ſhould really exiſt, nor even that they ſhould be poſſible; it is enough that we are not ourſelves the Inventors of the Story. Now without doubt this is St Gregory Nazianzen's Caſe: he does not affirm what he relates of the Centaur Chiron and of Achilles, without having read of any ſuch thing. I will allow farther, that he does not believe it; but ſtill he did not invent the Story; and this is ſufficient to make him worthy of Credit. Neither the Moral nor the Physical Truth is to be inquired into upon this occaſion, but only the Truth of the Relation. Mr de Girac, who will have it that the Marrow of Stags was the only Food of Homer's Hero, according to the common Opinion of the Ancients, doubtleſs eſteem'd the Authors, who reported it, worthy of Credit, altho' there is no Reaſon to think either that they firmly believed it, or that the thing is true. He has certainly plac'd St Gregory Nazianzen upon the ſame foot, with regard to the Marrow of Stags: He cannot therefore reaſonably except againſt him, in relation to that of Lions: And conſequently he himſelf produces a Witneſs worthy of Credit, immediately after having ſaid, That he did not believe there were any.

II. His quoting St Gregory Nazianzen upon this occaſion, is not ſo much to be wonder'd at, as his Ignorance of what two Modern Authors, who are in every body's Hands, have put beyond all Doubt. One is Mr de Meziriac, who has prov'd, by the Teſtimony of the Scholiſt of Homer, on the 16th Iliad, by That of Libanius, in his two Speeches, the One For, and the Other Againſt, Achilles; and by that of Statius, in the 2d Book of his Achilleid, that this Hero was fed with the Marrow of Lions. The other is Barthius, who, upon this Paſſage of Statius, beſides the double Teſtimony of Libanius, cites theſe

III. A Paſſage of Plutarch ill tranſlated.

(15) Vigenere's Comment. on Philoſtr. of Achilles's Food, Edit. in 4to pag. 544.

(16) Comment. on the Epithela of Briceſis, pag. 249.

(17) Plutarch's 4th Book of Life Converſation, ch. 1.

IV. Property of the Bones of Lions; Whether it be true that they are without Marrow.

(18) Obſerve, That Hoffman's Continuat. Lexici Univerſ. Tom. 1. p. 1003. attributes this only to the Lions Teeth, as alſo the producing Sparks of Fire by Colliſion.

(19) Athen. Deipnoph. lib. 8. cap. 11.

(20) In his Treatiſe, de Hermetico, & Chymico-rum Sapientia, printed at Copenhagen, 1672.

or with that of some other wild Beasts. The Etymologists have not neglected their Interests to that Reason, since Facts, borrow'd from the Pagan Mythology, are not to be confuted in that manner, especially when it is affirm'd, that no Author worthy of Credit speaks of them. The Testimony alone of some ancient Authors is sufficient to make Him lose his Cause, even though the Naturalists should assure us of the Impossibility of the Thing.

V. A Remark against Barthius. Decifus Autibus find themfelves lead into a Scare. From whence it appears, That Barthius engages himself in a superfluous Refutation, when, in commenting on the Verses of Statius, which I have cited below, he cries out very seriously; It is a strange Fable, ingens fabula, since a Child who should take in any such Food, only by sucking, would die: every thing in Lions, their very Breath, being poisonous, especially to such an Age: in consequence of which he cites a Passage of Aristotle, importing that Lions have no Marrow. All this is Labour lost; since the Ancients themselves, who had examin'd things a little, considered these Stories only as Sallies of Wit and Imagination. Would not a Man have little to do, who should spend his time in confuting, from Principles of Philosophy, the Stories of the same Achilles's Heel, and his burnt Lip? It is fabled, that his Mother, having plung'd him in the Waters of Styx, to render him invulnerable, could not procure that Advantage to his Heel, because she held her Son by it. Fulgentius, in the 7th Chapter of his 3d Book, and the Scholiast of Horace, on the 13th Ode of the 5th Book, remark, that she held him by the Heel. Those, who say that he died of a Wound in the Heel, as Hyginius, in his 107th Chapter, and Quintus Calaber, at the 62d Verse of the 3d Book, agree upon the whole with the other two. Servius, on the 57th Verse of the 6th Book of the Æneid, says in general, that he was invulnerable, excepta parte qua à matre, tentus est. That part excepted by which his Mother held him. Others have reported, that, to consume all that was mortal in her Son's Body, she laid him every Night under live Coals, and that in the Day she anointed him with Ambrosia, and that but one of the Child's Lips was burnt; which was occasioned by his having lick'd that Part.

(21) Apollo-dorus, lib. 3. Scholiast. Homeri Iliad. v. 36. Scholiast. Aristoph. p. 184. A. Many (21) Authors mention This Conduct of Thetis; and say farther, that she had destroy'd, by this means, six of her Children; but her Husband, having surpriz'd her in it, was the Cause that Achilles, who was the seventh, escap'd. Nevertheless Tzetzes (22) condemn'd this Story as false, and says, that he does not know from whence Lycophron borrow'd this Lie, that Thetis had seven Children by Peleus. This is another Example, which may be added to that of Mr de Girac, to shew the Danger, to which an Author exposes himself by too decisive a Confidence: for Mr de Meziriac cites four very grave Authors, who all agree to what Lycophron writes. There is good Reason to say, when we hear mention made either of some extraordinary Phrase, or of some uncommon Fact, that it is a good Bait to draw in Wagers, that is, your rash Scholars, who are always ready, on such an Occasion, to lay Wagers that such a thing is not to be found in any Author; and they seldom fail to lose. But what is most astonishing, is, they sometimes deny things the most easy to be met with. I shall give several Examples of this Behaviour in This Dictionary.

(23) Barth. Comment. in lib. 2. Achill. vol. 3. p. 1754. But we must not take our leave of Barthius (23), without observing that he pretends, that the reading Lupæ, instead of Lubens, does Statius much Honour, who, by this means, does not contradict Aristotle, and observes the same Distinctions with Apollo-dorus; the latter having affirm'd that Chiron made Achilles feed upon the Entrails of Lions, and the Marrow of wild Boars and Bears. But Barthius, taking upon himself once more the Air of Confutation, rejects the Marrow of the She-Wolf, as a manifest Absurdity; and says he is convinc'd, that if a Child should take that kind of Food but once, he would die before the next Day. Wherefore, adds he, Gregory Nazianzen reconciles it better, by adding the Marrow of Stags, to that of Lions. Barthius here seems to be inconsistent with himself, having said, in the foregoing Page, that the rejecting of the Marrow of Lions was a sign of Judgment in Statius, and that the approach of Lions is very dangerous to Children.

VI. The Fable of Achilles being fed with Lions Marrow must be proper Fictions.

It must be remark'd, That the Reason, why Apollo-dorus, and some others, have rather mentioned the Entrails, than the Marrow, of Lions, as the Food of Achilles, seems to be owing to their Opinion, that these Creatures have scarce any Marrow; for otherwise, Marrow was a more suitable Diet, considering the Character, under which the Poets represent him. It is not so much under the Idea of Valour, though they ascribe This to him in an eminent Degree, as under That of an Invincible Anger. Homer proposes to himself this Character of him in the Iliad, where, according to the Observation of Horace, he takes for his Theme,

— gravem
Peleidæ stomachum cedere necesse (24).

The fierce Pelides' baughty Rage,
Who knew not bow to yield.

CREECH.

And begins his Poem thus,

Μῆνιν ἄειδε θεὰ Πηληϊάδεω Ἀχιλῆος,
Ὀλομένην, ἣ μήτι' Ἀχαιοὺς δάγῃ ἔθηναι.

Achilles' Wrath, to Greece the direful Spring
Of Woes unnumber'd, Heavenly Goddess sing.

POPE.

Now it is certain, that in order to trace this Character to it's Source, in the marvellous Fictions of Antiquity, nothing could be better imagin'd, than Lion's Marrow, for the Nourishment of this Hero; since it is the most juicy, and, as is pretended, contains the specific and feminal Parts of the Animal. Homer hints to us in the Example of little Astyanax, that it was the favorite Moriel of an indulged or spoiled Child:

Ἀστυάει, ὃς πρὶν μὲν ἢ πατρὸς γένειος
Μυαλὸν ἄν' ἔθηναι καὶ δῶν τίνα θηρῶν (25).

(25) Hom.
Iliad 22.
ver. 500.

Astyanax —
He, who with tender Delicacy bred,
On Marrow, and the choicest Dainties fed.

And Jesters tell the Mothers sometimes, that it is a Son-in-law's Bit. Besides, there is no Beast so angry as the Lion; and it is supposed, that it was from him Prometheus borrowed the Principle, which subjected the first Man to Anger:

Fertur Prometheus addere principi
Limo coactis particulam undique
Defectam, & infani leonis
Vim stomacho appoluisse nostro (26).

(26) Hor.
Ode 16. lib.
1. ver. 13.

When bold Prometheus first began,
As Story goes, to make a Man,
From every thing he snatch'd a Part,
To furnish out his Clay,
And to compleat his rude Essay;
And plac'd the Lion's Fury in his Heart.

CREECH.

Not but that it would have serv'd the Purpose as well, to have given Achilles a Lioness for his Nurse. Virgil followed This Idea, in some Reproaches of Cruelty:

— duris genuit te cautibus horrens
Caucasus, Hyrcanæque admorunt ubera Tigres (27).

(27) Æneid. lib. 4.
See Macrob.
Saturn. lib.
5. cap. 11.

False as thou art, and, more than false, forsworn,
Not sprung from noble Blood, nor Goddess-born,
But born from burden'd Entrails of a Rock;
And rough Hyrcanian Tygers gave thee suck.

DRYDEN.

And the Brigadochio in the Comedy of the Visionaries, is not far from it in this Rhodomontade:

Le Dieu Mars m'engendra d'une fiere Amazone,
Et je sucai le lait d'une affreuse Lionne,

I was begotten by the God Mars upon a Warlike Amazon, and suck'd the Milk of a horrid Lioness.

By

Interests on this occasion; they have made their Advantage of this Tradition, for they pretend that the Name of Achilles is derived from it [B]. He was not contented to inure his Body to the most laborious Exercises, but he adorn'd his Soul with a great Variety of useful Knowledge. But if we may believe Homer, it is to Phanix, and

VII.
Whence the Fiction of the Marrow of a Stag.
Swiftneſs of Foot was formerly an Heroic Quality.

• Or Running-Footman. The People of Biscay were ſam'd for Swiftneſs.

(28) See the prodigious Swiftneſs, which Virgil, Æneid. 7.
v. 817, gives a young Amazon called Camilla; and Faſter la Cerdà's Ob-ſervations upon it.

(29) Homen-
liad. 7.
ver. 228.

(30) Vigenere's Comment on Phi-loſtrati de Nutrim. Achilli.

VIII.
Faults of ſome of Tertullian's Interpreters.

(31) Edmund Richer, who publiſh'd his Verſion at Paris, in 1600, 8vo.

(32) Salmaſius approves of thoſe who read Concilium.

(33) Not.
Critic. in Tertull. de
Pall. p. 77.
Facit 1614.
8vo.

(34) Lucret.
lib. 4.

(35) In his Poem on the Wedding of Theſis and Pelæus, which is thought to have preceded that of Hefiod on the ſame Subject.
Neither Voſſius nor Lorenzo Craſſo make any mention of this Poet.

(36) Salmaſ.
in Tract. de Pall. p. 281.
Edit. 1656.

By this Key we are led to the Reason, why ſome choſe to prefer the Marrow of Stags, before any other, for the Food of Achilles: Becauſe they were ſtruck with the Tradition, which aſcribes to him great Swiftneſs in running, and which induced Homer to honour him continually either with the Elogy of πῖδας ἄνδρ, swift-footed, or ſome other Epithet of the ſame Signification, πωδάρης, πωδάριος, πῖδας ταχὺς, πωδὶ ταχέϊον, πρᾶντοίς, &c. With us, at preſent, this is but the Merit of a *Bisſaſian Lacquey, but anciently (28) it was an heroic Quality: And therefore Homer's only Fault in the uſe of it is, His patching up his Verſe too frequently with it. It was therefore thought neceſſary to ſeign, that an Hero of an extraordinary Swiftneſs was nourished with the Marrow of Stags; and the Ancients were ſo fond of this Notion, that they did not take notice, that the Marrow of ſuch a timorous Animal was otherwiſe very Improper for This Thunderbolt of War, This Lion-bearded Hero.

Ἀχιλλεύς μὲν ἄνδρ' ἀνδρείοντα θυμολόντα (29)

who, ſhewing the utmoſt Diſdain for the General of the Army, among other opprobrious Expreſſions add'd;

Va ſac à vin, yeux de chien, cœur de cerf.

So Vigenere (30) translates this Verſe of the 1ſt Book of the Iliad,

Οἷνεβασις, κυνὸς ὀμματα ἔχων, πρᾶντον δ' ἰλαφείᾳ

O Monster, mix'd of Insolence and Fear,
Thou' Dog in Forehead, but in Heart a Deer!

P O E.

I do not think that, if the Matter were to be decided by a Majority of Voices, it would be judg'd that Achilles was fed with the Marrow of Stags, nor that Mr de Girac could ſupport his haſty Aſſertion, that Marrow was the only Food of Homer's Hero, according to the common Opinion of the Ancients. But if this ſhould be true, an old (31) French Tranſlator of the Treatiſe de Pallio would not be excuſable, for having reſtrained to this Marrow, what Tertullian ſaid of That of wild Beaſts in general. Tranſlators have no ſuch Right. "Ille ferarum medullis educatus, unde & nominis (32) conſilium, quando quidem labiis "vacuerat ab uberum guſtu: — He having been "fed with the Marrow of Stags, from whence he had "his Name, as having never ſuck'd at the Breſt with "his Lips, &c." Theodorius (33) Martilius ſtumbled likewiſe at theſe Words, pretending, that Tertullian hints at the Etymology ſine chilo, ἄνω χυλός, which is viſibly falſe, as Salmaſius obſerves. I might have remark'd another Miſtake of the ſame Author, as follows: He ſays that Achilles, according to Vellius Longius, cited by Cassiodorus, had his Name from the Word χυλός, as being one of thoſe Perſons who are called Chilones, or Labiænes, that is Thick-lip'd. Lucretius calls them (34) Labiæſ, and obſerves that a Lover, who would excuſe the Imperfections of his Miſtreſs, ſays, labioſa, φιλώμα, great Lips are large and ſpacious Fields for Kiſſes. But it is falſe, that Achilles had his Name from χυλός, a Lip, upon this account: he was rather ſo called, becauſe he was maim'd in that Part, although Salmaſius denies it, notwithstanding an expreſs Paſſage of Phobius, which I have already mentioned, and what Agameſtor (35), an old Poet, cited by Tzetzes, poſitively ſays of it; Salmaſius's Words are (36), "Si chilones dicti à mag- "nis & improbis labris, Achilles dictus fuerit quaſi "ἄνω χυλῶν, non quod fine labris fuerit, ſed quod "laborum miniſterio non uſus fuerit infans. — "If the Chilones are ſo called from their large and "monſtrous Lips, Achilles is ſo called quaſi ἄνω χυλῶν, not that he had no Lips, but becauſe he made "no uſe of them in his Infancy." I do not deny, but that Apollodorus ſays, that the Son of Thetis, whoſe firſt Name was Ligyron, was called Achilles by Chiron, becauſe he had never apply'd his Lips to the

Breſt (37). Ὅτι τὰ χυλῶν μαζῶν αὐτοῦ πρῶτον, quod mammis labra minime admooviſſet,

[B] That the Name of Achilles is derived from it.] I have taken Notice of the Etymologies of this Name in the Remark [B] of the foregoing Article; but I muſt ſpeak particularly of That before us at preſent. It always accompanies the Tradition, which ſays that Achilles was fed with nothing but the Fleſh and Marrow of Animals. The Connexion between theſe two Things ariſes from the Greek Word χυλός, which properly ſignifies the Nurture, which the Earth ſupplies us with. But ſome Authors build a pleaſant Opinion upon this. I ſhall give it in the proper Terms of Father Gautruche, in his Poetical Hiſtory. I rather chuſe This Work, than any other, becauſe it has been printed ſeveral Times (38), and in ſeveral Languages, and is eſteem'd a Book fit for every Body's reading. Now no Faults ought more carefully to be remark'd, than thoſe, which may miſlead the greateſt Number of Readers. Father Gautruche ſays (39), Inſtead of Milk and other common Food, Chiron nurſed him only with the Marrow of Lions, or of wild Beaſts, in order to produce in his Pupil the Courage and the Strength of theſe Animals, Whence, according to the Opinion of ſome, being nourished without any kind of Meat, he was called Achilles, that is to ſay, WITHOUT CHYLE. Though the laſt Period of this Paſſage does not appear in the laſt Edition, yet I ſhall remark, I. That it is an Error, to ſay that a Perſon is nourished without Meat, when he is only fed with the Marrow of Beaſts; for the Marrow is unqueſtionably comprehended under the Word Meat, and is not comprehended among thoſe Viands, which are permitted in Lent. II. That it is not true, that Marrow is not converted into Chyle, or that whoever is fed only with Marrow, muſt neceſſarily be without Chyle. Theſe Remarks will not ſeem ſuperfluous to thoſe, who ſhall conſider, that this Doctrinè of Father Gautruche is in a great many Copies of his Works, and in other Writers (40), and that in the Edition, where his Faults are dropp'd, we are not told, why they were ſuppreſſ'd.

The Foundation of this Miſtake ariſes from the Term χυλός, (which Euphorion made uſe of in ſome Verſes, cited by the Author of the great Etymologicum, and by Euphathius), being taken for that ſoft and whitith Subſtance, into which the Stomach converts the Aliments, and which the Phyſicians call Chyle, from the Greek Word χυλός: Whereas by χυλός ought to be underſtood, as Mr de Maziriac (41) took it from Euphathius, the Nurture we receive from the Product of the Earth. Natalis Comes (42) has wrong tranſlated Euphorion; for he makes him ſay that Achilles had taſted no Milk. Vigenere and Fungerus, depending upon the Authority of St Gregory Nazianzen, have not been more ſucceſſful. They attribute to St Gregory that, which is but in the Latin Tranſlation of the Commentaries of Nicetas Serronius, Archbiſhop of Heraclea, in the XIth Century, on the Orations of that Father, printed with his Works (43). Fungerus concludes, that Achilles was nurſ'd ſine cibo, becauſe his only Diet was the Marrow of Stags. The other will have it (44), that χυλός ſignifies Gravy, and that Achilles was nourished without Juice, becauſe he was not fed with the common Food of Men, but with the raw Fleſh of Savage Beaſts. Francis Alunno adopts one half of this laſt Error. "Fu nutrito, ſays he (45), "nel monte Pelio da Chirone Centauro, ne mai in "quel tempio mangio cibo cotto, perche fu nominato "Achille, perche à in Greco ſignifica ſenza, & chilos "CIBO COTTO. — He was brought up on Mount "Pelion; by Chiron the Centaur, and having never "ſed upon any thing but raw Fleſh, he was called "Achilles, from Alpha, which in Greek ſignifies "Without, and Chilos, DRESS'D MEAT." Some, taking the Word χυλός ſimply for Nurture; ground the Etymology of Achilles (46) on this, that his Preceptor Chiron, after a certain time, neither provided for him the Marrow of wild Beaſts, nor any other kind of Food, ſo that he was oblig'd to ſupport himſelf by the Fortune of the Chace. But was this to live without Nurture? This is, perhaps, the worſt Account of them all.

(37) Apol-
lor. lib. 3.
p. 235.

(38) An Edition of it was publiſh'd at Utrecht in 1690. to which was added the Tranſlation in Latin and Dutch. The Latin Tranſlation had already appeared by it ſelf. The English pub-liſh'd it in their Language in the Year 1671.

(39) Poetical
Hiſtory, B.
2. chap. 15.
p. 158. Edit.
of the Hague, 1681. which is the 4th.

(40) Among others, in the Hiſtorical Dictionary of Juſtè.

(41) Comm. on the Epistle of Briliens,
pag. 248.
where the Poet Eupha-tion is miſcalled Euphorion.

(42) My-thol. lib. 9.
cap. 12.

(43) This Verſion is print'd with the Works of St Gregory.

(44) Comment. on Phi-loſtrati. of the Nature of Achilles,
pag. 543.

(45) In his Fabrica del
Mondo, which is a Dictionary on Boc-accio, Dante, Petrarch,
&c. printed at Venice in 1588. Folio.

(46) Comm. on Alcibiades;
Emblems, p.
624. of the Edition of Thuliſius at Padua, 1667. in 4to.

and not to Chiron [C], that the Quality of Achilles's Preceptor, and Foster-Father is to (47) Decimator in the Theſaurus Linguarum. Leipzig 1606. in F. 8o.

[C] If we may believe Homer, it is to Phœnix, and not to Chiron. Many Persons are not aware of this. Decimator (47) says, that Achilles, after having been educated by Chiron, who taught him the Military Art, Music, and Morality, was put under the Direction of Phœnix, who taught him both to Speak and Live well, as he boasts of it himself. He proves this, as to Music and Morality, from these Verses of Ovid, in the 1st Book de Arte amandi.

Phyllirides puerum citharæ præfecit Achillem, Atque animos molli contudit arte feros.

*Chiron his Pupil to the Lyre inclin'd,
And humaniz'd, by Sounds, his savage Mind.*

I set them down without altering any thing, either in the Orthography, or in the Citharæ præfecit, which ought to be changed into Citharâ perfectit. Every body may see, that there is not a Word of the Study of Morality in those Verses. His Proof, as to Phœnix, are these Words of Homer:

(48) Homer. Iliad. lib. 9. ver. 442.

Τυνηά με πρίνῃσι διδάσκει μὲναι τάδε πάντα,
Μύθεο το γένῃσι ἱμῶνα, πρῆτῃσι το ἔργον. (48)

*He had me teach thee all the Ways of War,
To shine in Councils, and in Camps to dare.*

POPE.

* Mr. Pope has omitted the true last Lines, as unworthy of Homer, and too nauseous to be translated.

(50) The first Author of the Theſaurus is called Basilus Faber Soranus: He was Rector of a College at Erford, and he published his Book in the Year 1571.

after having employed 36 Years in teaching the Latin Tongue. The Work was reprinted in 1625, with the Corrections and Additions of Buchnerus, who died in 1611. at the Age of 70 Years, after having been Professor in Poetry 45 Years, and in Eloquence 30 Years, at Wittenberg. He also corrected and augmented that Dictionary for the Edit. of 1616. Lastly, Christopher Cellarius corrected it again, for the Edition of the Year 1686, and afterwards for that of 1692.

(51) Paraphr. ad Robinson, lib. 2. c. 11.

But provided we read with Attention the Book of the Iliad, from whence this Authority is borrowed, it will appear, that Decimator is mistaken. The Expressions of Phœnix testify, that he was the first Preceptor of Achilles. You would eat nothing, represents he to that Hero, unless I first took you on my Knees, and carved your Meat. The Wine which you discharged into my Bosom, in your troublesome Infancy, has often fully'd my Cloaths.

--- ἔστι δ' ἡμεῖς ἀπὸ τοῦ ἀλλοῦ
Οὐτ' ἐς δαῖτ' ἵκαναι. δ' ἐν μαγάρῳι πέσσεσσι
Πρὶν γ' ἔτι δὲ δ' ἐ' ἐ' ἡμεῖς ἐν γένεσσι καίεσθαι.
Ὅψα τ' αἰσῆσι προσημῶν, καὶ ἔσθον ἑταίρων.
Πολλὰ μοι κατὰ βόσιν ἐν γαστρὶ αἰσῆσιν (49)

*Thy infant Breast a like Affection show'd,
Still in my Arms, (an ever-pleasing load)
Or, at my Knee, by Phœnix wouldst thou stand,
No food was grateful, but from Phœnix' Hand.*

POPE.

It was necessary to produce the Greek; for it conveys to filthy an Image, that it might else have been thought I had not fairly translated it. See the 11th Paragraph below. But however it be, this shews, that, if we will make use of the Authority of Homer, with respect to Phœnix, we must renounce what others report concerning Chiron; or that at least we must not give Chiron the first Education of Achilles, and less still make it continue, until he had taught his Scholar the Military Art, Music, and Morality. When a Person is arriv'd at an Age fit for Instruction in these Sciences, he eats no longer on his Foster Father's Lap, nor throws up his Wine on his Cloaths. Add to this that they, who suppose that Achilles was brought up by Chiron, say that he was taken away from under his Discipline, to be sent, disguised in a Female Dress, to the Court of King Lycomedes, where his Disguise soon procured him opportunities of conversing familiarly with the King's Daughter, as appeared by the Child he brought into the World. Now it is not likely that they appointed him a Tutor after he became a Father; and consequently there is no room for placing the Guardianship of Phœnix after that of Chiron. The Faults of Decimator are to be found in the Theſaurus Scholasticæ Eruditionis of the last Edition, tho' that Work was often corrected by learned Humanists (50). (51) Dempster has likewise said, that Achilles, having been instructed by Chiron in his Infancy, was educated by Phœnix, when he was of a more advanced Age. Observe, that I do not intend to deny, that, after Achilles became a Father, Phœnix was ordered to teach him (52) how to conduct himself in the Trade of Arms, and the Councils of War: But I do not call this appointing him a Tutor.

I cannot tell whether Malherbe ever took notice of this; but it is certain that he expressed himself like one, who was well satisfied, that Achilles had but one Preceptor. For thus he speaks of that Warrior in the fourth Book of his Poems, p. 106.

On de Phenix, ou de Chiron,
Il eût fait son apprentissage.

Whether he serv'd his Apprenticeship with Phœnix or Chiron.

We must allow him only Phœnix, if we are to be determined by Homer, who makes no mention of the Preceptorship of Chiron; and only Chiron, if we follow the Crowd of Authors. Yet Mr. Ménage has said, in his Notes on this Passage of Malherbe, That Chiron was the first Tutor of Achilles, and Phœnix the second. I do not rely on the Authority of Tzetzes, who, by an Allegorical Explication of what he had read in some Authors, that Phœnix, blinded by his own Father, was brought to Chiron, who restored him to his Sight, pretends that the meaning of this is, that Chiron gave the young Achilles to his Care; for, besides that there is nothing more cold, or forced than this Thought; it is certain that Tzetzes by no means proves the Fact. By his pretended Allegories he endeavours to reconcile Homer with Lycophron; but how will he reconcile Homer, who says, that Achilles, yet a little Child, was under the Conduct of Phœnix: I say, how will he reconcile him with those who suppose Achilles to have been educated by Chiron from six Years of Age (53), to Manhood, 'till he had not only learnt to sit astride on the Back of his (54) Preceptor, but also till he had injured himself to (55) the most violent Exercises; without reckoning many other things, which Chiron taught him; as the Military Art, Music, Morality, (as Decimator informed us before) and Physick, but particularly Botany and Law, as an ancient Author called Staphylus (56), and others inform us? Statius, in the second Book of his Achilles; Claudian, in his Panegyric on the third Consulship of Honorius; and Sidonius Apollinaris, in his ninth Poem, specify what Achilles learnt of Chiron. Note, that on the pretended Testimony of Homer, they ascribe to Chiron, in the Commentaries on the Emblems of Alciatus, what belongs only to Phœnix. Nothing is more frequent among Authors than these quid pro quo's.

I said, that Homer has taken no notice of Chiron's Preceptorship. You will ask me then, what mean these Words of Eurypius to Patroclus in the eleventh Book of the Iliad,

--- ἐπὶ δ' ἦντα Φαρμακὰ παρὸν
Ἐπὶ δὲ, τὰ οὐ προτὶ Φαειν Ἀχιλλῆος δοδὶδύχασι,
Ὅν Χαίρων ἰδὶδατὶ δυνάστητος Κανταίρων. (57)

*With healing Balm; the raging Smart alloy;
Such as sage Chiron, Sire of Pharmacy, Once taught Achilles, and Achilles Thee.*

POPE.

I answer, That they do not signify, that Chiron was the Preceptor of Achilles, but only that he taught him Physic. Every one sees the Difference of these two Things. Menecmus, in his Travels, names an hundred Persons, who taught him Receipts and Secrets for Cures; yet those People had not been his Schoolmasters, nor had educated him in his Youth. Professors in Physic, who teach their Auditors an hundred good Remedies in public, or communicate some very rare Receipts to distinguish'd Friends in particular, are they therefore what we call Young Master's Tutor or Governor? And, without going farther than this Passage of Homer, do we not see that Achilles imparted to Patroclus Remedies, though he was not his Preceptor? To enter then into Homer's Thought, we must say that Achilles was educated by Phœnix from three or four Years of Age, 'till he was capable of learning to Discourse well, and perform fine Actions; but yet that, during that time, and afterwards, he did not fail to attend the Lectures of Chiron. It

(52) Iliad. lib. 9. p. 445.

(53) Pindar. Nem. Ode. 3.

(54) Τὸ αὐτὸ εἶπε καὶ Ἰδωκὸς ἀπὸ τοῦ Περσέως, λέγων, ὅτι ὁ Περσεύς ἔσθον ἐκ τοῦ Περσέως, ὡς καὶ ὁ Περσεύς ἔσθον ἐκ τοῦ Περσέως. (55) Greg. Numb. anzen. O. rat. 20.

(56) Stall. Achill. lib. 2. ver. 322.

(57) He is cited by Natal. Comen. lib. 9. c. 11. and in the Commentaries on Alciatus's Emblems.

IX. Examination of a Passage where Homer speaks of Chiron.

(57) Iliad. 11. ver. 229.

to be given. The Uneasiness of Tbetis did not permit her to leave her Son in Chiron's Cave, so long as she desired; she (e) took him from thence when he was but nine Years of Age, and disguising him in a Woman's Habit, hid him among the young Ladies in the Court of Lycomedes, King of the Island of Scyros, as soon as she was inform'd of the Preparations, which were making against the Trojans. The Reason of her Conduct was this; she knew, on the one side, that if her Son went to Troy, he would never return from thence; and, on the other, that Calchas had foretold that the City of Troy should never be taken without Achilles. The Device of Tbetis stood her in no stead; the Seer Calchas discover'd to the Greeks (f) where Achilles lay hid, whom they had fought for in divers Places without finding him: Upon this Ulysses, being deputed to the Court of Lycomedes, easily discover'd Achilles [D], and brought him away

(c) Apollodor. lib. 3. p. 235.

(f) Statius, Achill. lib. 1. ver. 493, &c.

is thus a certain Scholiast took Homer's Thought: For he observes, that Apollonius, who feigns, that Chiron went to the Sea-side to with the Argonauts: a good Voyage, and that his Wife attended him, holding Achilles in her Arms, and shewing him to Peleus, follow'd the Poets, who came after Homer, and supposed, with them, that Chiron nursed the little Achilles; a Thing never mentioned by Homer. Ἡρόδοτος δὲ τὸν Ἀχιλλεὺς τοῖς μετ' Ὀμήρου ποιηταῖς ὡς ἑλπίωνος λέγουσιν τὸν Ἀχιλλεὺς τραπεζῆαν. Ὀμήρου δὲ δὴν τούτου λέγει. (58).

(58) Schol. Apollon. lib. 2. ver. 558.

X.

Authors who have mentioned the Preceptorship of Chiron, and that of Phoenix.

(59) Argon. ver. 378.

(60) Nem. Od. 3.

(61) Iphig. in Aul. ver. 209, 709.

(62) Senec. Troad. Act. 3. ver. 333. Stat. Silv. lib. 2. ver. 39.

Achill. lib. 2. ver. 156.

Autonius Ptolept. ver. 30.

(63) De Venat. pag. 9. 3. A. & 974. C.

(64) Hipp. Tom. 1. p. 371. cap. 3. de Repub. Tom. 2. p. 391. B.

(65) Lib. 3. (66) Lib. 25. cap. 5.

(67) Sympos. lib. 4. cap. 1. p. 660. F. & de Music. pag. 1246. A.

(68) In Lacon. p. 197.

(69) Stromat. lib. 1. pag. 306. B.

(70) In Heroic. p. 682. A. & 705. A.

(71) Prolegom. pag. 71. A.

(72) pag. 97. C; pag. 129. A; pag. 142. C; pag. 143. A; & Declamat. 4. pag. 259. D.

(73) Eustath. in Homer. pag. 11. 34. & 340.

Scholiast. Homer. in Iliad. lib. 1. ver. 50. & lib. 16. ver. 14. & 36.

(74) These are the Names of the principal Scholiast. Homer. Iliad. 9. ver. 168, & 448. Dictys, lib. 2.

Xenophon, Conv. pag. 897. A. Plato 2. de Repub. Tom. 2. pag. 390. E. Cicero 3. de Orat. n. 15.

Strabo, lib. 9. pag. 297. Quintil. lib. 2. cap. 3.

Stat. Silv. 3. lib. 5. ver. 191. Plutarch. Tom. 2. pag. 4. 26. & 2.

Lucian. Dial. Mort. Philostr. Lemn. p. 136. Libanius, Prolegom. pag. 99.

Apollonius is very excusable, since he only followed the Crowd; for who has not spoke of Chiron, as having educated Achilles? Is it not what Orpheus (59), Pindar (60), Euripides (61), and so many other Poets have sung (62)? Xenophon (63), Plato (64), Apollodorus (65), Pliny (66), Plutarch (67), Pausanias (68), Clemens Alexandrinus (69), Philostrophus (70), Libanius (71), St Gregory Nazianzen, (72), and several others less ancient (73), have they not said the same thing? But, on the other side, they (74), who have mentioned the Preceptorship of Phoenix, are not fewer in Number. We ought not, then, to be very much surprized, if, according to some ancient Authors, Phoenix and Chiron are both represented as having been the Preceptors of Achilles: We can only say, that these Authors had not examined the thing narrowly enough, or that they had no regard to the Inconsistency, which results from the Circumstances of the Preceptorship of Phoenix, and the Circumstances of the Preceptorship of Chiron.

Valer. Flaccus, lib. 1. ver. 254. & 407. Autonius Ptolept. ver. 30. Claudian. de 3. Consul. Honor. ver. 61. (63) De Venat. pag. 9. 3. A. & 974. C. (64) Hipp. Tom. 1. p. 371. cap. 3. de Repub. Tom. 2. p. 391. B. (65) Lib. 3. (66) Lib. 25. cap. 5. (67) Sympos. lib. 4. cap. 1. p. 660. F. & de Music. pag. 1246. A. (68) In Lacon. p. 197. (69) Stromat. lib. 1. pag. 306. B. (70) In Heroic. p. 682. A. & 705. A. (71) Prolegom. pag. 71. A. (72) pag. 97. C; pag. 129. A; pag. 142. C; pag. 143. A; & Declamat. 4. pag. 259. D. (73) Eustath. in Homer. pag. 11. 34. & 340. Scholiast. Homer. in Iliad. lib. 1. ver. 50. & lib. 16. ver. 14. & 36. (74) These are the Names of the principal Scholiast. Homer. Iliad. 9. ver. 168, & 448. Dictys, lib. 2. Xenophon, Conv. pag. 897. A. Plato 2. de Repub. Tom. 2. pag. 390. E. Cicero 3. de Orat. n. 15. Strabo, lib. 9. pag. 297. Quintil. lib. 2. cap. 3. Stat. Silv. 3. lib. 5. ver. 191. Plutarch. Tom. 2. pag. 4. 26. & 2. Lucian. Dial. Mort. Philostr. Lemn. p. 136. Libanius, Prolegom. pag. 99.

I had therefore Reason to deny, in my Plan, that Statius, speaking of Phoenix and of Chiron as of two Preceptors of Achilles, was in the least favourable to Decimator and his Party; for besides that Statius does not tell us, whether they exercised this Employ both together, or one after the other, or which of the two was the first, he cannot be reconciled with Homer, who, in case of Competition, ought to carry it from him with an high hand. Consider these two Passages well:

Non tibi certasset juvenilia fingere corda
Nestor, & indomiti Phoenix Moderator alumni,
Quique, tabas acres lituorque audire volentem,
Æciden alio frangebatur carmine Chiron. (75)

In forming thee, nor Nestor would employ,
Nor Phoenix, Tutor of th'unconquer'd Boy,
A Guardian's Care; nor He, who would'st remove,
With softer Notes, Achilles' warlike Soul;
The Martial Music was the Hero's Choice,
And his Heart sounded as the Trumpet's Voice.

This is the first: The other is,

— tenero sic blandus Achilli

Semifer Æmonium vincebat Pelea Chiron.
Nec senior Peleus natum comitatus in arma
Troica, sed caro Phoenix hærebat alumno. (76)

Thus, for his Pupil, Chiron's flattering Tale
O'er the reluctant Father could prevail.

The Sire refus'd the Grecian Arms to share,
But sent Achilles to the Trojan War,
Trusting the darling Charge to Phoenix' tender Care.

Xenophon (77) and Lucian (78), who allot these two Preceptors to Achilles, are exposed to the same Battery as Statius; and besides they differ from Homer, whom Decimator alledges: Observe that, tho' Statius (79) says, that Phoenix accompanied Achilles to Troy, it does not follow from thence that he supposes he was Chiron's Successor; for he says clearly enough, that Phoenix had had the Care of Achilles before that Voyage; for he calls the latter the Alumnus (the Pupil) of Phoenix (80). As for Tzetzes, who tells us, in his Commentary on Lycophron, that Peleus, having brought Phoenix to Chiron's Cave, where Achilles was educated, said to him, Behold your Son; tutor him as a good Father ought to educate his Child; he proves nothing against me; nor is he in the least favourable to those who have recourse to the Distinction of Governor and Preceptor, which is so clear in Plutarch; with regard to the Son of Philip King of Macedon. See the Article LYSIMACHUS. The Poets, I believe, cannot shew us the same Distinction in those remote Ages; and, however it be, it does not appear that Peleus joined Chiron in the Tutelage of his Son with Phoenix. And if Tzetzes, expressing himself very ill, meant so, he deserves no Credit. He is too modern an Author to deserve to be followed in a Matter of Fact, which can neither be reconciled with Homer, nor with the ancient Authors, who have attributed the Education of young Achilles to Chiron.

I shall put an end to this Remark, already too long, with a bold Stroke, which I cannot forbear. I dare affirm, that we need only read the Speech of Phoenix, in the ninth Book of the Iliad, to admire at those, who at present admire That Poem. For is that Speech worthy the Majesty of Epic Poetry? And Horace, who, according to Mr Moreri (81), boasts in the sixth Satyr of the first Book, that he had learned the Iliad by heart, had doubtless forgot that Speech full of a thousand Impertinencies, when he gave the Author of the Iliad this Elogy, that he always runs directly to the Mark, that he bassens to the Event's semper ad Eventum festinet (82). If so, would he amuse a Deputy of the Greek Army, who had a very important and pressing Commission; I say, would he amuse him with old Wives Stories, and with a Recital of his former Adventures?

[D] Easily discovered Achilles.] Mr Moreri pretends, with little Exactness, that Ulysses discovered him, by causing a Merchant to present him with Toys and Arms; for if we adhere to what Ulysses himself says of it (83), in his Speech to the Generals of the Army, it was He, who not only presented those Toys and Arms to Achilles, but also to all the young Ladies of the Court. If we refer it to Hyginus, and Philostrophus the younger, it is Ulysses again, who presented them, being one of Ambassadors of the Greeks, sent to Lycomedes to demand Achilles of him. If we leave it to Statius, it may be said indeed, that it was not Ulysses himself, the Chief of the Greek Embassy, who presented the Toys, but that he employed a Merchant to do it. Some Moderns (84) say, that he did it himself in the Disguise of a Merchant.

(76) Id. lib. 2. Silva 1. ver. 33.

(77) In Cor. viv.

(78) In Dial. Achill. & Ant.

(79) Ubi supra. & lib. 3. Silv. 2. ver. 96.

(80) Mewrius and Canterus understand by the Word, αλγος, which Lycophron made use of to denote Phoenix, that the latter had been Achilles' Father.

XL
Homer censur'd for the Speech of Phoenix.

(81) In the Article HORACE, but in it a Mistake.

(82) Horat. de Arte Poet. vet. 148.

(83) Ovid. Metam. lib. 13. ver. 175.

(84) Tzetzes, Ophion. lib. 2. cap. 32. Nat. Comes Mythol. lib. 6. cap. 1. Vicerone on Philostr. in the Summary of Achilles' Narrative: Pomey in Pantheo Mythico, &c.

(75) Stat. lib. 5. Silva 3. ver. 191.

away without Trouble, tho' he was so much in Favour with the Princess Deidamia; the King's Daughter, that she suffer'd herself to be with Child by him [E]. From hence sprung Neoptolemus, or Pyrrhus, as shall be observ'd in it's proper Place. Achilles fought an infinite Number of fine Battles, during the Siege of Troy, and before they encamp'd before the City. The great Quarrel, which arose between Him and Agamemnon about their Mistresses, (for (g) Agamemnon having restor'd Cbryseis, who was His, took Briseis away, who belong'd to Achilles) obliged the latter to keep in his Tent, without troubling himself any more with the War; and nothing was able to make him change his Resolution, but the Death of his dear Friend Patroclus, to whom he had lent his Armour (b), of which Hector deprived him, as well as of his Life. Upon which, Vulcan, at the Request of Thetis (i), made a new Suit of Armour for Achilles [F]. The Death of Patroclus was soon after reveng'd [G]; Achilles fought

(g) Homer, II. 1. v. 323, &c.

(b) Ib. l. 16. v. 818.

(i) Ib. l. 18. v. 462, &c.

(84) U/m Cicero de Amicitia, cap. 20.

chant. I dare not maintain that this is forged; but it very certain, that it is not built upon good Authority. Langius pretends (85), that Lycomedes did what he could by his Tears and Prayers, to hinder Achilles from following Ulysses, and accuses Cicero for having taken the Son for the Father, in these Words: "Nec enim — Trojam Neoptolemus capere potuisset, si Lycomedem apud quem erat educatus cum multis lacrymis iter suum impediementum audire voluisset. — Nor could Neoptolemus have taken Troy, had he suffered himself to have been prevailed upon by the Tears of Lycomedes, who would have prevented his Expedition." Langius is mistaken, and not Cicero. See the Remark [A] of the Article PYRRHUS, the Son of Achilles.

[E] Suffered herself to be with Child by him.] Achilles was so young at that time, that there are but few Examples of such a forward Generative Faculty as his. And yet good Instruction was then more early; nor was there room for the Complaint of Montagne in the twenty fifth Chapter of the first Book of his Essays, when he says, They teach us to live when Life is past. An hundred Scholars have had the Veneral Distemper, before having attained to Aristotle's Lessons of Temperance. But, if I had mind to moralize on the Poetical History, I should say to Montagne, that this Adventure of the Son of Peleus is an Admonition, that though Education be implanted never so early, it will sink under the Weight of Nature.

I shall observe by the way, that the Fictions of the Ancients would be more tolerable than they are, had they taken care not to contradict each other so much; but it seems they looked on their fabulous History as a Country, wherein every Body did what he pleased, without any Dependence on others. Apollodorus says, that Achilles was but nine Years of Age (86), when he was carried into the Isle of Seyros, and that they had began already to talk of the Expedition to Troy. According to Statius, the Preparations of the Greeks had already continued a Year, when Ulysses was sent to the Island of Seyros to fetch Achilles from thence.

When Ulysses came there, Achilles was already a Father (87): Judge then whether Nature had been slow in granting him the Abilities of a Man, and whether he long deferred the Exercise of them on young Deidamia. Statius durst not keep to the Calculation of Apollodorus, for he gives Achilles (88) at least twelve Years before the taking of him out of Chiron's Cave. I cannot tell how Barthius could find (89), that, according to the Calculation of Statius, the Son of Achilles must be above a Year old at the Time of Ulysses's Embassy; for though the young Hero had enjoyed the Fair one the very first Day, his Son could have been but three Months old at the Arrival of Ulysses.

Some have said (90), that he repeated the Dole to his Mistresses, after her first Lying-in, and that he had another Son by her. But, seeing he was born (91) before the Voyage of the Argonauts, between which, and the Expedition of Troy, the Chronologers (92) place at least thirty Years, judge whether the ancient Poets adjusted their Chronology well.

[F] Made a new Suit of Armour for Achilles.] No body ought to object that Charles Stephens and Lloyd, Hofman, Moreri, &c. speak of the impenetrable Armour, which Thetis caus'd Vulcan to make for her Son, for the Expedition of Troy. For though she had rendered his Body already invulnerable, by plunging it in the River Styx, we know that few Precautions seem superfluous to motherly Fondness. Malherbe designed to specify these two Precautions of Thetis, when he said:

Bien que sa mere eût à ses armés
Ajoute la force des charmes (93).

Though to the youthful Hero's Arms
His Mother adds the Force of Charms.

But yet he did not particularize them, because his Expression rather inclines one to think, that Thetis gave her Son enchanted Armour, than that, besides having charmed his Body, she presented him likewise with Armour of Proof. Mr Ménage (94), who justly censures the Ambiguity of the Expression, acknowledges moreover, that Thetis made use of this double Expedient; which in the main does not clash with probability. It is not the Business of a Discreet Writer to suppress a Thing under Pretence that it was unnecessary. It is sufficient that he finds it in Authors; being at Liberty, however, if he thinks proper, to arm us with his Philosophical Reflexions. Now it is certain, that an ancient Author called Philarchus, or Phylarchus has left in Writing, That Thetis, finding she could not hinder Achilles from going to the Siege of Troy, supplicated Vulcan to make him a Suit of Armour (95), proof against all human Force. Vulcan, having forged the Armour, declared that he would not deliver it, until he had obtained of Thetis the greatest Favour she could grant him. She excused herself from it, offering to testify her Acknowledgment by any kind of Service: But, finding he required a Personal Acknowledgment, she promised to pay him with her Person, provided the Armour fitted Achilles, which was to be tried upon herself, who was of her Son's Stature. Vulcan, satisfied with the Bargain, gave Thetis the Armour, who put it on, and ran away with it; the poor Cripple, not being able to overtake her, threw his Hammer after her, and hurt her in the Heel.

It may then be said in general, that Thetis caus'd impenetrable Armour to be made for her Son's first Campaign. But since Homer is the chief Source, from whence every thing relating to this Article should be drawn, it ought not to have been forgot, that, after the Death of Patroclus, from whom Hector had taken Achilles's Armour, Thetis obtained another from Vulcan. It is one of the finest Episodes of the Iliad, and it served Virgil as a Model for one of the best Passages of the Æneid. It deserved therefore to be touched upon. Observe, that, according to Servius (96), the Armour, which Patroclus wore when he was killed, was made at Peleus's Cave.

[G] The Death of Patroclus was soon after revenged.] Moreri had reason to say, That Achilles soon resumed the Arms, which the Loss of Briseis had made him lay down. In effect, since the Iliad comprehends the Actions of but one Year, according to the Sentiment of Father Mabruun (97) in his Treatise of Epic Poetry, few Months only must have pass'd between the Retreat of Achilles, and his Return to the Army, after the Death of Patroclus. Therefore Malherbe fell into a strange Mistake, when he reported as a certain Fact, that Achilles had been nine Years before the City of Troy without fighting.

Achille à qui la Grece à donné cette marque,
D'avoir eu le courage aussi haut que les cieux,
Fut en la même peine, & ne put faire mieux,
Que soupirer neuf ans dans le fond d'une barque (98).

So Great Achilles, fam'd for warlike Might Thro' Greece, and equal to the Gods in Fight,

(93) Malherbe, lib. 3. P. 75.

(94) Ménage's Observations on Malherbe, p. 372.

(95) Apollodorus's Mythology, lib. 9. cap. 12. Tzetzes in Lycophron, pag. 36. takes some Notice of it. Whet I report, and is not given us by Natalis Comes, in the Scholiast of Pindar. in Rem. Od. 4.

(96) Servius in Æneid. lib. 1. ver. 843.

(97) Mr Ménage, in his Observations on Malherbe, p. 441, believes that it comprehends much less.

(98) Malherbe, Poëf. l. 5. p. 123.

fought with Heſtor (k), and having kill'd him, faſten'd him to his Chariot, and dragged him round the Walls of Troy [H]. Priam went in Perſon (l) to beg the Body of him, and obtain'd for it a great Ranſom. There are various Opinions concerning the Death of Achilles; ſome ſay that Apollo killed him (m), or that he (n) aſſiſted Paris to kill him, by directing his Dart to the Part, which was not invulnerable; others ſay that Paris (o) killed him treacherouſly in a Temple, where Achilles was gone to treat about his Marriage with Philoxena, the Daughter of Priam. The Greeks made a magnificent Funeral for him, of which Moreri's Dictionary has mentioned ſome Circumſtances, with very little Exactneſs [I], to ſay no worſe.

They

*Nine Years conceal'd within his Veſſel lay,
And for his Miſtreſs ſig'd the Hours away.*

Sarrazin, being probably deceived by this Place of Malherbe, whom he intended to imitate, has ſaid in a very fine Ode,

*Achille, beau comme le jour,
Et vaillant comme ſon épée,
Pleura neuf ans pour ſon amour,
Comme un enfant pour ſa poupée*

*Nine Years, Achilles, fair as Day,
And valiant as his Sword in Battle,
Cry'd for his Miſtreſs, ta'en away,
Like little Maſter for his Rattle.*

(99) Menage, as a Nov. But Mr Menage (99) corrected this Fault in the Edition he procured of Sarrazin's Works; he cauſed Neuf Mois, Nine Months, to be put inſtead of Neuf Ans, Nine Years. Finally, the Compariſon of Achilles to a Child, that cries for it's Baby, has it's Foundation in the Iliad; where we ſee that Achilles, having loſt his Concubine Briſſis, runs all in Tears to make his Complaint to his Mother, and that the good Lady comforts him, as if he were a little Boy.

*Χαλὴ τὴ μὴ νύκτατος, ἔτος τ' ἔπος' ἐν τ' ἐνθάδῃ.
Τίμων, τι κλάεις; τι δὲ σε θρήνη; λόγοι πένθος;
Ἐλευδα, μὴ μὴδ' ὧς τοι ὀδυρὸν ἔμψυ (100).*

(100) Homer. Iliad.
lib. 1. ver.
361.

*She seiz'd his Hand -----
And thus the Sorrow of his Soul explores.
Why grieves my Son? Thy Anguiſh let me ſhare, Reveal the Cauſe, and traſt a Parent's Care.*

POPE.

The Majesty of the Epic Poëſy ſuffered theſe Meanneſſes in thoſe Times. Therefore let us not regard them. Let us agree that Homer was a fine Genius, let us be pleaſed with the Fruitfulneſs and Eloquence of his Muſe, but let us add, (101) Horat.

Sat. 2. lib. 1.

— Sed ille,

Si foret hoc noſtrum fato delapſus in ævum, &c. (101).

(102) Æn.
lib. 1. ver.
483.

— But He,

Were he to live in theſe correſter Times, &c.

(103) Iliad.
lib. 23. ver.
23. & lib.
24. ver. 16.

[H] Dragged him round the Walls of Troy. Perhaps no Poet, before Virgil, ever aſſerted, that the dead Body of Heſtor was dragged three times about the Walls of Troy:

(104) In Aſſaſſe,
ver.
1045.

Ter circum Iliacos raptaverat Hectora muros (102).

(105) In Androm.
ver. 108,
399.

*Thrice round the Trojan Walls Achilles drew
The Corps of Hector, whom in Fight he flew.*

DRYDEN.

(106) Metam. lib. 12.
ver. 501.
Amorium,
lib. 2.
Eleg. 1. ver.
32. & in I- bis, ver.
333.

The Number of Turns, remarked by Homer, relate only to the Sepulchre of Patroclus; and it is very probable, that Virgil converted the three Circuits about the Sepulchre, of which Homer (103) had expreſſly made mention, into three Compaſſes round the Walls; I ſay, that he changed them in that manner, either through a Defect of Memory, or for the ſake of the Verſe. The Liberty taken in this Alteration has ſcarce been imitated by any Body; you no more find the three Circuits round the Walls in the Authors who lived after Virgil, than in thoſe who preceded him. Sophocles (104), Euripides (105), Ovid (106), Seneca (107), Statius (108), Diſſy. Cretenſis

V O L. I.

(109), Plato (110); Cicero (111), Hyginus (112), Philoftratus (113), Libanius (114), Serculus (115), Tzetzes (116), Eufathius (117), mention indeed of the dragging of Heſtor, but not the Number of Turns. As much as I can remember, there is only the Author of the Leſſer Iliad, in Latin Verſe, who mentions three Courſes round the Walls, and three round the Tomb. This Author's Name is Pindarus Torbanus; he was cited by the old Scholiaſt of Statius, which Veſſus did not know (118). Barthius has mentioned him often in the great Volume of his Adverſaria, and elſewhere (119). I know that Auſonius, in the Summary of the twenty ſecond Book of the Iliad, declares that Heſtor was dragged three times round the Walls of Troy; but I know alſo that he was cenſured for it (120), and that this Error made one of his Commentators believe, that Auſonius was not Author of all the Summaries which we have under his Name. Finally, the Treatment of the dead Body, the Diſcourſe which Achilles had with Heſtor, ready to expire, the Liberty he granted to every one of inſulting and ſtriking the dead Body, that Venal Soul, which ſuffered itſelf to be at laſt perſuaded, by rich Preſents, to ſend Priam the Body of his Son, are Things ſo far remote, I will not ſay from Heroic Virtue, but from the moſt Common Generoſity, that it muſt neceſſarily be judg'd, either that Homer had no manner of Idea of Heroiſm, or that he had only a Deſign to deſcribe the Character of a meer Brute. He repreſents Achilles to us, as wiſhing himſelf ſavage enough to eat Heſtor's Fleſh raw.

*Δὲ γὰρ πὺς αὐτὸν μὴ μόνος καὶ θυμῷ ἀνίη
Ἦμ' ἀνταμύμενον πρὶν ἔσθηναι (121).*

*Could I myſelf the bloody Banquet join!
No! — to the Dogs thy Carcaſe I reſign.*

POPE.

The Poet did not ſo much as comprehend, that, to do more Honour to his Hero, he ought not to have aſcribed to his Enemy ſo much Cowardice and Weakneſs as he does.

[I] Funeral — which Moreri's Dictionary has mentioned ſome Circumſtances with very little Exactneſs.] This Author has ſaid, that the Gods lamented the Death of Achilles ſeventeen Days; but he ought not to have cited Homer, without quoting the Place, where he ſpeaks of it. Now it cannot be in the Iliad, for he ſtrictly obſerved the Rule, which forbids to bury the Hero of an Epic Poem, in the Poem itſelf. Virgil obſerved it alſo. He ought to have ſaid then, that Homer ſpeaks of Achilles's Funeral in the twenty fourth Book of the Odyſſey, where he introduces that Epiſode on the Occaſion of Penelope's Suitors, killed by Ulyſſes. They have done wrong in the Edition of Amſterdam, to put the Continuators on Homer in the Place of Homer himſelf. But this is not all: They ſhould not have ſaid The Gods in general, without ſpecifying what Homer particularly mentions, to wit, That Thetis, accompanied by the Sea Goddeſſes, came to the Camp of the Greeks, to ſolemnize the Funeral Rites of her Son jointly with them, and that the nine Muſes aſſiſted with their mournful Elegies. He might have cited Pindar for this laſt Circumſtance.

*Τὸν μὲν ὅτε θένοντ' ἀνιῶν δαίμον' ἄλλὰ εἰ
παρὰ τε πυλῶν τάφου
δ' ἑλαινίαι παρβίνοι ἔσαν, ἡνὶ ὀρήντο τολῶμαίον ἔχουσαν. ἔδο-ξεν δ' ἄρα δ' ἀθανάτους ἑλὼν γε φῶτα κὶ φθιμένον δ' μῦθος ὅθιν διδοίμαν (122)*

X

(1) Virgil.
Æn. lib. 6.
ver. 47.
Ovid. Met.
lib. 12. ver.
530.
(6) Diſſy.
Cr. lib. 4.
Direc. Phyſi- cus, Hig-
gus, G. 110.
Servius in
Æn. 6. ver.
57.

(103) Lib. 3.
(111) De
Republ. lib.
3. Tom. 2.
pag. 391. B.
(112) Tuſ-
cul. I.
(113) Cap.
120.
(114) In He- roic. pag.
697.
(115) Pro-
pyma. pag.
100. D.

(116) P. 75.
(117) In Ho- mer. lib.
2. ver. 401.
(118) De
Hiſtor. Lat.
pag. 819.
(119) See his Commentary
on Statius,
Tom. 1.
pag. 340, &
Tom. 2. p.
393. 1603.

(120) See the Diſtribut. of Marianus.
Accurſ. upr Auſonius.
(121) Iliad.
lib. 22. ver.
346.

(122) Pin-
dar. lib. 1.
O. 5. pag.
715.

In

he

(134) In Heroic. pag.
705. C. Sc.
also Ælian.
Hist. div.
lib. 14.
cap. 23.

(140) Kuh
sius in Æ
lian ibid.

(143) Philostratus in Heroic. pag. 704. calls them τῆς

ἄλκιμος ἄλκιος Vigenere translates, The Ancients, who were in the same Age with Achilles.
 This is very ambiguous; belie had better use the Word Century than Age, and doubtless Philostratus
 did not mean that they were cotem-porary with Achilles,
 but that they were so with each other.

(148) Achill. lib. 1.
ver. 335.
See al d Diçlys Cret.
lib. 1.

That the Shade appeared first of the Height of seven Cubics

(141) Stati Achill.
lib. 2. ver
442.

No greater Toil, than when the Lyre I str
And Heroes were the Subject of my Song.

(g) Printed at Leyden in 1693. See the History of the Works of the Learned, May 1693, pag. 511.

he lov'd them as well on his side [O]; and it is even said that his Amours extended to Persons of his own Sex [P]. We shall see in the following Article what he did after his Death, and a Miracle he wrought, which Tertullian has taken Notice of. I refer you to the Homerique Achilles (g) of the late Mr Drelinchourt, as a Collection of the most compleat Literature that can be met with in Relation to this Hero of Paganism.

cites, gives This Hero a fine and tall Stature, and a Face that shot forth Rays, a Nose neither Aquiline nor hooked, but such as it ought always to continue. Thus Vigenere translates it, apparently from the Latin Version: I should choose to render it, such as it ought to be, and give This Signification to the Verb μᾶλλον.

[O] He loved them as well on his side. The Incontinency of Achilles was both a forward and a lasting Fruit: We have seen, that he got Deidamia with Child at ten Years of Age: And his future Achievements of this kind were answerable to this early Beginning. It was not long before Iphigenia experienced his Abilities (152), in the same way; and if Diana believed that they offered her a Virgin-Sacrifice in the Person of this Daughter of Agamemnon, she was deceived. Achilles had taken Care, that, if the worst came to the worst, Iphigenia should not go out of the World without having tasted both the Joys of Conception, and the Pains of Labour. He saw Helen on the Walls of Troy, and became so furiously in love with her, that he had no Rest, and was forced to have recourse to his Mother (153), and to beg of her to procure him by some means or other the Enjoyment of this Beauty. A fine Employ for a Mother! Thetis accepted of it, and invented a kind of Pimping, which consisted in making her Son believe, that he enjoyed the Fair One: But it was a meer Dream; and yet This imaginary Repast appeased Achilles's Appetite. Though he lost Briseis, he did not lie alone; he was too careful in providing for his Bed. He could find Relays at Home in case of Necessity; Diomedes (154) supplied the Place of Briseis. He had no sooner seen Polyxena, the Daughter of Priam, than he desired to make her his Wife; and not being able to satisfy this Desire in his Lifetime, he required that, after his Death, she should be sacrificed to him (155), that he might enjoy her in the Elysian Fields. He had so well deserved in this World to be called (156) ἀφρονικός, ἀκατάχρηστος, ἀφρονικός (Amorous, Incontinent, &c.) (157), that it was thought he would stand in need of Women, even in the other, and therefore they married him there both to Medea and Helen. He was accused (158) of having fallen in love with the Amazon

Penthesilea, after he had taken her Life away, and of having gratified his Passion on her dead Body. We shall take Notice of this in the Article THERSITES. See also the Article TENES.

[P] Persons of his own Sex. Some will have it (159), that Troilus, the Son of Priamus, died smothered in the Arms of the lascivious Achilles, who would have violated him, but found too much Resistance. A very malicious Turn is given to the Choice, which Ajax suggested to Menelaus, when he advised him to cause the News of the Death of Patroclus to be carried to Achilles by the handsome Antilochus. Philoftratus (160), who says plainly enough what sort of Acquaintance there might be between the Hero and the Messenger, who was chosen, is mistaken in relation to the Author of this Choice; for it was not Menelaus, as he says, who cast his Eyes on Antilochus; it was Ajax (161), who propos'd it to Menelaus. But it is chiefly with respect to Patroclus, that they have given a criminal Turn to the Passion of Achilles. Plato (162) takes his part upon this against Eschylus. Xenophon (163), is of Plato's Opinion in it. Sextus Empiricus (164) handles the Matter like a Man of his Profession, I mean Pyrrhionically. But Lucian and Philoftratus (165) declare him guilty of it: One of them pretends that Achilles was not enough upon his Guard in lamenting his Friend's Death, and that he suffered the Truth to escape him in these Words.

Μηδὺν τοὺν οὖν εὐνοῦντος ἡμίλιν
καλλίω. (166)

Femur tuorum sancta conversatio Melior,

What shall we say of this Distich to the 44th Epigram of the 11th Book of Martial?

*Briseis multum quamvis averfa jaceret,
Æacidae propior levis amicus erat.*

*What tho' Briseis lay not by his Side,
His smoth-fac'd Friend her Absence well supply'd.*

A CHILLEA, an Island of the Euxine Sea, called also the Island of Heroes, the Island Macaron (a), or the Island of the Blessed, Leuce, &c. was, according to some, over against the Borysbenes, and, according to others, over against the Danube. The Name of Achillea was given it, because the Tomb of Achilles was to be seen there (b), and because it was consecrated to that Hero. Tbetis (c) or Neptune gave it him, and he obtained Divine Honours there, a Temple, an Oracle, an Altar, Sacrifices, and the like. Some speak of this Island (d) as if it were uninhabited, and that it was unsafe to pass the Night in it; which obliged Persons, who went on Shore there, to return on Board toward the Evening, after having seen the Antiquities of the Place, the Temple, and the Gifts, which were consecrated to Achilles. This Hero was not there alone; the Souls of many other Heroes had likewise their Abode there [A]; and as for Achilles, he must necessarily have been present both in Body and Soul; for he married Helen there (e), and had a Son by her, whose Name was Euphorion, whom Jupiter loved criminally, and without Success, and whom he killed with a Thunderbolt, to punish him for his Refusal. Others say (f), that Achilles had Iphigenia to Wife in this Island, whom Diana had transported thither, after having communicated to her the Gift of Immortal Youth, with a Divine Nature. Lastly, others pretend, that the Wife, whom he married in the other World, was the famous Medea (g); but the most common Opinion gives him Helen to Wife. It

[A] The Souls of many other Heroes had likewise their Abode there (1). This appears from a Passage of Pausanias (2), where he relates that Leonymus, General of the Crotenians, having been at the Island of Leuce to be cured of a Wound, reported, That he had seen there Achilles, the two Ajax's, Patroclus, Antilochus, &c. I wonder Ammianus Marcellinus forgot this in the Passage, where he tells us, that this Island was a dangerous Place: "In hac Taurica Infula Leuce sine Habitatibus ullis Achilli est dedicata; in quam si fuerint quidam forte delati, visis

"antiquitatis vestigiis templaque & donariis eidem
"heroi consecratis, vesperi repetunt naves; aiant
"anim non sine discrimine vitæ illic quemquam per-
"nocitare (3). — In this Tauric the uninhabited I"sland of Leuce, is consecrated to Achilles; at which,
"whoever happen to arrive, after having viewed the "Remains of Antiquity, the Temple, and the Gifts
"consecrated to That Hero, go back to their Ships
"at Night: for they say, that no one can pass the
"Night there, without endangering his Life."

Temple, was not the least. That which relates to the Flight of Birds [F], is misrepresented by Mr Moreri, who moreover gives us a separate Article of a Fountain called ACHILLEA [G], wherein Achilles was wont to bathe himself, and which had a wonderful Quality. Achilles was not the only Person, who wrought Miracles in the Island of Leuce; his Wife Helen shar'd this Reputation with him (k), as we shall

(k) See the Remark [D].

stroyed them on the spot, and they fell stone-dead under the Trees. Whereupon the Amazons, crowding about the Temple, fell a spurring their Horses; but Achilles giving them a furious Look, as when he rufled on Scamander before Troy, so terrify'd their Horses, that their Fright proved stronger than their Bridles. So that prancing and curvetting, and imagining that what they carried on their Backs was a new and extraordinary Weight, they threw down the Amazons, and, like wild Beasts, trod them under foot; their Mains standing erect through Fury, and their Ears prick'd up; and thus, like cruel Lions, they tore them to pieces, devour'd their Arms and Legs, and made a most horrid Carriage of their Bowels. When they were glutted with this Feast, they fell a prancing and galloping through the Island, full of Rage and Fury, with their Jaws bloody, till they came to the top of a Cape, from whence perceiving the smooth Sea, and taking it for a fine large Plain, they ran headlong into it, and so perish'd. As for the Ships of the Amazons, an impetuous Whirlwind falling upon them (when they were empty and destitute of all their Rigging) caus'd them to dash one against another, as it were in a Sea Fight; so that they were broke to pieces, especially those whose Sides were attack'd by the Beaks and Prows of other Ships, as commonly happens to Vessels which have no Pilots. So that all the Wrecks meeting together near the Temple, where there were many Bodies half dead, and breathing still, and several Limbs horribly scattered up and down, with the Flesh, which the Horses, being not used to such Food, had reject'd, That holy Place must needs have been very much prophaned. But Achilles soon purged and expiated it; as it was an easy thing to do, in an Island of such small extent, against which the Sea beat on all Sides. Achilles having therefore let in the Waves, every thing was washed and made clean in a trice.

[F] That which relates to the Flight of Birds. What Moreri ascribes to Pliny, namely, That no Bird is seen to fly there, is misrepresented. Pliny's Words are: "Perdices non transvolant Boeotiae fines in Attica, nec ulla avis in Ponto, infula quæ sepultus est Achilles, sacratam ei zædem (18). — That is, Partridges; do not fly beyond the Frontiers of Boeotia in Attica; nor any Bird beyond the Temple of Achilles, which is in an Island of the Euxine Sea." Salmastius pretends, that by these Words must be understood, that no Bird ever soar'd above this Temple; and he proves by a Passage of Antigonus Carysius, that this was anciently believed (19). And, whereas he proves from an express Passage of Arrian, that the Birds came into the Temple every Morning to scatter the Water, with which they had wetted their Wings, and to sweep the Temple afterwards with them (20); he insults Solinus for having said, That no Bird comes into the Temple of Achilles; and that if any one happens to come near it, he flies from it again as fast as he can. Salmastius says, That Solinus has nothing but what he borrowed from Pliny; and that the latter had said the same thing with Antigonus Carysius; but it is more likely, that Pliny had not the Thought of Antigonus Carysius in view, and that Solinus had read the Fact elsewhere, adorned with more particular Circumstances, than those of Pliny. For what Negligence would it not be in the latter, if, intending to inform us, that Birds did not fly over the Temple, he should make use of an Expression which signifies, that they never flew beyond it? These two things are so little alike, that there is nothing more easy than never to go over a House, and yet to leave it behind; as it is not more difficult to fly above a House, without passing beyond it. Besides, the Ancients were so fond of diversifying their Miracles, that it is improbable, after what had been related from the time of Antigonus Carysius, that the Story of the Birds flying away at the sight of the Temple of Achilles, should not be broached till the time of Solinus. However it be, it cannot be proved from Pliny against Solinus, that the Birds came into it; and after all, Mr Moreri will be found to have imputed to Pliny more than he really said, and to have suffered himself to be deceived by these Words of Charles Stephens, in the two above-cited Editions (21). Achilles infulam nulla avis transvolat. — i. e. No Bird flies over Achilles's Island. Plin. 10. 29. 10. But he will take his Revenge with Usury on Mr Hofman, who attributes the same thing to Strabo also. It was owing, no doubt, to his seeing that Mr Moreri cited Strabo immediately after Pliny, and for want of taking notice, that That Citation from Strabo, with that of Pomponius Mela, which follows it, relate to other Matters contained in the Article. Nullam hic avem volare, says he, Plin. l. 10. c. 19. habet & Strabo, l. 13. (22).

[G] A separate Article of a Fountain called ACHILLEA. This Article appeared to me at first Sight worthy of Criticism; it seemed to me, that this Fountain was not called so Substantively; but by way of Epithet, or Adjectively, in common with every thing, which belonged to Achilles. In a Word, Fons Achilleus, and the Fountain of Achilles, appeared to me the same thing. Now as it would be ridiculous to make an Article of the Word Jacobean, in giving an Account of That Well of Jacob, spoken of in the fourth Chapter of St John (23), which a Latin Translator might call Fontem Jacobeanum if he pleas'd; I could not help thinking, that the Epithet Achilleus, which *Freinbemi*us makes use of, speaking of the Fountain of Achilles, ought not to be made a separate Article. But, after having consulted Athenæus (24), I found that this Criticism would be precarious, because it appeared to me that it might be contested, whether this Fountain was called Ἀχιλλέων Substantively, or Adjectively, and whether it might not appear in it's alphabetical Order, with as much Reason as the Island Achillea. It is to be found in the Geographical Theſaurus of Ortelius (25), under the Word Achilleum, and afterwards under the Word Achilleus fons; which is however better than the Achillea, fons Miletii, of Mr Hofman.

I shall not examine, whether *Freinbemi*us has well explained the Passage of Athenæus, which regards the Singularities of this Fountain (26). I am satisfied with observing, that Athenæus ought at least to have been cited, according to *Freinbemi*us, that is to say, at his sixth Chapter, and not at the second, of the second Book. Mr Hofman follows Mr Moreri in quoting, and they were both shewn the Way by Ortelius. But this is nothing in Comparison of Moreri's Blunder, who gives us Aristobolus the Son of Cassander, instead of Aristobolus Native of Cassandria.

We cannot complain too much of the Negligence of those who make Supplements to Dictionaries; for very often they tack certain things to them, which contradict those already there, and generally they forget to accommodate the Addition in such manner to the Foundation on which they build it, that no Dissonance may result from it. It is Horace's Rule, Primo ne medium, medio ne discrepet imum (27).

The Piece must be consistent with itself.

For Example, those who enlarged the Dictionary of Charles Stephens, made no Difficulty under the Word Achillea, to insert these Words of Ortelius, crude as they were, and without the least Alteration, "Video à Nebriffensi Caccariam, & à Carolo Stephano Caccariam in suis Dictionariis poni, sed pro ponti infula, quam dicunt apud Melam Collifaria dici, ex depravata fortè lectione, &c. — I find Caccaria in the Dictionary of Nebriffensis, and Caccaria in that of Charles Stephens; but they both appear to be a false reading for an Island of Pontus, which in Mela is said to go by the Name of Collifaria." Which is odd enough; for it makes Charles Stephens speak of his own Dictionary, in the Dictionary itself, as if he cited another Work; and yet he seems uncertain, in citing himself, of what he had advanced without any Appearance of Doubt in the Passage, which he quotes.

[H] Athen.

(18) Plin. lib. 10. cap. 29.

(19) Salmast. Exercit. Plinian. in Solin. cap. 29. pag. 215.

(20) In Periplo Ponti Euxini. Philostrophus has said almost the same thing. In that Island (says he, according to the Translation of Vigenere, Tom. 2. fol. 337.) there is a certain Species of white Birds, which are aquatic, and smell of the Sea, which Achilles makes use of to cleanse his sacred Grove, sweeping it with the Wind of their Wings, and sprinkling it with their Feather, wetted with Sea-water; for which they fly but very little above the Ground.

(21) In the Remark [L], of the Article ACHILLES, towards the Middle.

(22) Hofman upon the Word ACHILLEA.

(23) Tioje ponto translatu it; there was a Well of Jacob there, would do better to render it Jacob's Well was there, or as the Port-Royal has it, There was a Well there which was called Jacob's.

(24) Ἐν Μελίτρον ὑπὸ τῶν εὐξίνων ἔστιν ἡ Ἀχιλλέων πηγή. Athen. lib. 2. cap. 6.

(25) Edit. Hanov. 1611, in 4to.

(26) *Freinbemi*us. Supplement. in Ortel. Curt. 2. 7. 24. ADVICE to those who make Supplements to Dictionaries.

(27) Horat. de Arte Poët. ver. 154.

shall observe under the Article STESICHORUS. Abundance is here more dangerous than Scarcity [H].

[H] Abundance is here more dangerous than Scarcity. If the Reader finds in this Work several Relations of Prodiges, and Miraculous Traditions, he must not imagine, that it is my Intention to put them off for true; I fear no Accusers on this Head. If this were my Design, I would relate but very few of them. I am very sensible that in these Subjects; Credulity is the Source of Abundance (28); but at length it runs into such excess, that it generally cures those who are not incurable. CREDULITY is a Mother, whose own Fruitfulness destroys her sooner or later in the Minds of those, who make use of their Reason. So that it would have been the Interest of the Pagans, who intended to deify their Heroes, to have attributed but few Miracles to them. The Maxim πλὴν ἡμιον πάντος, The Half is more than the Whole, and That other, ne quid nimis, Too much of one thing is good for nothing, are applicable here. They, who have so multiplied the Sacred Winding Sheets, the Pictures of the Holy Virgin painted by St Luke, the Hairs of the same Saint, the Head of St John Baptist, the Fragments of the true Cross, and an hundred Things of this Nature, ought to reflect on these two Maxims; for, by encreasing the Dose, they have weakened the Force of it, and have administered both the Poison and the Antidote at once; Ipse sibi obstat magnitudo (29). — It's own Bulk is it's Ruin. Achilles had the same Fate in the Island of Leuce, as at Troy: The same Miracles, which might deceive the Reader, are sufficient to undeceive him; as the same Spear, which wounded Telephus, served him as a Balm to heal the Wound.

Vulnus Achillæo quæ quondam fecerat hosti, Vulneris auxilium Pelias hasta tulit (30).
Nysus & Æmonia juvenis qua cuspidis vulnus
Senferat, hac ipsa cusptide sensit opem (31).

*Ev'n in his Foe a Friend the Trojan found,
And the same Spear both gave and heal'd his Wound.*

But I forget that the Number of those, who are undeceiv'd by the multiplication of Prodiges, is so small, in comparison of those who are not, that it is not worth my while to alter my Course, and to take the two Maxims above for my Polar Star, when I trade in this Merchandise (32). We shall find a Mistake of Camerarius in the Remark [2] of the Article P.Y.RRHUS, King of Epirus, concerning a pretended Miracle of our Achilles.

ACHMET, the Son of Seirim. He wrote a Book of the Interpretation of Dreams, according to the Doctrine of the Indians, Persians, and Egyptians. It was translated from Greek into Latin, about the Year 1160, by Leo Tuscus (a), who dedicated it to Hugo Echerianus [A]. It was published in Latin, in the Year 1577 (b), from a very mutilated Manuscript, found in the Library of Sambucus (c); but it was said to be a Work of Apomajares (d). The learned Leunclavius inform'd the Public (e) of this Mistake, in his Annals of the Turks. Mr Rigault is the first who published this Work in Greek. He added it to Artemidorus, on account of the Similitude of the Subjects, and published them together at Paris, in the Year 1603. He alter'd nothing in the Latin Translation of Leunclavius, and made no Notes on the Text (f). He believes that Achmet, the Son of Seirim, is the same whom Gesner mentions. But the Achmet of Gesner was the Son of Habramius (g), and a Physician, and Author of a Work divided into seven Books, entitled, Peregrinantium Viatica, which was in Greek, in the Library of Don Diego Hurtado de Mendoza, the Emperor's Ambassador at Venice, when Gesner compos'd his Book. John Anthony Sarrazin was in possession of the same Work (h), as he assures us, in his Notes on Dioscorides. The two Greek Copies of the King of France's Library, from which Mr Rigault published his Book of Dreams, do not import that the Author called himself Achmet, the Son of Seirim. It is true, that, as the Beginning is wanting, it may be conjectured, that when they were whole, the Author's Name might appear at the Head. But lastly, these are but Conjectures, which may receive Strength from another Consideration; which is, that the Name of Achmet is writ with a fresher Hand on one of the two Copies. That Name did not appear in the Copy, which Leo Tuscus made use of in the XIIIth Century, in composing his Translation: This is inferred from the Italian Translation of that Work, compos'd by Tricasso (i). Mr Rigault took the Exordium, and gave it in Latin; though he supposes that it was not Achmet himself, but Leo Tuscus, who compos'd it (k). Barthius had the Translation of this Leo, and believes that his Copy was written in that Translator's Time (l). The Specimen he gives of it makes it appear, that it was not translated literally, and that many Passages of it were omitted. What is most remarkable is, that the Names of Achmet and of Seirim are in the Title of the Manuscript with those of Syrnacham, Baram, and Tarphan. The first of these three last Persons was Interpreter of Dreams (m), at the Court of the King of the Indies; the second at the Court of Saanisan, King of Persia; and the third, at the Court of Pbaraob, King of Egypt (n). Barthius conjectures from hence, that Achmet and Seirim were also two Interpreters of Dreams in some Barbarian Court. However it be, the Work was compiled by a Christian; for the Author begins it in the Name of the Holy Trinity (o). Mr Rigault looks upon the Greek Text only as an antient Translation of the Work. The Original was in Arabic.

Lambecius makes Achmet to flourish in the IXth Century, at the Court of Mamoun, Caliph of Babylon. Mr du Cange is not of that Opinion. See his Greek Glossary, at the Word μαμούν.

[A] To Hugo Echerianus.] Barthius calls him Hugo Eterianus, and says that he was an Excellent Author, Scriptorem ævo suo luculentum (1). There is a false Print in Barthius, as well as in these Words of Mr Rigault, Hugoni Echeriano dedicavit. It ought to have been Hugo Eterianus, Hugoni Eteriano. Allatius, in the eleventh Chapter of the second Book de per-petuo consensu Ecclesiæ Occidentalis & Orientalis, is mistaken in citing Hugo Eiberianus. Baronius, Bellarmine, and many others, write Hugo Eterianus, but Eterianus is more correct. It is the Name of an Ecclesiastical Author of the XIIth Century. This was communicated to me by Mr de la Mennoie.

(29) Florus in Præm.

(30) Ovid. Remed. Amor. lib. 1.

(31) Propert. lib. 2. eleg. 1.

(32) I beg pardon for this far fetched, or, if you will, non-jesical Figure.

(28) Prodigia eo anno multa nuntiata sunt, quæ quo magis credebantur simplices ac religiosi homines, eo etiam plura nuntiabantur. Liv. lib. 34. cap. 45. — i. e. That Year many Prodiges were said to have happened, and the more they were credited by foolish and superstitious Persons, the more they were esteemed.

(a) Rigault's Pref. to Achmet's Book.

(b) Leunclavius, at Frankfurt, in 8vo.

(c) Barthius, Advers. lib. 31. cap. 14.

(d) Toot is, Abumathar, or Albumathar. See the Catal. Oxoniens. pag. 35.

(e) Rigault. ubi supra.

(f) Titi's said he did, in the Catalogue of Oxford. pag. 5.

(g) Gesn. Biblioth. fol. 2. verso.

(h) Rigault. Ubi supra.

(i) Patrice Tricasso des Curatiers, de Mantua. See the Biblioth. of Du Verdier, pag. 94c.

(k) Ex Pref. Rigault.

(l) Ubi supra.

(m) Syrnacham, in the Edit. of Rigaltius.

(n) This appears by the beginning of the 2d, 3d, and 4th Chapters of the Book.

(o) See the end of the 2d Chapter.

(1) Barth. Advers. lib. 31. cap. 14.

ACIDALIUS (VALENS) would have been one of the best of the modern Critics, if a longer Life had permitted him to bring the Talents he had received from Nature to Perfection (a). He was born at Wistock, in the Frontiers of Brandenburg, and having visited several Universities of Germany, Italy, and of other Countries, where he made himself much beloved [A], he resided at length at Breslaw, the Capital of Silesia. He waited a long time for an Employ in this place; but, not succeeding, he went over to the Communion of the Church of Rome, where he soon met with the Rectorship of a School [B]. It is said, that four Months were hardly expired, when a very strange Accident happened to him. He was following the Procession of the Holy Sacrament, and on a sudden fell into a Phrenzy. He was carried home, and died soon after. Some gave out, that he had killed himself [C]. His Death was a great Loss, for he had Wit, and was a very industrious Person. His great Application to Study was the cause of his Death, if we may believe Tbuanus (b), who says, that by sitting up too late, while he was composing his Divinations on Plautus [D], he contracted a Distemper [E], of which he died in three Days, on the 25th of May, 1595. He was just entered into his 29th Year [F]. We have several Books written by him (c). A little Tract, printed in 1595, to shew that Women were not rational Animals, mulieres non esse homines, was falsely ascribed to him [G]. I have

(a) Adolefcens summæ Spei & Eruditionis. A Youth of the greatest Hopes and Learning. Thuan. lib. 113. p. 68.

(b) Ibid.

(c) See the Remark [D].

[A] Where he made himself much beloved. The Esteem, which the illustrious Persons of Italy had for him, may be seen by the Literary Correspondence, which he held with Vincenz Pinelli, Jerom Mercurialis, Antony Ricciolini, Alcanius Porcius, &c. He resided three Years in that Country (1).

[B] The Rectorship of a School. Barthius affirms this: Rektor Scholæ Neufanæ factus (2); says he, He was made Rector of the School of Neufan. I believe he ought to have said Neiffanæ, or Niffanæ. Neiffe, which Acidalius always calls Niffa in his Letters, is three or four Leagues from Breslaw. The Bishop of this Name resides there (3). He, who was then in that See, had John Matthew Wacker for his Chancellor, a Patron of Learning, and the Learned. He invited Acidalius to Neiffe, and lodg'd him at his House. See Acidalius's Letter (4). I have not observed in those, which he writ from that Place, that he ever mentioned the Rectorship of the School.

[C] That he had killed himself (5). Christian Acidalius, the Brother of Valens, durst not speak out plain, when he complained of the Calumnies which were spread abroad concerning his Brother's Death; but it must be no longer questioned, after what Barthius writ in one of his Books, that the Subject of his Complaint was the Report which was spread, that Acidalius had killed himself; a Theme of great Outcry from the Pulpit. Let us hear how Christian Acidalius speaks of it, after having said that his Brother was pompously buried. "Ut mirari satis nequeam calida multorum in judicando nimium præcipit tantum & temerarium ingenia, qui, & ipsius morbi & loci etiam sæpe ignari, quicquid maledicendi libido dictavit, vel fama, quæ

Tam fidi pravique tenax quàm nuncia veri,

"de obitu ipsius sparsit, propagare porro in externas etiam regiones & propugnare, imo nescio quas tragedias etiam in concionibus ad plebem, ubi regnare solent, excitare non erubuerunt. — So that I cannot sufficiently admire the rash and hasty Judgments of certain Persons, who were not ashamed to propagate in foreign Countries, the false Reports, which Calumny, and Fame,

Alike the Voice of Falshood and of Truth,

"had spread concerning his Death, and to dress up I know not what Tragical Story, in their Harangues to the People, whose Passions they command (6)." He does not deny that his Brother was disordered in his Brain, which deprived him of his Reason. "Gravissimum illud febrium acutatum symptoma Paraphrenitidem aliquoties sensit, quod extremum malorum animam etiam sua sede ejecit (7). — He was sometimes taken with a Paraphrenitis, that worst Symptom of Acute Fevers, which shakes the very Soul itself from her Seat." But he maintains that very able Physicians, and Mr Wacker's Family, at whose House Mr Valens lay sick, assisted him 'till he died. Perhaps there is nothing in which Fame oftener deceives us, than in relating the Sickness and Death of illustrious Persons; wherefore Preachers, and all Moralists in general, ought to be very reserved in their Reflections on them. One cannot too much distrust the rash Credulity, or artful Malice of this kind of Newsmongers.

[D] His Divinations on Plautus. On the one side he had the Satisfaction to see them promised in the Catalogue of Frankfort (8); and on the other, the Vexation of being obliged to make an hundred Complaints against the Slowness of his Bookseller. In a Word, they were not published 'till after his Death. Barthius set a Value on that Work; "Pauci cum Comici locum affectu sunt — solus Acidalius rectum sensum percipit, ut alia multa in Comico (9). — Few (says he) have hit the Poet's Sense in that Passage — Acidalius alone discovered it, as he did in many others." Mr Teiffier says, That the Commentary of Acidalius on Quintus Curtius is much esteemed (10). He dedicated it to the Bishop of Breslaw, who rewarded him well for it, as it appears from the Author's Thanks in his eighty ninth Letter. He wrote Notes on Tacitus, on the twelve Panegyrics, and on Velleius Paterculus, besides Specimens, Letters, and Poems (11). This last Work inserted in the Delights of the German Poets, contains Epic Verses, Odes, and Epigrams, which Borrichius thought to be of little Value (12). His Dissertation de constitutione carminis Elgiaci, pleases Barthius (13).

[E] He contracted a Distemper. Tbuanus does not say what that Distemper was; but we learn from another Hand that Acidalius heated his Blood in such manner, by sitting up late, whilst he was commenting on Plautus, that from that time he became subject to Fevers. This we learn from his Brother.

[F] He was just entered into his twenty ninth Year. Uratislavie, quæ Silesiorum Metropolis, per seque annum plus minus utrumque se mihi præstitit, (preceptorum & patrem) donec inde Nyssam evocatus familiaris morbo suo, quem ex nimis vigiliis in adornandis Plautinis Divinationibus suis, contraxerat, FEBRI SCILICET ACUTIS- SIMA opprimeretur (14). — During his Acidalius bode, for half a Year, or thereabouts, at Breslaw, the Capital of Silesia, I found in him both a Preceptor and a Father; 'till being invited to Nyssa, he was there seized with, and died of, that fatal Distemper, which he had contracted by too great an Application to his Divinations on Plautus. I mean A MOST ACUTE FEVER." He was more than once dangerously ill in Italy, and he informed his Friends in his Letters, that a Fever was his common Disorder in that Country. See Page 97 and 112 of his Letters.

[G] A little Tract — was falsely ascribed to him. Geisler cleared him from this false Imputation, as appears from these Words of Placcius; "Prioris auctor quomodo non ex vero sit habitus Valens Acidalius, vide apud Geislerum decadis 3. n. 8. (16). How

(8) Valens Acidali. Epist. pag. 317, 326.

(9) Barth. in Statium, Tom. 1. pag. 239.

(10) Teiffier's Elgiaci, taken from Mr de Thous Tom. 2. pag. 315.

(11) Ibid.

(12) Borrich. Differt. de Poët. pag. 125.

(13) In Claudian. apud König. Biblioth. pag. 6.

(14) Christ. Acidali. ubi supra.

(15) Baillet's Jugement sur les Poët. n. 1346.

(16) Pbeccius de Anonymis. l. 2. c. 16.

(1) Valens Acidali. in Epist. pag. 209, 215.

(2) Apud König. Biblioth. pag. 6.

(3) Niffa ad fluvium eognominem, Episcopatus Wratislaviensis sedes. Niffa, upon the River of that Name, see See of the Bishop of Breslaw. Bano in Cluverii Intr. d. lib. 3. cap. 15. pag. 106. Edit. Amstel. 1697.

(4) P. 228, 318.

(5) Barthius quotes this with his own Hand, in his Copy of Acidalius's Premi. See König. Bibl. Vet. & Nov. pag. 6.

(6) Christian Acidalius's Prolegomena of Valens Acidalius, p. 100. t. 1. Nov. c. 1.

(7) Id. ibid.

I have read somewhere, that he was a Physician [H], and that he intended to have wrote Notes upon Aulus Gellius, if he had lived longer. Nisi juveni illi fata quietem miserabiliter properassent.—Had not Death snatched him away suddenly (d). It appears from his Letters, that he was preparing an Edition of Apuleius. Mr Baillet places him among his Famous Children, and says that he illustrated Plautus at seventeen or eighteen Years of Age, not to mention several Latin Poems, which are extant, and which he composed at that same Age. One of his first printed Works is Velleius Paterculus, publish'd by himself at Padua, in the Year 1591. He himself says, That he was ashamed of this early Production of his Pen, and he was surpriz'd when he heard that it had been reprinted in France (e). Lipsius, who writ some Letters to him (f), wherein he expressed his Love and Esteem for him (g), was of Opinion that he would prove a great Man: Ipse Valens (non te fallam augur) gemmula erit Germania vestra, vivat modo.—Valens himself (I certainly foresee) if he lives, will become an illustrious Ornament of your Germany. This he wrote to Monavius in 1594. as may be seen in the beginning of Acidalius's Letters.

(d) Sciopp. de Arte Crit. pag. 18.

(e) Val. Acidal. Epist. pag. 70, 78, 127.

(f) Ibid. p. 160, 161, 299, 255.

(g) The Xth and XXVth of the Centuria ad Ital. & Hisp.

(17) That is the Dissertation to prove that Women are not rational Animals.

(18) Ut id genus hominum lucrum cupidi sunt, cum aviditate ejus emolumentum Editionis non satis respondisset, quædam persequere de iactura sua. As they are a Set of Men eager of Gain, because the Profits of the Edition did not answer his Expectation, he then complain'd of his Loss. Val. Acidal. Epist. Apolog. ad Calcem Epistol.

(19) Ibid.

(20) Ibid.

“adhuc esset fabula illa in Apologetica epistola satis refutata, quæ multorum animis altè nimis insederat, ut facile esset improbis quidvis in invidiam trahere, &c. (21) — Which Scandal arose from hence, that this Story, which I have sufficiently refuted in my apologetical Epistle, was yet fresh, and had taken so deep root in the Minds of many; insomuch that it gave a handle to unreasonable Men to blacken my Reputation.” To conclude; I shall observe, that he affirms this Dissertation had been handed about for a considerable time, and that in all likelihood it was written in Poland.

Few will wonder, that Acidalius was afraid of coming off by the work, if he brought the Clergy upon his Back; for, as it is very natural, to entertain an ill Opinion of one's Neighbour, these Gentlemen are very often compar'd to Æolus:

Æole, namque tibi Divum Pater atque hominum Rex

Et mulcere dedit fluctus, & tollere ventos (22).

O Æolus! for to thee the King of Heaven

The Power of Tempests; and of Wind has given.

Thy Force alone their Fury can restrain,

And smooth the Waves, or swell the troubled Main.

DRYDEN.

But there is this difference in the comparison, that they are more expert at raising, than appeasing a Storm. This latter Effect demands Men of Consequence and Weight:

Tum pietate gravem ac meritis si forte virum quem Aspergere, silent—

Ille regit dictis animos, & pectora mulcet (23).

If then some grave and pious Man appear,

They hush their Noise, and lend a list'ning Ear.

He sooths with sober Words their angry Mood,

And quenches their innate Desire of Blood.

DRYDEN.

The other Effect is more easily produc'd.

[H] That he was a Physician.] Scioppius calls him so (24). Indeed he took his Doctor's Degree, but it was only ad honores; for he never practis'd Physic, nor ever design'd to do it. “Medicum τὴν πάσιν nec ago, nec agere propositum unquam fuit: certò consilio tamen inter ejus artis candidatos nomen dedi, nec pœnitet, &c. (25) — I neither practise Physic, nor was it ever my Intention so to do; though, for certain Reasons, I thought proper to rank my self among the Candidates of that Science.” He had said a little before, “Dabam illis me τὸς Ἀκαυαρύδας, quorum sacris & in Italia fueram initiatus: — It was there I enroll'd my self among the Sons of Æsculapius, into whose Mysteries I was initiated even in Italy.” What he says in another Place imports something more, “Inde rediens cum solenni illorum studiorum (Medicinæ) honore (26). — Returning thence with the solemn Honour of that Science (Physic).”

(21) Christ. Acidal. in Præf. Epist.

(22) Virgil. Æn. lib. 11 ver. 65.

(23) Ibid. ver. 151.

(24) Sciopp. de Arte Crit. pag. 13.

(25) Val. Acidal. Ep. pag. 215. See also pag. 194, 209.

(26) Ibid. pag. 249.

ACINDYNUS (ΓΡΗΓΟΡΙ) a Greek Monk of the XIVth Century. He associated himself with Barlaam, who, after he had embraced the Greek Religion, made it his Business to extirpate the Hesychastes, whose Number was very much increased

(a) See the Authors quoted by Maimbourg, in his History of the Schism of the Greeks, lib. 5. pag. 147, 150. of the Dutch Edition.

(b) Orthod. Græc. Tom. 1. from pag. 759, t. pag. 773.

(c) In Book 2. cap. 16. de Confeſſu. in the Appendix to Cam's History. Liter. Script. Eccl. pag. 34. Consult that Appendix about this Article.

among the Monks of Mount Albos. The Hefycastes were contemplative Votaries, whose Name is a sufficient Proof, that, even in those Days, there were Quietists in the World. In the Rapture of their Devotion they pretended, that they saw a Brightness, resembling that which appeared about Jesus Christ, when he was transfigured on Mount Tabor, and affirmed this Light to be Uncreated, tho' altogether distinct from the Essence of God (a). Acindynus, seconding the ardent Zeal of Barlaam, wrote against the Illusions of these Fanatics, and was one of the Sticklers against them in the Council of Constantinople. But he had the Misfortune to meet with Antagonists, who had more Credit and Interest than either he, or Barlaam, and who drew upon them several Censures and Condemnations in several Councils. The ill Success he met with in That of Constantinople, about the Year 1337, did not deter him from charging openly with Heresy the Favourers of Gregory Palamas, for which he was cited by the Patriarch of Constantinople in 1341. He appeared before the Council, and was obliged to hold his Tongue, upon Pain of Excommunication. Six Years after he was yet more vigorously pursued, because John Cantacuzenus, who was become Emperor, had a Kindness for Palamas. The Censures and Excommunications, which at several times fell upon Acindynus, reduced him at last to a more sedate, and altogether obscure, Life. James Gretzer, a German Jesuit, publish'd at Ingolstadt in 1616, Acindynus's two Books, De Essentia & Operatione Dei. Leo Allatius has also published a Poem (b), and some Fragments of the same Author (c), who having had the Fate to pass for a Heretic [A] a considerable time, has found at last more learned and more equitable Judges [B].

[A] To pass for a Heretic.] As in the heat of a Dispute we are only intent upon pressing our Adversaries, we are often blinded to such a degree, as not to perceive, that we pass from one Extrem to another; or at least that we stretch our Arguments so far, that they prove too much. I make no doubt, but this was the reason, why Barlaam and Acindynus laid themselves open to their Adversary Palamas, and that, being orthodox at the bottom, they often argued like Heretics. Præteolus has not fail'd to place them in his Catalogue; but it is impossible to make any thing of the Sentence of their Condemnation, in the manner he relates it. What we find least obscure in his Book concerning Barlaam and Acindynus, is, That the Council, which was called in order to condemn them, was held in the presence of the Blessed and most famous Emperor Michael Andronicus Palæologus, and John his Son, in the Reign of Henry VII. Emperor of Germany, John XXII. being Pope of Rome, in the Year of our Lord 1313 (1). This whole Passage swarms with Errors: For first of all, in the Century here in question (2), there was no other Emperor of Constantinople who could be distinguished by the Title of Blessed by a Roman Catholic, but Michael Palæologus, who was reconciled to the Holy See, and died in Communion with it. Now he was neither called Michael Andronicus, nor had he a Son called John; and besides he died in 1283. Secondly, the Emperor, whose Son's Name was John, had no other Name but that of Andronicus Palæologus, and began to reign in 1328. so that neither John XXII. nor Henry VII. were his Contemporaries. Lastly, It is false that Acindynus was condemned about the Year 1313. Father Gualtier, in his Chronological Tables, does not forget Barlaam and Acindynus, whom he ranks among the Heretics, upon the Authority of Præteolus.

[B] Has found at last more—equitable Judges.] See the Authors quoted by Mr Moreri; I mean Pontanus and Spondanus's Annals. See likewise those of Beovius, Father Gretzer (3), Father Maimbourg (4), and the Authors cited by him in the Margin.

(2) The Word Century is taken here in a General Sense for the Space of 100 Years, beginning with one pleases

(3) Gretzeri Note in Cantacuz. & in Editione Acindyni.

(4) Maimbourg's Hist. of the Greek Schism, B. 5.

(1) Præteol. in Elench. Hæret. pag. 86. Edit. Colon. 1605. in 4to.

ACINDYNUS (SEPTIMIUS) was Consul of Rome with Valerius Proculus, in the same Year that Constantine, Son to Constantine the Great, was kill'd, near Aquileia (a). He had been Governor of Antioch, and during his Government there happened an Event, mentioned by St Austin (b), which deserves to be taken notice of. A certain Man, not paying into the Exchequer a Pound of Gold, at which he had been assess'd, was committed to Prison by Acindynus, who swore withal that he would cause him to be hang'd, if he did not pay that Sum upon a certain Day, which he appointed. The limited Time was near expiring, and the poor Fellow still unable to satisfy the Governor: He had indeed a beautiful Wife, but who was bare of Money as well as himself; and yet it was from her alone he began first to be in Hopes of Liberty. A very rich Man being desperately in love with this Woman, offer'd her the Pound of Gold, on which her Husband's Life depended, and asked no other Recompence for it but a Night's Lodging (c). She, being instructed by the Scripture, that She had no Power over her own Body, but her Husband, communicated to the Prisoner the Offer of this Gallant, telling him withal, that she was ready to accept of it, if he would give his Consent, he who was the true and lawful Master of his Wife's Body; and if he thought his Life worth redeeming at the Expence of a Chastity, whereof he had the sole Disposal. He thank'd her for it, and gave her leave to lie with her Lover. She obey'd; giving her Husband the Use of her Body, not in the common way of gratifying the Appetite of the Flesh, but to indulge the Desire he had to live (d). The Spark gave her a Purse with the promised Sum of Money, but stole it afterwards cunningly from her, and imposed upon her another Purse filled with Earth. The Good Woman, returning home, (for she had met her Gallant at his Country-House) no sooner found out the Cheat, but she complained of it publicly, and demanded Justice of the Governor, to whom the very ingenuously related the Fact. Acindynus began with accusing himself, as having by his Severity and Menaces drove these innocent People to such desperate Remedies, and first of all condemned himself to pay the Pound of Gold into the Exchequer; afterwards he adjudged to the obedient Wife That Piece of Ground, out of which the Earth had been taken, which was

(a) In 340. according to Calvinus.

(b) Augustin on our Lord's Sermon on the Mount, B. 1. c. 16.

(c) Pollicens pro una Nocte, si ei miſereri vellet, se auri libram daturum. Id. ib.

(d) Ille Corpus non nisi marito dedit, non concubere, ut solet, sed vivere cupienti. Id. ib.

found

found in the sham Purse. St Augustin dares not decide [A] whether this Woman's Conduct be right or wrong, and inclines rather to approve than to condemn it [B]; which is somewhat surprizing [C]. We have observed before (c), the same loose Principle of Morality in St Chrysostom, in relation to Abraham and Sarah's Conduct.

(c) In the Remark (1) of ABIME-LECH.

[A] Dares not decide. This is plain from these Words: "Nihil hic in alteram partem disputo; liceat cuique æstimare quod velit (1).—I do not decide upon this Question, let every one judge as he pleases." In another place he questions whether a Woman's Chastity would be violated, in case, to save her Husband's Life, and by his own Order, she should lie with another Man;—"Scrupulosius disputari potest utrum illius mulieris pudicitia violaretur, etiam si quicumque carni ejus commixtus foret, cum id in se fieri pro mariti vita, nec illo nefeciente sed jubente, permitteret, nequaquam fidem deferens conjugalem, & potestatem non abnuens maritalem (2).—It is a nice point to be determined, Whether that Woman's Chastity would be violated, even tho' she should be carnally known by another, who should submit to this for the sake of her Husband's Life, and that by his own Consent; in which she neither deserts her conjugal Faith, nor denies the Authority of her Husband." Rivetti, having quoted these Words, adds (3), That St Augustin relates, that the same Case happened under the Emperor Constantine (4), when Acindynus, &c.

[B] Rather to approve than to condemn it. This evidently appears by these Words: "Non ita existimandum ut hoc etiam femina, viro permittente, facere possit videatur;—Quamquam nonnullæ causæ possint existere ubi & uxor mariti consensu pro ipso marito hoc facere debere videatur.—Nihil hic in alteram partem disputo.—Sed tamen narrato hoc facto, non ita respuit hoc sensus humanus, quod in illa muliere viro jubente commissum est, quemadmodum antea, cum sine ullo exemplo res ipsa poneretur, horruimus (5).—We are not to imagine in general that it is lawful for the Wife to do this, even with her Husband's Permission—tho' there may happen Cases, in which such a Liberty may be allowed.—I pronounce nothing in this point.—However, now I have mentioned this Fact (to wit, the Case of the Wife, whose Husband was imprisoned by Acindynus) this Woman's Behaviour, in Obedience to her Husband, is not so contrary to the general Sense, nor shocks us so much, as at first sight it may do, when the Question is proposed without any Instance." I know not what Grounds the Protestant Divine, whom I have quoted in the foregoing Remark, has for his Assertion, when he assures us, that St Augustin rather inclines to condemn than to justify the Woman. "Quo facto Acindyni explicato, liberum unicuique permittit Augustinus æstimare quod velit, quamvis in eam partem propensior videatur, quod id fieri non liceat (6).—After laying down this Story of Acindynus, St Austin gives every one leave to judge as he thinks fit; tho' he seems more inclined to condemn the Lawfulness of the Action."

[C] Which is somewhat surprizing. So great a Divine as he was, ought surely to have known, that our Life, which is but a temporal and a perishing Good, ought not to be so dear to us, as to be thought worthy of being redeemed by our Disobedience to the Law of God. For as Disobedience is a Sin, which makes us liable to eternal Punishment, and a Moral Evil, which offends an Infinite Being, it is no less against common Prudence, than the Dictates of sound Reason, to chuse to commit a Sin, rather than lose one's Life. I say nothing of those wide Abysses of Corruption, which are opened every where under our Feet, by asserting, that an Action, which would be criminal, if done without a design to save one's Life, becomes innocent, when done to prevent Death. Acindynus's Prisoner would have acted the shameful Part of a Pander, no doubt, and consented to the Act of Adultery, properly

ly so called, if he had suffered his Wife to lie with the Spark merely to gain a Pound of Gold; but because he consented, only to save his Life, it ceases to be a Consent to Adultery; nay, it becomes a lawful thing. Who does not see, that if this Morality took place, there is not one Precept in the Decalogue, to which the Fear of Death might not dispense with our Obedience? Where are the Exceptions in favour of Adultery? If a Woman may be dispensed with for violating the Command of not defiling her Body, when by that means she may rescue her Husband from Capital Punishment, she will likewise be free to transgress it, when her own Life comes in question; for God no where exacts from us, that we should love another more than ourselves. Therefore we may with Impunity, it seems, violate the Law of Chastity, in order to avoid Death. And why will not the same Reason make Murder, Theft, Perjury, the abjuring of one's Religion, &c. lawful? The greatest Men are apt to mistake and lose their Way, even in the smoothest and most beaten Roads. Is it so difficult to find, that St Paul did not pretend, that a Husband had Power to dispose of his Wife's Body to whom he pleased; when he said, that the Wife has no power over her own Body, but her Husband? Nevertheless you see that St Augustin puzzles himself with these Words of the Apostle, and that he lays great Stress upon the Distinction, marito jubente, potestatem non abnuens maritalem. We shall take notice elsewhere (7) that he has made use of this Doctrine of St Paul to justify Abraham and Sarah in relation to Agar's Concubinage. Let us now hear a Divine, who tho' he lived several Ages after This Father of the Church, yet proves a better Casuist in this Point.

"Qua in re (that is, concerning the Adventure of the Wife whose Husband was Acindynus's Prisoner) mirum est talem ac tantum virum potuisse dubitare, cum ex sacra Scriptura constet aptissime malum aliquod pœnæ nunquam esse redimendum malo culpa, & vitam potius esse deponendam, quam ut eam nobis aut aliis servemus id facientes ex quo Deus offenderetur. Nullo modo itaque censendum est licitum esse adulterii remedium vel marito, vel uxori, vitandæ alterius necis causa; quin potius mortem expectare convenit, imo vero ultro expetere, quam alterutrius castitatem prodere, ob cuius conservationem multæ pudicissimæ feminae non solum ab aliis occidi sustinuerunt, sed etiam (quod tamen probare nolum) fide ipsi vim intulerunt, non solum inter Ethnicas, sed etiam inter Christianas (8).—It is strange, that so great a Man should hesitate in this Matter, when it is plain from the sacred Scriptures, that no Evil of Punishment is ever to be bought off at the Expence of the Evil of Sin, and that we should rather part with Life, than preserve it for ourselves or others, by doing what will offend God. And therefore we must by no means think, that either the Husband or the Wife is at liberty to have recourse to the Remedy of Adultery, in order to save either's Life: they ought rather to await Death, nay even voluntarily to seek it, than betray each other's Chastity; for the sake of preserving which many the most chaste Women, not only among the Heathens, but even Christians, have not only submitted to die by the Hands of others, but have violently destroy'd themselves; which latter Action, however, I by no means approve." He quotes the Example of Sopronia, of whom in it's Place. Consult the Amænitates Juris of Mr Ménage in the Chapter, entitled, De mariti lenocinio: Adulterarum viros ordinare non potuisse. 'Tis the 10th Chapter of this Work; See the 52d Page of it, in the Leipsc Edition of 1680, in 4to.

(7) In the Remark (1) of the Article of SARA.

(8) Rivet. Ubi supra.

ACONTIUS, (JAMES) a Philosopher, Civilian, and Divine, born at Trent, in the XVIth Century (a). He embraced the Reform'd Religion, and going over into England in the Reign of Queen Elizabeth, he received many Instances of That Prince's Bounty, as he acknowledges himself in the Frontispiece of the Book [A], which

[A] In the Frontispiece of the Book, which he dedicated to her.] Instead of an Epistle Dedicatory, he contented himself with a Canonizing Inscription, which begins with, DIVÆ ELIZABETHÆ ANGLIÆ, FRANCIÆ, HIBERNIÆ REGINÆ. He declares, that he inscribes his Book to

(a) More fully places him in the XVth Century.

(1) St Augustin, in his Tractatus de Sermone, lib. 1. cap. 10.

(2) Idem, in Tractatu, lib. 22. cap. 35.

(3) Rivetti Exercitationes in Genesim, Oper. Tom. 1. pag. 251.

(4) It is Constantinus, in the Book of St Augustin, which I have quoted.

(5) St Augustin, Ubi supra.

(6) Rivet. Ubi supra.

he dedicated to her. I mean the famous Collection of the Stratagems of the Devil, which has so often been translated, and reprinted. The first Edition of it is That of Basil, in 1565. soon after which the Author died in England (b). James Grasserus procured a second Edition of it in 1610. wherein we find indeed Acontius's Letter, de Ratione Edendorum Librorum, containing very wholsome Cautions to those, who design to set up for Authors; but the Editor has omitted his Treatise of Method (c); which is a good Piece [B], tho' the Author only published it as an Essay (d). He had compos'd in Italian a Book of Fortification, which he himself turn'd into Latin during his Stay in England (e); but I think it was never printed. He was also writing a System of Logic (f), which I suppose Death hindered him from finishing. 'Twas great Pity, for he was a Man of a just way of Thinking, and great Discernment and Penetration. He had fram'd to himself the most rational Idea of such a Work, and thought himself oblig'd to bestow the more Pains and Care upon it, because he foresaw, that an Age more refined, than that he liv'd in, was advancing [C]. His Conjecture was well ground'd [D]. His Principles in Religion were not the same with those of Calvin; he had a great Inclination to Toleration, and held in general certain Tenets, which have render'd him very odious to some Protestant Divines [E]. I have met with but few Particulars of his Life. He says of himself, by the

(b) Grasserus's Epistle to the Reader before Strategemata Satanae.

(c) See the Title of it, at the End of the Remark [B].

(e) Id. ib.

(f) Id. ib.

(d) Post illud tempus, quo excidit nobis inchoatum illud de Methodo opusculum, scis me his sedem ac locum, mutasse. — Since the time that this imperfect Work of Methodo came out of my hand, you know that I have twice chang'd my Situation. Acontii Epist. ad Joh. Wolfium Tigurinum de Ratione edendorum Librorum, pag. 410.

to her, as a Testimony of his Gratitude: "In figuram memoriamque grati animi ob partum ejus liberalitatem, quum in Angliam propter Evangelicæ veritatis professionem extorris appulisset, humanissimeque exceptus esset, literarum otium. — As the Sign and Memorial of a Mind full of grateful Sentiments for That Tranquillity, which her Bounty afforded his Studies, when, exiled for professing the Protestant Religion, he took Shelter in England, and was received with the greatest Humanity." In his Letter to Wolfius, he says, That his Pension relieved in some measure his Indigence, and afforded him leisure to Study. "Ut autem quicquid est operæ id ipsam in artem (munierendum oppidorum) conferrem, ex parte privatis sum rationibus adductus, etenim in hoc voluntario meo exilio inopiam UTCUNQUE sublevari, & otii ad alia studia fuppediat NONNIHIL, impetrato mihi ab hujus sapientissimæ atque optimæ Reginæ liberalitate honesto stipendio (1). — "I am induc'd, partly by private Reasons, to cultivate this Science (Fortification) as far as I am able; since, in this my voluntary Exile, it procures me a KIND OF MAINTENANCE, and affords me some Leisure for other Studies, by obtaining for me an honourable Pension from the Liberality of this Wife and Good Queen." What Restrictions are here! And how well they shew the Difficulty of satisfying the Expectations of Refugees? Observe, that he obtained this Pension, not as a Divine, but as an Engineer, which appears by the Reason he himself alleges, why he spent his time principally in the Study of Fortification.

[B] Which is a good Piece.] This is the Judgment which a learned Cartesian gave of it (2), in a Letter which he wrote to Father Mersennus, soon after the Publication of Des Cartes's Meditations. "He said, he relish'd above all things the Method which Mr Des Cartes had made use of in handling his Subject; he admir'd it's Usefulness, and extoll'd it's Excellencies above That of the Schools: More particularly he esteem'd his Judgment, and the Reasons he had to prefer the Analytical or Resolutive Method, to the Synthetical or Compound, as well in teaching, as demonstrating. He had not till then met with any thing like it, except the little Book De Methodo, compos'd by James Acontius, who, besides that excellent Treatise, has also given a fine Specimen of the Analytical Method, in his Book of the Stratagems of the Devil, which he recommends to the Perusal of all those, who love the Peace of the Church; though Acontius plainly discovers in it the Prepossession of his Sect, and intended by it to Favour those of his own Party (3). That little Piece of Acontius, under the Title of, Methodus sive recta investigandarum tradendarumque arrium ac scientiarum ratio. — (The Method, or right Rule, of investigating and delivering Arts and Sciences), was insert'd in a Collection of Dissertationes de Studiis bene instituendis, printed at Utrecht, in 1658.

[C] That an Age more refined — was advancing.] We must hear what he says himself, after having mentioned the other Reasons which rendered his Design very difficult in the Performance: "Intelligo etiam

"me in seculum incidisse cultum præter modum, nec tam certe vereor eorum qui regnare nunc videntur judicia, quem exorientem quandam seculi adhuc paulo cultioris lucem pertimesco. Esti enim multos habuit habetque ætas nostra viros præstantes; adhuc tamen videre video neicio quid magis futurum (4). — I am sensible too, that I am fallen into an extremely polite Age; and yet I am not so apprehensive of the reigning Geniuses, as the approaching Brightness of still politer Times; for though the present Age has produced, and continues to produce, many Great Men, yet I fancy I foresee an Era of superior Politicness arising upon us."

[D] His Conjecture was well ground'd.] I am of opinion, that the XVth Century produced a greater Number of Learned Men, than the XVIIth, and yet the former was not so enlightened as the latter. Whilst the Reign of Criticism and Philology continued, every Part of Europe produced Prodiges of Erudition. The Study of the new Philosophy, and of modern Languages, having introduced another Taste, That Universal and Profound Literature has disappeared; but in recompence, a certain Genius more refined, and accompanied with a more exquisite Discernment, has spread itself over the Commonwealth of Learning: People are now-a-days less learned, and more subtle. Therefore Acontius had Reason to foresee, at a Distance, an Age, which would be a more formidable Judge of the Logis, he intended to write, than That wherein he liv'd. However, I would not be thought so presuming, as by my own Authority to adjudge the Superiority to our Age; for in this I do but conform myself to the Opinion of the most acute and refined Critics. "We live in an Age, says one of them (5), wherein People attend more to good Sense and Reason, than any thing else; and it may be said in our Commendation, that we are already better acquainted with the Character of ancient Authors, and more intimately familiar with their Genius, than those, who went before us. The Difference between them and us, is, That, in the last Age, People were more ambitious of Erudition than they are at present. 'Twas the Genius of those times, wherein nothing was more in Vogue than a vast Capacity, a great Memory, and profound Literature. They studied Languages to the bottom; applied themselves to reform or restore the Text of ancient Authors by far-fetched Interpretations; cavilled about an equivocal Word; laid stress upon a Conjecture, in order to establish a Correction; in short, they stuck to the literal Sense of an Author, because they had not Force enough to raise themselves up to his Spirit, and to be thoroughly acquainted with him, as we have at present, because we are more Reasonable, and less Learned; and set a greater Value upon plain good Sense, than an extensive, but perverse, Capacity."

[E] Odious to some Protestant Divines.] That I may not be arraigned for advancing this without any Ground or Proof, I shall quote the Words of a Minister of the Hague (6): "Jacobus Acontius (de quo jure quod de Origine dici solet, ubi bene nemo melius, ubi male nemo pejus) — fuit — vir verè doctus, sed ingenui, ut acris quidem, ita & elatioris,

(4) Acont. ubi supra, pag. 412.

(5) Pere Rapin's Preface to the Comparaison of Thucydides and Livy.

(6) Saldernus de libris, pag. 337, 338.

(1) Acontii Epist. ad Wolfium, de Edendorum Librorum ratione, pag. 411.

(2) Houlinet's Letter is dated Aug. 29. 1641. apud Baillet, Life of Des Cartes Tom. 2. pag. 138.

(3) Baillet, ubi supra.

the by, that he had bestowed a great part of his Life in the Study of Bartolus, Baldus, and such like barbarous Writers, and many Years at Court (g). Acontius's Letter, which was published in 1696 (b), shews a clear and exact Genius; and which was acquainted with sound Logic. It is dated from London the 5th of June 1565. and serves to illustrate a thing which he had advanced concerning Sabellius, and which had been censured. Note, That tho' most Protestant Divines look upon this Man with Horror, yet some amongst them have very much commended him [F].

(b) By Mr. Crenius. p. 131, &c. of the 2d part of his Animadversiones Philologicae & Historicae.

"elaticiis, & iusto liberalioris: quin à nescio quali
scepticismo & indifferentissimo in ipsam Theologiam introducendo haudquaquam alieni, quod tracta-tu suo de Stratagematis Satanae testatum satis fecit;
libello, (Simone Goulartio iudice) omnium malo-rum pessimo". Voetius et adscribit t quod vel imperite vel subdole communem confessionis conceptum molitus sit, sub cuius vexillo militari passunt & ipsi Ariani. — James Acontius (to whom may be applied what is generally said of Origen, that where he did well, no one did better, where he did ill, no one worse) was a truly learned Man, but of a Genius too Elate and Free, and too Spectial in Matters of Religion, as appears by his Treatise de Stratagematis Satanae: A Book (according to Simon Goulartius) of all bad Books the worst. Voetius charges him with cunningly, or unskillfully, drawing up a Confession of Faith, under whose Banner the Arians themselves might fight." What is here mentioned of Simon Goulart is not to be found (as far as I know) in any of his Books; I believe it is taken from Uytenbogaardus, who says in one of his Works, that, when he studied at Geneva, he was censured by Simon Goulart for reading Acontius, who told him, that his Book of the Stratagems of the Devil, was the worst Book in the World, esse librum omnium malorum pessimum (7). I have met with another Passage of Voetius concerning this Matter, wherein that Doctor places Acontius among the Heretics, who came out of Italy, under Pretence of Reformation (8), and assures us, that if the Venom which lies hid in some Places of his Book, had been taken notice of, he had either been Excommunicated, or constrained to sign a Confession of Orthodoxy. "Iudicetur quis anguis in herba latuerit, quod hic vir in fundamentalibus assertionibus nunquam à quodam trium personarum statuerit, nec adversarios, Samosatenum, Photinum, Arrium, Eunomium, Pneumatomachos, aut eorum errores rejecerit, contentus solos illos rejectos, qui negarent filium non esse alium à patre (9). —
"Judge what a Snake is concealed in the Grass, when this Author, in his Fundamental Assertions, never lays down the SAMENESS of ESSENCE of the Three Persons, nor rejects the Errors of Samosatenus, Photinus, Arius, Eunomius, and the Pneumatomachi", being contented with disclaiming only those, who denied, that the Son is not distinct from the Father."
[F] Some amongst them have very much commended him." Mr Crenius furnishes us with Proofs for both these Assertions. He observes (10), That Conradus Bergius declares, that Acontius argued prudently and piously. This Bergius was Minister and Professor of Divinity at Bremen. The Book, wherein he speaks to this Purpose, is entituled, Praxis Catholica divini Canonis contra quosvis hereses & schismata, &c.
and printed at Bremen, in 1639. in 8vo. Rivetus, being in Possession of one of these Books, ex dono

authoris, wrote in it some Remarks, of which I shall mention That, which relates to Acontius. "Miror
 "cur, p. 524. tanti faciat vir doctus judicium Acon-
 "tii, hominis ambiguae fidei & Socinianorum vel
 "prodromi, vel commilitonis, cuius rei gratia ab
 "Arminianis toties reculus est & commendatus, etiam
 "in varias linguas vulgares translatus. Huic homini
 "scopus fuit, ut ex toto libro apparet, ad tam pauca
 "necessaria doctrinam Christianam ardere, ut om"nibus sectis in Christianismo pateret aditus ad
 "mutuam communionem. Vellem doctissi, & pium
 "virum à talibus laudandis & imitandis abstinuiss-
 "(11). — I wonder this Learned Author, at "his 524th Page, should so highly extol the Judg"ment of Acontius, a Man of ambiguous Principles,
 "and either the Fore-runner or Fellow-Soldier of the "Socinians; upon which account he was so great a Fa"vourite with the Arminians, that they reprinted his "Work many Times, translating it into several Vul"gar Languages. This Gentleman's Aim, as appears "from his whole Book, was to reduce the Christian "Doctrine to so few Fundamentals, as to open the "Door to a general Communion of all the Sects in "Christendom. I wish this learned and pious Au"thor had abstained from commending and imitating
 "such Writers." The Book, whence I had this Pas"sage, informs me farther, that Isaac Junius (12), Mi"nister at Delft, plac'd Acontius, the Remonstrants, and "Socinus, in the same Class, and look'd upon the first
 "as a Man, who had a mind to reduce all Sects into
 "one, and enclose them in the same Ark, as Noah did
 "all sorts of Animals in his, wherein they were pre"served, though sustain'd by different Food. We see "in the same Book, the Account which Peltius gave of "Acontius, which is, that by reducing to a small Num"ber the Points necessary to Salvation, and requiring "a Toleration for the particular Opinions, which were "against the other Articles, he opened a wide Door to "all manner of Heresies (13). Lastly, we find in the "same Book, that not only Arminius and Grevinchovius
 "have given great Commendations to our Acontius, but "also that Amesius and George Pauli (14), two Reformed
 "Divines, have very much applauded him. "Ja-
 "cobe Arminio tamen in Respons. ad Excerpta Theol.
 "Leidenf. p. 65. Acontius est divinum prudentiae ac
 "moderationis lumen, — (Acontius is a divine Lumi- "nary of Prudence and Moderation). Amesio præ-
 "fat. ad Puritan. Anglicanos & Grevinchovium in Ab-
 "sertione calumnia. Smoutii, p. 125. apud B. Hul-
 "semannum in Dedicat. Supplementi Breviarii Theo-
 "logici, p. 6. idem Acontius est divinus pater de rui's
 "graculis, qui sementem Ecclesiae Anglicanae calore
 "& rore caelesti fovit sedulo. — (The same Acontius
 "was very mighty in the Scriptures; and one, who
 "diligently cherished the Growth of the English
 "Church, with Warmth and Heavenly Dew (15)."

(11) Rivet. apud Crenium, ibid. p. 3.

(12) Isaac Junius in Examine Apologie Remonstrantium, p. 4. apud Crenium, ibid.

(13) Peltius in Dedicatio- ne Harmonie, apud Crenium, ib. p. 31.

(14) In Reformatione Augustino, seu Apologia pro dictatis suis de Aug. Confess. See Crenius, ibid. p. 32.

(15) Cren. ibid. p. 34.

ACOSTA (URIEL), a Portuguese Gentleman, was born at Porto about the end of the XVIth Century. He was educated in the Romish Religion, which his Father sincerely profess'd (a), though descended from one of those Jewish Families, which were constrain'd to receive Baptism. He was educated like a Person of Quality, and, after several Studies, apply'd himself at last to Civil-Law. Nature had endow'd him with good Inclinations [A], and Religion had made so deep an impression upon him, that he ardently desir'd to fulfil all the Precepts of the Church, in order to avoid Eternal Death, which he very much dreaded. Therefore he diligently apply'd himself to the reading of the Gospel, and other spiritual and godly Books; and

[A] Nature had endow'd him with good Inclinations.] He was so tender-hearted and compassionate, that he could not forbear shedding Tears at the recital of any Misfortune, that had befallen his Neighbour; and Modesty had taken so deep Root in his Soul, that he feared nothing more than what might offend it, and put him to the Blush. He was courageous, and susceptible of Anger on a lawful Occasion, and check'd the Insolence of those rude Men, who take delight in insulting others, still chusing to side with the weaker. This is the Character he gives of himself. Infirmorum Partes adjuvare cupiens, says he (1), & illis potius me socium adiungent.

(1) Uriel Acosta in his Exemplar Vitae Humanae, p. 340.

(g) Id. ib.

* Trigland. Hist. Eccles. p. 232.

† Voet. Polit. Eccles. part. III. in Indice, & pag. 31. & 338.

(7) Uytenbogaardus in his History written in Belgie, cap. 1. pag. 7. Edit. in 4to.

(8) Voetius's Theological Disputations, Tom. 1. p. 495.

¶ Pag. 114, 123, 341. Edit. Basil. 1610.

(9) Voetius, ubi supra, pag. 501.

* Opposers of the Divinity of the Holy Ghost.

(10) Thom. Crenius's Philological and Historical Animadversiones, part. 2. pag. 32.

(a) Pater meus verè erat Christianus. — My Father was truly a Christian. Uriel Acosta in his Exemplar Vitae Humanae, infered by Mr. Limborch, at the end of his Friendly Conference with a Jew, concerning the Truth of the Christian Religion.

(b) The Dignity of a Treasurer of a Collegiate Church.

and often consulted the Decisions of Casuists about the Heads of Confession; but the more Enquires he made, the more he found his Scruples and Difficulties increase, till, at last, they entangled him to such a Degree, that, being unable to get out of the Labyrinth; he fell into most terrible Agonies of Mind. He did not think it possible for him punctually to discharge the Duty and Conditions, which Absolution requires, according to sound Casuists, and thus he despair'd of Salvation, in case it could not be obtain'd any other Way. But, because it was difficult for him to abandon a Religion, to which he had been accustom'd from his Infancy, and which had taken deep Root in his Mind, thro' the Force of Persuasion, all he could do in his Condition was to examine, whether All the Notions he had imbibed of a Future State were not meer Fiction, and whether They were agreeable to Reason. He fancy'd that Reason incessantly suggested to him Arguments against Them. He was then 22 Years of Age, and This was the Course he took: He first turn'd Sceptic, and afterwards concluded, that the Road, into which Education had led him, would never carry him to Salvation. In the mean time, he studied the Law, and obtain'd a Preferment (b), at 25 Years of Age. Now, being unwilling to be without Religion, and the Profession of the Roman Catholic Religion affording him no Rest, he apply'd himself to the Reading of Moses and the Prophets, and, having found them more satisfactory than the Gospel, he was at last persuaded, that Judaism was the true Religion; but, not being permitted to profess it in Portugal, he resolv'd to leave his Native Country. Accordingly he resign'd his Place, and embark'd for Amsterdam with his Mother and Brothers, whom he had the Courage to catechise [B], and whom he had effectually brought over to his Opinions. As soon as they arriv'd there, they were admitted into the Synagogue, and were circumcis'd according to Custom: upon which he chang'd his Name of Gabriel into that of Uriel. It was not many days, before he found that the Manners and Customs of the Jews were not conformable to the Laws of Moses: He cou'd not forbear censuring this Nonconformity; but the Chief of the Synagogue gave him to understand, that he must follow their Tenets and Customs in all Points, and that if he receded from them never so little, they would excommunicate him. These Threats did not discourage him; He thought it would not become a Man, who had abandon'd the Conveniences of his Native Land for Liberty of Conscience, to yield to Rabbies who had no Authority [C]; and that it would argue want of Spirit and Piety, if he should

(2) Ibid. pag. 347.

(3) Ibid.

(4) Ibid.

[B] Whom he had the Courage to catechise. He does not forget the Circumstances, which were proper to heighten the Sacrifice he made to his Religion. He observes that he relinquish'd a profitable and honourable Post, and a fine House, which his Father had built in the best Part of the City (2). He adds the Dangers of embarking; for the Descendants of Jews; cannot go out of the Kingdom, without the King's particular Leave. Navem adscendimus non sine magno periculo: non licet illis qui ab Hebræis originem ducunt a regno discedere sine speciali Regis facultate (3). Lastly, he says, That if it had been known, that he entertained his Mother and Brothers with his Thoughts about the Jewish Religion, it would have been his utter Ruin; but his Charity made him overlook the Danger. Quibus ego fraterno amore motus ea communicaveram, quæ mihi super religione visa fuerant magis consentanea, licet super aliquibus dubitarem, quod quidem in magnum malum meum poterat recidere, tantum est in eo regno periculum de talibus loqui (4). We may here observe by the Way, that the Spaniards and Portuguese have omitted nothing, that the subtlest and severest Politics can invent, to maintain a Party. They have made use of every Method, for the Support of Christianity, and the Destruction of Judaism; and they cannot be accus'd, without Injustice, of having committed the Church to the Protection of Heaven, with a temper of Mind, dispos'd patiently to expect every thing from the Efficacy of their Prayers. On the contrary, one would think they followed the Advice which the Heathen Poet has given in an Affair relating to Agriculture,

Non tamen ullo magis præsens fortuna laborum est,
Quam si quis ferro potuit rescindere summum.
Ulcere os: alitur vitium, vivitque tegendo;
Dum medicas adhibere manus ad vulnera pastor
Abnegat, aut meliora deos fedet omina poscens (5).

(5) Virgil. Georgic. lib. 3. vers. 452.

*Receipts abound; but, searching all thy Store,
The best is still at hand, to lance the Sore,
And cut the Head; for, till the Core be found,
The secret Vice is fed, and gathers Ground:
Whilst, making fruitless Moan, the Shepherd stands,
And, when the launcing Knife requires his Hands, Vain Help, with idle Prayers, from Heaven demands.*

DRYDEN.

Or else one would be apt to say, that they have squared their Conduct by the Reproaches which Cato made to the Romans, when he blamed them for confiding solely in the Assistance of the Gods, who, added he, never hear the Prayers of the Slothful, for Sloth is a Sign of the Anger of Heaven. "Vos — inertia & molitia animi alius alium expectantes cunctamini, videlicet diis immortalibus confisi, qui hanc rempubl. in maximis sæpe periculis servavere. Non vultis, neque supplicibus muliebribus auxilia deorum parantur; vigilando, agendo, bene consulendo, prospere omnia cedunt. Ubi socordiae tete, atque ignaviae tradideris; nequicquam Deos implores: irati infestique sunt (6). — Unactive and Effeminate in Mind, you stand idly gazing on each other, relying on the Assistance of the Immortal Gods, who have often preserv'd this Republic in the greatest Danger. But be assured, that the Assistance of Heaven is not to be obtained by Wishes, and womanish Supplication: Success attends alone on Vigilance, Action, and wise Councils. If you give yourself up to Sloth and Idleness, it is in vain to implore the Gods; they are angry and unpropitious." Lastly, one may say, that the Lesson which they are most apt to practise, is the latter part of the Axiom, which a Modern has set down in these Words: We must, as it were, so wholly abandon ourselves to Providence, as if all human Prudence were useless; and we must so govern ourselves by the Dictates of human Prudence, as if there were no Providence (7). Without doubt they would laugh at an Author, who should blame them for using Christianity like an old Palace, so much decay'd, that it wants Props on every Side; and Judaism, like a strong Fortress, which one must cannonade and bombard continually, in order to weaken it. We may justly condemn certain Methods of supporting the Good Cause; but after all, as good as it is, it stands in need of Support; and Distrust is the Mother of Safety. See the Remark [E], of the Article LUBIENIETSKI, and the Remark [B], of the Article DRA-BICIUS.

[C] To Rabbies who had no Authority. There is certainly a great Difference between the Tribunal, which our Acosta stood in fear of in his own Country, and the Tribunal of the Synagogue of Amsterdam. This should betray his Sentiments upon this Occasion; wherefore he persisted in his former Course. Accordingly he was excommunicated, which had such an effect, that his very Brothers, I mean those, whom he had instructed in the Jewish Religion, durst neither speak to him, nor so much as salute him, when they met him in the Streets. Under these Circumstances he compos'd a Book in Justification of himself; wherein he shewed that the Rites and Traditions of the Pharisees were contrary to Moses's Writings. He had scarce begun this Book, when he embrac'd the Opinion of the Sadducees; for he was fully persuaded, that the Punishments and Rewards of the Old Law respected this Life only; grounding His Opinion principally upon this, that Moses makes no mention either of the Joys of Heaven, or of the Torments of Hell. When his Adversaries were inform'd, that he had embrac'd this Opinion, they were extremely pleas'd, because they foresaw it wou'd be a good Plea in justifying to the Christians the Proceedings of the Synagogue against him. This was the Reason, why, even before his Book went to the Press, they publish'd a Treatise concerning the Immortality of the Soul, compos'd by a Physician (c), who forgot nothing, that might contribute to brand Acosta for an Atheist: Nay They even encourag'd Children to abuse him in the Streets, and to throw Stones at his House. Nevertheless he publish'd a Book against the Physician, wherein he strenuously oppos'd the Immortality of the Soul (d). The Jews had recourse to the Tribunals of Amsterdam, and impeach'd him, as a Person who overthrew the Principles both of Judaism and Christianity. He was imprison'd, and admitted to Bail in 8 or 10 days. The Impression of his Book was confiscated, and the Author fin'd 300 Gilders. All this did not stop him: Time and Experience push'd him on much farther. He examin'd whether the Law of Moses came from God, and fancied he had found sufficient Reasons to be convinc'd, that it was a meer Contrivance of Human Wit; but instead of concluding from thence, Therefore I ought not to return to the Jewish Communion, he drew this Consequence, Why should I obstinately remain separated from it all my Life-time, expos'd to so many Inconveniencies, and a Stranger as I am, in a Country, the Language whereof I cannot speak? Having consider'd all these things he return'd to the Pale of Judaism 15 Years after his Excommunication, recanted what he had said, and subscrib'd whatever they pleas'd. Some days after, a Nephew of his, who lodg'd in his House, inform'd against him. This was a Youth, who had taken notice, that his Uncle did not observe the Laws of the Synagogue, either in point of Diet, or otherwise. This Accusation was attended with strange Consequences: For one of Acosta's Relations, who had reconcil'd him to the Jews, thought himself obliged,

(6) Salust. in Bello Catilin. pag. 160.

(7) Cotin, Oeuvres Glorifiantes, Tom. 2. in his Discourse on the Truth of Dreams, p. 260.

(c) In the Year 1623.

(d) Entitled, Examen Traditionum Philosophicorum ad Legem Scripturam. The Philosophical Traditions compared with the written Law. [Perhaps Philosophicorum is a Mistake for Phariſaicum.]

This latter can only inflict Canonical Punishments, whereas the Christian Inquisition can put a Man to Death, for it delivers over to the Secular Sword all those it condemns. Therefore I do not wonder, that Acosta was less afraid of the Jewish Inquisition, than of that of Portugal: He knew that the Synagogue had no Tribunals, which intermeddled with any Process, Civil or Criminal, and therefore look'd upon their Excommunications as a meer brutum Fulmen; he did not find this Canonical Sentence attended either with Death, Whipping, Prison, or a pecuniary Mult. Wherefore he thought, that since he had Courage enough not to betray his Religion in Portugal, he ought, with much more Reason, have the boldness to speak, according to his Conscience, among the Jews, even at the Peril of Excommunication from them; which was all he had to fear from Men, who have no Magistrates of their own. "Quia minimè decebat, ut propter talem metum terga verteret, ille qui pro libertate natale solum, & utilitates alias contemplant; & succumbere hominibus, præsertim JURISDICTIONEM non habentibus, in tali causa nec pium nec virile erat; decrevi potius omnia perferre & in sententia perdurare (8). — "As it was unbecoming a Person to turn his Back thro' such a Fear; one who had forsaken his native Land, with all it's Conveniencies, for the sake of Liberty; and as, in such a Case, it was neither pious nor manly to submit to Men, especially such as had no JURISDICTION, I determine rather to bold it out to the last, and to persist in my Opinion." But it fared with him as with most People, who judge of complicated Evils. They imagine 'tis in the Union of two or three Punishments that a Misfortune consists; and that a Man would deserve but little Pity, should he suffer but one of them; but They Experience the contrary, when Providence exposes them to but one of these two or three Disgraces. They feel it much heavier than they imagined it would prove. The Inquisition of Portugal seem'd dreadful to the Jew Acosta: Why so? Because he beheld it join'd with the Power, either mediately or immediately, of imprisoning, torturing, and burning, Criminals: If he had consider'd it only with relation to it's Excommunication, he would not have been much afraid of it. This was the Reason of his contemning the Menaces of the Synagogue of Amsterdam. But he was sensible, by Experience, that the bare Power of Excommunication is very terrible, tho' altogether unaided by the Secular Sword. Every body look'd upon him as a Monster after his Excommunication: His very Brothers avoided meeting him, and durst not take notice of him. Ipsi Fratres mei, quibus ego Præceptor fueram, me transibant, nec in plateâ salutabant, propter metum illorum (9). The Boys hooted at him in the Streets, and loaded him with Curfes; they gathered in Crowds about his House, and threw Stones at his Windows; jamque faces & saxa volant, He could not be quiet either at home or abroad. Pueri islorum, à Rabinis & parentibus edocti, turmatim per plateas conveniebant, & elatis vocibus mihi maledicebant, & omnigenis contumeliis irritabant, hæreticum & defectorem inclamantes. Aliquando etiam ante fores meas congregabantur, lapides jaciebant, & nihil intentatum relinquebant ut me turbarent, ne tranquillam etiam in domo propria agere possem (10). The Evils, to which his Excommunication subjected him, were so violent, that at last he found himself unable to support them; for as great an Aversion as he had to the Synagogue, he chose rather to return to it by a seeming Reconciliation, than to be openly separated from it. For this Reason, he said to certain Christians, who had a mind to turn Jews, that they did not know what Yoke they were going to submit their Necks to. Nesciebant quale jugum suis verticibus imponerent (11). But how great was his Perplexity, when, having refus'd to undergo the ignominious Penance impos'd on him by the Synagogue, he saw himself still detained by the Bonds of Excommunication? Those, who met him in the Streets, spit at him, and Children were taught to do the same. Multi eorum transeunte me in plateâ spuebant, quod etiam & pueri eorum faciebant ab illis edocti: tantum non lapidabant, quia deerat facultas (12). His Relations persecuted him, and no body would attend him, when he lay sick. To be

(9) Acosta. Exempl. Vitæ Humanæ. pag. 347.

(10) Ibid,

(11) Ibid. pag. 343.

(12) Ibid. pag. 349. short.

(8) Uriel Acosta, ubi supra.

obliged, in Honour, to prosecute him with the utmost Severity [D]. The Rabbies; and all the People under them, were acted by the same Spirit, especially when they heard that our Acosta had dissuaded two Christians, who were come from London to Amsterdam, from turning Jews. He was summon'd before the grand Council of the Synagogue, who declar'd to him they would excommunicate him a second time, if he did not give them the Satisfaction which they shou'd require of him. He found the Terms of it so very hard, that he answer'd, He cou'd not submit to them. Whereupon they resolv'd to drive him from their Communion; and 'tis impossible to relate the many Insults offer'd him from that time, and how much he was persecuted by his Relations. Having past seven Years in this sad Condition, he resolv'd to declare, that he was ready to submit to the Sentence of the Synagogue; for they had given him to understand, that, by means of this Declaration, he would easily come off, because the Judges, being satisfy'd with his Submission, would mitigate the Severity of the Discipline. But he was deceiv'd, and made to undergo with the utmost Rigour the Penance, which they had at first impos'd upon him [E]. This is what I have extract'd, without any Disguise or Alteration, (and without pretending to warrant the Truth of the matters of Fact) out of a small Piece compos'd by Acosta (e) and publish'd and confuted by Mr Limborch (f). 'Tis thought he writ it some few days before his Death, having first resolv'd to lay violent hands upon himself. He executed this strange Resolution a little after he had fail'd in his attempt of shooting his principal Antagonist as he pass'd by his Door (g); for, his Pistol missing Fire, he lock'd himself up, and with another Pistol shot himself (h). This happen'd at Amsterdam, though in what Year is not certainly known [F]. This Instance favours those, who condemn the Liberty of philosophizing in Matters of Religion; for the principal stress of their Arguments lies in this, that such a Method leads a Man infensibly either to Atheism or Deism [G]. I shall just mention the Reflexion, which

(c) Exemplar Humane Vitæ.

(f) See the Citation (a).

(e) It was after his Brother or his Cousin, Limborch in Pref. ad Exemplar Vitæ.

(b) Limborch, ibid.

(13) Acosta, ubi supra, pag. 347.

short, they tormented him to such a Degree, that at last they extorted from him the Submission they desired. Duravit pugna ista per annos septem, intra quod tempus incredibilia passus sum (13).—This Struggle continued for seven Years, during which I suffered incredible Persecutions. We shall see in the Remark [E], what kind of Punishment they impos'd upon him. He was then more than ever sensible, how terrible even those People are, who, without any legal Jurisdiction, inflict the Laws of Discipline.

I am cautious of declaring my Approbation of the Reasons of the Independants; who think it so unjust, that the Church should arrogate to herself the Power of Excommunication, that is, of inflicting Punishments, which are sometimes more ignominious and defaming than a Branding-Iron; and which exposes a Man to more temporal Misfortunes, than the afflictive Pains which the Civil Magistrate imposes. The Sentence of the Judge does not set aside the Acts and Offices of Humanity, much less the Duties of Consanguinity. But Excommunication often arms Fathers against their Children, and Children against their Fathers; it stifles all the Sentiments of Nature; it breaks the Bonds of Friendship and Hospitality; and reduces People to the Condition of such as are infected with the Plague, nay sometimes to a worse and more abandon'd State.

[D] One of his Relations — thought himself obliged, in Honour, to prosecute him with the utmost Severity. These are the ill Offices he did him: Acosta was upon the point of marrying a second Wife; he had a great many Effects in the Hands of one of his Brothers, and it concerned him very much to continue his Partnership with him. Now this Relation cross'd him in all these Particulars; for he broke off the March, and engaged Acosta's Brother to detain all his Effects, and to have no more Dealings with him. This Procedure ought to be considered as one of the Reasons, which confirm'd Acosta in his Impiety; for without doubt he perswaded himself, that this Violence and Injustice was authorized by some Passages of the Old Testament, wherein the Law commands Brothers, Fathers, and Husbands, not to spare the Lives of their Brothers, Children, and Wives, in case of Apostasy (14). And we must take notice, that he made use of this as a Proof against the Law of Moses; for he pretended that a Law, which overthrew Natural Religion, could not proceed from God the Author of that Religion (15). For, argued he, Natural Religion establishes a Bond of Amity among Relations, &c. See how Mr Limborch has answered this Sophism (16).

[E] With the utmost Rigour the Penance, which they had at first impos'd upon him. His own Account of it is as follows. A great Crowd of Men and Women being assembled in the Synagogue, to see this Spectacle, he entered the Place, and, at the time appointed, went up into the Pulpit, and read with a loud Voice a Paper, wherein he acknowledged that he had deserved Death a thousand Times, for not keeping either the Sabbath-day, or his promis'd Faith, and for having dissuaded the Conversion of certain Christians, who were inclined to embrace Judaism: That, in Atonement for these Crimes, he was ready to suffer whatever they should decree, and that he promis'd never to relapse into the same Faults. Being come down from the Pulpit, he was ordered to retire to one of the Corners of the Synagogue, where he stripp'd himself naked, from the Waste upwards, and pulled off his Shoes; then the Door-keeper tied his Hands to one of the Pillars; after which the Master-Chanter gave him thirty nine Stripes with a Whip, neither more nor less; for in these Ceremonies they take care not to exceed the Number, which the Law prescribes. Next came the Preacher, who ordered him to sit on the Ground, and declared him absolved from his Excommunication, and that the Doors of Paradise were not shut against him as before. Et ita jam porta cali mibi erat aperta, quæ antea fortissimis ceris clausa me à limine & ingressu excludabant (17). Acosta put on his Cloaths again, and went and laid himself down flat on his Belly, at the Door of the Synagogue, and all that went out trod over him. I thought the Reader would be pleas'd to find here this small Specimen of Jewish Ceremonies (18).

[F] Though in what Year is not certainly known. 'Tis very probable that he kill'd himself soon after the Ceremony of his Abolution, enraged at the Treatment he had received, contrary to the Hopes he had entertain'd of a mitigated Punishment. But this will not precisely determine the time of his Death, because it is not known in what Year he performed this Penance. If it were known how long he had been under Excommunication, when the Physician's Book was published, in 1623, it would not be difficult to make an exact Computation, since he observes, that his first Excommunication lasted fifteen Years; that the second continued seven, and soon followed the other. It is suppos'd, in the Bibliothèque Universelle, that he killed himself in the Year 1647 (19), but others say it was in 1640 (20).

[G] That such a Method leads a Man insensibly either to Atheism or Deism. Acosta serves them for an Example. He would not acquiesce in the Decisions of the Catholic Church, because he did not find them conformable to his Reason; and he embraced Judaism, because he found it more agreeable to his Natural Notions. Afterwards he rejected an infinite

(17) Acosta, ubi supra, pag. 350.

(18) Taken from the Exemplar Humane Vitæ of Uriel Acosta, pag. 349, 350.

(19) Bibliothèque Universelle Tom. 7, pag. 327.

(20) Joh. Helvicus Willemorus in his Philosophical Dissertation concerning the Sadducees, pag. ult. He querit Judæism, Proleg. pag. 71.

(14) See Deuteronomy, xiii.

(15) Uriel Acosta, ubi supra, pag. 352.

(16) Philip a Limborch in his Confutation of Uriel Acosta, pag. 361, 362.

which Acosta made on the Jews endeavouring to render him the more odious, by affecting to say, That he was neither Jew, Christian, nor Mahometan [H].

Number of Judaical Traditions, because he thought they were not contained in the Scripture; nay, he rejected the Immortality of the Soul, upon pretence that the Law of God makes no mention of it: And lastly, he denied the Books of Moses to be divinely inspired, because he thought that natural Religion did not agree with the Ordinances of That Legislator. Had he lived six or seven Years longer, he would, perhaps, have denied Natural Religion itself, because his wretched scanty Reason would have puzzled him with Difficulties about the Hypothesis of Providence, and of the Free Will of the Eternal and Self-existent Being. It is certain, that Mankind, even in making use of their Reason, stand in need of Divine Assistance; without which it will prove a blind and erroneous Guide: And we may compare Philosophy to certain Powders so very corrosive, that, having consumed the proud and spongy Flesh of a Wound, they would corrode even the quick and sound Flesh, rot the Bones, and penetrate to the very Marrow. Philosophy is proper at first to confute Errors, but if she be not stopped there, she attacks Truth itself; and when she has her full Scope, she generally goes so far, that she loses herself, and knows not where to stop. This must be imputed either to the Weakness of Man's Understanding, or to the ill use he makes of it's pretended Force. By Good Fortune, or rather through a wise Dispensation of Providence, there are few Men, who are capable of thus abusing their Reason.

[H] Affecting to say, that he was neither Jew, Christian, nor Mahometan. This Accusation, answered he, carries both Malice and Ignorance with it; for, had he been a Christian, they would have looked upon him as an abominable Idolater, who, together with the Founder of Christianity, deserved to be punished by the true God, as an Apostate. If he had followed the Religion of Mahomet, they would not have made him less odious: Therefore he had no way of escaping the Lash of their Tongues, but by devoutly addicting himself to the Pharisaical Traditions. Let us consider his own Words: "Scio ad-
"versarios istos, ut nomen meum coram indocta plebe
"dilatant, solitos esse dicere, iste nullam habet re-"ligionem, Judæus non est, non Christianus, non "Mahometanus. Vide prius, Phariseæ, quid dicas,
"cœcus enim es, & licet malitiâ abundes, tamen sicut
"cœcus impingis. Quæso, dic mihi, si ego Chri"stianus essem, quid fuisses dicturus? Planum est,
"dicturum te, fœdissimum me esse idololatram, &
"cum Jesu Nazareno Christianorum doctore pœnas
"vero Deo iolaturum, à quo decesseram. Si Maho-"metanus essem, norunt etiam omnes quibus me ho-
"noribus fuisses cumulaturos: & ita nunquam lin-
"guam tuam possem evadere; unicum hoc effugium
"habens, nempe ad genua tua procumbere, fœdi-
"ssimos pedes tuos, tuas inquam nefarias & puden-
"das institutiones, oculari (21). — I know that "my Adversaries, in order to blacken my Name in "the Sight of the ill-judging Vulgar, were wont to "say, This Man has no Religion; He is neither Jew,
"Christian, nor Mahometan. Consider first, thou
"Pharisee, what thou sayest; for thou art blind, and,
"in spite of thy abundant Malice, thou stumblest like
"a blind Man. Pray tell me, if I were a Christian,
"what would you say? It is certain you would call "me a vile Idolater, and condemn me, together with "Jesus of Nazareth, the Teacher of the Christians,
"to expiate by Punishment my Apostasy from the "True God. Were I a Mahometan, every one knows
"with what kind of Honours you would load me. Thus
"I could never escape your Censure: One way indeed
"there is; namely to fall down at your Knees, and kiss
"your filthy Feet, I mean your wicked and shameful
"Institutions." He makes use of another Answer:
For he asks his Adversaries, whether, besides the three Religions they have mentioned, (and of which the two last were, in their Opinion, not so much Religion, as an Apostasy from God) they acknowledge any other? He supposes that they acknowledge Natural Religion as true, and as a Means of rendering us acceptable to God, and sufficient to save all Nations, the Jews excepted. 'Tis That, he tells them, which is contained in the Seven Precepts, which Noah,

and his Descendants down to Abraham, observed.
Then, said he, according to yourselves, there is a Religion, on which I may depend, although I descend from the Jews; and if my Prayers cannot engage you to give me leave to mingle with the Crowd of other Nations, yet I shall not fail to assert this Liberty to myself. Upon which he launches out in the Praises of Natural Religion.

By the first of his Answers we may plainly see;
that the Objection of the Jews was more specious than strong; more glittering than solid; more proper to serve their own Ends, than agreeable to the exact Rules of Argumentation; and at the bottom somewhat fallacious. What makes it look plausible and specious is This: The Mind of Man is so contrived, that, at the first Impression, a Neutrality in the Worship of God is more shocking to him than a False Worship; and therefore, when he hears of any one's abandoning the Religion of his Fathers, without embracing another, he is seized with more Horror, than if he were told that such an one had quitted a better Religion for a worse. This first Impression dazzles and affects him to such a Degree, that he makes it his Standard to judge of such Persons by; and his Repentment is thereby proportion-ably raised. He does not allow himself time maturely to examine, whether in reality it is better to lift one's self under the Devil's Banner, in some of those False Religions, which That Enemy of God and Man has introduced, than to observe a Neutrality.
Therefore we may imagine, that the Pharisees, who persecuted Acosta, laid so much stress upon their Objection, only because they found it proper to startle and confound the People, and to engage the Christians in their Quarrel. I confess they would not have made so much Bustle, had he embraced Christianity at Amsterdam or Mahometanism at Constantinople; but, in effect, they would not have accounted him less abandoned, less damned, or less an Apostate: Their Temper would have been owing to their Policy, and the effect of their just Fear of the Repentment of the Religion Established. If we judge from the first Impressions of Things upon us, there are but few Protestants who, upon the News that Titius had left the Profession of the Reformed Religion, without embracing any other Persuasion, would not assert that he was more criminal than if he had turned Papist: But I would fain ask these Protestants, Have you good Ground for This? Have you well examined what you would say, in case he were become a great Bigot to Popery; if you should see him loaded with Relicks, running mad after Processions, and, in short, practising all the Extravagancies of Idolatrous and Superstitious Monks? Could you answer, that you would still say the same, if you should be informed that he was turned Jew or Mahometan, or a Worshipper of the Pagods of China? To repeat it once more, the Mind of Man is thus contrived;
the first thing, that strikes it, is the Rule of it's Passions: We lay hold of the present Circumstance, and do not consider what we should say in another Conjuncture. This private Person has left us, and has embraced no other Sect: we must attack him on this side. — His Indifference is now his greatest Crime; but if he were turned Heathen, we should attack him on that side too, and we should say, at least we should think, if he had but stood Neuter, and attach'd himself in general to the Religion of Nature, it were something; but, as it is, &c.

By the second Answer, Acosta deprived his Adversaries of a great Advantage; for he sheltered himself against that strong Battery, It is better to be of a false Religion than of none. However, upon the whole, we must conclude, that he was of a detestable Character, and a Genius so ill turned, that he miserably lost himself in the Labyrinths of his mistaken Philosophy.

How much the Notion of Neutrality in Matters of Religion, offends and provokes the Minds of Men.

(21) Acosta,
ibid. pag.
351.

ACRONIUS (JOHN), taught Mathematics and Physic at Basil, with a great deal of Reputation, and compos'd some Books, De Terræ motu; de Sphæra; de A- strolabii & Annuli Astronomici constructione. He was of Friesland, and died at Basil in VOL. I. NO. IV. B b the

(a) He makes no mention of him in his Book De Scientiis Mathematicis.

(b) Theobor-nus Scree-hus.

the Flower of his Age, in the Year 1563. This Author has escap'd the Diligence of Vossius (a) though Swertius, and Valerius Andreas had given him a Place in their Bibliotèque of the Netherlands; wherein however they have forgot to insert another JOHN ACRONIUS, who was a Minister, and perhaps a Native of the same Province with the former. This Minister was of a Restless, Seditious, Spirit; he abandon'd the Congregation of Wesel, at a time when she was threatened with an imminent Danger; They found, at Deventer, that they could not chuse him Pastor of their Church, without admitting at the same time a very disagreeable Member into their Society; He left the Church of Groningen with disgrace; and at Francher he discover'd his want of Abilities to discharge the Trust of Professor of Divinity, into which he had intruded. Lastly, he was Minister at Haerlem, where he behav'd himself as usual; that is, he contradicted, oppos'd, and censur'd every one, without distinction. The Historiographer of That City does not deny him the Character of a very Learned Man, but gives him at the same time That of a Turbulent Spirit (b). Some have compared him to Heshufius, against whom the following Distich was handed about,

Quæritur, Heshufi, quarta cur pulsus ab urbē?
In promptu causa est, seditiosus eras.

The Cause, Heshufius, of thy Exile's known;
Thou wert a Mover of Sedition grown.

(c) See Martin Schoenius. Exerc.
citat. lxx.
pag. 255.
Edit. in 4to.

Acronius wrote in Flemish a Book de Jure Patronatus, wherein he inserted several Quotations from the Canon-Law (c). I am inclin'd to ascribe to him the Elenchus Oribodoxus pseudo-religionis Romano-Catholicæ, printed at Deventer in 1615. He may very well be the Author of the Treatise, De studio Theologico, which Mr Komig attributes to Him, who wrote about the Sphere. The same Komig speaks of one RUARDUS ACRONIUS, who publish'd some Catechetical Expositions in 1606. He might have added, that, in the beginning of the Troubles of Arminianism, he wrote something against the Arminian Hypothesis, concerning the Power of Magistrates in Matters of Religion; and that 'twas He, who publish'd a Sermon, which Uytenbogaerd had preach'd at the Hague before the Troubles, much different from the Doctrine, which he afterwards maintain'd, in relation to the same Question (d). Ruardus Acronius was one of the six Advocates for the Reform'd against the Arminians, in the Famous Conference held at the Hague in 1611.

(d) Ex Voetit Polit.
Ecclesiæ Tom.
1. pag. 125.

(a) Charles Stephens in his Historical Dictionary.

(b) Scholi-ast on Homer. in ll.
18.

(c) Eustath.
in Iliad. 1.
Schol. Apol-
lon. in lib.
4.

(d) Scholi-ast on Pind.
in Olymp. 9.

(e) Eustath.
in Iliad. 2.

(f) Hygin.
cap. 14.

ACTOR [A] is the Name of several Persons mention'd in Fabulous History. I. It is the Name of one of Hercules's Companions in the Amazonian War, who having receiv'd a Wound, resolv'd to return home, and died by the way (a). II. It is also the Name of Patroclus's Grandfather; for Menetius, Patroclus's Father, was Son of ACTOR and Ægina. This Actor was a Loctian, according to some (b), but he settled himself in the Island of Oenone, after having married Ægina, Daughter to the River Alopus; by whom he had Menetius. Others say, that he was a Theffalian, Son of Myrmidon, who was Son of Jupiter (c); and that the Nymph Ægina having already had a Son by Jupiter, call'd Æacus, went into Theffaly, where Actor made no scruple to marry her, notwithstanding the Apprenticeship she had serv'd in Matters of Love (d). He had by her several Children, who conspir'd against him, which oblig'd him to send them into Exile, and bestow his Kingdom upon Peleus, with his Daughter Polymele. Peleus was Son to Æacus, and consequently Ægina's Grandson, and had fled for Sanctuary to Pthia, where Actor reigned; thither, I say, he fled, after he had kill'd his Brother Phocus. III. There was likewise one ACTOR, Son of Hippasus, who sail'd with the Argonauts (f). IV. Another, who was Son of Neptune and Agamede [B], Daughter of Augeus (g). V. Another, who was Son of Axeus [C], and

(g) Id. cap.
157.

[A] ACTOR. Mr Moreri has, without any reason, changed this Word into Altarius; but this is a small Fault in comparison of that, into which he falls some few Lines after, when, by these Words, Quæ fuit Actoride cum magno semper Achille, he pretends to prove, that Ovid, from whom he quotes them, has made mention of one Actorius. How came he not to see, that there is no mention made in that Passage of any Person call'd either Actorius or Actoride, but only of Patroclus, whom the Poets, for the sake of Verification, are used to denote by the Patronymic ACTORIDES, i. e. descended from ACTOR?

[B] Son of Neptune and Agamede.] Munkerus in his Commentary upon the 157th Fable of Hyginus, pretends that Homer's Scholiast makes this Actor Son of Neptune and Molione; but the Scholiast says no such thing. Homer, in the 749th Verse of the 11th Iliad, mentions two Brothers whom he calls Antropus and Molone, Actorionas Molionas. Whereupon his Scholiast says, that by these Words we must understand Cteatus and Eurytus, Sons of Actor and Molione; or, according to some, of Molione and Neptune. Homer thought them Sons of That God, for he adds, That they would have been slain, had not Neptune, their Father, succoured them in the Engagement, by covering them with a thick Mist.

Ἐν τῇ σφύρῃ πατρὸς εὐρυπύλου Ἑὐρύχιδου
Ἐν τοῖσιν ἰσθμοῖς καὶ ἄλλοις ἄνδρ' ἄλλας (1).

Neptune, their Sire, to save his Offspring, shrouds
The youthful Heroes in a Veil of Clouds.

[C] Who was Son of Axeus.] Homer calls him Axeus, Ὀὐς τῶνδ' Ἀχαιῶν δῖον Ἀχαιοῖς Ἀχιλλῶ (2).

Meziriac remarks a Fault (3) of the Author of the Great Etymologicum, who thought that the same

(1) Homer.
Iliad. lib. 11.
ver. 750.

(2) Id. Iliad.
lib. 2.

(3) Upon Ovid's Epigiles
pag. 44.

Father of Astyoeb, (D), by whom the God Mars had two Sons, who at the Siege of Troy commanded the Forces of Aspledon, and Orchomenus, two Towns of Bæotia. VI. Another ACTOR, Son of Porbas, built a Town in Elis, his Native Country, which he call'd Hymene, after his Mother's Name (i). Augias King of Elis, who according to some, was his Brother (k), and whose Stables, clean'd by Hercules, have made so much noise, associated both him and his two Sons in his Kingdom (l). His two Sons were call'd Earytus and Cleatus, and poetically Molionides, because their Mother's Name was Molone; see the Article MOLIONIDES. VII. Lastly, there was one ACTOR, describ'd as an Hero of the first Race among the Aurunci (D).

Actor, mentioned here by Homer, was the Father of Patroclus. 'Tis what Homer never meant. He speaks of one Actor a Bæotian, Grandson to Erginus, and Great-Grandson to Clymenus. Meziriæ quotes for this Pedigree Eustatius upon the second Iliad, and Paulanias in his Bæotica; but Paulanias makes Clymenus Grandfather to Actor, but not Great-Grandfather (4).

(D) One Actor, describ'd as an Hero of the first Race among the Aurunci. He is thus describ'd by Virgil, in the twelfth Book of the Æneid:

Vociferans: Nunc O nunquam frustra vocatus
Hæsta meos, nunc tempus adest: te maximus Actor,
Te Turni nunc dextra gerit — (5).

He said the Loane Aruncan Actor wore;
Which with such Force he brandish'd in his Hand;
The tough Asb trembled like an Osier Wand.
Then cry'd, O pond'rous Spoil of Actor slain,
And never yet by Turnus to'd in vain,
Fail not this Day thy wanted Force. —

DRYDEN.

ACTUARIUS [A], a Greek Physician, of whom there are extant several Works [B]. Ambrosius Leo of Nola, who has translated some of them, and gives him great Commendations, owns that he could not discover who he was, nor of what Country (a). Peter Castellan, in his Lives of Illustrious Physicians, and Wolfgang Jussus in his Chronology of Physicians, confess the same thing (b). Mr Moreau, in his Treatise of Bleeding in the Plurisy, believes that he liv'd about the Year 1100 [C].

[A] Actuaris.] Some call him John, Son of Zacharias (1); others chose rather to make him Son of John Zacharias (2). Vossius, who approves the latter, in the thirteenth Chapter of his Book, De Philosophia, mentions a little after one John Actuaris, who lived in the Time of Constantine Ducas (3), as is infer'd from his having a Sister, upon whom Michael Psellus compos'd a Monody. If it should happen, that this John Actuaris did not differ from the Physician here in question, Vossius will have been in the wrong to distinguish them, and not to give the Physician the Name of John: But by the Remark [C] it will appear, that there's little likelihood of their being the same Person. Mr Du Cange shews, that the Title of Actuaris denotes a particular Dignity belonging only to the Physicians at the Court of Constantinople; and he confesses he is ignorant of the Reason of it, notwithstanding all the Enquiries of Father Postelins. He owns also, that he does not know, whether our Actuaris, whom he calls John, Son of Zacharias, was in possession of that Dignity (4).

[B] Of whom there are extant several Works.] They were printed at Paris, in a Volume in Folio, by Henry Stephens in the Year 1567. having been printed before in another Place in three Volumes in 8vo. They have likewise been printed singly more than once. The chief of them are, De actionibus & affectibus spiritus animalis ejusque nutritione, Libri II. De Urinis, Libri VII. first translated into Latin by Ambrosius Leo, and printed at Venice in 1519. and afterwards revised and illustrated with Notes, by James Goull. De Medicamentorum Compositione: Ruel has translated this Treatise. Methodi Medendi Libri VI. translated by Henry Matbiasus of Bruges, and printed at Venice in 1554 (5).

[C] That he lived about the Year 1100.] Mr du Cange durst not place him in the Reign of Alexis (6), although his Book, De affectibus Spiritus Animalis, is dedicated to Josaph Ratenyter; and though Nicetas, in the third Book of the History of Alexis, n. 5. speaks of one Ratenyter. He approves what Lambertus decided concerning this Physician's Time (7), which is, that he lived in the Reign of Andronicus the Elder; because in the Manuscript of one of his Books, which is in the Emperor's Library, there is a Title, which shews that it is dedicated to Apocauchus. But we know that Apocauchus lived under That Andronicus. Mr du Cange observes, that Actuaris relates in the beginning of his Method of Cures, that the Emperor his Master sent him to the Hyperborean Scythians. Mr Moreau is therefore a little out in his Reckoning; for Andronicus the Elder did not begin his Reign before the Year 1332.

ACUNA (a) (CHRISTOPHER) a Spanish Jesuit, born at Burgos, enter'd into the Society in the Year 1612, at 15 Years of Age. After having spent some Years in Study, he went into America, and labour'd to convert the Natives of the Kingdoms of Chili, and Peru, and was Professor of Moral Divinity. He return'd to Spain in the Year 1640, and gave the King his Master an Account of the Commission he had receiv'd to examine the River of the Amazons. The following Year he publish'd a Relation of that River at Madrid. He was sent to Rome in the Quality of Procurator of his Province; and having pass'd into Spain, honour'd with the Title of Qualificator of the Inquisition, he return'd to the West Indies. He was at Lima, when Father Sotuel, from whom I have extract'd this Account, publish'd the Bibliotheca of the Jesuit Authors at Rome in the Year 1675. The Relation of our Acuna is entituled, Nuevo descubrimiento del gran rio de las Amazonas. A New Description of the great River of the Amazons. The Author was ten Months successively on that River, and had Orders to inform himself exactly of the State of it, that the King might be enabled to make the Navigation of it easy and commodious. For this purpose, he embark'd at Quito (b) with Peter Teixeira, who had advanc'd thus far up the River, and whom they thought proper to send back again thither. They embark'd in the Month of February 1639 [A], and did not arrive at Para, till the Month

[A] In the Month of February 1639.] I own Christopher de Acuna; and therefore I take this Date freely, that I have not by me the Relation of Father from Mr Chevreau, and prefer it to the Month of D. Nic. Antonio, that the Spaniards do not put an Apostrophe between the Article de, and a proper Name which begins with a Vowel.

(2) Homer. Iliad. 2. Paulan. in Bæot.

(7) Paulan. lib. 2. pag. 148.

(4) Paulan. lib. 9. pag. 311.

(4) Apollo-dor. Bibl. lib. 2. pag. 138. Edic. Salmur.

(7) Paulan. ubi supra.

(5) Virgil. Æneid. lib. 12. pag. 95. &c.

(a) Apud Gesner. Bibl. fol. 3. verso.

(b) See Mercklin. in Lindenst. renovato, pag. 6.

(1) Hyde's Catal. Bibl. Oxon. & Mercklinus in Lindenst. renovato.

(2) Gesner's Bibl. and his Abridg. etc.

(3) He began to reign in 1059.

(4) Glossat. Græc. pag. 46.

(5) See Mercklinus in Lindenst. renovato, pag. 6, 7.

(6) Hemans, but he had done better to have examin'd it, Alexis Angelus who began to reign in the Year 1195.

(7) De Bibl. Cesar. lib. 6. pag. 113.

(a) It is pronounced Acuna, but the Spaniards call it Acuna.

(b) It is a City of Peru.

* I don't call him d'Acuna; for I have observ'd in D. Nic. Antonio, that

(c) See the Preface to the French Translation.

(d) In 1682, in 12mo.

(e) Of the 19th of April, 1683.

(1) A 7a E. in it. Lips. Ann. 1683.

(2) Strabo, lib. 14. pag. 452.

(3) Diodor. Sicul. lib. 16. I take the Duration of the other Reigns from him.

(4) Strabo, & Diodor. ibid.

(5) Arrian. lib. 1.

(6) Diodor. Sicul. lib. 17. Strabo, ibid.

(7) Plutarch. Alexandr. pag. 677.

(1) Diodor. Sicul. lib. 16.

(2) Chevr. Hist. du Monde, Tom. 4. pag. 33. Edit. Holl.

(3) See the Summary of this History.

(4) Valefi in Plutarch. pag. 99.

Month of December following. It is believ'd that the Revolutions of Portugal, which made the Spaniards lose all Brazil, and the Colony of Para at the Mouth of the River of the Amazons, were the cause that the Relation of this Jesuit was suppress'd (c), for fear that, being useless to the Spaniards, it might become servicable to the Portuguese. The Copies of it became very scarce, insomuch that the Publishers of the French Translation at Paris (d) declar'd that there remain'd no more of them, except that which the Translator had made use of, which is perhaps That of the Vatican. Mr de Gomberville is the Author of this French Version, but it was not publish'd till after his Death; and a long Dissertation is added to it, which deserves the perusal. The Relation itself likewise is well worth reading. Those who have it not, may meet with a Specimen of it in the Journal of Paris (e), in that of Leipsic (f), and in Mr Chevreau's History (g).

January, noted in the Journal of Leipsic; because the Faults, which the Printers of that Journal have committed in the foregoing Page, give me some Reason to distrust them. I find at Page 324. of That Journal, that the Governor of Brazil called Peter Teixeira to go up the River of the Amazons in the Year 1639. and that Teixeira could not arrive at Quito in less than a Year's time (1). He did not therefore embark again at Quito in the Month of January 1639. as is asserted at Page 325. Mr Chevreau is more to be credited, when he declares, that Peter Teixeira departed in the Month of October 1637. and gave an Account of his Voyage to the Viceroy of Peru (2), in September of the Year 1638. Mr Chevreau (3) does not name the Author of the Relation right, for he calls him Christopher d'Alcuna.

(f) Pag. 323. Annus 1683.

(g) In Tom. 4. pag. 1-1. Edit. of Holland.

(2) He was called the Count de Chincon.

(3) Chevr. History of the World, Tom. 4. pag. 171.

ADA, Daughter of Hecatomnus (a), and Sister of Artemisia, Queen of Caria, married her own Brother Idrieus, and reign'd with him in Caria, after the Death of Artemisia, who surviv'd her Husband Mausolus but two Years (b). Idrieus reign'd seven Years [A], and died of a Distemper, without leaving any Posterity. His Widow, having reign'd about four Years, was dethron'd, by Pexodares her younger Brother (c), who, to maintain his Usurpation, allied himself to a Persian Lord, whose Name was Orontobates, to whom he gave his Daughter in Marriage [B]. Her Name was Ada, as was That of the dethron'd Queen; and her Mother's Name was Apbneis, Daughter of Synnefis, King of Cappadocia. Orontobates succeeded his Father-in-Law in the Kingdom, at the end of six Years, and defended Halicarnassus against Alexander (d). The Revolutions of those Times were favourable to Ada. She implor'd that Conqueror's Protection against the Usurper, deliver'd the City of A-linda to him, which continu'd faithful to her, and promis'd to endeavour to make him Master of many others (e). Alexander gave her a very kind Reception, and re-establish'd her in her former Authority over all Caria, after having subdued the City of Halicarnassus. Out of Gratitude for his Favours, she sent him all kind of Refreshments, Comfits, Pastry, and delicate Meats, with the best Cooks she could find: But he return'd her for answer, that he had no occasion for such Things, and that his Governor Leonidas had already provided him with more excellent Cooks, in teaching him, that to dine with Appetite, he must rise early and walk; and that to make a good Supper, he must eat but a slender Dinner (f).

[A] Idrieus reigned seven Years. Diodorus Siculus tells us this (1). Mr Chevreau, who has converted the Years into Months (2), would perhaps have had more Reason to lengthen the time, than he had to shorten it; for Idrieus was yet living, when Isocrates wrote his Philippiac. Now if we believe Hermippus (3), he compos'd it a little before his own Death, and That of Philip: So that Philip must have lived 'till the tenth Olympiad, seeing Isocrates died a few Days after the Battel of Cheronea, which was fought in the second Year of the tenth Olympiad, about two Years after the Death of Philip. Because therefore the Reign of Idrieus did not begin 'till about the third Year of the hundred and seventh Olympiad, (for I have shewn in the Remarks on the Article ARTEMISIA, that her Husband Mausolus, whom she surviv'd two Years, did not die 'till the end of the hundred and sixth: the seven Years which Diodorus gives him, are not sufficient. Yet I believe his Chronology is more to be depended upon than that of Hermippus. Where would Hermippus place the Reign of Ada, and that of Pexodares, whereof the one continu'd four Years, and the other six, and both of which preceded the Expedition of Alexander?

[B] He gave his Daughter in Marriage. Valefius thought that Philip King of Macedon demand'd this Daughter of Pexodares for his Brother Arideus, and cites Plutarch for it (4). But that Historian does not tell us, whether the Daughter of Pexodares, of whom he makes mention, was called Ada; but it may very well be infered from his saying, that she was the Eldest (5), for we know besides, that Orontobates, having married a Daughter of Pexodares, thought himself lawful Possessor of the Kingdom of Caria. So far then Valefius seems to me to be in the right; but he had no reason to say, that Philip desired that Alliance for his Brother Arideus; Pexodares first offer'd it, and sent Ambassadors to Philip for that Purpose. On the other side, Arideus was not the Brother, but the Son of Philip. Plutarch says it expressly. He adds a Circumstance, which affords us a remarkable Instance of the Intrigues of Courts. Alexander's Friends alarm'd him on the Proposals of Pexodares's Ambassador: They suggest'd to him, that Philip's Aim in this Alliance was to put Arideus in a better Capacity of succeeding to the Kingdom. Alexander, to ward against this Blow, dispatch'd a Person to Pexodares, to represent to him, that he ought rather to cast his Eyes on Alexander, than on Arideus, who was a Bastard, and almost a Fool. Pexodares did not hesitate in his Choice; but Philip, discovering what was carrying on, reproved Alexander sharply, telling him he would shew himself unworthy of being his Successor, if he was satisfied with the Daughter of a Carian, and Vassal of a Barbarian Prince. At the same time he exil'd all his Son's Confidants, and writ to the Corinthians to send him the Messenger, bound Hand and Foot, whom Alexander had sent to Caria. He was a Comedian, whose Name was Thestylus.

(5) Plutarch. in Alexandr. pag. 669.

ADAM, the Stock and Father of all Mankind, was produc'd immediately by God on the Sixth Day of the Creation. His Body having been form'd of the Dust of the Earth [A], God breath'd into his Nostrils the Breath of Life; that is to say, he animated him, and made him that Compound Creature, which we call Man, comprehending an Organized Body, and a Rational Soul. The same Divine Being, which produc'd Adam, plac'd him a fine Garden (a); and, to give him an opportunity of imposing Names on the Brute Creation, he caus'd them all to appear before him. Afterwards he caus'd a Deep Sleep to fall on Adam, and took out of him a Rib [B], of which he form'd Woman. Adam knew that This Woman was Bone of his Bone, and Flesh of his Flesh; and liv'd with her, without any Shame on account of their being naked. There was a Tree in the Garden, of which God had forbid them to eat, on pain of Death. Yet the Woman, seduced by a Serpent (b), did not abstain from eating of it, and persuaded Adam to eat of it likewise. From that time they perceived that they were naked [C], and made themselves Aprons with Fig-leaves sewed together. God came and pronounced on them the Punishment, which he resolv'd to inflict upon them, drove them out of the Garden, and made them Cloaths of Skins. Adam called his Wife Eve, and consummated his Marriage. He became the Father of Cain, and of Abel, and afterwards of Setb, and of many other Sons and Daughters, the Names whereof are not known, and died at the Age of 930 Years (c). This is all that is certain in this matter. A great number of other things, which have been related of him, are either very false, or very uncertain; it is true, we may judge of some, that they are not contrary to the Analogy of Faith, nor to Probability. I place in this rank what is said of his prodigious Knowledge [D]: We read indeed nothing in Genesis, but what is less proper

(a) It is commonly called the Terrestrial Paradise, and the Garden of Eden.

(b) See the Remarks on the Article EVE, concerning this Serpent.

(c) See the first Five Chapters of Genesis.

[A] Of the Dust of the Earth. If we may believe Father Garasse (1), Photius reports, the Egyptian Tradition, That Wisdom laid an Egg in the Terrestrial Paradise, out of which came our first Parents like a couple of Chickens. I believe Photius has said no such thing, and I am much mistaken, if it be not a licentious Paraphrase of that Jesuit, forged on what Photius relates concerning a certain Mariner, whose Name was Oi, whom some made to issue in τὸ ἀποροῦν (2), that is, according to Father Garasse in another Book (3), of the Race of the first Man, whose Name was Oon (Egg). Or, according to Father Schottus, à primo parente Ou. Many Enquiries might be made about this Egg, which served, according to the Doctrine of the Ancients, for the Generation of Things, when the Chaos was reduced into order. We shall touch upon some Particulars of it under the Word ARIMANIUS.

(1) Garasse's Curious Doctrines, pag. 332.

(2) Phot. ex Helladio, Biblioth. pag. 183; A. 279.

(3) Theological Summary, pag. 26.

where he reports this with many Alterations.

(4) Daniel Francus, de indicib. Libror. prohib. Epist. Dedicat.

(5) His Name is Florentine Schilling, Regular Clerk of St Paul, and a Barnabite.

(6) August. de Civit. Dei. lib. 14. cap. 17.

(7) Ibid. & lib. 11. de Genesis ad litter. cap. 31. & lib. 1. de Nupt. & Consuec. cap. 5. & lib. 1. Locutionum in Genes. n. 9. & lib. 2. de Peccat. Merit. & Remiss. cap. 22.

(8) Ibid. de Civit. Dei. lib. 14. cap. 17.

"their Bodies; whence Nakedness became indecent; and which excited their Attention, and put them to the blush."

[D] What is said of his prodigious Knowledge.]

Mr Moreri is not contented with affirming in general, that Adam had a perfect Knowledge of Sciences, and chiefly of Astrology, of which he taught his Children several curious Secrets; he adds also, that Josephus says, that Adam engraved some Observations he had made on the Course of the Stars on two different Tables. I have search'd for this in Josephus, but find only, that the Descendants of Setb, the Son of Adam, invented Astronomy, and caus'd their Inventions to be engraven on a Pillar of Brick, and a Pillar of Stone, to preserve them from the general Destructions, which, according to the Predictions of Adam, were to happen, once by Fire, and once by a Deluge (9). When a Person is capable of falsifying in this Manner an Author, whom he cites, he seldom regards the Words of his Evidence so closely, as to make them say nothing, but what they really depose; so that I do not wonder, that Mr Moreri attributes to our first Father the Imposition of Names on Plants; I say I do not wonder at it, though the Scripture makes him only Author of the Names of Beasts. They, who infer from this Imposition of Names, that Adam was a great Philosopher, do not deserve to be refuted. To return to the prodigious Knowledge attributed to Adam; I say, that, according to the common Opinion (10), he knew more the very first Day of his Life, than any Man besides can learn by long Experience. Scarce any thing, besides future Events, the Thoughts of the Heart, and one Part of individual Beings, escap'd his Knowledge. Cajetan, who ventures to rob him of the perfect Knowledge of the Stars, and of the Elements, was much censured for it. Some, having made it a Question, whether Solomon ought not to be excepted out of the general Position, which gives the Preference to Adam's Knowledge, above That of all other Mortals, have been reduced to acknowledge, That Adam was more knowing than Solomon. It is true, Pinedo excepts Politics; but no Regard is paid to his particular Opinion; and it is determined, that the speculative Understanding of the first Man was endow'd with all the Philosophical and Mathematical Knowledge, which human Nature is naturally capable of; and that his practical Understanding possess'd a consummate Prudence, with respect to every thing which Men ought to do, either in a private or public Capacity; and, besides, contain'd all moral Sciences, and all the liberal Arts, Rhetoric, Poetry, Painting, Sculpture, Agriculture, Writing, &c. Every one knows, with what Emulation Mankind have strove to heap Praises upon Aristotle. Every Idea, and every Comparison had been exhausted, when a good Cartesian, being willing to outdo the most extravagant of all his Panegyrist, maintained, That

(9) Josephus Antiquitat. lib. 1. cap. 2.

(10) See Sallust's Annals Tom. 1. pag. 107, 113.

[C] They perceived that they were naked.] The Scripture says, that their Eyes were opened. This Expression made some People believe that Adam and Eve were blind, till they had transgress'd the Commandment of God. "Neque enim cœci creati erant, ut imperitum vulgus opinatur (6).—For they were not created blind, as the ill-judging Vulgar think." St Augustin refutes this Mistake very strongly, in several Parts of his Writings (7), and tells us, that this opening of our first Parents Eyes consist'd in their being sensible of certain corporeal Motions, which they were ignorant of before; and that it was this, which inspir'd them with Shame. "Exstitit in motu corporis quædam impudens novitas, unde effudit indecens nuditas, & fecit attentos, reddiditque confusos (8).—There was a certain impudent Novelty in the Motion of

(d) So God created Man in his own Image, in the Image of God created he him, Male and Female created he them. Gen. i. 27.

to give us this Notion, than the contrary; and yet it is very probable, that Adam came out of the hands of his Creator endued with innate Science, and that he did not lose it by Sin; as the bad Angels are not become less knowing since their Fall, and as the Crimes of Learned Persons do not deprive them of that Knowledge they enjoy'd before. What some affirm concerning the Beauty of Adam [E], may be also plac'd in the rank of probable things; but it is altogether false that he was created of both Sexes [F]. It is a gross mistake of the words of Scripture (d) to imagine any such thing. The Revelations of Antoinette Bourignon [G], would be improperly

(11) Henry de Hafia. He lived in the beginning of the XVIIth Century.

(12) See Rivinus's Serpent. seduct. pag. 50.

(13) Idem, pag. 49, 56, 57.

(14) Ibid. pag. 56.

(15) Eugubius in Cosmopoeia apud Salian. Annal. Tom. i. pag. 106.

(16) Id. ib.

(17) Id. ib.

(18) Salian. Tom. i. p. 106.

Aristotle's Learning was as extensive as That of Adam (11). Some Rabins have been satisfy'd with equalling the first Man to Moses and Solomon, in point of Learning (12); but others have maintained, that he excelled the Angels themselves, and have alleged the Testimony of God himself, in proof of it (13). They say, that the Angels having spoke of Man with some Disdain, when God consulted them on his Creation, God answered them, That Man was more knowing than they; and to convince them of it, he presented all kinds of Beasts to them, and ask'd them their Names. They could not tell what to answer; and then he ask'd the same Question of Man, who named them all after each other; and being interrogated, what should be his own Name, and what was God's Name; he answered right, and gave to God the Name of Yehovah. According to the same Rabins, the meaning of this Aphorism of their Doctors, that Adam's Stature extended from one end of the World to the other, is, that he knew all things (14).

[E] Concerning the Beauty of Adam.] If some Authors had been contented to say, that he was a fine Person, and well made, they would have said nothing but what was probable; but instead of this, they have fallen into the Gaeties of Rhetoric, and Poetry, and even into visionary Notions of this Matter. It has been fabled, that God, intending to create Man, assumed a perfect, and beautiful, human Body; and that he formed the Body of Adam on that Model, whence God might say, in relation to this Body, that he made Man after his own Image. They add, That this Apparition of God, under an human Form, was the first prelude to the Incarnation; that is, that the second Person of the Trinity clothed himself with the Appearance of the same Nature he was one Day to assume in the Flesh, and that, under the likeness of the finest Man that ever was, he laboured in the Production of Adam, whom he made a Copy of that great and divine Original of Beauty, which he had assumed. "Hanc speciem divinatque pulchritudinem clementissimum formosissimumque assumens, quam erat post multa tempora usque ad carnem & ossa assumpturus, creabat hominem, largiens ei speciem hanc tantam, ipse primus Archetypus, speciosissimus ipse speciosissime proles creator (15). — The most Clement and Fair, assuming this divine Form and Beauty, which he was in process of time to cloath himself withal, even to Flesh and Bones, created Man, bestowing on him this noble Form, himself the Original Archetype, the most beautiful Creator of a most beautiful Creature." It can be no wonder, after this, that these Exclamations should be made; "Quantum qualemve credas fuisse primi hominis illius venustatem? quantum in ore decus, quas gratias inelidisse (16)? — What, and how great, must be the Beauty of the first Man? And what Charms must dwell in his Countenance?" For in short, the Form, which the WORD assumed, was like That, which was seen by St Peter on Mount Tabor, and by Moses on Mount Sinai, and like That, which Moses and Elias appeared in on the Day of the Transfiguration. But what is still more wonderful is, That Adam himself saw his own Maker, and the manner how his Body was formed by the fair Hands of it's Author. "Cum fingeretur homo, manus illas divinas apexit, ambrosiolique vultus illos, pulcherrima brachia cor-pus suum fingentia, singulorūque artus ducentia (17). — When Man was created, he beheld those divine Hands, that ambrosial Countenance, and those beautiful Arms, which form'd his Body, and fasten'd every Member of it." A very learned Man published these airy Notions (18); and there are People enough, who approve, at least, one part of them.

[F] That he was created of both Sexes.] Many of the Rabins believed that Adam's Body was created double, Male on one Side, and Female on the other; and that both these Bodies were joined together by the Shoulders; the Heads looking towards places directly opposite, like the Heads of Janus (19). Now they pretend that, when God made Eve, he only divided This Body into two: That, which was of the Male Sex became Adam, and That, which was of the Female, became Eve. Manasseh Ben Israel, the most learned Rabbi of the XVIIth Century, maintained This fantastical Opinion, if we believe Heidegger (20). The learned Maimonides, the Honour and Glory of the Jewish Nation, had (21) already maintained it, if we may believe the same Witness. Eugubinus varied from it, only as to the Situation of the two Bodies; for he pretends that they adhered together by the Sides, and that they resembled each other in all things, except the Sex. The Male Body was on the right, and embraced the other by the Neck with his left Hand, while the other did the like to him with the right Hand. Both were animated; both fell into a deep Sleep, when God intended to form Eve, that is, separate her from the Male Body. We need only be able to read the Scripture, to confute all those chimerical Notions. Before I pass on to other Matters, I shall just take notice of those Androgynes, of which Plato has spoke so largely (22). They were Hermaphrodites, with four Arms and four Legs, and two Faces turned towards each other on one Neck. This duplicity of Members gave them much Force, and made them very insolent upon that account; so that they thought on nothing less than making War with the Gods. A Consultation was held in Heaven on the manner of reducing them to Reason; and Jupiter's Opinion was followed, which was to divide them afunder. Each of the Parts preserved a strong Inclination to a Re-union; and this is the Origin of Love, according to this Philosopher. But some Alterations were necessary to be made in the Situation of certain Members, in order to make their Re-union fruitful. I shall observe by the way, that they, who speak of these Androgynes of Plato, seldom report the Matter as it really is. They make him say, that Men, in general, were of this kind at first; but his Account relates only to certain of them: He acknowledges that there were also Males and Females, of the same kind with those at present. See the Remark of the Article SALMACIS. The Author of a Book entituled, The New Visionary of Rotterdam (23) assures us, that, according to the Rabins, Adam and Eve were both Hermaphrodites before their Fall (24). He is the only Author I know of, who ascribes this Opinion to the Rabins.

[G] The Revelations of Antoinette Bourignon.] This Lady's Works prove, that she had very particular Opinions; but perhaps she advance'd nothing more strange, than what concerns the first Man. She pretends that, before the Fall, Adam had the Principles of both Sexes in himself, and the Power of producing his Likeness, without the help of a Woman: And that the Necessary, which both Sexes are under, at present, of uniting for the sake of Propagation, is a Consequence of the Alteration Sin made in the human Body. "Men, says she (25), think they were created by God as they are at present, though it is not true; seeing Sin has disfigured the Work of God in them, and instead of Men, as they ought to be, they are become Monsters in Nature, divided into two imperfect Sexes, unable to produce their like alone, as Trees and Plants do, which in that Point have more Perfection than Men or Women, incapable to produce by themselves, but in Conjunction with each other, and accompany'd with Pain and Misery." The Particulars of this Mystery are explain'd in another Work, as it was revealed from God to Mrs Bourignon (26). She believed that she had seen, in an Extacy, how Adam was made before Sin, and in what manner he was able alone to produce other Men. Nay, she believ'd she had learn'd, that he had put this rare Fecundity in practice, (19) See Heidegger's Histor. Patriarch. Tom. 1. pag. 128.

(20) Conciliat. in Genesim apud Heidegger. ibid. See Hoornbeek who refutes him in the first Chapter of the fourth Book de conversione judæis.

(21) In Moræ Nevoch. pag. 2. cap. 30. and Heidegger. Tom. 1. pag. 128. But observe, as Mr Van Dale has informed me, that Heidegger does not give a faithful Account of the Opinion, which Maimonides ben Israel and Maimonides have most approved.

(22) Plato in Convivio, pag. 118 c. Edit. Francof. 1602.

(23) It was printed in the Year 1686.

(24) P. 56.

(25) Preface of the Book entitled, The New Heaven and the New Earth, Amst. 1679.

(26) Continuation of the Life of Mrs Bourignon, pag. 375.

(6) The Jews
object this.
See Bartol-oci Bibl. Rabin. Tom. I.
pag. 291.

perly allעד'd in confirmation of this false Gloss. The romantic Narrations of James Sadeur [H] might as well be employ'd for that Purpose. Neither is it more true that Adam was produc'd with Circumcision (e), and that, being displeas'd at it, he committed the Fault of those, whom St Paul mentions in one of his Epistles (f). We may place likewise in the rank of Fable, what has been said of his gigantic Stature [I], his

(f) 2 Cor.
 vil. 18.

practice, by the Production of the human Nature of Jesus Christ. Though the Passage is somewhat long, yet I shall beg leave to transcribe it, as it will shew us to what Extravagancies the human Mind is liable.

"God represented to her in a Vision, without the Assistance of corporeal Eyes, which could not have endured such Brightness, the Beauty of the first World, and the manner how he form'd it out of the original Chaos: All was bright, transparent, and radiant, with an ineffable Light and Glory. In the same spiritual manner he made the first Man Adam appear to her, whose Body was more pure and transparent than Crystal, all light and flying, in appearance; in and through which were seen Vessels and Streams of Light, penetrating from the inside to the outside, through all his Pores; Vessels, which contained most lively and diaphanous Liquors of all Sorts and Colours, not only of Water and Milk, but also of Fire, Air, &c. His Motions were wonderfully harmonious; every thing obey'd him; nothing resisted nor could annoy him. He was of a larger Stature than Men are at present; his Hair short and curl'd, inclining to black; his upper Lip covered with small Hair: And, instead of the bestial Parts not to be named, he was made like as our Bodies shall be restored in eternal Life, after a manner which I know not whether I dare reveal. In this Region of his Body, was situated the Structure and Resemblance of a Face; which was a Source of admirable Odors and Perfumes: From thence likewise Men were to spring, whose Principles he had all within himself: for there was a Vessel in his Belly, which bred small Eggs, and another Vessel full of Liquor, which impregnated the Eggs. And when Man grew enflamed with the Love of his God, the Desire he had that there should be other Creatures, beside himself, to praise, love, and adore the divine Majesty, made that Liquor, by the Fire of God's Love, to spread itself on one or more of these Eggs with unconceivable Delight; which, being impregnated, came out some time after from the Man, by the forementioned Canal, in the form of an Egg, and a little after hatch'd a perfect Man. After this manner there will be an holy and endless Generation in the Life eternal, quite different from that which Sin produc'd by the means of the Woman, whom God form'd of the Man, by taking that Vessel out of Adam which contained the Eggs, which the Woman now possesses, and from which Men proceed at present, according to the new Discoveries in Anatomy. The first Man, whom Adam produc'd by himself in this glorify'd State, was chosen by God to be the Throne of the Divinity, the Organ and Instrument by which God would communicate himself eternally with Mankind; that is, Jesus Christ, the First-Born, united to the human Nature, both God and Man (27)."

I wish the Author of The New Visionary of Rotterdam had not insulted, in so gay a manner, the Visions of this Maid, and those of the Minister, whom he attacks. He might have turn'd the latter into Ridicule, for his Notions concerning Adam and Eve's Marriage, without playing the Buffoon so much upon the Subject. I only add two short Remarks. The first is, that Antoinette Bourignon ought not to have expected her own Resurrection: for, according to her Principles, the gross Matter, which was added to Man's Body after the Fall, and which rots in the Grave, will not rise again (28); and the Resurrection is nothing else but the re-establishing of Man in his State of Innocency: A State wherein, according to the fine Revelations of Antoinette, there were no Women. An Heretic, whose Name was Amaury, was formerly condemn'd at Paris (29), for maintaining, among other Errors, That at the end of the World both Sexes shall be re-united together in one Person, and that this re-union began in Jesus Christ; and that if Man had continued in the State, wherein God produc'd him, there would not have been any distinction of Sexes (30). Faber Stapuleus believ'd, that, in the State of Innocency, Adam might have begotten a Man like himself, without the help of a Woman (31). So that Mrs Bourignon was not the first who broach'd this Opinion, though she has added much of her own to it; for instance, That perpetual Propagation, which, she says, will be in Paradise, in the same manner that Man would have multiply'd, if he had preserv'd his Innocency. What shall we say to Paracelsus, who believ'd that our first Parents had not the necessary Parts of Generation before they sinned, but that, after the Fall, they came out of them, like Excrescences, or Tumours in the Throat? Negabat primus parentes ante lapsum habuisse partes generationi hominis necessarias, postea accessisse ut frumam gusturi (32). My second Remark is, that this Lady attributes to Jesus Christ, born of Adam, all the Apparitions of God, spoken of in the Old Testament; and that she believes, that when he resolv'd to cloath himself with the Corruption of our Flesh and Blood, in the Womb of the Holy Virgin, he enclos'd his Body there, either by reducing it to the smallness it had at it's first Conception or Birth, or some other way inconceivable to our gross Reason (33).

These two Reflexions, which were sufficient in the first Edition of this Work, are not so in this; for there are Persons so captious, as to object, that my Article of ADAM contains intolerable Obscenities, I answer, that They are too nice and scrupulous; and that they are ignorant of the Privileges of History. They, who write the Life of a wicked Man, may and ought to represent, in general, the excesses of his Debauchery; and what choice soever they make of Words, they must necessarily relate impure things, and such as fully the Imagination. This is inevitable. All they can do is to avoid Particulars, and too gross Expressions; and this I have done. They likewise, who write the History of Sects, whose Doctrines or Actions have been impure, find themselves under the same Necessity. The most cautious Style can never hinder them from presenting filthy and obscene Images to their Readers. That which justifies me in particular, is, that I relate Absurdities contain'd in a Book, which is publicly sold. Besides, I have the Example of the ancient Fathers on my side, who have inserted the most shocking Impurities of Heretics in their Works.

[H] The romantic Narrations of James Sadeur. It is a pretended relation of certain Hermaphrodite Nations of Terra Australis. See the Article SADUR.

[I] His gigantic Stature. Philo believed that Adam exceeded the size of all other Men both in Body and Soul (34); but the Talmudists go much farther; they affirm, that Adam was extended from one end of the World to the other, when God first form'd him; that after he had transgress'd, the Hand of the Lord was heavy upon him, and reduc'd his Stature to the Measure of an hundred Ells (35). Some say that God did it at the Request of the Angels, who were afraid of so gigantic a Creature; but they suppose that God left to the first Man the height of nine hundred Cubits. See the first Volume of the Rabbinical Dictionary of Father Bartoloci, pag. 65, 66. Barcephla takes notice of certain Authors, who say, that the Terrestrial Paradise was separated from our World by the Ocean, and that Adam, being driven out of this Paradise, cross'd the Sea on foot, to come into our World, and that he found it every where fordable; his Stature was so enormous (36). This is just the Orion or the Polyphemus of the Poets;

— — — — — quam magnus Orion

Cum pedes incedit mediis per maxima Nerei

Stagna viam fecidens, humero supereminet undas (37).

— — — — — He stood,

Like tall Orion, stalking o'er the flood:

When with his brawny Breast he cuts the Waves,

His Shoulders scarce the topmost Billow laves.

DRYDEN.

summo

(30) Protocli
Elench.
Heret. in
the Word
Almaicium & Dofeaf.
Relat. de Burign. in-feried in the Acta Erudit.
Lipf. pag.
150.

(31) Apud
Cornel. à Lapide in Genef. cap.
ii. ver. 24.

(32) Paracel-
us apud Vossum de Phil-osophia, cap.
9. pag. 71.

(33) Conti- nued Life of
M. Bourig-
non, pag.
317.

(34) Philo
de Opific.
Mundi.

(35) In the Book Sanhedrim.

(36) In his Treatise, de Paradiso.

(37) Virgil.
Æneid. lib.
10. ver. 765.

(27) The June.

(28) Preface
to the New Heaven.

(29) In the beginning of the XIIIth
Cent. 17.

his Books [K], his Sepulchre [L], and of a Tree planted on that Sepulchre [M], &c. But we must be careful not to doubt of his Salvation, as the Abbot Ruperius did (g), and least of all to believe him condemn'd to Infernal Flames, as the Tatiamies did (b). Nor are we oblig'd to adopt the Opinion of Origen, St Augustin, St Athanasius, and others, that Adam was one of the first of those, who rose from the dead with JESUS CHRIST (i); and we are yet less oblig'd to believe, that his Repentance would have kill'd him with Grief, if God had not sent the Angel Raziel to comfort him (k). But Reason requires us to believe; that his Faith and his Prayers obtain'd Mercy for him, and that he made a very good End; without imagining at the same time, that he made a Speech to his Children before his Death, and recommended to them particularly to honour their Mother, and to bury her near him. It is

(g) Ruperii Comment. in Genes. cap. xxxii.

(b) Epiphanius Hæres. 46. Eusebii Hist. lib. 4. cap. 27.

(i) Apud Corn. à Lapide in Genes. cap. v. vers. 5.

(k) See Reuchlinus de Art. Cubal. pag. 8. & Heidegger's Hist. Patriarch. Tom. 1. pag. 16c.

— — — summo cum monte videmus
Ipsum inter pecudes vasta fe mole moventem,
Pastorem Polyphemum, & litorea nota petentem (38).

(38) Virgil. Æneid. lib. 3. ver. 655.

— — — When, on the Mountain's Brow,
We saw the Giant-Shepherd stalk before
His following Flock, and leading to the Shore.

(39) Id. ib. ver. 664.

— — — graditurque per æquor
Jam medium, necdum fluctus latera ardua tinxit (39).

— — — Thro' Seas he strides,
And scarce the topmost Billows touch'd his Sides.

DRYDEN.

The Arabians have no less an Idea of the Stature of our first Parents, than Moses Barcephas's Authors. The following is a Narrative of Mr Monconis. "My Arabian told me how the Caravan of Cairo arriv'd "first at Mecca, and how, after having offer'd their "Prayers, they went to the Foot of the Mountain, "which is a League distant from thence, to wait "for the other Caravans of Damascus and of Bagdad, "which came the following Days to Mecca; and "that being all arriv'd on the ninth of the twelfth "Moon, which is Diel Heghe, at the end, I say, of "the ninth Day, which is Affer, all the three Caravans ascended to the top of the Mountain, on the Summit whereof (which is very low, like those "Hillocks, which stand alone in the midst of Plains) "they believe that Eve laid her Head, when Adam "knew her the first Time; and that her two Knees "were two Muskets shot distant from each other, "on two other Hillocks in the bottom of the Plain; "on each of which places they have erected a round "Pillar, between which (to be a good Agè, that is, "Pilgrim) you must pass, both ascending and descending the Mountain, on the top of which is "a Mosque, made like a Niche, into which but seven or eight Persons can enter (40)." I find that one John Lucius is cited, who believed that Adam was one of the greatest of all Giants (41), and who used to prove it by these Words of Scripture, according to the Vulgar Translation, Nomen Hebron ante vocabatur Cariatharbe: Adam maximus ibi inter Enacim situs est (42). Upon the Authority of this Passage, St Jerom fancies that Adam was buried at Hebron (43). But it was proved to him, that neither the Hebrew Text, nor the Translation of the LXX, make mention of Adam; or of any Sepulchre (44). The Geneva Translation renders it, the Name of Hebron before was Kariath-Arbah, which Arbah had been a very great Man among the Hanaksins. The Englisb Version renders it after the same manner. There is a Mountain in the Island of Ceylon, called the Peak of Adam, because, according to the Tradition of the Country, it was the place of his Residence (45). The prints of his Feet are yet to be found there, above two Palms in length. Pythagoras would not infer such a gigantic Stature from thence, as that which others attribute to Adam; I say, Pythagoras, who judg'd of Hercules's Stature by the length of that Hero's Foot (46). It is also said that there are some Remains on that Mountain, of the Tears which were shed for the Death of Abel; but others say, that Adam and Eve lamented his Death in a Cave in Judæa, where their Beds of Stone are to be seen of thirty Foot length (47).

(40) Monconis. Travels, part 1. pag. 372. 373. Edition of Lyons.

(41) John Lucius, lib. 1. de Eminent. dat. Temp. cap. 4. apud Pererium in Genes. lib. 4. quest. 3.

(42) Joshua, cap. xiv. vers. ult.

(43) Hieron. in Matth. cap. xxvii.

(44) Pererius ubi supra.

(45) Ludov. Romanus Patrius in sua Navigat. apud Biffellum illust. Ruinar. Decid. 1.

(46) A. Gellius Noct. Att. lib. 1. cap. 1.

(47) Apud Salden. Oria Theol. pag. 346.

(48) Heidegger. Hist. Patri. Tom. 1. pag. 481.

(49) See Salian. Tom. 1. pag. 230.

Jeus, reports, that Abraham being gone into the Country of the Sabæi, open'd Adam's strong Box, wherein he found his Books with those of Setb, and Edris (50). This last Name is that which the Arabians give to Enoch. They say that Adam received twenty Books fallen from Heaven, which contain'd divers Laws and Promises, and Threatnings, from God, and Predictions of many Events (51). Some Rabbies attribute the 92d Psalm to Adam, and there are some Manuscripts, where the Chaldean Title of that Psalm imports that it is a Song of Praise, recited by the first Man on the Sabbath-day (52). The good Eusebius Nierembergius, who was Credulity itself, reports two Canticles, which he faithfully copied out of the Revelations of the ever blessed Amadeus, in the Library of the Escurial (53). It is said, that Adam was the Author of these two Pieces; he made the one the first time he saw Eve; the other is the penitential Psalm, which he and his Wife sung after their Fall.

(50) See Stanley's Eastern Philology, B. 3. cap. 3.

(51) Hoefting. Hist. Orient. pag. 22. cited by Lyserus in Polygamia Triumphata pag. 145.

(52) Gaspard Schoetus Technic. Curios. pag. 556.

(53) Lib. 2. cap. 13. de Orig. Sacre Scripte. cap. 15. apud Schoetum, ibid.

(54) See Salian. Ann. Tom. 1. pag. 225. where he shows that St Jerom himself says that common Opinion is false.

[L] His Sepulchre.] We have already seen, that St Jerom imagined, without any ground; that Adam was buried at Hebron; but we have as much Reason to be of his Opinion in that, as to think with many others, that Adam was buried upon Mount Calvary (54). I confess the latter Opinion is preferable per la predica, for the Preacher's Use; for it is much more fertile of Allusions, Antitheses, moral Application, and all kind of Rhetorical Figures: But such a Reason is fit for little else, than to serve as an Answer to those, who may ask, why St Jerom's Opinion had fewer Followers than the other. But, Comparisons aside, it is enough for us to be informed, that the Fathers generally believed, that the first Man died in the Place, where Jerusalem was built afterwards, and that he was buried on a neighbouring Hill, which was called Golgotha, or Cakary; which is that where Jesus Christ was crucified. If you ask me how Adam's Grave could redit the Waters of the Deluge, and how his Bones could maintain their place, in order to receive the sprinkling of the Blood of our Lord; for there lies the Mytery;

Hic hominem primum suscepimus esse sepultum,
Hic patitur Christus: pia sanguine terra maderit,
Pulvis Adæ ut possit, veteris cum sanguine Christi
Commixtus, stillantis aquæ virtute lavari (55);

Here Tradition says the first Man was buried; Here Christ suffered: The pious Earth is wet with Blood, that the Dust of Adam, mixt with the Blood of Christ, might be wash'd with the Virtue of the dissolving Water:

(55) Tertullian. Carm. contra Marcion. lib. 2. cap. 4.

If, I say, you put this Question; Barcephas will quote a Doctor upon you, very much esteem'd in Syria (56), who said that Noah dwelt in Judæa; that he planted the Cedars, wherewith he built the Ark, in the Plains of Sodom, that he took Adam's Bones with him into the Ark; that, after he was come out of the Ark, he divided them among his three Sons; that he gave the Skull to Schem; and that the Offspring of Schem, having taken possession of Judæa, buried this Skull in the same Place where Adam's Grave had been.

(56) Dom. Jacobus Orrohaia (five Edelers) St Ephrem wrote 1st in the 13th Century was his Disciple. See Salian, pag. 226. Corn. à Lapide, p. 13.

[M] A Tree planted on that Sepulchre.] Cornelius à Lapide says, that the Hebrews have a Tradition, that by the Command of an Angel Setb put some of the Seed of the forbidden Tree into Adam's Mouth, who was already buried; and that it produc'd a Tree, of which the Cross of Jesus Christ was made; and that it was but just that the same Wood, which had caus'd Adam to sin, should be That, on which Jesus Christ should expiate Adam's Sin (57). That Jesuit refers us to Pinedo, who is giving one's self too much Liberty, to forge such direct Speeches [N]. We have related elsewhere (l) the Opinions concerning the Duration of his State of Innocence.

(57) In Genesim. cap. ii. ver. 9. pag. 74.

(l) In the Remark [A] of the Article ABEL.

who related this Fable at length. But what does he mean by the Hebrews? Doubtless he means the Jews. Now, do the Jews own that Jesus Christ expiated Adam's Sin by the Punishment of the Crows, to which their Nation condemn'd him under Pontius Pilate? When an Author is full of a thing, he thinks others are so too, and does not always perceive the Absurdity of attributing his own Thoughts to them. Lastly, this Fable has been variously reported; for we find in a Rabbi, who liv'd long before Jesus Christ, and whose Work is entituled, Gale Rafejab (58), that the Angels brought to Adam, in the Desert, a Branch of the Tree of Life, which Seth planted, and that it became a Tree, whereof Moses made good Use; for, after having made out of it the Rod, with which he wrought so many Miracles, he sweetened the bitter Waters with it, and erected likewise the Brazen Serpent on part of it. Some say that Adam sent Seth to the Gate of the Garden of Eden, to desire the Angel's who defended the Entrance, to grant him a Branch of the Tree of Life, which they comply'd with (59).

(58) See concerning this Rabbi, and his Works, the Nouv. Liter. for July 1686. Art. 3. pag. 770. taken from Mabius of the Brazen Serpent.

[N] To forge such direct Speeches. I have Salian in view, in this Censure. Not contented with the Speech, he made a long Epitaph for Adam, wherein he denotes his own Name by these three Letters, J. S. P. (60). He made Epitaphs also for Abel, Abraham, and Sarah, &c. In truth this is scarce pardonable, except in Authors, who are just come from teaching Rhetoric; and I am fully persuaded that the Sirmonds, the Petavius's, the Hardouins, and the rest of the great Authors of the Society of the Jesuits, will judge of it, as I do.

(59) See Salien's Oria Theolog. pag. 608.

(60) See Trey flavij, Jac. Salianus' Po-suit.

ADAM, Archdeacon of the Patriarchal Chamber, and Superior of the Monks of Cbaldaa, was sent to Rome at the beginning of the XVIIth Century, by Elias, Nestorian Patriarch of Babylon. This Patriarch, having caus'd the Profession of Faith, which Paul V. had sent him, to be examin'd by his Bishops, commission'd Adam to present it to That Pope, with the Alterations he had made in it; but order'd him at the same time to correct what the Pope should find amiss in it. This Embassy of our Adam was an Embassy of Obedience. This Monk, being come to Rome, acquitted himself of his Commission with all imaginable Care. He had brought a Writing with him, wherein he pretended to reconcile the Faith of the Eastern Churches with That of the Church of Rome, and to make it appear that their Differences were but a Verbal Dispute [A]. He had first shew'd this Writing to his Patriarch, and afterwards, by his order, to all the Bishops of the Party, and he had employ'd a whole Year in going from City to City to procure the Approbation of those Bishops. Peter Strozza, Secretary to Paul V. was order'd to answer this Writing. The Answer favour'd more of Inflexibility than Condescension; for he explain'd every thing with the utmost Rigour; and the Legate of the Patriarch was not only oblig'd to submit to the Doctrines, but to the very Expressions of the Church of Rome. He sign'd whatever the Pope propos'd to him, and, not satisfy'd with abjuring all the Errors of his Nation, he wrote several Books, and address'd them to his Countrymen, to communicate to them the new Lights he had acquir'd at Rome. He departed from thence after an abode of Three Years; and carry'd with him a Brief from Paul the V. to his Patriarch Elias, rejecting all the Terms of Accommodation, which that Patriarch had propos'd, and obliging him to condemn every Expression, which might cover any Error (a). Adam was accompanied by two Jesuits (b), who had Orders to labour at the entire Re-union of that Sect.

(a) Taken from the 10th Chapter of the 5th Book of the Perpetuity of the Faith defended. Mr. Arnaud cites the Treatise of Peter Strozza, de Dogmatibus Chaldaeorum.

(b) Nic. Goddign's lib. 1. de Rebus Abassinorum apud Aub. Miræum, de Statu Relig. Christi. pag. 226.

[A] Their Differences were but a verbal Dispute.] The Sieur de Moni, in his Critical History of the Levant, seems fully persuaded, that the Patriarch Elias had reason to maintain, that there is but a mere verbal Difference between the Nestorians of the present Time, and the Catholics. The Nestorianism of the present Time, says he (1), is but an imaginary Heresy; the Difference of their Opinion consists only in Equivocations; the Nestorians understanding the Word Person in another Sense, than the Latins. Why then did they not acquiesce in the Explanation, which the Patriarch of Babylon gave of their Notions? The Reason was, because, in order to keep up a Decorum, and out of a false Puntillo of Honour, it was necessary to maintain that Nestorianism was a dangerous Heresy; otherwise they would have prostituted the Honour of the Oecumenical Councils. This is what the Sieur de Moni would have said in a free Country; but in France he was obliged to qualify his Expressions; The Councils, says he (2), having condemn'd the Heresy of Nestorius, it seem'd necessary to make it appear at Rome, that Nestorianism was a true Heresy, since it had been condemn'd by the Church in a general Council. He adds, with the same caution, That some might infer, from the very Acts of the ancient Councils, that Nestorianism is but a nominal Heresy; and that if Nestorius and St Cyril had understood each other, they might have reconcil'd their Opinions (3).

(1) Moni's Critical History of the Levant, and Customs of the Nations of the Levant, pag. 93.

(2) Id. ib.

(3) Id. ib.

ADAM, (JOHN) a French Jesuit, was a famous Preacher of the XVIIth Century [A]. He was of Limousin, and enter'd among the Jesuits in the Year 1622, at 14 Years of Age (a). His Superiors, finding him qualify'd to succeed in the Pulpit, apply'd him to it, after he had taught Humanity, and Philosophy. He exercis'd the Trade of Preaching Forty Years, and was follow'd in the chief Cities of France, and in the Lowre itself (b). He began, as it was reasonable he should, in the Provinces; but when he had sufficiently signaliz'd himself in them, he was sent to Display his Talents on the grand Theatre of the Kingdom. The Circumstances of the Times favour'd him, the Disputes of Jansenism having already heated the People; and never was Man more fit than Father Adam, being a rash Adventurer, to be let loose against That Party. He was hot and undaunted, and had all the Qualifications of a great Declaimer. The Sermons, which he preach'd in Lent at Paris in St Paul's Church in the Year 1650, made a great Noise. The Preacher push'd Matters so far, that,

(a) Sotuel, Biblioth. Societatis Jesu, pag. 397.

(b) Id. ib.

[A] Was a famous Preacher of the XVIIth Century.] See the Letter which Mr de Balzac writ to him on the 15th of January 1643, after having read the fifteen Sermons, which that Jesuit had sent him (1).

(1) It is the 15th of the 3d Book of the 1st part of the Letters Choities, pag. 109. &c. of J. Holl.

that, had it not been for powerful Patrons, they would have forbid him the Pulpit [B]. He had Honesty enough to acknowledge [C], that St Austin was no ways favourable to Molinism; and was very angry with that Ancient Doctor. The Jansenists did not pass by this Affront [D]. They publish'd an Answer to his Sermon, and were not satisfy'd with apologizing for St Austin; but refuted some other Propositions of that Jesuit, and particularly That, which related to the Inspiration of the Canonical Writers [E]. Father Adam had no regard to the Complaints, which were made

[B] They would have forbid him the Pulpit.] This we learn from a Letter of Guy Patin, written the twelfth of April, 1650; Our Archbishop, says he, has forbid the Pulpit to Mr Brouffell, a Doctor of Navarre, and Canon of St Honore, who is a great Jansenist, for having preached within these three Days a little too boldly. Father Adam, a Jesuit, would have felt the same rigour, for having preached against St Austin in St Paul's Church, and for having called him the hot African and the petulant Doctor, if the Credit of the Jesuits and of the Capuchins had not diverted the Archbishop from it (2).

(2) Patin's Letter 3^o.
Page 172.
Of the 1st part, Edit. of Geneva, 1691.

[C] He had Honesty enough to acknowledge.] This must be understood, cum grano salis, with some Restriction; and we should be deceived, if we imagined, that this Jesuit retained nothing of the Artifices of those, who pretended that St Austin is neither favourable to the Calvinists, nor to the Jansenists: For in the same Sermon, which raised such an outcry, and which he divided into two Parts, he designed by the second to shew from the Doctrine of That Father, that Jesus Christ died for all Men, without Exception; and he had already published a Book, entitled, Calvin defeated by himself, and by St Austin's Weapons, which he has unjustly usurped in his Doctrines of Grace, Free-will, and Predestination (3). Now he made no Difficulty to say, that Jansenius and Calvin taught the same thing in the Doctrine of Grace; and a few Days after his Sermon, he replied to one, who reproached him for it, I fear nothing; no one can attack my Sermon, nor my Book about Grace, without undertaking at the same time to support Calvin (4). What are we to understand then by the Honesty which I ascribe to him? Why, that the Liberty he took in giving his Opinion of St Austin's Errors, plainly intimated, that he did not esteem him a proper Model of Faith in those Matters.

(3) Defence of St Austin against Father Adam.

(4) The same.

[D] The Jansenists did not pass by this Affront.] A few Days after, they published a Pamphlet of sixty Pages in Quarto, entitled, A Defence of St Austin, against the Errors, the Calumnies, and the scandalous Invektives which Father Adam, the Jesuit, preached in St Paul's Church on the second Thursday in Lent, on this Text of the Gospel, "I am not sent but to the lost Sheep of the House of Israel." They accused him of having said, "I. That St Austin was intricate and obscure in his Writings; that, being an African, violent and full of Heat, he was often too passionate, that he ran into Extremes, and had exceeded the Bounds of Truth in opposing the Enemies of Grace; as it happens sometimes, that a Man, who designs to strike his Enemy, does it with such Violence, that he dashes him against a Tree, and gives him a Counter-Blow contrary to his Intention. II. That St Austin himself, in establishing Original Sin, against the Pelagians, was carried away to an excess of Error, in saying that Original Sin was punished in Children, who died without Baptism, with the Torments of Fire, and with Damnation. III. That St Austin was not steady in his Notions, since, according to the Observation of Mr Garnache, he changed his Opinion three times about the Doctrine of Grace." These Reproaches, and some others of the same kind, had already appeared in a Book of Father Adam. Those, who have not that Book, may find them in a Work, which is easy to be consulted; I mean the Vindicie Augustiniane, wherein Father Adam is the first of St Austin's modern Adversaries, whom Father Norris refuted.

[E] Which related to the Inspiration of the Canonical Writers.] "It is not surprising, that Father Adam should assert in his Sermon, that St Austin was carried too far by the Ardor of his Zeal, since, in a naughty Book, full of Falsities and Errors, he has laid it down *. That this Weakness is not so criminal, but that God suffers it in those Authors, whom he inspires, and whom we call Canonical - - - and that the Natural Fire of St Paul was likewise apt to incline him to Expressions of this nature - - - To prove that there are some Frailties in Canonical Authors, and that they follow their own Imaginations in expressing the things which God has revealed to them, he says, That when the Prophet Elias complained of the Impiety of the Age, he said to God, that Faith was extinguished in the Hearts of all Men, and that he alone remained of all who adored him on the Earth. — David affirms, that there was never more Corruption and Disorder seen, than in his Time, that there was not one Man to be found who would perform a good Action." This is the Doctrine which Father Adam's Censurers reproached him with. The result of it is, that the inspired Doctrine, and the Expressions of those who are inspired, are two different things; that God is the Author only of the first, but that he left the other to the Imagination of the Person inspired, and that this did not hinder his Imagination from exceeding the Dictates of the Holy Spirit. Without doubt this was Father Adam's Sentiment; for the Examples of Elias and David, which he alleges, would not serve the Purpose of one, who believes, that it was revealed by God, that Elias was the only Worshipper of the True God, and that in David's Time there was not one good Man on the Earth. Whoever therefore makes use of such Examples must be convinced, that God only revealed, that the Number of good Men was small. Thus the Imagination of an inspired Author may make that universal which is given him with Restriction; and thus he may fall into the Sophism, à dicto secundum quid ad dictum simpliciter: In a Word, This is to adulterate Revelation, to deceive the Church, to lie. The Jansenists did not fail to exclaim against this Doctrine, as being impious, and opening a Door to a thousand Attempts against the Authority of the Scripture (5). "For, said they (6), if God suffers any Frailty in the Canonical Authors, whom he inspires, if there is a Natural Fire in St Paul, which is not from God; every thing, which the Libertine or Heretic finds in Holy Writ contrary to his Sentiments, he will say proceeds from the Frailty or Natural Fire of the Writer, and not from the Spirit of God. - - - To allow of any Infirmary, or any Influence of meer Natural Disposition in the sacred Writers, is to give every one the Liberty of judging of This, and of throwing out of the Scripture what he pleases, as proceeding rather from the Weakness of Man, than the Spirit of God. - - - The Libertine will deny the Eternity of Hell Torments, and when St Matthew says, Go ye cursed into everlasting Fire, he will say it was an extravagant Expression denote the long Continuance, and Greatness of the Torments prepared for the Wicked, proceeding from "to the Imagination of the Evangelist (7)." Those Gentlemen pretended that Father Adam only made use of this Doctrine, that he might shift off the Force of St Paul's Expressions, which seemed hard to him, and contrary to his Sentiment, and to teach us the Art of playing with the Words of the Apostle of the Gentiles about Grace and Divine Predestination, as well as with those of St Austin. If he finds himself pressed by the Ninth Chapter of the Epistle to the Romans, where St Paul says, that God will have Mercy, on whom he will have Mercy, and whom he will he hardens; he may answer, that St Paul's Natural Fire carried him into Expressions of this Nature; that it is a Frailty which God suffers in Canonical Authors; that it is the Expression of a thing revealed after the Imagination, Disposition, and Temper of St Paul (8).

* Third Part, cap. 7. pag. 622.

I omit their Answer to the Instances of Elias and David; and shall only observe, that they found a great Mistake in matter of Fact in the first of those Citations; for the Canonical Author, who relates

(5) Ibid. pag. 11.

(6) The same.

(7) Pag. 16.

(8) Compare this with what is said pag. 374. in the Advice to the Refugees.

made against his Sermon, and against a Book, wherein he had thrown out several Expressions concerning St Austin, which gave great Offence. He retracted nothing, and continued writing in the same Strain. The Jansenists renew'd their Complaints, and their Writings; and a particular Conflict arose between them and Father Adam. They criticiz'd the Books, which he publish'd, some of which he compos'd for the use of pious Minds, in Opposition to those Gentlemen. To this end, he publish'd the Psalms of David, the Hymns and Prayers of the Church in Latin, and in French. Every body knows that the Jansenists endeavour'd to recommend themselves by their French Translations of those Books. They attack'd likewise the Poetry of Father Adam; I mean the Translation, which he had made, of the Hymns in French Verse [F]. But this Paper War continued but a very little time between them. His Writings began in 1650. and ended in 1651 [G]. It is plain, they found that he did the Church and the Society more Service by his other Talents, than by his Pen. He was therefore sent to Sedan to settle a College of Jesuits there. He would have found it very difficult to succeed in this Design, had the Marshal de Fabert liv'd, who was of all Men the least a Bigot, and most firmly settled in the Principles of Honesty. The Protestants were very easy under his Government; but the Scene was chang'd after his Death (c). They met with great Molestation from This Jesuit, and were oblig'd to pay large Sums of Money, and to establish Funds, which put him in a Capacity of founding the College he had projected. He publish'd a Scheme to which Mr de St Maurice, Professor in Divinity at Sedan (d), return'd an Answer which remain'd without Reply. He liv'd some Years at Sedan, where he promoted the Interests of his Order, and the business of making Profelytes, to the utmost of his Power.

(c) Which happened in the Month of May 1662.

(d) He liv'd at Maelricht, upon his leaving France after the Revocation of the Edict of Nantes, till his Death, which fell out in the Year 1700, Aug. 20. Father Adam laid many Snare in his way, but he found an Adversary, who avoided them ingeniously.

relates Elias's Complaint, does not mention it as the Expression of a Man inspired, but as the Expression of a Man who was deceived, and to whom God revealed that he was in an Error. Therefore that Author did not deviate from the utmost Historical Exactness in reporting this False Complaint of Elias. These Gentlemen put the Public in mind, "That among the Propositions extracted from the Public Lectures of the Jesuits of Leuven, acknowledged by them, and censured by the Faculties of Lowain and of Douay, in the Year 1588. are the two following: I. To constitute Holy-Scripture, it is not necessary that the Words should be inspired by the Holy Ghost. II. It is not necessary that the sacred Authors should be immediately inspired by the Holy Ghost, with every Truth and every Sentiment, contained in their Writings." But, whatever Appellation these two Propositions deserve, yet they are very different from the Doctrine of Father Adam, and much less dangerous (9).

I have enlarged upon this, because I observed that it was an unknown Fact to those who, on Occasion of the Sentiments of some Divines of Holland, have lately wrote so much concerning the Inspiration of the sacred Books. All Communions have their Father Adam; there are Writers to be found every where to whom the same Lecture ought to be read, which was read to that Jesuit. The following are the Words of Mr Saurin, Minister of Utrecht, to Mr Jurieu, Minister of Rotterdam (10). "The Comparison which M. J. made between the Imagination of the Prophets, which received Impressions from above, and a Wheel, which, being set a-going, continues in Motion, though the Hand, which impelled it, be removed (11), is another Phorphanation. For though he did not apply it to the greater Prophets, it will necessarily lead to them; unless he can shew that their Imaginations, when wrought upon, did not run beyond the Impression, by their own Impetuosity, like the Wheel, which is put in Motion, as he says happened to other inspired Persons, in whom God produced these extraordinary Motions for Signs and Prodigies, and who often went farther, than they ought to do. By what Mark would he have us distinguish those Prophets, whom God sends for Signs, if their Imagination, being once stirred, confounds what comes from God with their own Folly, and if they report Truth and Falshood together, under the external Appearance of Persons out of their Senses, and disordered in their Imaginations? This Mixture of Divine Inspiration, and Extravagancy concealed under the exterior Resemblance of Madness, is inconsistent with the Idea which we have of the Wisdom of God (12)." Some Persons are of so warm an Imagination, that they never report any thing that is told them without improving upon it: They only retain the thing, and never remember the Expressions of him, who related it to them: They substitute others in their room, clothed with all their Fire, and consequently an unfaithful Representation of what was told them. These Persons easily believe that the Prophets and Apostles treated in the same manner the Ideas which the Holy Ghost communicated to them.

[F] The Translation, which he had made, of the Hymns in French Verse (13). What is to found in relation to this in the ninth Part of the Difficulties proposed to Mr Steyaert, deserves to be reported: "No Liturgy, for these many Years, has been more esteemed than that whereof the Title is: 'The Office of the Church, and of the Virgin,' in Latin and French, with the Hymns translated into Verse; otherwise called les Heures de Port-Royal; or, the Port-Royal Primer. Four Editions were published of it in one Year; which gave so much Jealousy to the Jesuits, that they left nothing undone to cry it down. They made silly Objections against it, which were immediately answered. They opposed to it Father Adam's Prayer-Book, under the Name of les Heures Catholiques, the Catholic Primer, as if the other was Heretical. The Hymns in it were also translated into Verse, but so ridiculously, that it only served to raise the Credit of those of the Port-Royal. Lastly, they informed against them to the Inquisition of Rome, and made use of all their Credit to have them condemned there (14)." Cardinal Spada intimated to Mr de St Amour, that if that Work of Father Adam was presented to the Tribunal of the Inquisition, they would condemn it. Mr de St Amour answered, That if the Primer, which he defended, was to be decried. . . . they might as well condemn it without that of Father Adam: And that he did not think it proper to accuse those Fathers to compose a silly Book, whenever they saw a good one appear, which did not please them, in hopes of having them both condemned, under pretence of bolding the Balance even, and of keeping both Parties in Peace (15).

[G] Begun in 1650. and ended in 1651.] Father Sotuel mentions but five of Father Adam's Works. The last is his Answer to a Letter of Mr Duillé, which came out in 1660. These are the Titles of his other Books: Calvinus à seipso & à S. Augustino propositus, (Calvin defeated by himself and St Austin) Parisiis 1650. in 8vo. Psalmi Davidici Latine & Gallice cum Cantici undecim quibus utitur Ecclesia, (The Psalms of David in Latin and French, with eleven Hymns used by the Church) Parisiis 1651. in 12mo. Fidelium regula ex Sacra Scriptura & sanctis Patribus deprompta, (A Guide to the Faithful, extracted from the Sacred Scriptures, and the Holy Fathers) Parisiis 1651. in 12mo. Preces Catholice Latine & Gallice, (Catholic Prayers in Latin and French.) Parisiis 1651. in 8vo. and 12mo.

[H] An

(9) See Mr Simon's Answer to the Opinions of some Divines of Holland, cap. 12. and his Critical History of the New Testament, cap. 25. the Bibliothéque Universelle, Tom. 10. pag. 132. Tom. 11. p. 80. and Tom. 19. pag. 499.

(10) In 1692.

(11) See the 20th *Pajlo-*ral Letter of 1689.

(12) Saurin. Examination of Mr Jurieu's Doctrine, designed as an Answer to a Libel entitled, Mr Jurieu's Second Apostasy, pag. 21.

(13) See Mr Duillé's Reply, Part 2. pag. 19. and Part 3. pag. 234. & 242.

(14) Difficulties proposed to Mr Steyaert, part 9. pag. 42.

(15) Ibid. pag. 45.

Power. At length, the Government itself was disgusted at him; and, whether it was that they dreaded his bold and intriguing Spirit, or that they perceiv'd, that his Manner of Preaching had not all the Gravity requisite in a Place, where there was a Protestant University, they were pleas'd that his Superiors recall'd him: I have been told, that some Instances were made for it. He had been sent to preach at Loudun, while the Protestants held a National Synod there, about the end of the Year 1659. It is likely, this engag'd him in the composing of a Work, which made him known to the Protestants of France, more than any thing else, and more than many Authors of the First Rank are known to them. A Minister of Poitiers (e) having chang'd his Religion, a little after the breaking up of that Synod, wrote a Letter, wherein he maliciously censur'd the Fast, which That Assembly had enjoyn'd all the Reform'd Churches of the Kingdom to keep (f). Mr Daille, who had been Moderator of the Assembly, answer'd his Letter. The other reply'd; Father Adam would engage in the Controversy, and publish'd an Answer to Mr Daille's Writing in the Year 1660 [H]. Mr Daille reply'd to them both in one Book. Perhaps he never succeeded better than upon this Occasion, nor was any Piece so much read by all sorts of Persons among the Protestants; which is the Reason, why Father Adam, who appears almost in every Period in it, and often under such a Character as makes an Impression, is more known to them than an hundred Authors, who surpass him. This Work of Mr Daille remain'd without Reply [I], and it is not to be wonder'd at: They, who ought to have answer'd it, were inferior to such an Adversary, who could have triumphed over them even in a bad Cause. I do not know in what Year Father Adam was Procurator of the Province of Champagne at Rome; the Bibliothèque of the Jesuits does not remark it (g); but it informs me, that in 1674. he was Superior of the Maison Professe at Bordeaux. I think he died in that Employ about the Year 1680. He publish'd some Controversial Sermons on the Eucharist, which was the Gospel of the Day all over France, during the Quarrel between Mr Arnaud and Mr Claude; I say, he publish'd them since the Impression of Father Sotuel's Work, and I think he preach'd them in the height of the Contest. They are not ill turn'd, but they are a little too Dramatic, Mr Claude being sometimes introduc'd as speaking in them. I say this only upon hear-say. Father Adam pass'd through the hands of Father Jarrige, but met with a milder Treatment, than from many others, and came off at a small Expence [K]. He was not the first who spoke

(e) His Name was Mr Corti.

(f) See Mr Daille's Life pag. 33, &c.

(g) Rexit Collegium Sedanense in Provincia Campanie, à qua electus est Procurator ad Urbem. . . . He govern'd the College of Sedan in the Province of Campanie, from whence he was elected Procurator for the City. Sotuel Biblioth. Soc. Jesu, pag. 397.

[H] An Answer to Mr Daille's Writing in the Year 1660. Father Sotuel entitled that Work, Responsum ad Epistolam D. Allii Ministri Charentonensis Heretici. This is to latinize Mr Daille's Name after a wretched manner, and is a Sign that Father Sotuel read but few Books of Controversy. For is there any Controversist, to whom Mr Daille's Latin Works are unknown, and who consequently does not know that That Minister's Name in Latin is Dallæus? They, who have a confused Notion, that there was a Minister of Charenton, whose Name was Mr Allix, would believe without Meditation, that Father Adam wrote a Book against him, if they had no other Light than what the Article of that Jesuit affords in the Continuator of Aligambus; and thus the least Mistake in Proper Names is enough to lead the Reader into an Error. Any one, who should once mistake Mr Allix for the Allius of that Continuator, might very well give him a place in the Catalogue of the Famous Children, and send him to Mr Baillet (16) as an Additional Article; for he would imagine that That Book was printed in the Year 1660. and refuted by a famous Jesuit.

[I] This Work of Mr Daille remained without Reply. The Curious will be glad to see here what the Son of that Learned Minister observed concerning This Book. He says, "It is in every body's hands, and was so well received, that two Editions have already been made of it. Those of our Communion, for whom it was chiefly compos'd, find, with Satisfaction, most of our Controversies treated in it after a manner very proper to instruct them, and our Religion cleared from every thing which it's Enemies commonly charge it with. And if we may draw any advantage from the Silence of our Adversaries, it seems as if they had condemn'd themselves, seeing hitherto neither of them have oppos'd any thing against it; tho' they often promis'd the contrary, and have been reproach'd for it several times (17)". Mr Daille, the Son, has mention'd one thing, which clearly insinuates, that Father Adam was the Converter of the Minister Corti. It ought, therefore, to be taken Notice of, as one of the great Actions of the Hero of this Article: Let us hear then Mr Daille's Historian once more. "Not only the new converted Roman, who was the "Party concerned, defended himself by publishing a large Answer; but as if his Cause had not been secure enough in his own Hands, a famous Jesuit came to his Assistance, of whom some of his Communion said, that he was the first Man of the World only by his Name. The Reader will easily see, that Father Adam is meant by this, who to defend his PROSELYTES, published a second Answer at the same time, of the same Size, and Force with his.

The Phrase, First Man, made use of in the above Passage, supply'd me in the first Edition of this Dictionary, with a Marginal Note, which shall make, at present, part of the body of this Column. It is as follows: "I have heard say, that the Queen-Mother having asked a great Lord, who attended her to one of Father Adam's Sermons, what he thought of it; he thanked her for his having been so well convinced by it of the Hypothesis of the Præ-Adamites. Being desir'd to explain this Riddle, he answered, This Sermon convinces me that Adam is not the first Man of the World." You will find this Story in the Continuation of the Menagiana (18); and you will farther be inform'd, that the great Lord, who gave the Queen this Answer, was the Prince de Guemont, and that the Sermon which gave occasion to the Jest, was very ill received both by the City and the Court (19). Father Adam made a very odious Comparison in it between the Parilians and the Jews, who crucified our Lord. He compar'd the Queen to the Virgin; and Cardinal Mazarine to St John the Evangelist. Note that others ascribe this Witticism to Benjérade. Read his Life before the last Edition of his Works (20).

[K] Came off at a small Expence. I find three Passages relating to this, in the Works of the Ex-Jesuit Jarrige. The first is as follows: Father John Adam, one of the best Preachers they have, interpreted the Treatise of Generation to one Utensile of the Convent of St Macaire, and gave as exact a Description of the Parts, which contribute to the Procreation of Children, as the Sieur du Laurens in his Anatomy (21). The second contains these Words; All those who were of the College of Poitiers in the Year 1646, know the Quarrel between John Adam and James Biron. They attacked each other in such an hostile manner,

(18) Page 20. of the Edition of Holland.

(19) It was a Sermon on the Passion, preach'd by Father Adam at St Germain de l'Auxerois.

(20) That of the Year 1697.

(21) Jarrige, the Jesuit, placed in the St. Foix, cap. 1.

(16) He publish'd a Book in 1688. entitled, Of the Children which became famous by their Studies or their Writings.

(17) Abridgement of Mr Daille's Life, printed in 1670.

spoke disrespectfully of St Austin [L], and who endeavour'd to persuade, that St Paul often carry'd his Subject farther than it wou'd bear [M], thro' too lively an Imagination.

ner, that, by the Providence of God, all their Impurities came to Light, and James Biraot remained convicted, &c. (22) The third informs us (23), that John Adam, the most excellent of their Preachers, was the Son of a Taylor. Of these three Passages, the first alone can hurt the Memory of Father Adam; for the second makes the Impurities, which were discovered in consequence of their Quarrel, fall on Biraot's Head alone. Thus all, that the scandalous Chronicle, and private Memoirs, had revealed to Father Jarrige, concerning Father Adam, is reduced to some Lectures of Anatomy read to a Nun, on the Generation of Children. Once again, this is to come off cheaply out of the Hands of Jarrige. This will be allowed me by any one, who reflects but the least on the Character of that Author's Works. If he had told us the Nun's Age, we might form a better Judgment of the Nature of the Offence. To discourse on such Points before a young Nun is doubtless a great Sin, because it is morally impossible but that such a Conversation must excite in her impure Thoughts; but I would willingly have a Casuist of good Sense, who is neither of too loose, nor too rigid Morals, examine this Question; would a Nun of such an advanced Age, that she could bear a Lecture of Anatomy on the Organs of Generation, with the same Indifference as an Explication of the Parts of the Ear, commit a Sin by her Curiosity in hearing such a Lecture? I believe it will be granted me, that it is very lawful for a Woman, of what Condition soever, to be acquainted with all that is said concerning the Circulation of the Blood: It is no Sin for her to know that the most subtle Parts of the Chyle pass from the Intestines into the Laëal Veins, and from thence successively into the Reservoir of the Chyle, into the Ductus Thoracicus, into the subclavian Vein, into the hollow Vein, into the right Ventricle of the Heart, into the Artery of the Lungs, into the Vein of the Lungs, into the left Ventricle of the Heart, and into the great Artery. There is no harm in her understanding the opening and shutting of the Valves, which are at the Extremities of the Veins and of the Arteries, the Anastomoses, the Secretion of the Urine, &c. Why then would it be criminal in her to finish her Course of Anatomy, and to acquaint herself minutely with the Structure both of the Internal and external Parts, designed for the Procreation of Children? The Crime cannot consist in the bare Knowledge of these things; it must consist then in the impure Thoughts which might accompany, precede, and follow such a Study: But I suppose, in the present Case, the Person to be as calm, as if she was studying the Anatomy of the Ear. This is the point, on which the Argument must turn. I do not set up here for a Casuist, but leave the Question to be decided by those, to whom it properly belongs; and shall only remark, that, for the greater Security of their Virtue, it is better, that Persons, who are not of a Profession, which obliges them to know these things, and chiefly those, who have made a Vow of Chastity, should never have such a Curiosity, or ever satisfy it: So that Father Adam could not have owned the Fact, without acknowledging that he had committed a Fault. The most charitable Construction is, that his Pupil had a mind to apply this Maxim: Amare licet, si potiri non licet. Dum caremus veris, gaudia falsa iuvent. — We may love, tho' we can't enjoy; and, whilst we are deprived of real Pleasures, let us divert our selves with imaginary ones.

[L] He was not the first, who spoke disrespectfully of St Austin.] Mr Sarrau in a Letter to Mr de Saumaise in 1646, tells him that the Jesuits affirmed every day from the Pulpit, that St Austin was not a Rule of Faith, and that he had advanced many things indifferently, to clear himself from the Objections, which were made to him. Non est hic Pater regula fidei. Ut se expediret ab argumentis hæreticorum sui temporis multa liberius & inconsideratus dixit quibus non teneretur (24). Father Adam, four Days after his Sermon, confessed to a Person, who represented to him the Prejudice his Sermon might cause, That Gabriel à Porta, a Jesuit, said often, that it were to be wished that St Austin had never wrote concerning Grace (25). Some Divines had very freely declared, long before the Birth of Janfenius, that St Austin had pushed things too far, and that when he determined to oppose certain Errors, he receded so far from them, that he generally ran into the opposite Extrem: For Example, when he opposed the Error of the Pelagians, he seemed to incline too much towards that of the Manichees; and, in opposing the Manichees, he seemed to adopt the Heresy of Pelagius. An Irishman, whose Name is Paul Leonard, cites Generard, Cornelius Musfus, Bishop of Bitonto, Cajetanus, and Sixtus Sinenfis, for this (26). But Father Annat cites many others in the same Book; wherein he endeavours to prove that St Austin is not of Janfenius's Opinion (27). See what Father Norris answered to that great Cloud of Witnesses, produced against the great Bishop of Hippo. Some Protestants are not far from the same Thought, that St Austin over-strained things. I do not speak of the Philosophical Commentary (28), wherein Father Adam's Judgment is approved in some measure; nor of the Bibliothèque Universelle (29), wherein St Austin is represented just as Father Adam could have desired it: I speak of Mr Dailly, who not only involves St Austin in the general Accusation he raises against the Fathers, of seeming to fall down one Precipice, when they would shun another (30), but charges him likewise with having treated his Subjects too much after the fluctuating manner of the Academic Philosophers (31). A little Book was published some time ago, entitled, An important Advice to Mr Arnaud, on a Project of a new Bibliothèque of Janfenist Authors; which speaks of a third Party then forming, which was to be neither Janfenist, nor Molinist, and which would place St Austin between Heaven and Earth, neither too high, nor too low. Such a Medium would reconcile Animosities, if People would but be reasonable. Upon this Scheme, every one would be at liberty to be Janfenist or Molinist, as he pleased. Ought it not to suffice the Jesuits that St Austin is not a Rule of Faith? Or do they require more in the Books, out of which the Deputies of the Janfenists extracted above an hundred Propositions levelled against the Authority of this Father? (32)

[M] To persuade, that St Paul often carried his Subject farther than it would bear.] There is a Passage of Father Cassini in the Censure of Father Adam's Sermon (33) where St Paul and St Austin are compared to "two great Seas, which pour so violently over one Shore, by the impetuosity of the Wind, that they seem as if they would leave the other dry for a while; but as the Ocean after having spread itself largely on one side, returns within the Bounds prescribed to it by God; so these, after having launch'd out against the rebellious Spirits, which rise against the Truth, return to a peaceable Equality, to edify the House of God." This is that Wheel which takes more Turns than it is commanded, to which we have seen that Minister compare the prophetic Spirit (34). St Paul and St Austin overflow their Banks sometimes, but, like the Tide, they return afterwards to the Bounds which God has set them. A fine way of answering all the Passages of St Paul which displease! It is but saying he had then overflowed all the Country, and that his Return must be expected into the Channel, which God had allotted him. Sir Edwin Sandis informs me of a thing, which is too much to the Purpose to be omitted here. He says (35), I have it from very good Hands, that in Italy they have such a lively Jealousy against some Parts of the Scripture, and chiefly against the Epistles of St Paul, that not long ago some Jesuits, exalting St Peter as an excellent Man, in their public Sermons, and among their Favourers in private Conversation, censured St Paul as a Person of a petulant and hot Brain, who in most of his Disputes had suffered himself to be carried away so immoderately by the Sallies of his Zeal, and the Arrogancy of his Spirit, that no great account was to be made of his Assertions; and that the reading of him is very dangerous, securing of Heresy in divers Places; and perhaps it had been better that he had never writ. In conformity to which I have heard Roman Catholics say many times, that they have already often consulted among themselves about censuring and reforming St Paul's Epistles. Though, to speak my Sentiments, I cannot give credit to it; the

(22) Ibid.

(23) Jarrige, Answer to James Beauséant, cap. 14.

A Doubt proposed to the Casuists on an Anatomical Curiosity.

(26) Paul Leonard's Answer to the Expositione contra Scientiam mediam, pag. 117, 118.

(27) Annati Augustinus vindicatus à Bajaniis.

(28) Part 3. pag. 4. See also the Supplement, p. 2.

(29) Tom. 14. pag. 287.

(30) Dailly of the Use of the Fathers, pag. 153.

(31) Ibid. pag. 393.

(32) In 1633. See the Historical Memorial concerning the five Propositions, p. 82.

(33) Pag. 17.

* In his Holy Court, Tom. 3. Maxim 6. of Predestination.

(34) Above, towards the end of the Remark [E].

(35) Account of Religion, chap. 26. pag. 215.

(24) See Sarrau's Letter, pag. 196.

(25) Defence of St Austin against Father Adam, pag. 24.

Undertaking in itself being so blasphemous and abominable, and the Scandal so desperate in these Times. But, however, it is certain, that they esteem St Paul below all the sacred Writers: And I can affirm from my own Knowledge and Hearing, that some of them teach in their Pulpits, that that holy Apostle had no other Affurance of his Doctrine, than the Conferences he had with St Peter; and that he durst not publish his Epistles before St Peter had approved them. Behold the Absurdity of these Men! If the Epistles of St Paul were approv'd by St Peter, they are as authentic as can be desired.

(a) Under the Word ADAM, he says look for MELCHIOR ADAM; but when we turn to Melchior, we meet with nothing about him.

(b) This I wrote in June 1698.

(c) Melch. Adam in Epist. Dedicat. German. Theol.

(d) Joach. Bergerus. See the Epistle Dedic. of his German Philosophers.

(e) Henn. Witte, Divinum Biogr.

(f) See König, Bibl. Vet. & Nov. pag. 8. who refers to Henningus Witte, Præfat. Memor. Theologor. pag. 17, 18.

(g) Morhofius Polyhist. pag. 392, 399.

ADAM (MELCHIOR) liv'd in the XVIIth Century. The indefatigable Care he took to collect, frame, and publish the Lives of a great number of learned Persons, deserves, that somebody should do him the like Office; and yet I think no body has yet done it. Mr Moreri undertook to record him, but he forgot his Promise when the Time of performing it presented itself (a). The Promise and the Non-performance have subsisted hitherto in all the Editions of his Dictionary (b). One would think it difficult to forget a Writer, to whom we are oblig'd for so many Articles. As for me, who find my self very much indebted to his Labours, I would testify my Gratitude to him by giving the Particulars of his Life at large, but I can no where find the necessary Materials for it. All that I have met with is as follows: MELCHIOR ADAM was born in the Territory of Grotkau in Silesia, and perform'd his Studies in the College of Brieg, where the Dukes of that Name took great Care to encourage Literature, and chiefly the Reform'd Religion (c), I mean that, which a Roman-Catholic would call Calvinism. The young Man learn'd to be a good Protestant in that School. To continue his Studies, he had his Share in the Bounty, which a great Lord (d) bestow'd for the Maintenance of a certain number of Scholars. He became Rector of a College at Heidelberg (e), and it was in that City that he publish'd the first Volume of his Illustrious Men in the Year 1615. The first Volume, which contain'd the Philosophers, and, under that Name, the Poets, the Humanists, the Historians, &c. was follow'd by three others: That, which contain'd the Divines, was printed in the Year 1619. That of the Civilians follow'd it; and lastly, That of the Physicians. These two last were printed in 1620. All the Learned, whose Lives we see in these Four Volumes in 8vo. liv'd in the XVIth. Century, or in the beginning of the XVIIth. and are Germans or Dutchmen; but there is a Series of twenty Divines of other Countries, whose Lives our Author publish'd separately in the Year 1618. All his Divines are Protestants. Although he compos'd but few Lives, yet he bestow'd much time on that Work, and took great pains with it, because he abridg'd the Writings, which furnish'd him with the Materials; whether they were Lives properly so call'd, or Funeral Orations, Programmas, Elogies, Prefaces, or Family Memoirs. I say nothing of the Summaries, which he plac'd in very great numbers in the Margin. He omitted some Persons, who were no less considerable, than many of those he has taken notice of [A]. The Lutherans are not pleas'd with him (f): they find him too partial, and will not allow his Collection to serve as a Rule to judge of the German Literati by (g). He died in the Year 1622. He compos'd other Works [B]. Consult Mr Baillet, in the 177th and 178th pages of the 2d Tome of his Judgment of the Learned.

[A] He omitted some Persons, who were no less considerable, than many of those he has taken notice of.] He acknowledges this himself; but he declares that there was no Affectation in it, and that a want of Memoirs was the only Cause of it. He propos'd to himself to supply this Defect in some other Volumes. These are his Words; "Quædam mihi monendus aut rogandus es, mi lector. Primum ne præteritis aut omisissis non paucos queraris, haud indignos, qui hoc in theatro apparent. In eo mea, mi lector, culpa nulla est: sed penuria fecit historię: quam nancisci nullam uspiam potui. Malui itaque prorsus tacere de multis præstantibus viris; quàm, ut ille de Carthagine, pauca dicere, & trita illa Natus est; obiit; scribere. Suppleri tamen poterit hic defectus, volente Deo, & mutuas operas tradentibus bonis patriæque amantibus; si hujus Voluminis tomus secundus fuerit adornatus. Quod idem dictum volo, de reliquis fuit Jurisconsultorum & Politicorum, Medicorum, ac Philosophorum (1). — I have some things, Reader, to inform you of, and some things to request of you. First, that you would not complain of the Omission of many Persons, not unworthy to appear upon this Stage. The Fault, Reader,

"is not my own, but is owing to the want of Materials, which I could by no means procure. I chose therefore to say nothing of many excellent Persons, rather, than like him of Carthage, to say but little, and to write down the thread-bare Account. He was born & he died. However, this Defect may be supplied, God willing, and by the Assistance of good Men, and Lovers of their Country: when the second Tome of this Work shall be prepared. Which Notice I desire may be understood to regard the other Lives of Civilians, Politicians, Physicians, and Philosophers."

[B] He compos'd other Works.] To wit, Apographum monumentorum Heidelbergensium. Notæ in Oratorem Julii Cæsaris Scaligeri pro M. T. Cicerone contra Ciceronianum Erasmus. Parodia & Metaphrasæ Horatianæ (2). It is not true, as is asserted in the Catalogue of Oxford, that he was the Author of an Historia Ecclesiastica Ecclesiæ Hamburgensis & Bremensis. It is the Work of a Canon of Bremen, whose Name is Adam, who lived in the XIth Century. Conringius and Puffendorf, who placed him in the Xth, are mistaken. See Müllerus, at the 65th Page of the first part of the Jagege ad Historiam Chersones Cimbricæ.

(2) Ex Dianæus Blog. Henn. Witte

(1) Melch. Adam. Præfat. Theol. Germanor.

(a) St Austin gives them the Name of Adamians, after St Epiphanius, who calls them Adamians.

(1) Theodoret. Hist. Fab. lib. 1.

(2) Baron. ad Ann. 175. num. 33.

ADAM, a Joyner of Nevers, and a French Poet. Look for BILLAUT.

ADAMITES (a), a ridiculous Sect, which, according to some Authors, was a Branch of the Carpocratians and Valentinians (b). Theodoret assigns one Prodicus as it's Founder [A]. St Epiphanius pretends, that they deriv'd their Name of Adamites

(b) See Dancus upon August. de Heres. cap. 31.

[A] Theodoret assigns one Prodicus as it's Founder (1). Barnabas places him in the Year 120, and makes him more antient than Valentinus; which induces him in another place (2) to censure those, who reckon him among the Disciples of Valentinus. If this be true, Lambertus Daneus, whom I have cited, deserves no Credit: I shall speak of this Prodicus in a separate Article.

subsisting. Evagrius makes mention of some Monks of Palestine, who, thro' an excess of Devotion, and to mortify their Bodies, went, Men as well as Women, into solitary Places, quite naked, excepting those Parts, which Modesty forbids to name; where they expos'd themselves in a very strange manner [E] to the Extremities both of Heat and Cold (g). We shall speak of the Modern ADAMITES, under the Article PICARDS. I find, that both Catholics and Protestants reproach each other [F] with having Adamites among them: but perhaps neither Party has more reason than the other for this Charge. If I had no other Authority, than that of Lindanus (b), I shou'd scarce believe, that, in the year 1535, Adamites were seen in Amsterdam, among the richest and most noble Families, who ran about stark naked; some of whom were fanatical enough to climb up on Trees, where they waited in vain for Bread to fall from Heaven to them, till they fell themselves half dead to the ground. I shall quote an Author (i) in another place (k) who attests part of these Facts.

(g) Evagr.
Hist. Eccl.
lib. 1. c. 21.
21.

(b) Lindan.
Dubitantii
Dial. 2.
pag. 171.

(f) Lambert.
Hortens. in Hist. Tumult. Anabaptist.

(k) In the Remarks of the Article
PICARDS.

[E] In a very strange manner.] They outdid the other Monks, whom the same Evagrius mentions; who, having no Garment of their own, (since the same, which one Monk wore one Day, served another the next Day) had, at least, the use of some Garment (14). The Solitaries, of whom I speak, were satisfied with wearing only a Girdle, and as for the rest, they renounc'd Humanity as much as they could; they would not eat of the Food which serv'd other Men; but fed like Beasts, and eat but just as much as would keep them alive: At last they became like Beasts; their Figure alter'd, and their Sentiments also. When they saw other Persons, they ran away, and if they found themselves pursued, they fled, as far as they could, to some inaccessible Hole. Some of them appeared in public again, and pretended to be Fools, to shew the greater contempt of Glory. They went to eat in public Houses; they entered into the public Baths; they convers'd, and wash'd, with the other Sex; but with so much Insensibility, that neither the Sight, nor Touch, nor even the embraces of a Woman, caus'd any Emotion in them. They were Men with the Men, and Women with the Women; they would be of both Sexes. Μετὰ ἀνδρῶν καὶ θύρας σῶναι, μετὰ γυναικῶν τε αὐ γυναικας, ἑκατέρως τε μετρίσθαι ἰδίαις ὄρεσιν, καὶ μὴ μᾶλλον σῶναι (15) — Cum viri quidem viri sunt, feminae vero cum feminis; non enim unus, sed utriusque simul sexus, esse cupiunt. It is likely they had not much trouble in counterfeiting the Fool, and that they were so in reality; we may, at least, apply to them what Rutilius Numatianus said, though unjustly, of all kinds of Solitaries:

(14) Evagr.
Hist. Eccl.
lib. 1. c. 21.

(15) Ibid.

Quænam perversi rabies tam stulta cerebri
Dum mala formides, nec bona posse pati (16) ?

(16) Rutil.
Itiner. lib.
1. ver. 445.

What Madnes 'tis, whilst Evil you avoid,
To fly the Good, and leave it unenjoy'd ?

Lastly, Their Nakedness was very contrary to the Principles of those Religious, of whom I shall speak in the following Remark, neither would it agree well with the Doctrine of Father Sanchez.

[F] Reproach each other.] Mr Moreri assures us, that there are Adamites in England, who bold their Assemblies by Night, and teach only these Words, Swear, Forswear, and do not discover the Secret. It was proper to inform him, in the Edition of Amsterdam, that there were no such People in England, that the Civil Government there is too good to suffer an Infamy of that nature, which could not be concealed, and that it is likewise very improbable, that there are any in Poland; for he had said, that there are still remaining some of these mistaken People in that Country. He could not defend himself, by saying that he does not pretend, that these People shew themselves naked in public, but only that they undress themselves in their Nocturnal Meetings, which the best Government may be ignorant of; I say, he could not alledge this in his Justification, since he just before mentioned the Adamites of Bohemia, who went always naked, as is pretended. So that, if Mr Moreri understood what he said, he must assert, that there are yet People in England, both Men and Women, who go always naked, out of a Principle of Religion. Now this is what the Government would not suffer, and cannot be ignorant of. Behold here a Catholic who maintains, that there are Adamites in Protestant Countries. I say nothing of those idle and ridiculous Stories concerning Holland, which are to be seen in the Sorberiana, pag. 17. Let us produce, on the other side, a Minister who says there are Monks in Italy call'd Adamites, who go naked, in consequence of the Vow they make, and in compliance with the most sacred Rules of their Order. "Ac ne nunc quidem, sicut be (17), nomen ejus (hæresis Adamianorum) extaret, nisi Monachi quidam, qui se falso pietatis & vitæ austeritatis prætextu commendant, horum hæreticorum impudentes proflus mores retinuisent, & inter sanctissima ordinis & regulæ suæ præcepta posuissent, quales ii qui etiam nunc hodie Adamitæ dicuntur, vigentque plurimum in Italia — Vivunt, enim nudi, non necessitate quidem adaacti vel inopia vestimentorum, sed ex voti professione. — The very Name of this Heresy (of the Adamites) would be extinct, did not certain Monks, who recommend themselves under the false Pretence of Piety and Austerity of Life, retain the very impudent Manners of these Heretics, and place them among the most sacred Precepts of their Order and Institution; such as are those, who even at this time are called Adamites, and flourish chiefly in Italy. — For they live naked, not compelled by Necessity, or for want of Garments, but in compliance with their Vow."

I wish he had been more eager to prove this Fact, than to make a Comparison between the Conduct of these People, and that of the ancient Monks, who never saw themselves naked (18), and who said, that a Man of their Profession could not contemplate his own Nudity, without behaving unworthy of himself (19). A modern Casuist, who is none of the most rigid (20), counts it nevertheless a venial Sin, propria verenda aspiciere ex quadam curiositate absque alia mala intentione; and a mortal Sin, aspiciere verenda alterius sexus, aperta vestibus ita subtilibus, ut parum aspectui obfist (21). To see a Person, of a different Sex, swim naked, is, according to him, a mortal Sin. Two Men of a grave Character, as two Bishops, who should look upon each other naked, commit, says he (22), a mortal Sin. De Bernia tells us of a Man, who never handled his Pudenda without his Gloves (23). Why might not a Casuist require, that a Man should abstain from touching them naked, as well as from contemplating them naked? An ancient Philosopher, thro' an Affectation of Chastity, never touched them with, or without a Glove; he receeded in that respect very far from the Principle of Anacharsis (24). This ancient Philosopher was the severe Xenocrates. Aristoteles, irridens Chalcædonium Xenocratem, quod mejendo virilibus non admooveret manum, inquit, "puræ quidem manus at inquinata mens (25)."

We shall prove in the Remark [N] of the Article HADRIAN VI, that la Motte, le Vayer ought not to have taken the Passage of Bernia in a literal Sense.

(17) Lamb.
Danzon in Aug. Her.
cap. 31.

(18) Apud
Socrat. Hist.
Eccl. lib. 4.
cap. 23. &
Sozomen.
lib. 1. c. 13.

(19) See in the Historia Indiana of Belthazar Bonifacius,
pag. 181.
Sæpe St. Jerome maintain'd, that a Virgin ought to kiss at seeing herself naked;
and I see Examples of this guar'd by Theodoret.

(20) Sanchez de Ma-
rimon. lib.
9. Disputat.
46. n. 27;
28.

(21) Ibid.
n. 25, 26.

(22) Ib. n.
27, 28.

(23) Apud
la Motte
le Vayer, Heram.
Rust. pag.
79.

(24) See
Plutarch de Garrulitate,
pag. 505, &
Clemens
Alexand.
lib. 5.
Stromat.
pag. 568.

(25) Athen.
lib. 12. p.
530.

(a) See the Article MYRRHA.

(b) Ovid. Metam. lib. 10. v. 337.

(c) Hygin. cap. 164.

ADONIS, Minion of the Goddess Venus, was the Son of Cinyras King of Cyprus [A]. The Poets have pretended, that Myrrha (a), that King's Daughter (b), became so desperately in Love with her Father, that she caus'd her self to be introduc'd into his Bed, without his knowing who she was. Some say she made use of the Artifice of Lot's Daughters (c). Adonis was the Fruit of this Incest. He was perfectly beautiful, and appeared so lovely in the Eyes of Venus, that she stole him away [B], and devoted herself wholly to his Company. Heaven itself seem'd an unpleasant abode to her in Comparison of the Hills and Woods, where she follow'd Adonis, who was a great Hunter [C]. Judge whether the Poets did not exert all the Figures of their Art (d), to represent the inexpressible Grief, which seized the Heart of that Goddess, when a wild Boar had kill'd her dear Adonis [D]. Never was a Mourning

(d) Ovid. Metam. lib. 10. Bion. (136AA. a- See also Theocritus, 1136AA. ad. and among the Moderns Mr Menage in his Greek Poems, pag. 167.

(1) See Meursius of the Island of Cyprus, lib. 2. cap. 9.

(2) Apollod. lib. 3. pag. 238.

(3) Metam. lib. 10. ver. 480, & 513.

[A] The Son of Cinyras King of Cyprus. Almost all Authors agree that Cinyras reigned in that Island (1), though some have said, that he first reigned in Affyria (2). See the Article BYBLUS. Ovid makes him to be born in the Island of Cyprus; but he says, That Myrrha, flying from her Father who would have killed her, after he had discovered her Incest, travelled through Arabia, and was delivered of Adonis, in the Country of the Sabei (3). He would have done well to have remarked in few Words, that Cinyras had past from the Island of Cyprus to Arabia, or that Myrrha had embarked in that Island. When Adonis was born, his Mother had been already metamorphos'd into the Tree, from whence Myrrh distills. We understand from Ptolemy, the Son of Hephestion, That Venus, seeking Adonis, of whose Death she had heard, found him at Argos, a City of Cyprus, in the Temple of Erebian Apollo. Whence some have affirmed, that he was killed in that Island. Propertius is of this Number, when he says in the thirteenth Elegy of the second Book,

Tellis, qui niveum quondam percussit Adonim
Venantem Idalio vertice, durus aper.

Witness the cruel Boar, fated to kill Adonis, hunting on th' Italian Hill.

There was a Temple of Adonis and Venus at Amathus in the Island of Cyprus (4). Strabo says, that Byblus was the Residence of King Cinyras, and that there were some Temples of Adonis to be seen there (5). Note, That Antoninus Liberalis relates, that Myrrha, whom he calls Smyrna, was born on Mount Libanus, and that her Father's Name was Theias (6). Phnyasis plainly gave him the same Name, and not that of Thoas, as we read at present in Apollodorus (7). We read the same likewise in Probus, on the tenth Eclogue of Virgil, with this additional Circumstance, that the said Thoas was King of Syria and Arabia: Probus borrowed this from Antimachus.

[B] She stole him away. This Fact was but little remarked by the ancient Writers: I wonder at it; for it was universally known. The Painters made it the Subject of their Pictures, as they did the Rape of Ganymede. This Plautus informs us of.

ME. Dic mihi; numquã vidiſti tabulam pictam in pariete,
Ubi aquila catamitum raperet, aut ubi Venus Adoneum?

(8) Plaut. in Menæchmis Act. 1. Sc. 2. v. 34.

ME. Tell me; did you never see a Picture on a Wall, where the Eagle carries away the Catamite, or Venus Adonis?
PE. Often.

[C] An unpleasant Abode to her in comparison of the Woods, where she followed Adonis, who was a great Hunter. Read this Passage of Ovid:

Abſinet & cœlo: cœlo præſertur Adonis:
Hunc tenet: huic comes eſt: aſſuetaque ſemper in umbra
Indulgere ſibi, formamque augere colendo,
Per juga, per ſilvas dumoſaque ſaxa vagatur (9).

(9) Ovid. Metam. lib. 10. ver. 532.

Ev'n Heav'n itſelf with all it's Sweets unſought,
Adonis far a ſweeter Heav'n is thought.
On him ſhe bangs, and ſonds with every Art;
And never, never knows from him to part.

VOL. I.

She, whoſe ſoft Limbs had only been diſplay'd
On roſe Beds beneath the Myrtle Shade,
Whoſe pleaſing Care was to improve each Grace,
And add more Charms to an unrivall'd Face,
Now, buſkin'd, like the Virgin Huntreſs, goes Thro' Woods, and pathleſs Wilds, and Mountain Snows. EUSDEN.

Virgil represents Adonis under another Idea than that of a Hunter,

Nec te peniteat pecoris, divine poeta,
Et formoſus oves ad flumina pavit Adonis (10).

(10) Virgil. Ecl. 10. ver. 18.

The Sheep ſurround their Shepheard, as he lies:
Bluſh not, ſweet Poet, nor the Name deſpiſe:
Along the Streams his Flock Adonis fed,
And yet the Queen of Beauty bleſt his Bed.

DRYDEN.

Few Authors, I think, have represented this Favourite of Venus under the Character of a Shepherd. Servius, upon this Paſſage, relates ſome Particulars no leſs different from the common Tradition, than This. Some have ſaid, that he was inſpired by the Muſes with this Inclination for Hunting (11). It ſeems they bore a Grudge to Venus, for cauſing ſome of them to fall in Love with Mortals. To be revenged of her, they ſung ſeveral Airs before Adonis, which gave him a violent Paſſion for Hunting. Perhaps he became odious to Diana upon this Account: for two of a Trade ſeldom agree. Whence ſome have ſaid, that Diana's Anger was the Occaſion of a wild Boar's killing this Boy (12).

(11) Teetates on Lycophon.

[D] When a wild Boar had killed her dear Adonis. Theocritus ſeigns, that Venus, having cauſed the wild Boar to be brought before her, chid him roughly; but that he alledged in his Excuse the violent Paſſion, which had ſeized him at the Sight of ſo fine a Thigh: that he was eager to kiſs it; but did it in too paſſionate a manner; that he was ſo diſpleaſed with himſelf for what he had done, that he thought his Tuſks deſerved to be cut off, and that he burnt them himſelf (13). Thus a learned and polite Writer (14) explained the laſt Verſe of that Idyll of Theocritus. The Editions have it ἵνα τὴν ἰπῶρα, exuſſit amores; but he believes it ſhould be read ὀδύρας, dentes, inſtead of ἰπῶρα. This cruel Kiſs puts me in mind of a Thought of the Chevalier Marini: He introduces the God Pan, who boalts that the Spots which are ſeen in the Moon, are Impreſſions of the Kiſſes he gave it. Surely he attacked her very forcibly. What Careleſs! by adding a little more to them, they would be like thoſe of Apes, who, it is ſaid, ſmother their young ones ſometimes with embracing them. What would Horace have ſaid to this, ſince upon a much ſlighter Occaſion, he expreſſes himſelf thus,

(12) Apollod. lib. 3. pag. 238.

(13) Theocritus 1136AA. 31, or 30. according to other Editions.

(14) Mr de Longe-Pierre: See his Tranſlation of Bion, pag. 47. Edit. of Paris 1686.

ſive puer furens
Impreſſit memorem dente labris notam.
Non ſi me ſatis audias
Speres perpetuum dulcia barbæ
Lædentem oſcula, quæ Venus
Quinta parte ſui neſtaris imbuſit (15).

Or, when the ruſſing amorous Youth
Hath preſſ'd thy Lips with eager Toſſ,
And left a Mark behind:

(15) Horat. Od. 13. lib. 1.

(k) Scholiast. Theocrit. in Syracul. fide Etyl. 15.

(l) Selden. de Dis Syris. lib. 2. cap. 11. pag. 250. and the Remark [I].

(m) See the Remark [G].

(n) Scholiast. Theocrit. Etyl. 15.

(o) Macrobi. Saturnal. lib. 1. cap. 21.

(p) See the title of Volume of the Bibliotheca Universelle, pag. 7. Berkeleyus in Stephani's Byssant. in the Word Ἀμύθος.

assures us, that Adonis was beloved by Jupiter (k); and that Proserpine fell in Love with him in Hell [G]. Yet she had some Compassion for her disconsolate Rival, who earnestly desir'd the Restitution of her Lover (l): She consented to his Absence for six Months, in favour of Venus. It was reported, then, that Adonis pass'd six Months with Venus, and six Months with Proserpine. The Scholiast, whom I have cited, contradicts himself hereupon [H]; and some do not speak so advantageously of Proserpine's Complaisance (m). This division of the Year has been allegoris'd; as if we were to understand by it either the successive Stages of the Seed, which at first lies under ground, and afterwards rises above the Surface of the Earth (n), or the Period of the Sun's alternate Revolution thro' the Southern and Northern Signs of the Zodiac (o). These Explications seem not so solid to me, as the Sentiment of those, who reduce the Fable of Adonis to the History of Osiris (p). The Ancients do not agree about the Country, where the Scene of Adonis was laid; some placing it in Syria, others in the Island of Cyprus, or in Egypt, as will appear in the Remarks. Two things are related of Hercules, very opposite to each other, in relation to our Adonis; one is, that he was in love with him, and that Jealously made Venus direct the Centaur Nessus how he might lay an Ambush for Hercules (q): The other, That this Hero, seeing many People come out of a Temple, in a City of Macedonia, had a mind to enter and perform his Devotions there; but, hearing that Adonis was the Divinity of the Place, he ridicul'd the Worship paid to him (r). Some report, that Adonis was born of Jupiter, without the concurrence of a Woman (s). St Jerome believ'd, that the Prophet Ezekiel spoke of the Festival of Adonis [I]. Lastly, It is difficult

(g) Prol. Heplid. apud Photium, pag. 473.

(r) Scholiast. Theocrit. ad ver. 21. Etyl. 6. See also Zennobius & Apollonius in Proverbiis.

(s) Val. Probus in Ecl. 10. Virgil. ex Philo. Stephano.

Ἦ Κινύρα βασιλεὺς Κυπρίων ἀνδρῶν δαυπρώτων,
Παῖς σοι κάλλιπος μὴν ἔγω θαυμαστότατος τε
Πόντων ἀνθρώπων, δῖο δ' αὐτὸν δαίμων ἔχων
Ἦ μὴν ἱλαυνομένη λαθρίως ἱερταῖς, ὃ δ' ἱλαύνων.

A Son, O Cinyra, is given to thee,
Who fairest of the Human Race shall be:
Two Deities his Favours shall contest;
One he shall press, by other shall be press'd.

Albenus adds, that Venus and Bacchus are meant in these Lines; for both of them were in love with Adonis. Plato, the Comic Poet, had reported this Oracle (27). He is not the only Poet, who has taken notice of this Amour of Bacchus. We find two Verses in Plutarch, which tells us, that Bacchus, having seen the Fair Adonis, in the Island of Cyprus, fell in love with him, and carried him away (28). What Plutarch adds, is curious, and may serve upon occasion for a Lesson to those, who give us so many Oriental Genealogies of the Pagan Religion, and Mythology. One of the Personages of Plutarch's Dialogue maintains very seriously and gravely, That Adonis and Bacchus are the same Divinity, and that the Jews abstained from Swine's Flesh because Adonis was killed by a wild Boar. Now he pretends, that their Religion, their Feasts, their Ceremonies were much the same with those practis'd in Greece to Bacchus; and he says likewise, that their Levites were so called from Ἀδώνης, Ἐως, Lyfius, Evius, two Names of that Deity. Aufonius declares, that Bacchus, Osiris, Adonis, &c. were one and the same God (29). Macrobius goes yet farther (30).

[G] Proserpine fell in love with him in Hell. If we may believe Apollodorus (31), she did not stay so long before she fell in love with him; she was enamoured of him in his very Cradle. Venus, being charmed with the Beauty of this Child, put him in a strong Box, and shewed him only to Proserpine; who protested that she would keep him. Jupiter was obliged to decide the Quarrel; and this was his Sentence: That Adonis should be at his Liberty the first four Months of the Year, and that he should stay the next four with Proserpine, and the last four with Venus. It had been better to have placed Adonis's Portion in the middle of the Year; and perhaps it was so before the Abbreviators or Copiers of Apollodorus had put his Book into the Condition we now find it in. However it be, Adonis refused the Vacation which Jupiter allotted him, and renounced it in favour of Venus; for he presented her with his own four Months. Others say (32), I. That the Mule Calliope being charged with the Decision of the Dispute by Jupiter, ordained that Adonis should belong six Months to Venus, and six Months to Proserpine. II. That Venus, angry that she was not allowed to engross his whole Time, inspired all the Women of Thrace with so violent a Passion for Orpheus, the Son of Calliope, that each endeavouring to take him from the other, tore him in Pieces. One of the Complaints, which Venus makes of her Son, in the Dialogues of Lucian, is, That he sends her sometimes to Mount Ida in search of Archifis, and sometimes to Mount Libanus for the fair Asprian, half of whom he had robbed her of, by the Care he had taken to make Proserpine in love with him (33). Arnobius (34), and Clemens Alexandrinus (35), mention this Goddess's Passion for Adonis; and it is without Reason that Sylburgius would place in the Greek Father Ἀἰδωνά instead of Ἀδωνά; for if we should read Ἀἰδωνά we should make Clemens Alexandrinus affirm a Falshood, to wit, that Proserpine's Love for Adonis was an Adultery. Meziriac is the Author of this last Remark. See the 403d Page of his Commentary on Ovid's Epistles. Calliope's Judgment puts me in Mind of these two Verses:

Et vitula tu dignus & hic, & quisquis amoris
Aut metuet dulces, aut experietur amarus (36).

So nice a Difference in your singing lies,
That both have won, or both deserve the Prize.
Rest equal happy both, and all who prove
The bitter Sweets and pleasing Pains of Love.

DRYDEN.

[H] Contradicts himself hereupon. He tells us, on the one side, and with little Probability, That Adonis abode six Months with Proserpine, and six Months with Venus, without touching them, they having separate Beds. Ἀνεῖν τὰ συγκαθεύδον καὶ προσεμύκειν (37); and, on the other side, that he pass'd six Months in the Arms of Venus, and as many in the Arms of Proserpine. Ἐξ ὧν αὖτε ἐκείνην ἐν ταῖς ἐγκύλαις τῆς Ἀφροδίτης, ὅσων καὶ ἐν ταῖς ἐγκύλαις τῆς Περσεφόνης (38). Observe, that the like was related concerning the Agreement between Ceres and Pluto; namely, that Proserpine should remain six Months with Him, and that she should go and finish the Year with Ceres. The Ancients had not variety enough of Invention: they apply'd the unravelling of their Fables to too many Subjects. Besides, Egypt, Phœnicia, and the Island of Cyprus, which were the Scenes of Adonis, are not distant enough from the Sun, from the Month of September, to the Month of March, to induce one to say, That Adonis is then in the Grave, or in the Shades below: And I wonder what Mr Moreri meant by his six Months, in which the Days are so short, and the Nights so long. For in the Countries, which I speak of, the Difference of the longest and shortest Day of the Year, gives no room for this Expression. Many more things might be corrected in the Adonis of that Author.

[I] That the Prophet Ezekiel spoke of the Festival of Adonis. St Jerome thought that the Tammuz in these Words of Ezekiel, Then he brought me to the Door of the Gate of the Lord's House, which was towards the North, and behold there sat Women weeping for

(33) Lucian, Dial. Veeris & Lunæ.

(34) Arnob. lib. 4. pag. 145.

(35) Clemens Alexandr. in Protrep. pag. 21.

(36) Virgil. Ecl. 3. v. 99.

(37) Scholiast. Theocrit. ad v. 21. Etyl. 5.

(38) Id.

(27) In Adonide, apud Athen. lib. 10. cap. 22. pag. 456.

(28) Plut. Sympos. lib. 4. cap. 5.

(29) Aufon. Epigr. 30.

(30) Macrobi. Saturnal. lib. 1. cap. 13. & 21.

(31) Apollod. Bibl. lib. 3. pag. 240.

(32) Hygin. Astronom. lib. 2. cap. 7.

difficult to comprehend why the Ancients feign'd that Venus hid, or buried her Favourite under Lettuces [K], since they observ'd, that that Plant causes Impotency. Perhaps their Allegory may be explain'd, by supposing they meant, by it, that Venus had exhausted her Favourite, and pass'd him so often thro' the Alembic, that he was only fit to be compar'd to the Terra Damnata, and the Caput Mortuum of the Chymists: But they do not hint at any such Meaning. They do not all agree, that he died of his Wound [L]. There was a River near Byblus call'd Adonis, which descended from Mount Libanus; it became red once a Year, because the Winds drove a large quantity of Duft into it of the Colour of Vermillion. They thought this a proper time to lament Adonis; it being the season, when they suppos'd he was wounded on Mount Libanus, and his Blood ran down into the River (1).

(1) Lucian.
de Dea Syria.

(30) Ezech.
viii. 14.

for Tammuz (39), is Adonis. He did not forget to remark the two Faces, under which this Festival appeared: First of all they bewail'd Adonis as dead; and afterwards they sung, and celebrated him as restored to Life. Plangitur à mulieribus quasi mortuus, et postea reviviscens canitur atque laudatur (40). St Cyril relates several Particulars of this Feast: He says, That it was still celebrated in Alexandria (41); and, when he explains these Words, Woe to the Land — that sends Ambassadors by the Sea, even in Vessels of Butyrus upon the Waters (42); he will have it to be understood of the Letters, which were sent to make known the Arrival of Adonis.

(4-) Hieron.
Comment in Ezech. lib.
3.

(41) Cyril.
in Ezech.
lib. 2.

(43) Isaiah xviii. 1, 2.

(45) Cyril.
ubi supra.

“ They took, says he (43), an earthen Vessel, and writing a Letter to the Women of Byblus, as if Adonis were really found again, and putting it into the Vessel, they seal'd it up, and cast it into the Sea, after having used some Ceremonies. “ This Vessel, as they asserted, came of itself to Byblus, on certain Days of the Year, and certain Women, favour'd by Venus, having received it there, “ ceased from weeping, after having open'd the Letter; as if Venus had found her Adonis again.” Lucian says, That he saw the Past-board Head at Byblus, which the Egyptians sent thither every Year, without any other Ceremony, than casting it into the Sea. The Winds carry'd it directly to Byblus, in seven Days, which was the usual time spent in going from Egypt to that City. Procopius Gazæus relates this as well as St Cyril (44). According to the latter, the Greeks believed, that Venus descended into Hell to recover Adonis; and, it being known, said they, at her return, that she had found him (45), it was proper that the mournful Beginnings of the Feast should terminate in great Rejoicings.

(44) Procop.
Gaz. Comment in Isaiah xviii.

(45) Ἀναστάσις δὲ
τῆς Ἀδὸν καὶ
μὴν καὶ ἡρησθαι Ἀ-γάθης τὸν ζητῶμενον συνήσθαι καὶ ἀνακιστῶν.
Cyrill. ubi
supra.

(46) Apud
Athenæum,
lib. 2. cap.
23. pag. 69.

(4-) Apud
Athen. ibid.

[K] Under Lettuces. It is Callimachus who tells us, That Venus hid Adonis under Lettuces (46). According to Cratinus she did the same by Phaon, of whom she was greatly enamour'd. What had Athenæus done with his Wits, when he advanc'd, that the Poets intended to signify by this Allegory, that Lettuces cause a kind of Impotency in those, who commonly eat of them? Would Venus have made choice of them to cover her Favourites with, had they had such an Efficacy? Would she not have abhorrd the very Name and Sight of them? Would she not have fear'd, that the very touch of them would have been attended with ill Consequences? Observe a Difference between Callimachus and Eubulus; the latter said, That, when Adonis was dead, Venus buried him under Lettuces; from whence he infers, that That Plant is of no use but for the Dead (47). The Original of all these Stories might very well proceed from the Report, That Adonis, having eaten of a certain Lettuce, which grew in the Island of Cyprus, was kill'd by a wild Boar. They, who consider in what part the Boar wounded him, will easily find the unravelling of all this. Adonis was become impotent, from having eaten too many of those Lettuces: This is the Reason why it is feign'd, That afterwards he receiv'd a mortal Wound in the Groin. So that the Word καταφυγὼν ought not to be substituted in the room of καταφύγων (48); and it is much more reasonable to think that Nicanor spoke of this Lettuce, as having been the Food of Adonis, than to think, that he spoke of it as of an Alyssum, which Adonis sought, to escape the Boar.

(48) In the Passage of Nicanor, reported by Athenæus,
ibid.

I must acquaint my Reader, that Mr de la Monnoie is not of this Opinion. He was pleas'd to communicate to me the following Remark upon this Subject. “ The καταφυγὼν of the Manuscripts is much to be prefer'd before the καταφύγων of the printed Copies. Nicanor, in the Place, which Athenæus cites, speaks of a kind of Lettuce, under which, he says, Adonis took Shelter, when the Boar kill'd him. This makes very good Sense; whereas there would be little Sense in saying, That Adonis had eat too much of that Lettuce, when the Boar kill'd him; the Expression would not be clear, nor coherent, and it would only be a confus'd Mixture of Allegory and Fable. Moreover it must be considered, that ῥιδαὶ being of the Feminine Gender, there should be ῥε or ῆν καταφύγων, because ῥ is then adverbially taken for quo. “ It is certain, that Casaubon prefer'd καταφύγων to καταφύγων (49). He confirm'd his Opinion by the Words, which are found in the same Page of Athenæus, ἐν καλαῖς ῥιδαῖσιναῖς ἀπορύφας (50), in pulchris lactucis abdidit: But he should have observed that Athenæus does not report them, till after having quoted a long Passage of a Poet, who said, That if any one eats of these Lettuces, he can do nothing with a Woman (51). Observe well, that this Poet's Words follow immediately upon what Nicanor said. Now it is a sign that Athenæus did not write ῥ καταφύγων, but ῆν, or ῥε καταφύγων. And it is a more evident sign of it, because we see, that That Author, having cited Callimachus, who said, That Venus hid Adonis under Lettuces, observes that it is an Allegory, designed to shew that those who commonly eat of that Herb, become weak and impotent with regard to Venus. Ἀλληγοῦνται τὸν ποιητὴν ἐπὶ δεξιᾷ αἰεὶ πρὸς ἀφορμὰς ἐν συνεχῶς χρόνῳ ῥιδαῖς. En quidem allegoria Poetis innuuntibus qui assidue lactuca vescuntur ad venerem esse invalidos. It is of no Importance, that Nicanor has confounded Allegory with Fable: The Poets are full of such Mixtures. Besides it is observable, that he misunderstood the Word he would explain. Ἐρῖθιν λέγουσιν Φοῖνι παρὰ Κυπρίους ῥιδαῖς (52). Lactucam à Cypritis dicit vocari Brentbin. He mistook a Fir-Tree for a Lettuce (53). This Mistake induced him to alter the Tradition; for he was sensible, that it would be ridiculous, to suppose, that Adonis hid himself under a Lettuce; and therefore he says, that he fed upon it.

(41) Casaub.
in Athen.
lib. 2. cap.
27. pag.
144.

(42) Casaub.
ibid. says,
καταφύ-γων: Which makes the same Sense.

(43) Am-plius in Salemo.

(42) Athenæ
ubi supra.

(43) See the Bibliothèque
Universelle,
Tom. 3. pag.
28.

(44) Pag.
31.

(45) Apud
Ptolemæum,
Pag. 472.

Κοκυτὸς μῦθος τὸν ἀφαικῶνα νύκην Ἀδωνί,

Cocyus only wash'd Adonis' Wounds;

was not understood. It signifies quite another thing, from what it is generally thought to imply; for it informs us, that one Cocyus, a Disciple of Chiron, had cur'd Adonis of his Wound, receiv'd by the wild Boar. The Ceremonies of the Festival, may convince us, that Adonis did not die of it. His Votaries mourn'd at first, as if he were really dead, and afterwards rejoic'd, as if he were return'd into the World again. “ It is obvious to conjecture, that this Fable “ was built upon some strong Expressions of the Egyptians, or the Phœnicians, who used to say, that “ They, who recover'd from a great Fit of Sickness, “ or escap'd any imminent Danger, were rais'd again “ out of the Grave. Many Examples of it are found “ in the Psalms (56).” Add to this, “ That it was the “ Custom of the Oriental Nations, to consecrate “ Golden Figures of the Parts of the Body, in which “ they had suffer'd any Inconvenience. We find an “ Instance of this in 1 Sam. vi. 4. Adonis having been “ wounded in the Groin, and being cur'd of his “ Wound, consecrated a Golden Phallus — They “ had a very great respect for that Figure in the My- “ series of Osiris (57).” We find here a Confirmation of the foregoing Remark; The Clouds vanish, and

(46) Bibliothèque Uni-verselle,
Tom. 5.
pag. 31.

(57) Ibid.
Pag. 33.

and the Day begins to appear. Venus thought she had lost for ever, not the Life, but the Sex of her Husband; whether it was that a wild Boar had actually injured him in That; or that Witchcraft, or some other Principle, unknown to us, had brought a fatal Mortification upon those Parts. Hinc illa lacrimæ; This was the Cause of her Tears. But the Wound, being heal'd, or the Charm remov'd, Venus was persuaded, that her Husband reviv'd again, and that he return'd to her from the lowest depths of Erebus; and this was the Occasion of her Joy: And, in order to preserve the Memory of all this more mysteriously, and more honourably, the Festival of Adonis was ordered to be celebrated every Year, in such and such a manner. It would be easy to adapt the Explications of Macrobius to this Hypothesis; his Sun descending to the inferior Parts of the Zodiac, and remounting afterwards to the superior Parts; his wild Boar, the Image of Cold, and consequently of those, who are included in the Canon-Law under the Title De frigidis & maleficiatis; his Venus despairing, because she was the Widow of her Sun; and afterwards rejoicing at the return of that beautiful Luminary, which rendered her fruitful. Every body sees, that it would not be difficult to make a proper use of the Agreement between Venus and Proserpine; I mean those Seeds concentrated in the Bosom of the Earth for some Months, out of which they spring afterwards for the Propagation of the Species.

ADRASTUS, King of Argos, the Son of Talaüs and Lyfianassa (a), the Daughter of Polybius, King of Sicyon, acquir'd a great Reputation in the Famous War of Thebes, wherein he engag'd to maintain the Rights of his Son-in-Law Polynices [A], who was excluded from the Crown of Thebes by his Brother Eteocles (b), notwithstanding the Agreement pass'd between them. Adrastus, being followed by Polynices, and Tydeus his other Son-in-Law, by Capaneus, and Hippomedon, his Sister's Sons, by Amphiaraus, his Brother-in-Law, and Paribenopeus (c), march'd against the City of Thebes; and this was the Expedition of the seven Wortbies, so much sung by the Poets: They all perish'd in it, except Adrastus, whom his Horse sav'd. It was a Horse of consequence, whose Name was Arion; we shall speak of him in his place. This first War was follow'd by some others; for Adrastus, not having been able to obtain the Bodies of the Argians, who were kill'd before Thebes, had recourse to the Abenians (d), who, under the Conduct of Thebeus, constrain'd the new King of Thebes (e) to comply with Adrastus's Request. This Satisfaction did not put an end to the War; for the Sons of those, who had succeeded to ill in the first Expedition, wag'd a second War, ten Years after, which was call'd the War of the Epigones [B], and ended with the taking and plundering of Thebes. None of the Chiefs perish'd in it (f), except Ægialus, the Son of Adrastus. It was a kind of Compensation, some times practis'd by Fortune (g). This Loss touched Adrastus so sensibly, being moreover weakened by old Age, that he died with Grief [C] at Megara (b), as he was leading the victorious Army back, which had taken the City of Thebes. It is a Proof, that he was personally present in the second Expedition [D], which, nevertheless, but few Writers have taken notice of. Those of Megara greatly honour'd his Memory; but it was nothing in comparison of what those of Sicyon did [E]. There built him a Tomb in the most conspicuous part of their City, and instituted Feasts and Sacrifices to him, which they celebrated every Year with great Shew and Magnificence. We may see in Herodotus in what manner Callisthenes, Tyrant of Sicyon, abolish'd

(a) Pausan. lib. 2. pag. 50.

(b) Ibid. lib. 9. pag. 286.

(c) Hygin. cap. 7. Apollod. lib. 3. Diodor. Sicul. lib. 5. cap. 6.

(d) Pausan. lib. 1. pag. 37.

(e) Eteocles and Polynices kill'd each other.

(f) Hygin. cap. 7.

(g) See the Remark [H].

(b) Pausan. lib. 1. p. 42.

(1) Pausan. lib. 9. pag. 286.

(2) It is in the Scythia of Euripides, ad Phoeniss. ver. 41. See Statius al., Theb. lib. 1. ver. 39.

(3) Hygin. cap. 60. Apollodorus, lib. 3. says, "That one of them bore the Head of a Boar on his Shield."

[A] The Rights of his Son-in-Law Polynices. Pausanias says, that Adrastus had married his Daughter to Polynices, before the Dispute about the Succession of Thebes (1); but others pretend, that this Marriage was not made, till Polynices, excluded by his Brother, had retir'd to Adrastus. They relate, that Tydeus fled for Refuge thither at the same time, and that the latter of these two Refugees was cover'd with the Hide of a Boar, and the former with the Hide of a Lion; which was the reason of Adrastus's giving them his Daughters in Marriage; for he recollected the Oracle (2), which had commanded him to marry them to a Boar, and a Lion (3). The Supplement of Moreri says falsely that Tydeus, being ask'd why he wore the Hide of a wild Boar, answer'd, that it was because his Father Oeneus was the Conqueror of the wild Boar of Calydonia. He did not give this Answer; and it was not Oeneus, but Meleager who kill'd that furious Boar. The Oracle, which was given to Adrastus, is likewise mis-reported in that Supplement.

[B] The War of the Epigones. Had they been aware, in the composing of the third Volume of Moreri, that this War was only ten Years later than the first, they would not have translated the Word Epigones by, they, who were born after the Siege of Thebes: they would only have said, they, who surviv'd their Fathers: or, in general, the Descendants of the first Chiefs.

[C] That he died with Grief. The Supplement pretends that he cast himself into his Son's Funeral Pile, and cites Hyginus, Fab. 242. and Herodotus, Lib. 5. Now it is observable, that Herodotus says nothing of Adrastus, which has been taken notice of in that Article of the Supplement. The only thing, which may be suspected to have been borrow'd from Herodotus, is at the Beginning of the Article in these Terms: Adrastus was obliged to retire to King Polybius, in the City of Sicyon, who gave him a good Reception, and his Daughter Amphitea in Marriage; but this does not agree with the Account of Herodotus, who says that Polybius left his Kingdom by his Will to Adrastus his Daughter's Son. See the following Remark. The Citation of Hyginus is yet worse; for Hyginus does not speak of our Adrastus there, but of another, who was the Father of Hipponous, and who cast himself into the Fire to obey an Order of Apollo. Hipponous did as much, upon the same Principle. The Author of the Index of Hyginus, in the Edition of of Amsterdam in 1681. gives to Hercules for Sons the Adrastus, and Hipponous, we are here speaking of; and yet he pretends, that the same Adrastus is the Father of Ægialeus, of whom Hyginus speaks in the 71st Chapter, and who is manifestly the Father-in-law of Polynices, and the Son of Talaüs. He mistook the Sense of these Words: "Hercules Jovis filius ipse sese in ignem misit. Adrastus & Hipponous ejus filius ipse se in ignem jecerunt ex responso Apollinis (4). — Hercules, the Son of Jupiter, threw himself into the Fire. Adrastus, and Hipponous his Son, threw themselves into the Fire, in Obedience to the Oracle of Apollo."

[D] That he was personally present in the second Expedition. I can add a second Evidence to Pausanias; I mean Pindar, who asserts positively, that Adrastus, having collected, and taken away his Son's Bones, brought back his Army safe to Argos (5). He does not, then, suppose he died by the way at Megara, as Pausanias does; but still these are two consistent Authorities to ground the present Fact on, namely, that Adrastus was at the second War of Thebes.

[E] In comparison of what those of Sicyon did. The Scholiast of Pindar (6) reports, that Dioutichides maintains, that they had only the Cenotaph of Adrastus at Sicyon, and that his real Tomb was at Megara (7).

(4) Hygin. Fabul. cap. 242.

(5) Pindar. Pyth. Od. 8.

(6) Schol. Pindari in Od. 9. Nem.

(7) Dioutichides, lib. 5. Hist. Megarica.

(i) Herod.
lib. 5. cap.
67.

(h) Id. ibid.
See also Pau-
san. lib. 2.
pag. 50.

(l) Pindar.
Nem. Od. 9.

(m) The Scio-list of tat-tism apud Barthium,
Tom. 2. p.
361. upon these Words of the Thebaid, lib. 2.
ver. 1-9.
Quis te solio Sicyonis avitice Excitum
infensum componere legibus Argos Neciat?

(8) Pindar.
Nem. Od. 9.

(c) Diodor.
Sicul. lib. 5.
cap. 6.

(10) Apol-
lod. lib. 3.
pag. 187.

(11) Barth.
in Stat.
Tom. 2.
pag. 170.
See also pag.
914.

(12) He should have said three Daughters and two Sons.

lith'd these Ceremonies, out of Hatred to the Argians (i). You must understand, that Adrastus was King of Sicyon (k), in virtue of the Will of Polybius, his Grandfather by the Mother's side, to whom he once fled for Refuge, being constrain'd to depart out of Argos [F]; and that, during his Reign, he made the City of Sicyon very famous (l), by the Pythian Games, which he establish'd there (m). Some Writers remark, that his Hereditary Kingdom was that of Sicyon, and that he obtain'd that of Argos by Election; the Mildness of his Nature occasioning the Argians to invite him [G], to come and civilize their barbarous Manners. Homer does not say so much; but only, that he reign'd first at Sicyon (n). Servius, on Æneid. Lib. 6, gives the same account; and we read the same thing in Pindar (o), and in his old Scholiast. They give him commonly but two Daughters, Argia, the Wife of Polynices, and Deipila the Wife of Tydeus (p), but he had besides two Sons, Ægialeus and Cyanippus: and a Daughter, whose Name was Ægialea, who married Diomedes, the Son of Tydeus, and gave him great uneasiness by her immodest Behaviour. Some say, that he was the first, who built a Temple to the Goddess Nemesis, and that upon that account she had the Name of Adrastea [H]. But I am certain they confound him with another Adrastus. He, who built the first Altar to that Goddess, erected it on the River Ælepus in Phrygia (q). We do not find that our Adrastus was ever in Asia; and yet we meet with a King of that Name in Phrygia, at the time of the Siege of Troy (r). There is more reason, therefore, to attribute the Establishment of the Worship of Nemesis to an Asiatic Prince, whose Name was Adrastus, than to a King of Argos of that Name. Herodotus speaks of an ADRASTUS, who fled to the Court of Cræsus King of Lydia, and who kill'd that King's Son by an Accident (s). The Article of that Adrastus in Moreri's Dictionary is tolerably good [I].

(n) Homer.
Iliad. lib. 2.
ver. 79.

(o) Pindar.
ubi supra.

(p) Statii
Theb. lib.
2. ver. 333.

(q) Antimachus apud
Strabo. lib.
13. pag. 405.

(r) Homer.
Iliad. lib. 2.
ver. 337.

(s) Herod.
lib. 1. cap.
35. & seq.

[F] Being constrained to depart out of Argos.] It is said, in the Supplement to Moreri, that Adrastus was driven out of the Kingdom of Argos by his Brother-in-law Amphiaraus, and obliged to retire to the City of Sicyon; but, by an inexcusable neglect, they have not cited any Authority for this. The Reader must traverse a great deal of Ground to meet with Evidences. I have searched so long, that at last I have discovered the Source in Pindar, where I find that Adrastus left Argos, and retired to Sicyon, by reason of Amphiaraus's Attempts, and the overthrow of the Family of Talaüs, which were no longer in possession of the Sovereign Power (8). That Poet adds, that Adrastus stopped the Course of this Evil; and that the Marriage of Eriphyle with Amphiaraus was the Bond which re-united the contending Parties, and quieted the Troubles. Amphiaraus was not therefore the Brother-in-law of Adrastus, when the latter was obliged to retire to Sicyon. Pindar does not say, that this Fugitive Prince married King Polybius's Daughter, nor that Talaüs was killed by Amphiaraus; but both these Facts, the former of which is so contradictory to Herodotus, are in the Scholiast of Pindar. Diodorus Siculus says, That the Marriage of Amphiaraus with Eriphyle the Sister of Adrastus, did not appease the Differences, since a little before the Wars of Thebes, the two Brothers-in-law were yet contending for the Crown (9). They were divided on another Point; Amphiaraus was unwilling to be of the Expedition, and Adrastus passionately desired that he might. Eriphyle was chosen Arbitress of their Dispute, and gave the Cause for her Brother. Apollodorus says partly the same Thing, though confusedly enough (10). Bartbius has misrepresented what Diodorus Siculus says; for he supposes, that Eriphyle was the Daughter of Adrastus (11). The Latin Translation of that Historian, printed at Basil in 1548. says falsely, That Eriphyle adjudged the Crown to her Husband.

[G] The Argians to invite him.] If Mr Moreri had known this Particular, he would have taken care not to have affirmed, That Adrastus quitted the City of Sicyon after four Years' Reign, without any body knowing the Reason of it, and came to reign at Argos, where he had two Daughters, &c (12). However it be, here is a Subject for Historical Pyrrhonism; namely the Disagreement of the Ancients about the two Kingdoms of Adrastus; I mean in relation to the Title, and the Order of Succession. See the Article TALAEUS.

[H] And that upon that Account she had the Name of Adrastea.] The Scholiast of Pindar says, That this Name was given to the Goddess Nemesis, on account of the Compensation I have taken notice of. Adrastus was the only Chief, who survived at the first Siege of Thebes, and his Son was the only Chief, who was killed at the second. The Balance is much more just, according to the Hypothesis of those, who ascribe the whole Conduct of the second War to the Epigones; but they who pretend that Adrastus was present, and who give him the Glory of leading back the Victorious Army, necessarily suppose that he commanded there. He should have perished, therefore, in this second Expedition, to make the Balance even between Him and the six Colleagues who accompanied him in the first.

[I] The Article of That Adrastus in Moreri's Dictionary is tolerably good.] I only find these small Faults in it. I. He makes Adrastus to be the Son of Gordias, instead of making him the Son of Midas, and Grandson of Gordius, conformably to the Latin Translation of Herodotus. I know very well that the Greek Text imports that he was the Son of Gordius, and Grandson of Midas (13); but I am certain likewise on the one side, that Moreri had not Abilities to rectify Translations by the Greek Originals; and on the other side, that there is a Greek Reading agreeable to that Translation. II. He should not have omitted, that Cræsus used such Expiatory Ceremonies in favour of Adrastus, as were used for the Purification of involuntary Homicides. III. It ought not to have been said, That Adrastus killed himself on the Body of the Son of Cræsus, but on his Tomb; for Herodotus notes, That Cræsus, having excused and comforted the Murderer, caused his Son to be buried. IV. Lastly, he ought not to have cited Chio, or Li. The Names of the Mules, given to the Books of Herodotus, are of no use in Quotations, especially when a French Book is composed for such Popular Use as Moreri's Dictionary; however he ought to have settled the distinct Ellimate of Chio, by adding, or, the first Book.

(13) Herod.
lib. 1. cap.
35.

ADRIANI (JOHN BAPTIST) born at Florence, in the Year 1511, of a Patrician Family, wrote the History of his own Times in Italian. His Work is a Continuation of Guicciardin, and begins at the Year 1536 [A]. Judgment and Sincerity, Diligence

[A] And begins at the Year 1536.] Not having it by me, I must be contented with the Testimony of Thuanus; but I apprise my Reader, That, according to Spandanus (1), our Adriani begun his History at the Year 1537. and finished it at the Year 1574. It comprehends twenty two Books, and was printed at Florence by the Giunti, in the Year 1583.

in Folio, and at Venice, in two Volumes in 4to.
in the Year 1527. Marcello Adriani, the Author's Son, published this History, and dedicated it to Francis de Medici, Great Duke of Tuscan. It contains the Space of forty four Years, if we may believe Bocchi (2).

[B] Had

(1) Spand.
ad Annum 1534. n. 11.
pag. 426.

(2) Bocchi.
ubi supra.
pag. 427.

Diligence and Exactness reign through out it; and it appears that Cosmo, Great Duke of Tuscany, a Prince of a prodigious Genius, and consummate Prudence, had communicated his Memoirs to the Author [B]. Thuanus, from whom I borrow this, acknowledges ingenuously, that he was oblig'd to this History for many things, and that none supply'd him with more Materials (a). He thinks it strange that the Italians do not consider Adriani according to his Merit. Besides this History, there are extant six Orations of this Author's Composition, to wit, the Funeral Oration of Charles the Vth; that of the Emperor Ferdinand; that of Eleonora of Toledo, Wife of Cosmo, Duke of Florence; that of Isabella, Queen of Spain; that of Cosmo, Great Duke of Tuscany; and that of Jane of Austria, the Wife of Francis de Medicis (b). He died at Florence in the Year 1579. I believe him likewise to be the Author of A long Letter concerning the Ancient Painters and Sculptors, which we meet with at the beginning of the 3d Volume of Vasari. He was the Son of the Learned MARCELLO VIRGILIO (c), Secretary of State to the Republic of Florence, and Professor of Literature in that University. He succeeded him in the Place of Professor (d), and left a Son nam'd MARCELLO ADRIANI, who was very learned, and who exercis'd the same Function (e), and took the Title of, Il Torbido, (The Troubled) in the Academy de Gli Alterati (f). There are some Authors, who find our John Baptist a little partial against Pope Paul III (g).

(a) Thuan. Hist. lib. 68. sub fin.

(b) Jac. Rill. Lit. Literary Memoirs of the University of Florence, pag. 45.

(c) Mich. Pocci. natus de Script. Florent. p. 103.

(d) Rilli, ubi supra, pag. 253.

(e) Id. Ibid. pag. 255.

(f) Boechi in the 6th Book of Fiepi's, published with Killi, p. 43.

(g) Spondan. Annal. ad Ann. 1545. n. 18. pag. 492.

[B] Had communicated his Memoirs to the Author.] Thuanus had already declared his Opinion of this in the thirty seventh Book, on Occasion of the private Conferences, which Catherine de Medicis had with the Duke of Alba, at the Interview of Baionne. The Protestants, says he, who are a very suspicious People (3), gave out, That the Extermination of their Sect was contrived in these Conferences. What happened afterwards will plainly show Falsity whether it was false, or not. He adds, That John Baptist Adriani, a very sincere and judicious Historian, and whom, it is likely, the Memoirs of the Duke of Florence had supplied with many Particulars (4), has reported, that according to the Advice of the King of Spain, explained by the Duke of Alba, it was concluded in that Interview, That the Heads of the principal Protestants should be cut off, and that afterwards they should fall upon them all, after the manner of the Sicilian Vespers. I wish d'Aubigne had not exceeded the Author, whom he copied. Almost all Historians, says he (5), and among them John Baptist Adrian, who had the Cyphers and the Secrets of the Duke of Florence, unanimously agree, that the Wars of the Netherlands, and the Massacres, which followed afterwards, were projected there. It is not to be questioned but that Thuanus is the Original which d'Aubigne copied; but does not the Copier give himself too much Liberty? Does he not lay that down as matter of Fact, which Thuanus only advanced as a Probability? Does he not speak of the Great Duke's Cyphers and Secrets, of which Thuanus has not said a Word? For Commentarii does not signify Cyphers and Secrets. The more heinous an Accusation is, the more we ought to attend to the Terms of the Deposition, even when Appearances are favourable, as in this Case. If Zeiller had cast his Eyes on this Passage of Thuanus, he would not have ventured to say, that Adriani's History ended with the Death of Charles V. (6)

(5) D'Aubigne, Hist. Tom. 1. lib. 4. cap. 5.

(6) Zeiller. de Historiis, par. 2. pag. 1.

ADRIANUS, or Adrian, Emperor, Pope, &c. Look for HADRIAN.

ADRICHOMIA (CORNELIA), a Nun of the Order of St Augustin, in the XVIth Century, the Daughter of a Dutch Gentleman, acquir'd much Reputation by the Knowledge of Poetry, which she made use of conformably to her Profession; for she translated David's Psalms into Verse, and compos'd several other Sacred Poems. James Faber Stapulensis admir'd this Lady's Wit and Learning. Cornelius Musius kept a strict, but very honourable, Correspondence with her. This is what Francis Swertius relates of her (a). I wonder, that Valerius Andreas, whose Collection of the Writers of the Netherlands is much more copious, than that of Francis Swertius, takes no notice of this Illustrious Dutch Maid. He could not be ignorant of what the other had said of her.

(a) Athen. Belgic. pag. 181.

ADRICHOMIUS (CHRISTIAN) was born at Delft in Holland, in the Year 1533. He was a Priest zealous for his Religion, and apply'd himself to Study. He was a considerable time Director of the Nuns of St Barbara, the Place of his Birth; but the Religious Civil Wars obliging him to go into Exile, he retir'd first into Brabant [A], and afterwards to Cologne, where he undertook a considerable Work, which was printed after his Death [B]. The Subject of it was a Description of the Holy-Land in general, and of the City of Jerusalem in particular; as we find by his Theatrum Terræ Sanctæ, printed with Geographical Maps at Cologne in 1593 in Folio. It is pretty well esteem'd, and would have been yet more, if the Author had not trusted too much to the Manethon, and Berosus, and such other Chimerical Writings, of the Monk Annius of Viterbo. He sometimes assum'd the Appellation of Christianus Crucius; under which Name he publish'd the Life of Jesus Christ at Antwerp (a), with an Oration de Christiana Beatitudine, which was deliver'd in a General Chapter (b). He died at Cologne in the Month of June 1585, being the thirteenth Year of his Exile, and was bury'd in the Monastery of the Canonesses of Nazareth, of which he had been Director for some time (c).

(a) In 1578.

(b) Tre 23d of July, 1570.

(c) Ex Valer. Andr. Bibl. Belg. p. 131.

[A] Into Brabant.] The Author, quoted by Mr Moreri and my self, expresses himself thus; Inde à primis Genio-Calvinistis pulsus, Machinæ, Trajecti & Coloniae vixit (1). I do not question in the least, but that Moreri is mistaken in taking Trajectum for Utrecht; he had better have translated it Maastricht.

[B] Which was printed after his Death.] What Mr Moreri asserts, That Adrichomius himself published this Work, and that his Theatrum Terræ sanctæ is distinct from the Description of the Holy Land, &c. is false.

(1) Valer. Andreas Bibl. Belgic. pag. 132.

ÆGIALEA, Daughter of Adraſtus King of Argos. See EGIALÆA.

ÆRODIUS, a Learned Civilian of the XVIth Century. Look for AYRAULT.

AFER (DOMITIUS) a famous Orator under Tiberius, and under the three following Emperors, was of Nismes (a). After his Prætorſhip, not finding himſelf greatly rais'd, and being ambitious of exalting himſelf by any Method, he turn'd Accuſer againſt Claudia Pulchra, Couſin to Agrippina (b). He gain'd his Cauſe, and by this Succels he found himſelf in the Number of the Firſt Orators, and in the Favour of Tiberius, who bore an implacable Hatred to Agrippina [A]. The Commendations his Eloquence receiv'd from this Emperor made him reliſh the Trade; inſomuch that he was ſeldom without ſome Accuſation, or ſome Defence, upon his Hands; which gain'd greater Reputation to his Tongue, than his Honesty; till at length he loſt much of his Fame, even as an Orator, when old Age, having wore out his Mind (c), could not prevail with him to leave off Pleading [B]. The Accuſation of Claudia Pulchra fell out in the Year of Rome 779. The Year after her Son Quintilius Varus was accuſed by the ſame Orator, and by Publius Dolabella (d). No body wonder'd, that Afer, who had been a long time poor, and who had not well manag'd the Gains of the former Accuſation, ſhou'd return to the Charge; but it was thought ſtrange, that a Relation of Varus, and of ſo great a Family, as Publius Dolabella was, ſhou'd join with this Informer. Afer died in the Reign of Nero, in the Year of Rome 812 (e). It was reported that he died at Table of exceſſive Eating (f). Quintilian, who, in his youth, was greatly attach'd to this Perſon [C], makes frequent Mention of him

(a) Eufeb. Chron. a. 2060.

(b) Tacit. Annal. lib. 4. cap. 52.

(c) Niſi quod ætas extrema multum etiam Eloquente dempſit, dum ſeſſa mente retinet ſilentium. Id. ib. See in the Remark [B] a Paſſage of the 11th Chapter of the 12th Book of Quintilian.

(d) Tacit. Annal. lib. 66.

(e) Id. Ann. lib. 14. cap. 19.

(f) Eufeb. Chron. a. 2060.

[A] Tiberius, who bore an implacable Hatred to Agrippina.] This Princeſs was ſo well ſatiſfied, that it was the Emperor, who occaſioned the Proceſs againſt her, that he ſhew'd no Repentment for it to Domitius. The latter meeting her one day in the Streets, turned from her: She imagin'd this Behaviour proceeded from Shame, and having cauſed him to be called, ſhe bid him fear nothing, and told him, That it was not he, but Agamemnon, who was the Cauſe of all this: Ὀδυσσεὺς ἀκούεισ' ἡ γὰρ εὐ μοι πύθων ἄντιος ἄλλ' Ἀγαμέμνων Bono ſis animo, Domiti; non enim tu horum cauſa es, ſed Agamemnon (1). It is a ſign that he had read the Iliad.

(1) Dion. Caſſ. lib. 59. ad an. 792. pag. 752.

[B] Old Age, having wore out his Mind, could not prevail upon him to leave off pleading.] This is too common an Infirmary. Few Perſons know how to retreat in time, or can ſay with Horace:

Est mihi purgatam crebro qui perſonet aurem;
Solve ſenefcentem maturè ſanus equum, ne
Peccet ad extremum ridendus & illa ducat (2).

(2) Hor. Epist. 1. lib. 2.

*There ſounds, methinks, ſtill thro' my well-purg'd Ear
A little Voice, ſo ſoft Horace have a care,
And wiſh't 'tis well releaſe thy aged Horſe,
Leaſt, when he runs but with unequal Force,
And ſtretches hard to win, he breaks his Wind,
And, laugh'd at, diſſam'd, baſely lags behind.*

CREECH.

Poets and Orators ought to be moſt careful of withdrawing from their Buſineſs at a proper time; becauſe they ſtand moſt in need of the Warmth of Imagination; yet it too frequently happens that they perſiſt in their Career till the loweſt Decline of Age. They think the Public is oblig'd to drink the very Dregs of their pretended Neſſar. But, if formerly the Legiſlators limited the Time, wherein People might marry, (for they prohibited it to Women of 50 and Men of 60 Years of Age) (3) and, if they ſuppoſed that, after a certain Age, it was time to leave off thinking of Procreation, either becauſe of the Extinction, or the Weakneſs, of the Faculties; every Author ought, for the ſame Reaſon, to ſet Bounds to himſelf in the Production of Books, which is a kind of Generation, for which every Age is by no means proper. The Compariſon, which Horace makes uſe of, puts me in mind of a Precept, which Virgil has left us; and which old Poets ought to apply to themſelves.

(3) Quid eſt quare apud poetas ſalutarius iuſtiter deſerit liberis tollere? ſtrum ſexagenarius ſciſus eſt, & illi lex Pæpæ ſibulam impoſuit? Lucian. lib. 2. cap. 16. Capiti Pæpæ Popæ leſis à Tiberio Cæſare, quaſi ſexagenarii generare non poſſent, addito abrogavit. Suet. in Clavd. c. p. 23. & ibi Commemorat.

Hunc quoque, ubi, aut morbo gravis aut jam ſegnior annis, Deſicit, abde domo, nec turpi ignoſce ſenefcæ.
Frigidus in Venerem ſenior, fruſtraque labore

Ingratum trahit, & ſi quando ad prælia ventum eſt,
Ut quondam in ſtipulis magnus ſine viribus ignis,
Incaſſum furit (4).

*But, worn with Years, when dire Diſeaſes come,
Then bide his not ignoble Age, at home.
For, when his Blood no youthful Spirits move,
He languiſhes, and labours in his Love.
In vain he burns, like baſty ſtubble Fires,
And in himſelf his former ſelf requires.*

DRYDEN.

I ſay, old Poets ought to profit by this Leſſon, and not think to climb Parnafſus, when they are become like that Horſe which Pliny ſpoke of, after Ariſtote (5): “Generat mas ad annos triginta tres.—Opunte & ad quadraginta duraffe tradunt adjuſtum modo in attollenda priore parte corporis.—The Male generates till thirty Years of Age.—At Opus they ſay “be bold; out till forty, with the Aſſiſtance however “of liſting up the fore part of his Body.” They obſcure their firſt Glory by it, in Imitation of our Domitius Afer. See the Article JOHN DAURAT. Some dedicate their Muſes to divine Poetry in their old Age; theſe are commonly inſipid Productions (6): I ſay commonly, for there are very excellent Works compos'd by old Men on all Subjects.

[C] Was greatly attach'd to this Perſon.] Charles Stephens, Lloyd, and Hofman, in their Dictionaries, Glandorp, at the 306th Page of his Onomaſticon, and others, remark, that Quintilian informs us of this Particular in his 5th Book: Conſtititur ſenem Domitium ſibi adoleſcentulo cultum: But they all agree, that he adds, that the Authority, which Domitius had acquir'd, was much diminiſh'd, ſed priore auctoritate multum imminuta. I have not found this in that Paſſage of Quintilian; he ſays (7), “Sufficebant aliqui “libri duo à Domitio Afro in hanc rem compoſiti, “quem adoleſcentulum ſenem colui, ut non leſta “mihi tantum ea, ſed pleraque ex ipſo ſint cognita.— “The two Books of Domitius Afer upon this Subject “were otherwiſe ſufficient; for I was a Follower of “the old Orator in my Youth; ſo that I receiv'd Inſtruction as well from the Author, as his Writings.” He ſhould have quoted the 11th Chapter of the 12th Book of Quintilian. It is there we meet with the Decline of Domitius's Authority; which affords us a Confirmation of the Precept, which the Author had before given, concerning the Retreat, which Orators ought to make, when their Age will not ſuffer them to maintain their former Character. “Non quia prodeſſe unquam ſatis ſit, & illa mente, qua illa facilitate prædito non conveniat operis pulcherrimi quam longiſſimum tempus; ſed quia decet hoc quoque “proſpicere, ne quid pejus quam fecerit, faciat. Neque enim ſcientia modo conſtat Orator, quæ augetur “annis,

(4) Virgil. Georg. lib. 3. ver. 95.

(5) Plin. lib. 8. cap. 42.

(6) See Bailler's Judgment of the Poets, Tom. 3. pag. 246. See alſo what he ſays of Writings compos'd in old Age, Tom. 1. of his Judgment of the Learned, pag. 389.

(7) Quintil. lib. 5. cap. 7.

(g) Quintil. lib. 5. cap. 7. & lib. 6. cap. 3. See also Pliny's Epist. 14. lib. 2. & ibi Catanzum, pag. 121.

him (g). He tells us, that there were many agreeable Narrations in his Pleadings; and that there were public Collections of his Jetts, some of which he relates. He mentions likewise two Books which this Orator publish'd concerning Evidences. It was well for him, on a certain occasion, that he had a ready, as well as a flattering, Wit, or else he had been undone. It was when Caligula became his Accuser (b), and pleaded in Person against him (i). Domitius, instead of defending himself, repeated that Prince's Plea [D], with signs of Admiration, and then kneeled down, and begg'd Pardon, declaring that he dreaded Caligula's Eloquence, more than his Imperial Quality. He was not only pardon'd, but rais'd to the Consulship, by the Deprivation of those, who were then in Office. His Crime was very slight; he had erected a Statue to Caligula, and remark'd in the Inscription, That that Prince was in his second Consulship, at the Age of 27 Years. He thought to make his Court by it; but the Emperor brought an Action against him for it, pretending that he reproach'd him for his Youth, and his infringing the Laws (k). After had some adopted Children: Pliny the Younger will inform you so, and tell you besides some curious Circumstances concerning them [E]. The Abbot Faydit, in his Remarks on Virgil, pag. 5. makes him of the Royal Family of the Domitians.

(b) Dion. Cuss. lib. 59. ad Ann. 792.

(i) He read his Plea.

(k) Dion. lib. 59.

"annis, sed voce, laterum firmitate; quibus fractis aut imminutis, etate, seu valetudine, cavendum est, ne quid in Oratore summo desideretur, ne interstiat fatigatus, ne quæ dicet parum audiri sentiat, ne se queratur priorem. Vidi ego longe omnium quos mihi cognoscere contigit, summum oratorem, Domitium Afrum valde senem, quotidie aliquid ex ea quam meruerat autoritate perdentem, cum, agente illo, quem Principem fuisse quondam Fort non erat dubium, alii (quod indignum videbatur) riderent, alii erubescerent, quæ occasio fuisse illis dicendi, mille cum defecere quam desinere. Neque erant illa quælibet mala, sed nimiora. Quare antequam in has ætatis veniat infidias, receptui canet, & in portum integra nave perveniet (8). — Not that it is sufficient once to have been useful, or that the longest possible Continuance of so fine a Profession is improper for a Person endu'd with these Abilities; but because he ought to provide against this likewise, that he does not degenerate from his former Excellency. For Science (which indeed increases with Years) will not alone make an Orator; he must have Lungs, and Strength of Sides; and if these are broken or impair'd by Age or Sickness, he must take care that the great Orator is not found deficient, that he does not stop short for want of Breath, that he is not sensible he is not heard, and that he is not the first to complain of himself. I myself saw the greatest Orator, of all I ever knew, Domitius Afer, in his very old Age, continually losing part of that Authority, which he had merited; inasmuch that, when he pleaded, (he, who undoubtedly was once the first at the Bar) some, which appear'd very indecent, laugh'd, others blush'd for him; which occasioned them to say, they had rather he would fault, than conclude. Nor was this a slight Inconvenience, but a Matter of great Consequence. Wherefore an Orator, before he falls into these Snarers of Age, should sound a Retreat, and sail into Port with a sound Vessel." I omit Moreri's great and capital Omissions; they may be well enough known only by comparing. I shall only remark, that his Citation of Suetonius, and of Dion, in Caligula, is nothing to the purpose. For besides that it is not customary to cite Dion without referring to such or such a Book, and that it is only his Ab-breviator Xiphilinus, who is cited with reference to such or such an Emperor, it is not true that Suetonius speaks of Domitius Afer, either in the Life of Caligula, or in any Work, which we have remaining of his. So that, when Scaliger advances, in his Notes on the Chronicle of Eusebius, that what has been said of that Orator by St Jerome, was taken out of Suetonius, he must necessarily have regard to Books that are lost since the Death of That Father. Mr Hofman gives us two Domitius Afers instead of one, and makes use of the bad Citation, for which we have censur'd Mr Moreri.

[D] That Prince's Plea. Caligula was so charm'd with that Piece of his own, that when one of his freed Men, who had contributed much to pacify him, ventur'd to reproach him for the Process enter'd against Domitius, he answered, I ought not to have suppress'd a Discourse of such Importance. As much as to say, What, should I have taken so much Pains about this Plea for nothing? should I rather have renounc'd the Praises which my Rhetoric deserv'd, than expose the Life of Domitius? There are but too many great Men of Caligula's way of thinking: They believe every thing ought to be sacrificed to their Passions. They, who said, that the Cardinal de Lorrain chose to expose the Catholic Religion to all the Dangers of the Conference of Poissy, rather than deprive himself of the Honour of displaying his Learning and Eloquence upon that Occasion (9), knew him pretty well.

[E] Curious Circumstances concerning them. Domitius adopted two Brothers, whose Names were Domitius Tullus, and Domitius Lucanus. He caus'd afterwards their Father's Estate to be confiscated, and left them his own in some manner against his Intention; for it is very probable that he was prevented by Death from revoking the Will, which he had made in their Favour. Domitius Lucanus, Son-in-law of Curtius Mantia, render'd himself odious to his Father-in-law. He had a Daughter, in whose Favour Mantia would not make his Will, but on condition, that Lucanus should set her at Liberty; but, when she was made free, Domitius Tullus adopted her. This was a Collusion of the two Brothers: They enjoy'd their Fortunes in common; wherefore, by the Daughter's being again in her Father's Power, by means of this Adoption, Domitius Lucanus came in for a share of Mantia's Inheritance, though the latter had used many Precautions to hinder him from it (10). Domitius Tullus was his Brother's Heir, preferable to the Daughter, who was common to them. He fed many with Hopes of being his Heirs; by which means he procur'd all the Cares, all the Presents, and all the officious Assiduities, to himself, which are used to rich old Men, whose Inheritances are courted; but he deceived them all. The Young Lady, whom he had adopted, was his Heiress, and all his Legacies were given to his Relations. He particularly remembered his Wife, for he left her a good Estate. She undervalued herself in marrying him, considering the wretched Condition, to which Age and Diseases had reduced him. He might have disgust'd a Woman, in his Condition, though she had been his Wife in his Youth and Vigour. How much more Reason was there for his being disagreeable to a Wife, who began her Correspondence with him when he was so infirm. Nevertheless this Lady bore the distastefulness of her Condition so patiently, and supported her Husband's infirm and decay'd Life with so much Charity, that she regain'd the good Opinion of the Public. This poor Wretch was so impotent in all his Limbs, that his Servants were obliged to wash and clean his Teeth, which caus'd him to complain of being every Day obliged to lick his Slaves Fingers. Yet he had no mind to die (11). Pliny's Words, which give us this Account, and which contain so many Characteristics of Manners, deserve to be produc'd at length. "Accepit (uxor) amoenissimas villas, ac cepit magnam pecuniam, uxor optima & patientissima, ac tanto melius de viro merita, quanto magis est reprehensa, quod nupsit. Nam mulier, natalibus clara, moribus proba, ætate declivis, diu vidua; mater olim, parum decorè sequuta matrimonium videbatur divitis (ensis, ita perdit morbo, ut esse tædio posset uxori, quam juvenis, sanisque duxisset. Quippe omnibus membris extortus & fractus, tantas opes solis oculis obibat; ac ne in lætulo quidem, nisi ab aliis, movebatur. Quinetiam, sordum

(9) See the Remark [D] of the Article LORRAIN (Charles's).

(10) Fuit fratribus illis quasi fato datum, ut divites inter se invicem in ætate quibus facti essent. — It was the Fate of those Brothers, to become rich even in spite of those, by whom they were made so. Plin. Epist. 18. lib. 8.

(11) Ibid. pag. 493.

(12) Id. ib.(13) In one of the Remarks on the Article MENCENAS.

* She is called Hagar in the English Version of the Bible.

(1) R-Joshua the Son of Karcha in Pirke Eliezer. cap. 26. apud Heidegg. Hist. Patr. Tom. 2. pag. 192.

(2) Salom. Jarchi apud Heidegg. ib.

(3) In the Book Juchasin apud Heidegg. ib.

(4) Apud Corn. à Lapide in Genes. p. 171.

(5) Genesis xlii. 16.

"miserandumque dictu, dentes lavandos fricandof-
 "que praebebat. Audium est frequenter ab ipso,
 "quum quereretur de contumeliis debilitatis suae, se
 "digitos fervorum suorum quotidie lingere. Vivebat
 "tamen, & vivere volebat, sustentante maxime uxore,
 "quae culpam inchoati matrimonii in gloriam perfe-
 "verantia verterat (12). — She (his Wife) came
 "into Possession of the finest Villas, and a large Estate;
 "a Wife, the best and most patient, that ever was,
 "and who deserv'd so much the more from her Hus- "band, as the Censure she underwent in marrying was
 "the greater. For it was thought scarce decent, that
 "a Lady, of great Birth, of Reputation, advanc'd in
 "Years, who had been long a Widow, and formerly a
 "Mother, should be fond of marrying a rich old Man,
 "so worn with Diseases, that he might have disgust'd
 "a Wife, whom he had married in his Youth, and in "Health. For he was so distorted and broken in all
 "his Limbs, that he could only enjoy his great Wealth
 "in Sight: nor even so, without being turn'd in his "Bed by others. Nay, which is filthy and wretched
 "to relate, he was oblig'd to have his Teeth wash'd and "clean'd by others. He was frequently heard, in com- "plaining of his Infirmities, to say, that he every "Day lick'd his Servants Fingers. Yet he liv'd, and "desir'd to live, being supported chiefly by his Wife,
 "who turn'd the false Step of beginning such a Mar- "riage to her own Honour by persevering in it."
 This Lady's Virtue would certainly have been more worthy Admiration, had she foreseen the long Continuance of her Husband's Infirmities. But, after all, she deserves to be praised; for tho' the hopes of purchasing a large Jointure, at the price of some very vexatious, but short, Disguists deceiv'd her, yet her Condition never appear'd to fit uneasily upon her; but she did her Duty always with a good Grace. What fine Descriptions are there in that Letter of Pliny!
 how strongly does that miserable, impotent Wretch, in his Fears of Death, represent human Weakness! An Infirmity, of which we shall speak elsewhere (13), and which was in those Times much more scandalous than at present; for it was taken for a courageous and resolute Action to put an end to too tedious a Sickness.
 How peripetuous is it, on the other side, to see a Man, who had a Daughter, and Grand-children, give out that he expects an Heir out of another Family; and that they need only lay a formal Siege to his Inheritance to take the Place! What fordid Traffic! What Cunning! It was such like Persons as this, who found their Account in those, who courted their Inheritance.

— Dominus tamen & Domini Rex
 Si vis tu fieri, nullus tibi parvulus Aula Luserit Aeneas, nec filia dulcior illo.

Jamdudum & carum sterilis facit uxor amicum (14).

(14) Juvenal
 Sat. 5. vers.
 237.

*Would'st thou become his Patron and his Lord,
 Would'st thou be in thy turn by him ador'd?
 No young Aeneas in thy Hall must play,
 No sweeter Daughter lead thy Heart astray.
 O! how a barren Wife does recommend!
 How dear, how pleasant is a childless Friend.*
 Rev. Mr BOWLES.

But if this Avarice was base, That of the Persons, whom it cheated, was no less fordid. They would have been less blamable, if they had courted the Favour of one, who had no Children, and if they had not exclaimed against Domitius Tullus, after his Death.
 Their Complaints were laugh'd at, as they discovered their Shame; the deceased was praised, and his Conduct was thought useful to such a corrupt Age as That. Let us once more employ Pliny's Pencil. "Va-
 "rii tota civitate sermones: alii scilum, ingratum, im-
 "memorem loquuntur, seque ipsos, dum insectantur
 "illum, turpissimas confessionibus produunt, qui de illo,
 "uti de patre, avo, proavo, quasi orbi querantur: alii
 "contra hic ipsum laudibus ferunt, quod sit frustratus
 "improbos spes hominum, quos sic decipere pro mori-
 "bus temporum prudentia est (15). — The whole City
 "was divided: some call'd him false, ungrateful, and
 "forgetful: and, whilst they reproach'd his Memory,
 "betray'd themselves by scandalous Confessions, com- "plaining of him, as if they had been disinherited by
 "a Father, Grand-Father, or Great-Grand-Father's
 "others extol him for this very thing, in that he dis- "appointed the unreasonable Hopes of some Men, whom,
 "considering the Morals of the Times, it was Wisdom to
 "to deceive."

(15) Plinius
 ubi supra.

(a) Tacit.
 Annal. lib.
 15. cap. 49.
 56, 70.

(a) Genesis
 xvi. 1.

AFRANIUS Quintilianus, a Roman Senator of a bad Reputation by reason of his infamous Lewdness, enter'd into the grand Conspiracy against Nero, which cost Seneca his Life, in the Year of Rome 818. He had a personal Reason to hate that Prince, who had compos'd a severe Satire in Verse against him. He denied, a long time, that he was an Accomplice in that Conspiracy, but confess'd it at last, in hopes of his Pardon. He shew'd more Courage in his Death, than his manner of Life promis'd (a).

AGAR *, the Handmaid, and afterwards the Concubine of the Patriarch Abraham, was an Egyptian (a). There is some probability, that he took her into his Service, when he was return'd from Egypt, and had recover'd his Wife, whom King Pharaoh had taken from him. But it is false to say, as the Jews do [A], That Agar was That King's Daughter. Every one knows, that Sarah, finding herself bar-ren a long time [B], desired her Husband to try whether he could have Children by this Servant; and that Abraham, overcome by her Solicitations, and doing also an Act

[A] As the Jews do. It is thought that the Chaldae Paraphrast was the first, who published this false Tradition. He pretends, that Pharaoh, having taken away Sarah, gave her his own Daughter Agar for an Handmaid; and that Sarah brought her with her into the Land of Canaan. Rabbi Jesua is of the same Opinion (1). Another Rabbi gives this turn to the Story; that Pharaoh, struck with the Prodigies, which were wrought upon his own Person, since he had taken away Sarah, said to Agar, My Daughter, it is better for you to be a Servant in this Family, than Mistress in another (2). But Abraham Zacuth will not allow her to be of such illustrious Extraction; he says, that she was a Servant of Chu-ria, the Wife of Pharaoh, and that Churia gave her to Sarah, after the Death of her Husband (3). St Cyrilostom says, that Pharaoh himself gave this Hand-maid to Abraham (4). The Scripture observes, indeed, that, among other Presents, which he made him, he gave him Women Servants (5). If he gave him this Damoel, we need not question, but that he chose her from among those of a servile Rank.

I could willingly believe, what Philo says, that she embraced Abraham's Religion (6); but as to what he adds, that That Patriarch abstained from enjoying, her as soon as he perceived that she was with Child,
 I am not concerned either to deny or affirm it. These are Mysteries, which we ought not to pry into; it must be supposed that they pass under the Veil of Night, or behind the Curtain, and we must leave them to the Covert of their natural Darkness. The Jews, always soaring up to the Marvellous, attribute Agar's Conversion to the Miracles, which were performed in Pharaoh's House on Account of Sarah's Rape (7).

[B] A long Time. It is said, in Genesis, that Abraham had dwelt ten Years in the Land of Canaan, when he first lay with Agar; from whence the Jews have inferred, that an Husband ought not to cohabit with a Woman after he has found her bar-ren for the Space of ten Years (8). An absurd Consequence; as well because Abraham had been married above ten Years to Sarah, when she propos'd her Handmaid to him (9), as because he had not the

(6) In his Book de A-bramo.

(7) Apud
 Corn. à Lapide, ubi supra.

(8) Aben-
Ezra in Ge-
nes. xvi. 3.
 apud Hei-
 degg. ubi pag.
 197.

(9) Sarah's Barrenness was known before Abraham went out of his Country to go to Haran.
 See Genesis
 xi. vers. 30.
 the

Act of Obedience, according to the Translation of some Interpreters [C], went in unto Agar with all the Success that his Wife could have desired; I say, his Wife; for it was upon her own Account, that she desir'd her Servant might bear Children, and, being incapable of giving her Husband any Himself, she was willing to oblige him by Proxy (b). They, who shall think it little agreeable to the Practice of our Age, that so much Solicitation was requisite to prevail with Abraham to comply with such a Request, and are chiefly surpriz'd that this Request came from his own Wife, ought to remember, that all Times, and all Nations of the World, are not alike. However it be, Agar, finding herself with Child, became as proud, as if she had done a very great Exploit; but her Insolence was soon abated. Sarah, who could not brook her haughty Behaviour, treated her with such Severity, as oblig'd her to leave the House [D]. Agar did not return, till she had humbled herself, according to the order she had receiv'd from an Angel, who told her that she should be delivered of a Son, who should quarrel with every body [E]; soon after which she was deliver'd of Ishmael, who was educated with his Father till he was at least 15 or 16 Years of Age [F]. It is not known, whether these two Women agreed very well all that time; but we find that Agar was at last oblig'd to depart with her Son. Sarah would absolutely have it so, because she had seen Ishmael mocking at something [G]. Abraham sent the Mother and the Child away with a very small Vaticum. The Bottle of Water, which he gave them, being emptied, poor Agar saw the Hour that her Son must die of Thirst [H]. To avoid this Sight, she went and sat down at a distance from the

(b) Ecce conclusit me Dominus ne parerem, in-gredere ad ancillam meam, si fructu filium ex illa suscipiam filios: Behold now the Lord hath restrained me from bearing; I pray thee go in unto my maid, it may be that I may obtain children by her. Genes. xvi. 1.

the least Intention of forsaking her, after he had lived ten Years with her in the Land of Canaan without Issue.

[C] Doing also an Act of Obedience, according to the Translation of some Interpreters.] The Vulgar Translation says, Cumque ille acquisieret deprecanti; and the Version of Geneva, And Abraham obeyed the Word of Sarah (10). St. Austin gives this latter Sense to the Words of Scripture; for, after having observed, that Abraham was so complaisant, as to cohabit with, or to leave, Agar, just as it was agreeable to Sarah's Inclinations, he makes this Exclamation, "O virum viriliter utentem feminis, conjuge temperanter, ancilla OBTEMPERANTER, nulla in-temperanter (11)!" — O illustrious Man, in the Use of Women a Man indeed; yet conversing with his Wife temperately, with his Handmaid obediently, and with no Woman intemperately!" He had already made use of this Expression, "Ufus est ea (concubina) non ad exemplum libidinem, nec infultans, sed potius OBEDIENS conjugi (12)." — He conversed with her (his Concubine) not so to gratify his Lust, or to insult her, but rather in Obedience to his Wife.

[D] Treated her with such Severity, as oblig'd her to leave the House.] Who would ever have thought that this would have one day served as an Apology for Persecution? Yet the copious and inventive Mind of St. Austin found this Secret in it. He maintained, from Sarah's Conduct towards Agar, that the True Church may inflict Chastisements on the False, exile it, torment it, and so on. He was severely reprimanded for this Assertion in the Philosophical Commentary on the famous Words, Compel them to come in (13).

[E] Who should quarrel with every body.] The Angel said to her, He will be a wild Man: his Hand will be against every Man, and every Man's Hand against him (14). If it were permitted to look for Types here, as St. Austin did, one would think, that Ishmael was an Emblem of certain snarling Polemical Writers, who are for snapping at every body, and who, to declare War the better against human kind, run every Moment out of their Sphere, scribbling on every Subject, right or wrong, and always in a defamatory and libellous Style. All Ages and Countries produce these Copies of Ishmael. Some of them indeed differ from their Original in this, that, tho' they cast Stones at every body, few Persons take the trouble to return them; but let them quietly enjoy a wretched Impunity, which increases their Insolence, and their Frenzy.

[F] 'Till he was at least fifteen or sixteen Years of Age.] It is proved thus: Ishmael was fourteen Years old, when Isaac was born; for he was born when Abraham was eighty six Years of Age (15), and Abraham was an hundred Years old, when Sarah was delivered of Isaac (16). Now the latter was weaned before Ishmael was sent away; therefore, &c. I shall not amuse you with the Opinion of those Jews, who believe, that Isaac sucked twelve or five Years (17); for if there were any Foundation for the this Opinion, I should have allowed a longer time for Ishmael's abode with Abraham, than what I have here advanced. See the Remark [H].

[G] Had seen Ishmael mocking at something.] The Translation of the LXX imports, that Sarah's ill Humour proceeded from her having seen Ishmael play with Isaac. The Vulgar Translation followed them in it; Cum vidisset Sara filium Hagar Aegyptiae ludentem cum filio suo. The Hebrew Text particularizes nothing; it leaves us to guess, whether the Son of Agar laugh'd at Sarah or Isaac, or at the Feast that was made when Isaac was weaned, or at something else; or whether he made himself too familiar with, or superior to, Isaac; or lastly, whether he attempted to beat him. Some Interpreters have advanced many idle Notions hereupon; for they believe, that either Sarah saw Ishmael perform some Acts of Idolatry, or that he played some lewd Tricks, or that he endeavoured to kill Isaac. "Hebraei nonnulli accipiunt de lusu idololatriæ, quasi videlicet idola fingentem & colentem Ismaëlem vidisset Sara — Alii venerum hunc fuisse lulum statuunt — & detestationem turpitudinis. Neque desunt qui Ifmaëlem fratri necem molitum esse existimant (18). Some pretend, that he shot an Arrow at him with a Design of killing him (19). It is said, that the Hebrew Word for Mocking (20) has four Significations, in Scripture, viz. Pastime, Idolatry, an amorous Game, and a desperate Fight. To prove the third Signification, they alledge the twenty fifth Chapter of Genesis, where it is said, That Abimelech looking out at a Window, saw Isaac sporting with Rebecca his Wife. But it is to extend the Signification of the Word beyond it's due Limits, to pretend, that it implies, in that Passage, the Work of the Flesh. It is sufficient to understand by it a certain Familiarity, which shewed that they were not Brother and Sister, but Husband and Wife: for that was the Conclusion Abimelech drew from it. The most probable Account of the Matter seems to me to be this: Ishmael gave himself some Airs of Contempt, which made Sarah fear, that he would one day dispute the Birthright, if it was not prevented in time.

[H] That her Son must die of Thirst.] Supposing that the mocking, which Sarah was offended at, was on occasion of the Feast that was made when Isaac was weaned, Ishmael must have been sent away at about sixteen Years of Age. If it be supposed, that this Mockery was much later in time, than that Feast, his Age will be so much the more increased at his leaving his Father. But make him as young as you can (which will be to allow him at least sixteen Years of Age) will it not appear very strange, that his Mother was obliged to carry him on her Shoulders at that Age, — to lay him under a little Tree, to take him up again, to carry him in her Arms, and to give him drink? Read that Passage of Scripture concerning Ishmael; it represents to us a Child in swaddling Cloaths, or very near it. We cannot get out of this Plunge by supposing that this

(10) Apud Hieronymum cap. 21. in tractat. Hebraicis. See Sallian. Tom. 1. pag. 474. Corn. à Lapide in Genes. p. 199. takes it for granted, that Isaac was not weaned till five Years of Age; Sallian p. 474. cites St. Jerome, Del Rio, and Per. thus for the same Opinion, which is his own.

(18) Heidegg. ibid. pag. 205.

(19) R. Eliezer Pirke. cap. 30. ap. Heidegg. ib. who cites also Basil Hathurim.

(20) Lyrarus apud Pererum in Genes. xxi.

(10) Genes. xvi. 2. The English Version in like manner gives it, And Abraham hearkened unto the voice of Sarah.

(11) August. de Civit. Del. lib. 16. cap. 25.

(12) Id. ib.

(13) Comment. Philosoph. part. 3. pag. 65.

(14) Genes. xvi. 12.

(15) Ibid. xvi. 16.

(16) Ibid. xxi. 5.

the place, where she had laid Ishmael. An Angel came to her Relief, and discover'd a Well to her, where she fill'd her Bottle; and by this means she sav'd her Son's Life. She married him afterwards to an Egyptian Woman. Thus far the Scripture carries the History. Many of the Rabbins, pretend, without any Reason, that Agar is the same with Ketura, who was Abraham's Wife after the Death of Sarah (c). But this Error is much more tolerable than the ridiculous Superstition of the Saracens, who honoured the Stone, on which Agar [I], as they said, granted Abraham the last Favour, as an holy Relick. Their Writers do not mention the Reason; and acknowledge but a very remote Relation between Agar, and the Stone [K]. An Author, cited by Eusebius, certainly meant this Agar, when he said that Abraham married an Egyptian Servant-Maid, by whom he had twelve Children, who seiz'd on Arabia, and divided it among themselves (d). The Rabbins have advanced another Fable, to wit, that Ishmael came to Life again, before he was born; for, say they, his Mother lost her Fruit for a Punishment of her Vanity, and by the Fatigue of her Journey; but her deference for the Angel who advised her to bumble herself to her Mistress, obliged God to re-animate her Child. Cornelius à Lapide assure us in the 17th Page of his Commentary on the Pentateuch, that Tostatus believ'd this Story.

Calvin is fully accused of inveighing bitterly against Abraham and Sarah, on account of the Concubinage of Agar. But there is more Reason to say that St Austin's Apology for the Patriarch's Conduct is very weak. See the Remarks [I] and [K] of the Article SARAH.

Fact was misplaced; for it is expressly declared, that Sarah sent Ishmael away because she would not have him share the Inheritance with Isaac. And therefore Ishmael was not sent away 'till after Isaac was born; and consequently he was as able to seek for Water, as his Mother; he was no longer et non potuit vivere, an Infant to be carried upon Shoulders, &c. (21) I foresee that I shall be told, that neither the Translation of the LXX. nor the Vulgate import, That Ishmael was carried on his Mother's Back; and that it ought therefore to be concluded, that the Hebrew Text does not clearly favour my Supposition. With all my Heart; the rest of the Narrative is sufficient for me, and I submit it to the Judgment of every Reader, who considers the thing without Prejudice. Perhaps the best Solution would be to say, that, as they lived longer in those Ages, they did not come out of Childhood so soon as we: This would do very well, if it were not attended with the Consequence of making Ishmael twenty Years old when he was thrust out of doors; for, according to this Answer Isaac must have sucked longer, than they sucked in the Time of the Maccabees. Now in that Age Children sucked three Years (22); we ought therefore to acquiesce, with St Jerome, and many of the Moderns, in the old Hebrew Tradition, which I took notice of, to wit, that Isaac was not weaned 'till five Years of Age. Tho' I cannot but express my wonder, that they, who follow it (23), should not perceive the difficulty attending it; which does not cease to be very great, even supposing, as I do, that Isaac did not suck suck at the Breast so long as was usual in the time of the Maccabees.

[I] The Stone on which Agar, &c. What idle Stories! as if Abraham, who was a great Lord, and whose Retinue amounted to above three hundred Domesticks, able to bear Arms, could not provide a Bed for a Concubine of this kind. He did not take her, but at the Solicitation of his Wife; Sarah performed in some manner the Functions of the Paranymp; it was more like a Wedding, than any thing else; and yet they tell us, that a Marriage of this sort was consummated on a Stone. This Story might be probable enough, if it were related of a Master of a Family, who was afraid of his Wife, and whom a thousand reasons might induce to do the Feat by Stealth, and wherever Occasion offered; being persuaded, that if he missed his Opportunity, in hopes of a better, he might be disappointed for Life. However it be, we understand by Euthymius Zigabenus, that the Saracens honoured and kissed a Stone, which they called Brachtan, and when they were asked the Reason of it, some answered, it was, because Abraham knew Agar on that Stone; others, that it was, because he tied his Camel to it, when he prepared to offer up his Son Isaac (24). The same Author says, That this Stone was the Head of the Statue of Venus, the Deity, which the ancient Ishmaelites worshipped. The form of the Anatemas which a Saracen is obliged to recite who embraces Christianity, confirms this Author's Account; for it imports, that That Stone was the Image of Venus (25), and that the Saracens spoke of it as of a thing, which had served Abraham for the abovementioned Purposes. On this Occasion, I shall observe, that the Stone, which was worshipped by the Arabians, and which they took for the God Mari, was black and unheven. Τὸ δὲ ἄγαμα λίθος ἐστὶ μάλα τετραγώνος, ἀσύνθετος. — Simulacrum autem est lapis niger, quadratus, nullam figuram incisam habens (26). Ridetis temporibus prius Persas fluvium coluisse — INFORMEM Arabas lapidem (27). — You think it ridiculous, that in ancient Times the Persians worshipped a River — the Arabians an unheven Stone. Maximus Tyrius, who had seen it, says only, that it was square (28). The Mother of the Gods, whom the Phrygians adored with a very extraordinary Zeal, was nothing more than a plain Stone; and they gave only a Stone to the Roman Ambassadors, who desired to establish the Worship of that Divinity at Rome; "Is legatos comiter acceptos Pessimum in Phrygiam deduxit, sacrumque is lapidem, quem matrem Deam incolere esse dicebant tradidit, ac deportare Romam jussit (29)." How absurd soever the Idolatry of those was, who worshipped the Stone which Jacob set up for a Pillar, and anointed and consecrated to God (30); it was yet more tolerable, than That of the Saracens; for Jacob's Stone served him for a Pillow, in a Night, which he pass'd, as one may say, with God, the Dreams and Visions, with which he was entertained, representing heavenly Things in so lively a manner to him. The Saracens durst not have said so much, in relation to their pretended Stone of Agar. Scaliger has collected a great deal of curious Learning concerning this Stone of Jacob (31); but what the learned Pocock has said concerning That, which the Saracens honoured, is no less considerable. I am going to take some Notice of it.

[K] But a very remote Relation between Agar and that Stone. You must consult Pocock, if you would be exactly inform'd of their Religion hereupon (32). The black Stone, which they adore, is in the Temple of Mecca, in a Corner, two Cubits and one third from the Ground. They suppose that it was one of the precious Stones of Paradise, and that it descended from thence with Adam: that it was carried thither again at the Time of the Deluge; that it was sent into the World again, when Abraham built the Temple; and that the Angel Gabriel put it into the Hands of that Architect (33). It was, at first, whiter than Snow, and brighter than the Sun; but it became black, by being touched by a Woman who had her Menstruethers say, That the Sins of Men made it lose its Whiteness and Lustre; others affirm, that it was sullied by being much kissed and handled. It would be very difficult to prove from the Arabian Authors, what St John Damascenus and Euthymius assert, That there was a Venus's Head engraven upon it. There is another Stone, which they esteem sacred, and on which they pretend a Figure is to be seen; but it is a Figure of Feet, and not of a Head; it is the Print of Abraham's Feet, when he rested on that Stone, either, building the Temple (34), or while his Daughter-in-law (35) washed his Head, when he made

(c) Targum Jonathanis, Parnaphra's Hierosolym. Jarchius, R. Eliezer apud Heidegg. Hist. Patriarch. Tom. 2. pag. 136.

(21) That is to say, As Men go now, such Men as live in the degenerate days.

(22) The Mother of the Maccabees told her Son, that she suckled him three Years, 2 Maccab. vii. 37.

(23) Moreiri in this Number.

(24) Euthym. Zigab. in Parnaphra, apud Vossium de Orig. Idol. lib. 2. cap. 17. & lib. 1. cap. 39.

(d) Melito apud Alexand. Poly. Hist. cited by Euseb. Prep. Evang. lib. 9. cap. 19.

(25) Εἰς τὴν τῆς ἀποδομένης ἑστῆς. Veneris habere. See Vossius ibid. lib. 2. cap. 31. pag. 467. Edit. Francofurt.

(26) Suidas in voce ἄγαμα.

(27) Ammonius, lib. 6. pag. 196.

(28) Maximus Tyrius Dissert. 38. pag. 384.

(29) Livius lib. 39. cap. 11.

(30) Genes. xxviii. 18.

(31) Scaliger Animadv. in Euseb. n. 2150.

(32) Pocockii Notae in Specim. Hist. Arab. pag. 113, &c.

(33) See the Remark [F] of the Article O. A. B. A. H. A. M.

(34) Ex A. built.

(35) The Wife of Ishmael.

(36) Ex Ahmed Ebn Yusuf & Sa-fudino.

(37) In the Life of Ishmael.

(38) See the Article ABUD-HAHER.

made Ishmael a Visit (36). This last Stone is shut up in an Iron Chest. Ahmed Ebn Yusuf pretends to have seen and kiss'd it, and to have drank Water there out of the Well Zanzam, and to have taken notice, that the Print of the Right Foot is deeper than that of the Left, and that the Toes are as long as the Fingers of the Hand (37). They hid this Stone in one of the Hills of Mecca, when the Karmatians committed a thousand Profanations in the Temple, and carried the black Stone away (38). Now since Euthymius, and the Catechism for the Use of the converted Saracens, remark, That the Stone, on which it was pretended that Abraham had to do with Agar, or to which he tied his Camel, was in the middle of the Oratory, in medio huius ecclesie, this must not be understood of the Black Stone (for that is fix'd in a Corner of the Temple); but of the Stone, in which Abraham's Footsteps are to be seen. Besides, though no Arabian Writer says, That the Reason why they venerate that Stone, is, because it serv'd the Patriarch for the Purposes mentioned by Euthymius, we must believe, that the Tradition, which Euthymius speaks of, relates rather to the Stone, in which Abraham's Footsteps are imprinted, than to the Black Stone: from whence two Things are to be concluded. I. That Euthymius, and the Catechist of the Sara- acens, had not a distinct Knowledge of these People's Errors, as to the Worship of Stones. II. That the Arabian Writers did not acknowledge any near and direct Relation between Agar and the venerable Stones of Mecca. Agar is no farther concern'd in it, than inasmuch as Abraham set his Feet on it; while her Son Ishmael's Wife wash'd his Head. There is a third remarkable Stone at Mecca; it is white, and passes for Ishmael's Sepulchre; it is in a kind of Inclosure, near the Foundations of the Temple. From all these Particulars we may infer, That it is very easy to deceive a Man in Matters of Religion, and very difficult to undeceive him in them. He is fond of his Prejudices, and finds Leaders, who indulge him in them, and who say within themselves, "quando quidem populus vult decipi, decipiat. — Since the People will be impos'd upon, let them be impos'd upon." They find their Account in this, both in point of Authority and Profit: When the Difciple is become inveterate, the most disinterested fear, that the Remedy may prove worse than the Disease. These dare not cure the Wound, and it is the Interest of others, that it should not be cur'd. Thus an Abuse is perpetuated: Dishonest Men protect it; and honest Men tolerate it.

(f) Plato in Convivio, init. pag. 1174.

(g) Id. ib. pag. 11, 6.

(h) See Athen. lib. 5. pag. 217. & Calaub. in Athenæum, pag. 379.

(i) In his Convivium.

(j) Ælian. Var. Hist. lib. 14. cap. 13. See also Athen. lib. 5. pag. 187.

(k) Plato in Protagora, pag. 220. Athen. lib. 5. pag. 106. Ælian. lib. 2. c. 21.

(m) In the Remark [O] of the Article EURIPIDES. See the Scholiast of Aristoph. ubi supra.

(a) Plato in Protagora, pag. 220.

(b) Scholiast. Aristoph. in Rana, act. 1. scen. 2.

(c) Plato ib. & in Convivio, pag. 1175.

(d) Id. in Protagora, pag. 220.

(e) Ἀγαθὸς τῶν τραγῶν καὶ τῶν κωμικῶν. Moribus bonis, & mensis laetitia. Schol. Aristoph. ibid. See also Suidas in Ἀγαθῶν.

AGATHON, a Tragic and Comic Poet [A] Disciple of Prodicus (a), and Socrates (b), is greatly celebrated for his Beauty in Plato's Dialogue (c), in which he is farther commended for his Good Nature (d). Some Authors report, that he was a very Good Man, and that his Table was magnificent (e). Perhaps they found this on the splendid Entertainments he gave, after his first Tragedy had obtained the Prize (f), and he had been crowned in the Presence of above 30000 Men (g), in the 4th Year of the XCth Olympiad (h). Plato supposes, that the Discourses, which he recites, on the Nature of Love, in one of his Books (i), were held the day after that Solemnity, at the second Entertainment, which Agathon gave. The Pieces of This Poet were so full of Antitheses, that he reply'd one day to a Person, who was for expunging them, You are not aware, that you rob Agathon of himself (k). He was the Darling of Pausanias the Ceraman, and follow'd him to the Court of Archelaus, King of Macedon (l). He often quarrell'd with him; but it was with a view of affording him a more sensible Pleasure by their Reconciliation. Thus he explained himself to that Prince, who asked him the Cause of their frequent Quarrels, as Ælian informs us in the XXI Chapter of the Second Book of his Various History. I have taken notice, in another place (m), of what is related concerning Euripides's Passion for Agathon. The Answer of the former is misrepresented in the Historical Dictionaries [B]. The Scholiast of Aristophanes seems to assure us, that

Agathon

[A] A Tragic and Comic Poet.] No body questions his writing Tragedies; it will be sufficient therefore to prove, that he was a Writer of Comedies. For this I may appeal to the Scholiast of Aristophanes, on the second Scene of the first Act of the Fraags. "Οὐτως δ' Ἀγαθὸν κωμικοῦς καὶ τραγικοῦς διδάσκαλος. This Agathon, a Writer of Comedies, when Socrates taught. Observe, that he speaks of the same Poet, who is one of Plato's Interlocutors in the Feasts, and who most certainly compos'd Tragedies. I appeal likewise to these Words of Philostrophus, Καὶ Ἀγαθὸν διὰ τῆς τραγικῆς τέχνης, ὅν δ' κωμικῆς οὐκ ἔμελλεν καὶ κωμικῆς οὐκ ἔμελλεν τῶν λαμπρῶν γυναικῶν. (1). Agathon, the Tragic Poet, whom the Comic Muse acknowledged skillful and elegant, frequently imitates the Style of Gorgias in his Iambics. I am aware, that these Words may signify, that he was praised in Comedies; but they may be taken in this Sense, That he shew'd both his Capacity and Elegancy in the Comedies, which he compos'd. A learned Critic conjectures, That Socrates hinted at our Agathon, when he said, that it was the business of the same Poet to compose both Tragedies and Comedies; and that whoever has a Genius for Tragedy, is equally capable of excelling in Comedy (2). Τὴ δὲ αὐτῆς ἀντιθέσεως ἑνὶ κωμικῶν καὶ τραγικῶν ἐκείνου καὶ τῶν, καὶ τῶν τραγικῶν δὲ καὶ κωμικῶν ἑνὶ (3). Ejundem viri officium esse tragediarum comediarumque componere, eumque qui arte tragicus est esse quoque comicum. It is, I think, to multiply Beings unnecessarily, to give us a Comic Poet Agathon, different from ours. It is what Vossius (4), Moreri, Hofman, &c. have done.

[B] The Answer of the former is misrepresented in the Historical Dictionaries.] I have set it in it's true Light, in another Place (5): the following is a very confused Account of it: " Agatho Philosophus Pythago- ricus, frequens antithesis, adhibuit quondam convivio Archelao rege, cujus erat familiarissimus, interrogatque ab eo, cum jam esset annorum 80, si robur adhuc illum servaret? Sane, inquit, non solum ver, sed autem etiam bona & prospera tem adferre (6). — Agatho, the Pythagorean Philosopher, a great Lover of Antitheses, being once invited to a Banquet by King Archelaus, who'd whom he was very intimate, and being asked by him whether, at the Age of fourscore, he yet retained any Vigour; reply'd, surely not only the Spring, but the Autumn, is wont to produce good things and Prosperity." Let us reckon up the Mistakes of this Account. I. The Agathon, who was fond of Antitheses, and was in the Court of Archelaus, was not a Pythagorean. II. He was but about forty Years of Age, when Archelaus gave occasion for the above-mentioned Reply (7). III. It was not Agathon, but Euripides, who gave this Answer. IV. The Question did not turn upon personal Strength; but upon Beauty; and the Answer had no regard to the Goods of Fortune. V. It would be an Absurdity to take the Age of eighty Years for the Autumn of Life. VI. I believe no Philosopher, of the Sect of Pythagoras, was called Agathon. All these Faults of Charles Stephens are to be found in the second Edition of Lloyd; may we see the pretended Testimony of Ælian more exactly remark'd in it (8). This Exactness is prejudicial to the Author; for, since he was not ignorant in what Chapter the Fact was to be found, he is more inexcusable in copying all the Mistakes of the Dictionary which he undertook to correct. Mr Hofman followed him Letter by Letter, and distinguish'd between this Agathon and Him, who was at the Court of Archelaus. Mr Moreri speaks also of a Pythagorean Philosopher, named Agathon, who, at the Age of eighty Years,

(6) Charles Stephens in the Word AGATHO. pag. 117.

(7) See the Article EURIPIDES, ubi supra.

(8) Ælian. Var. Hist. lib. 13. cap. 4. Lloyd in the Word AGATHO.

Agathon died at the Court of Archelaus (C); and we may conclude from the Words of Aristophanes, that he was not living, when the Comedy of the Frogs was acted [D], that is in the second Year of the XCIII^d Olympiad (N). There remains nothing of Agathon but what we find in Aristotle, in Athenaus, &c. who cited him. They are beautiful Sentences enough, and confirm what has been said of his Passion for Antitheses [E]. I shall give an Instance of them, wherein we meet with a very judicious Maxim relating to the Deceitfulness of Appearances [F]. Aristophanes satirizes answered that Monarch, That the Autumn produced Flowers and Fruits, as well as the Spring. He mentions afterwards Agathon, a Tragic Poet; and Agathon a Comic Poet.

[C] That Agathon died at the Court of Archelaus. Ἀρχαλαὺς τῷ βασιλεὶ μέχρι τελευτῆς μετὰ πολλοῦν συνην ἐν Μακεδονίᾳ (9). That is, He lived with many others in Macedonia at the Court of King Archelaus until his Death. This may either signify, 'till the Death of Archelaus, or 'till the Death of Agathon. For which Reason I do not give these Words as a certain Proof.

[D] That he was not living, when the Comedy of the Frogs was acted. We find these four Verses there,

HP. Ἀγάθων δὲ πῶς εἶναι; ΔΙ. ἀπολαύων μὲν ἀποίχεται, Ἀγάθος ποιητὴς, καὶ πεδινὸς τοῖς φίλοις.

HP. Ποῖ γὰρ εἰ τάχυναι; ΔΙ. ἐς μακρὸν ἰουχλαί (10).

HE. But where is Agatho?

BA. He has left me, and is gone. — A good Poet, and dear to his Friends.

HE. Unhappy Man! to what Country is he gone?

BA. To the Banquet of the Gods.

[E] What has been said of his Passion for Antitheses. Kubnius has given us three Sentences of Agathon, as a Specimen of his Taste (11). The two first were cited by Aristotle, and the other by Athenaus. The Sense of the latter is, If I tell you the Truth, I shall not please you; and if I please you, I shall not tell you the Truth (12). Those cited by Aristotle signify, the one, that the only impossible thing with God is, to cause, That what has been created, should not have been created (13); the other, That Fortune loves Art, and Art loves Fortune (14). Vossius imagin'd, that this last Sentence belong'd to Agathon the Comic Poet (15); but he had better have ascrib'd it to the Tragedian, and have observ'd, that the Spirit of Antitheses adjudges it to him. I say this without pretending, that it is certain that Agathon, the Tragic Poet, differs from Agathon the Comic Poet. Mr Moreri copied Vossius, according to Custom. I wonder Kubnius did not produce this;

Τὸ μὲν πάρος ποτε ἔργον ἐς παντὸς αἵμα,
Τὸ δ' ἔργον ἐς πάρος ποτε ἰκνησάμεθα (16).

Operis loco ducimus accessorium,
Et in opere satagimus ut accessorio.

[F] A very judicious Maxim on the Deceitfulness of Appearances. Agathon observes, That it is likely several Things may happen, which are not likely. Εὐδὸς γινέσθαι πολλά καὶ παρὰ τὸ εὐδὸς. Verisimile ἂν εἴ multa fieri præter verisimile. Thus Vossius reports this Sentence; and he observes, that Aristotle alleg'd it in more than one Place (17). That great Philosopher cited it in the following manner, in the 24th Chapter of the 2^d Book of his Rhetoric.

Τὰς ἐν τοῖς εὐδὸς αὐτὸ τὸ τῶν ἀνὰ λόγους
Βροτοῖσι πολλά τυγχάνειν ἐκ τινος (18).

Fortasse aliquis verisimile id ipsum esse dixarit,
Mortalibus multa evenire non verisimilia.

We may compare, with this Maxim, that of Se Bernard; Ordinatum est, minus interdum ordinatum fieri (19); that is, 'It is very consistent with Order, that sometimes things should be done out of Order.' Mr de Balzac reports this Thought so ill, that of a very fine Maxim he makes frightful Untruth: 'The Affairs of the World, says he (20), sometimes alter their Course, and go into an unusual Channel; and though this is only likely, as Agathon said, That many things happen against Likelihood, nevertheless, generally speaking, like Enterprizes produce like Events: The Adverb only produces a Monster here, and if it was an Error of the Press (21), I wonder the Corrector was not startled at it. For what is more monstrous, than to maintain, that it is never probable that a thing should happen agreeable to probability? This is the fine Axiom ascribed to our Agathon, in the Prince of Balzac: but the Sequel of the Discourse shews, that if the Poet's Thought was marr'd on the Paper, it was not so in the Mind of the Writer: It is certain that Mr de Balzac meant to say, with Agathon, that this very Thing is likely, that many Things happen against likelihood. Euripides was so fond of this Maxim, that he has repeated it five Times; for, as Mr Coffar says (22), he ended his Medea, his Alceste, his Andromache, his Bacchæ, and his Helena, with the following Sentence;

Πολλὰ δ' ἀλάττω κραινέει θεός, καὶ τὰ δοκῶντι' οὐ δεικνύσθαι.
Ὅν δ' ἀδελφῶν περὶν αἶψαν βούε'

The meaning is, The Gods sport with human Foresight, and equally deceive our Hopes and our Fears. Sometimes they divert Events which all Men expected, and, opening Passages and Ways unknown, make Designs to succeed, which were in Appearance impossible. Seneca made a very good use of this Thought, to encourage those who are terrify'd at the likely and probable Approaches of ill Fortune. How many things, says he, have happened, which no body expected? How many others have never appear'd, tho' every body expected them? Nothing is so sure among those things, which we fear, but it is yet more certain, that our Fears and our Hopes prove sometimes groundless. Seneca's Words are more strong: It will be better to transcribe them. "Verisimile est aliquid futurum mali? Non statim verum est. Quam multa non expectata venerunt, quam multa expectata nunquam comparuerunt? — multa interveniunt, quibus vicinum periculum vel prope ademptum, aut sublatum, aut desinat, aut in alienum caput transeat — habet etiam mala fortuna levitatem: Fortasse erit, fortasse non erit. Interim dum non est, meliora propone — nihil tam certum est ex his quæ timeantur, ut non certius sit & formidatâ subfidere, & sperata decipere (23). —

Is any Misfortune likely to befall you? It does not therefore immediately become certain. How many unexpected things have come to pass? How many look'd for Events have never happen'd? — Many things intervene, by which an approaching Danger may stop short, or cease to be a Danger, or fall upon another Head. — Even ill Fortune has her Fickleness: Perhaps it will be; perhaps it will not be. In the mean time, whilst it is not, hope the best. — Nothing, in all the Ills we dread, is so certain, but it is still more so, that what we fear sometimes vanishes, and what we hope for sometimes disappoints us." Cardinal Palavicin is very angry with Fra Paolo, who took the Reception of the Doctrine of Zuinglius by the Evangelical Cantons, as a manifest Proof, that an higher Cause, than Zuinglius, was the influencing Motive. I omit Palavicin's Reflexions, but shall copy what he borrows from Aristotle, namely, That it happens sometimes, that the most probable things are fall; for if they were always separated from Fallhood, they would be certain and not probable. I am going to shew, that he builds upon this Maxim, when he accuses those of Rashness and Presumption, who pretend to judge of the Providence of God. Such a Person is a devout Christian, therefore he is predestinated to Salvation: Such a Person is a Mahometan, and wicked, therefore he is predestinated to Damnation. Rash Consequences, and which are often groundless! This is Cardinal Palavicin's Remark: The whole Passage is as follows. "Per tanto chi ascrive le prosperità della miglior causa ad una volontà che dio habbia di farla stabilmente prevalere alla rea, discorre con pietà probabile e leggiera: quantunque talora s'ingannî, secondo il suo segnamiento

(21) Statement instead of surmised. Note that there are some Galconisms between the sequel of the sequel of the sequel.

(22) Coffar. Sequel of the Defence of Voiture, pag. 406.

(23) Seneca Epist. 24. pag. 187.

(N) See Sam. Petit's Miscellany, lib. 1. cap. 14. pag. 50.

(9) Schol. Aristophan. in Ranas, act. 1. sc. 2.

(10) Aristophan. in Ranas, act. 1. sc. 2. ver. 83.

(11) Gultum antithetorum Agathonis dare possumus. Kubnius in Eudam. lib. 14. cap. 13. pag. 735.

(12) Athen. lib. 5. c. 13. pag. 311.

(13) Aristot. Eth. Eudamior. lib. 7. cap. 2. pag. 182.

(14) Id. ib. cap. 4. pag. 183.

(15) Vossius de Poet. Gr. pag. 59.

(16) Agath. apud Athen. lib. 5. init.

(17) Vossius Instit. Poet. lib. 1. p. 16.

(18) Agathon apud Aristot. Rhetor. lib. 2. cap. 24. pag. 448.

(19) Bernardi Epist. 276. ad Eugen. III.

(20) Balzac in his Prince, n. 142. pag. 100. Edit. of Rouen in 1632. 4to.

rises him severely on account of his Morals, in one of his Comedies (o). I believe we ought to distinguish him from that Agathon, whom the Philosopher Plato lov'd so tenderly [G]. The Mistake of Budæus was doubtless voluntary, when he said in the 27th Chapter of the Institution of a Prince; that Euripides kiss'd a Lady, at Archelaus's Table, who was called the Fair Agatha.

(o) In Theophrastus.

“segnamento del Filosofo: Che talvolta il più probabile è falso; perciôche se da falsità fosse esente, non saria probabile, mà certo. E se basta il potersi ingannare accioche ogni giudicio, quantunque dubitativo della Providenza divina chiamasi presuntuoso; chiamerassi presuntuoso chiun que dall'averlo Dio fatto nascere fra Christiani e viver devotamente, prende conghietura che l'habbia destinato alla vita eterna; e' contrario s'avvisi di chi nacque Saraceno e vive scelerato: Essendo manifesto poter succedere che il primo si dannì, e' secondo si salvi (24). — Thus he, who ascribes the Success of the better Cause to the Immediate Influence of Heaven, reasons probably and justly; tho' he may sometimes be deceived; according to the Sentiment of the Philosopher, that the most probable Thing sometimes prove false, because, if it were exempt from Falsity, it would not be probable, but certain. Now, if the bare Possibility of being mistaken renders all Judgment concerning divine Providence, though express'd with Doubt, presumptuous, certainly it is great Presumption in any one to imagine, that because he is born a Christian, and lives devoutly, therefore he is predestin'd by God to eternal Life, and to judge the contrary of ones who is born a Saracen, and lives wickedly; it being evidently possible, that the former may be damn'd, and the latter sav'd.”

(24) Palavi-
cin. Istor.
del. Conci-lio, lib. 3.
cap. 8. in fine. p. 303.

Not only the Physicians, but the News-Writers, likewise, ought to profit by the Sentence of Agathon. A Professor of Leipst exhorts Physicians not to speak without much Precaution, if they would do Honour to Physic. He would not have them promise too much, nor terrify their Patients so greatly, but speak always conditionally, and with a perhaps (25). All this, in virtue of Seneca's Maxim produc'd above. The like Advice may be given to your great Coffee-House Politicians: I mean those among them, who have a good deal of Sagacity and Judgment. Their Conjectures are generally right; nor have they often occasion to repent of their decisive Air, with which they deride the Hopes or Threats of the Gazetteers. This gives them a still greater Boldness to reject magnificently every piece of News, which shocks Probability; but they are sometimes mistaken; for the Event confirms, upon some Occasions, the most impertinent and the most extravagant News that can be reported, and which they had condemn'd as Chimera's, or as Things inconsistent with the Wisdom, which had till then appear'd in the Councils of the State. This Rule is not always safe, and sometimes enflames those Reasoners upon public Affairs, who trust too much to it. It is therefore Prudence to act considerately, and not to pronounce definitive Decrees, under pretence of having the most plausible Appearances on our side. But if in this Case it is not reasonable to play the Dictator, what Blame do not they deserve, who promise the greatest Successes, against all Appearances, and publish these Promises as grounded on St John's Revelation?

(25) Bibl.
Universelle,
Tom. 4. p.
80, 81. in the Extr. of the Miscellaneous Curiosa Medica of Christianus Lan-gus.

[G] From that Agathon, whom the Philosopher Plato lov'd so tenderly. That Philosopher compos'd a very tender Distich, and so full of Sense, that a Latin Poet found Matter in it for seventeen Verses. Let us transcribe a whole Chapter of Aulus Gellius here (26). “Celebrantur duo isti Græci versiculi, mul- torumque doctorum hominum memoria dignantur, quod sunt lepidissimi & venustissimi brevitas. Ne- que adeo pauci sunt veteres scriptores, qui eos Pla- tonis esse Philosophi affirmant; quibus ille adole-

(26) Aulus
Gellius, lib.
7. cap. 11.

scens luserit, quum tragicædis quoque eodem tem- pore faciendis præluderet.

Τὴν ψυχὴν, Ἀγάθων φιλῶν, ἐπὶ χεῖλεσιν ἔσχεν.

Ἦαυτο γὰρ ἢ τὰ ἡμῶν ὡς διαβαρομένην (27).

“Hoc distichon amicus meus, ois ἄμωρος adolescens, in pluris verculos licentius liberiusque verit: qui quoniam mihi quidem vix sunt non esse me- moratu indigni, subdidi.

(27) Note
that Diogen.
Laertius, lib.
3. n. 32.

— says, mentioning both two Greek Verses, that they were made by Plato for Agathon: They are thus translated in the Greek and Latin Editions of Dio-genes Laertius.
Suavia dans Agathon, animam ipse in labra tenebram?
Ægea ete-rnam prop-ians tanquam abituia fuit.

Dum semihulco savio
Meum puellum favior;
Dulcècque florem spiritus
Duco ex aperto tramite:
Animula ægra & faucia
Cucurrit ad labias mihi,
Rictumque in oris pervium;
Et labra pueri mollia;
Rimata itineri transitus,
Ut transiret nictur.
Tum si moræ quid plusculæ
Fuisset in cœta osculi;
Amoris igni percita Transisset, & me liqueretur:
Et mira prorsum res foret,
Ut ad me fierem mortuus,
Ad puerum at intus viverem.

“That Greek Distich is much celebrated, and thought worthy of being recorded by many learned Men, as being most witty and most beautifully concise. Nor are there a few among the antient Writers, who affirm it was compos'd by Plato the Philosopher; with which he diverted himself in his Youth, and at a time when he was making Essays towards Tragedy.”

Τὴν ψυχὴν, Ἀγάθων φιλῶν &c.

My Soul (in kissing Agathon)
Flies to my Lips, and would be gone.

“A young Gentleman, a Friend of mine (no Enemy to the Muse), has paraphras'd this Distich in several Verses; which, as they seem to me not unworthy of being produc'd, I have here subjoin'd.

Dum semihulco savio, &c.

Whilst on thy Lips, to taste the Bliss,
I print the burning, amorous Kiss,
And drink thy balmy Breath; my Soul,
Thro' Love impatient of controul,
Mounts to my Lips in extasy,
And fain would pass, to dwell in Thee.
If, then, Dear Youth, we should delay,
And on the Kiss prolong our stay,
The wanton Thing would take her Flight, Struck with Love's Fire, and leave me quite;
And strange would my Condition be,
Dead in myself, but yet alive in Thee.

Observe that Plato was but fourteen Years of Age, when our Poet Agathon obtained the Prize of Tragedy, so that it is not very likely, that he shew'd for him, but for an Agathon much younger (28).

(28) Athen.
lib. 5. cap.
13. p. 217.

AGESILAUS, the first of the Name, King of Sparta, succeeded his Father Doryssus, who was the fifth King from Eurythbenes. The Reign of this Agésilæus was very long [A], and yet it affords an Historian scarce any materials. The Histories of

[A] Was very long. In saying this, I rely more on the Authority of Eusebius than on that of Pausanias. The latter assures us, that Doryssus, and his Son Agésilæus, did but just shew themselves on the Throne; δι' οὗτος οὖτος τὸ χρόνον ἐπὶ τῆς βασιλείας ἀνέστησαν. — Death soon seized them both (1). But Eusebius makes them reign seventy three Years: he gives twenty nine Years to the Father's Reign, and forty four

(1) Pausan.
lib. 3. p. 82.

(a) The Reign of Agesilaus began in the Year of the World 2997, according to Helvicus, 24 Years after the Death of Solomon.

of those Remote Times (a) have not been preserved. Pausanias ought not to have said, that Lycurgus gave Laws to Lacedæmon [B] in this Reign (b). Charles Stephens, (b) Pausan. lib. 3. pag. 82. Lloyd and Hofman confound this Agesilaus with Agesilaus II. for they say of the latter, that he was the Sixth King of Lacedæmon.

to the Son's. Caloifus quotes Pausanias for this Duration: This is to make a judicious Choice of one's Witnesses,

[B] That Lycurgus gave Laws to Lacedæmon.]

Meurfius proves, in his Antiquities of Lacedæmon, that Lycurgus published his Laws in the thirtieth Year of Archeblaus, the Son and Successor of Agesilaus.

AGESILAUS, the second of the Name, King of the Lacedæmonians, was the Son of Archidamus. He had perhaps Ambition enough to desire the Kingdom in exclusion of his elder Brother Agis; but, however that be, it was not perceived, till after the Death of Agis, that he was desirous the Order of Succession should be broke in upon for his sake. This Desire had all the Success he could expect; for they did Leotychides, Son of Agis, the Injustice [A] to exclude him from the Crown in Favour of Agesilaus (a). The latter repaired by a great number of fine Actions what was irregular in this first step, and tho' he was of a diminutive Stature, an unpromising Aspect, and lame [B], he justly acquired the Reputation of a great Captain. He was brave, vigilant, and ready; he improved every Advantage to the utmost, and knew how to make the best use of Occurrences; he understood all the Stratagems of War, and he had the Art of deceiving his Enemies, at the same time that he let them know his

[A] They did Leotychides — the Injustice.} We cannot give their Treatment of him any other Name, if we examine well the Reasons of it. Agesilaus did not deny, but that, according to the Laws of the Country, the Crown belonged to his Brother's Son; but he maintained that Leotychides was not the Son of Agis; and made use of these two Methods of Proof. He said in the first Place, that Timea, the Mother of Leotychides, was so fond of Alcibiades, who had fled to Lacedæmon for Refuge, that her Husband suspected, that the Child, which she had some time after, had no other Father, than that Gallant. This concerned Leotychides. It was of Him that Timea was delivered about that Time: It was He, whom Agesilaus did not acknowledge for his Son but on his Death-bed. Agesilaus alleged in the second Place the Testimony of Neptune. He said, That Agis was driven from his Wife's Bed by an Earthquake, and that Timea was brought to Bed of Leotychides above ten Months after (1). These two Reasons stand for nothing; the Maxim, Pater est quem nuptiæ demonstrant. — Wedlock makes the Father, ruins them entirely. If, whenever a Husband takes Umbrage at seeing his Wife pleased with the Visits, or private Conversations, of a Stranger, he should exclude from the Inheritance the Children born about that Time. What a Confusion would it introduce? Therefore, though it should be true what an Historian says, That Timea made no Scruple of calling her Son by the Name of Alcibiades, before her Women, instead of Leotychides (2), nothing could be legally concluded from this Fact in favour of Agesilaus. Timea herself ought to have declared what she meant by this Language (3), and whether she used it in earnest, or by way of insult, or merely in jest. Much less could they have alleged the Indifference of Alcibiades, if it had been true that he boasted of his Familiarity with Timea, not thro' a Principle of Gallantry, but out of an Ambition of giving Kings to Lacedæmon (4). An hundred Reasons of this kind ought not to have balanced the Act, by which Agis acknowledged Leotychides for his Son, in the Presence of good Witnesses, on his Death-bed. The second Reason of Agesilaus was an idle Story; for let Neptune be never so much the cause of Earthquakes, how could it be proved, that Agis durst not lie with Timea after the Earthquake in question? A Lying in ten Months after the last Careless of an Husband (5), is no Proof in Law. The Maxim, Pater est quem nuptiæ demonstrant, and the Decisions of Physicians, remove all Suspicions. So that it may be said that the Lacedæmonians, a People who piqued themselves upon a very rigid Morality, took away a Crown for Reasons, which, in a well regulated Court, would have been insufficient to have excluded a Man from the Inheritance of an Acre of Land. But the Misfortune of Leotychides was, that Lyfander the most intriguing, the most deceitful, and the most factious of all Men, who had gained a Reputation in the City proportionable to his Abilities, and the Victories which he had obtained over the Enemies, took it in his Head to calise Agesilaus to be crowned (6). No fundamental Law can hold against such Persons: If you allege the Divine Law to them, they explain it their own way. This Lyfander did, when he heard that a Prophet of Lacedæmon would have pleaded, in favour of Leotychides, an Oracle, which forbade the Lacedæmonians to suffer a lame Person to reign. This, says Lyfander, does not relate to the Defects of the Feet, but the Defects of the Blood; and it is Leotychides, who would make your Kingdom bald, not being of the Race of your Kings.

[B] Tho' he was of a diminutive Stature, an unpromising Aspect, and lame.} He was always the first to rally his own Lameness (7), as is commonly practised by Men of Wit in the like case; by which means they disconcert the Schemes of the Laughers. "Materia petulantibus, & per contumeliam urbanis detrahitur, si ultro illam & prior occupas. Nemo alius risum præbuit, qui ex se cepit. Vatinium hominem natum & ad risum, & ad odium, scurram suis se venustum ac dicacem, memoria proditum est. In pedes suos ipse plurima dicebat, & in fauces concisas: Sic inimicorum, quos plures habebat quam morbos, & in primis Ciceronis urbanitatem, effugit (8). — The Invidious of the ill-natured, and the Railery of the Witty, are disappointed by being beforehand with them. No one is liable to be laughed at by others, who first laughs at himself. Vatinius, a Man designed by Nature the common Object of Ridicule and Contempt, is reported to have been an ingenious and talkative Droll. He was always jesting upon his own Feet, and his little Mouth: Thus he escaped the Ridicule of his Enemies, of whom he had more in Number than Diseases, and particular of Cicero." The Pleasantry of Agesilaus, and the Strength wherewith he endured the most painful Exercises, made amends for all his bodily Defects (9), for without these his despicable Outside would have been very prejudicial to him. Αἰγύλας ὡς ἐν ἑαυτῷ καὶ ἐν ἑστέῳ εὐκαταφρόνως. He is said to have been small of Stature and of a contemptible Aspect (10). The Ephori had fined his Father for having married a little Woman (11), from whence they concluded would spring but a diminutive Race of Kings. Cornelius Nepos speaks more expressly of Agesilaus's ill Mein than Plutarch. "Atque hic tantus vir, says he (12), ut naturam faultricem habuerat in tribuendis animi virtutibus, sic maleficam natum est in corpore, exiguis & claudus altero pede, quæ res etiam nonnullam afferebat deformitatem; atque ignoti faciem ejus cum intueretur, contemnebant. — This great Man, as he experienced Nature's favourable in bestowing on him the Virtues of the Mind, so he found her unpropitious in regard to his Body, being little and lame of one Foot, which rendered him in some manner deformed; inasmuch that those who were unacquainted with him, at first sight were apt to despise him." Never was the minus præsentia samam more true than with

(6) Plot. ubi supra.

(7) Plot. lib. 3. pag. 59. E.

(8) Seneca de Constantia Sapientis, cap. 17. pag. 692.

(9) Plot. in Agesil. pag. 596.

(10) Id. ib.

(11) Id. ib.

(12) Corn. Nepos in eum Vita, cap. 3.

(a) Mitrap. p. 597. & Xenoph. de Rebus Græcis, lib. 3. pag. 214.

(1) Ex Plot. in Agesil. p. 597. & Xenoph. de Rebus Græcis, lib. 3. pag. 214.

(2) Doris, apud Plot. ubi supra.

(3) According to the Maxims of the Law, the Evidence which a Person gives against himself is not received.

(4) Plot. in Agesil. pag. 214.

(5) Note, that the Antients allowed ten Months for the Term of Child-bearing; Matræ longa decem menses, Virg. Ecl. 4. ver. 61. & La Cærdæ upon that Passage.

his True Intentions [C]. He was desirous they shou'd understand the Trade of Arms; otherwise it wou'd have been difficult for him to have drawn them into his Snares (b). He had the Art likewise of deceiving his own Soldiers, by giving them, instead of the bad News he received, a fictitious Relation of some great Triumph (c). This deserves to be remarked, to undeceive those, who believe, that it is only since the Invention of the Gazette, that the Public has been imposed upon in this way. As soon as Agesilaus was on the Throne, he advised the Lacedemonians to prevent the King of Persia, who was making great Preparations for War, and to attack him in his own Dominions (d). He was chosen for this Expedition, and gained so many Advantages over the Enemy, that if the League, which the Athenians and Thebans had formed against Lacedemon, had not crossed his Enterprizes, he would have carried his victorious Arms into the Center of the Persian Monarchy. He quitted all these Triumphs with a good Grace, to come to the Assistance of his Country, and freed it very fortunately, by the Battel which he gained over the Allies in Boeotia [D]. He gained another Battel near Corinth (e); but he afterwards had the Vexation to see the Thebans obtain signal Victories over the Lacedemonians. These Misfortunes raised many Malecontents against him; but, after all, they did not obscure his Glory. He had been sick during the first Advantages, which the Enemy gain'd (f); and when he was fit for Action, he prevented, by his Valour and Prudence, the Consequences of the last Victories of the Thebans; insomuch that it was the general Opinion, that, had he been in Health at the beginning of the War, the Lacedemonians would not have been worsted, and that they would have been entirely subdued in the end without him (g). It cannot be denied that he loved War, more than the Interests of his Subjects required (h); for if he could have lived in Peace, he would have saved his Country many Losses, and would not have engaged it in Undertakings, which ended only in a very great Diminution of the Power of the Lacedemonians. This insatiable Thirst for War and Slaughter, push'd him, in his old Age, on an Enterprize, which was generally disapproved (i). He was above eighty Years of Age, when he undertook to lead Troops into Egypt, to support Tacbus, who had revolted against the Persians. But, being disgusted at Tacbus, he forsook him to take the part of Neftanabus, a Relation of Tacbus, whom he powerfully assisted; after which he designed to return to Lacedemon; but he died of a Fit of Sickness by the Way, in the third Year of the CIVth Olympiad [E]. He was Eighty four Years of Age, whereof he had reigned Forty one (k). Mr Moreri has committed

(b) Plut. in Agesilao, pag. 617. E.

(c) Ibid. pag. 605. Xenophon. de Rebus Græcis, lib. 4. pag. 224.

(d) Cornel. Nepos in Agesil. vita, cap. 2.

(e) Ex Cornel. Nepote, ibid.

(f) Plut. in Agesil. pag. 611. B.

(g) Talem se imperatorem prebuit, ut eo tempore omnibus apparuerit, nisi ille fuisset, Spartam futuram non fuisse. Corn. Nep. ibid. cap. 6.

(h) Plut. in Agesil. pag. 616. B.

(i) Id. ib. C.

(k) Plut. p. 617, 618. Corn. Nepos in Agesil.

respect to him. Fame went before him into Egypt, and represented him there under the most pompous Ideas. As soon as they heard of his landing, they ran in Crowds to see him: Judge then how they were surprized, to see a little Man lie on the Grass in a mean and slovenly Garment. They could not forbear laughing, and applying to him the Fable of the Mountain, which brought forth a Moufe (13). Their Contempt was not lessened, when they saw the Choice he made of the Refreshments sent him by the King (14). See below the Remark [G].

[C] He deceived his Enemies, at the same time that he let them know his true Intentions. The Reason was, They did not believe so expert a General would discover his Designs. "Vidit, si quo esset iter facturus palam pronunciaisset, hostes non credituros, aliasque regiones occupaturos, nec dubitatu aliquid esse facturum ac pronunciaisset. Itaque cum ille Sardis se iturum dixisset, Tissaphernes eandem Cariam defendendam putavit (15). He knew that if he publicly declared the Rout he was about to take, the Enemy would not believe him, and would post themselves in a quite different Place, nor would doubt of his acting contrary to his Declaration. Accordingly, when he gave out, that he would march to Sardis, Tissaphernes thought proper to stay and defend Caria." We should improperly apply here the Thought of Mr Wicquefort: Sir George Downing, Ambassador of England, had not Probity nor Prudence enough to be persuaded, that no Minister deceives more securely nor more pleasingly, than he who never deceives; because in keeping the High-road, those, who look for By-ways and Evasions, can never meet him (16). The Comparison between such a Minister, and our Agesilaus, would be a very lame one; for this King of Lacedemon, in publishing his Intentions, deceived his Enemies, only because on other Occasions he had concealed his Intentions. A General, who pursues this Scheme, can seldom make use of a more successful Stratagem, than that of spreading a true Report of his Marches. The Contrivance will be good, because it is new, and the Enemy has not yet been deceived by it. Read this Passage of Xenophon; it is Cambyles who speaks to his Son, Cyrus, and who compares new Stratagems in War to new Airs of Music. Καὶ σφέτερά μὲν καὶ ἐν τοῖς μουσικοῖς τὰ νέα ὑδοιμαί, τοὺς δὲ καὶ ἐν τοῖς πολεμικοῖς μάλλον τὰ καινὰ μηχανήματα ὑδοιμαί, ταῦτα γὰρ μάλλον καὶ ἱκανατέρῃ δύνανται τοὺς πολέμιους (17). And as in Music what is new is most esteemed, so in War the newest Stratagems are the best; for they are most likely to deceive the Enemy. We shall observe in another Place (18), that some Men, by dint of Folly, avoid being imposed on.

[D] Which he gained over the Allies in Boeotia. The Battle was fought at Coronea. Xenophon, who served under Agesilaus in it, gives the same Account (19); as does Plutarch (20). Lambinus, in his Commentary on these Words of Cornelius Nepos, apud Coroneam quos omnes gravi prælio vicit, would, without necessity, correct the Word Καρφώναν of Plutarch, by that of Κορυναίαν. Plutarch mentioned these two Places, without pretending, that the Battle was fought in the first. But, says Lambinus, could Agesilaus, going from Phocis, advance into Boeotia, as far as Chæronea, if Chæronea is in Phocis? No, doubtless; but this I F is false, and Lambinus shews by it, that he was but little versed in Geography. See the Commentary of Kirchmaierus on Cornelius Nepos, at pag. 722. Charles Stephens erred yet more grossly, when he placed Chæronea in Peloponnesus. Lloyd and Hofman followed him in this Error.

[E] He died of a Fit of Sickness by the Way, in the third Year of the hundred and fourth Olympiad. A Storm having obliged him to put into Harbour, he was carried into a Desert Place, called the Port of Menelaus, where he died (21). Hic cum ex Ægypto revertetur — venissetque in portum qui Menelai vocatur, jacens inter Cyrenas & Ægyptum, in morbum implicitus decessit (22). It was in the third Year of the hundred and fourth Olympiad, according to Calvisius: But we see by this, that his Calculation is false; for from the third Year of the Ninety fifth Olympiad, the beginning, as he says, of the Reign of Agesilaus, to the third Year of the hundred and fourth Olympiad, there are but thirty six Years: And yet he allows forty one Years to that

(17) Xenophon. Cyropæd. circa fin. pag. 21.

(18) In one of the Remarks of the Article S I M O N I D E S.

(19) Xenophon. de Rebus Græcis. lib. 4. pag. 225.

(20) Plut. in Agesil. pag. 605.

(21) Plut. pag. 618.

(22) Corn. Nepos. in Vit. Agesil. sub fin.

(13) Plut. ibid. p. 616. See the Article TACHUS.

(14) Corn. Nepos, ubi supra.

(15) Ibid. cap. 3. See also Plutarch in Agesilaus, pag. 600. F.

(16) Wicquefort's Ambassador, pag. 170.

(1) Plut. in Agell. See also Cicero's Epist. ad Famil. 12. lib. 5. pag. 260. Edit. Grev.

mited some Mistakes here [F]. We shall see in the Article CONON, whether Cornelius Nepos and Justin have done their part in the History of Agellus. This Prince would never suffer his Effigies to be made either in Relievo, or in Flat-Painting (1); nay he forbid it by his Last Will. Some have been of Opinion, that he did this, because he was sensible he was not a handsome Man, diffidens forma sua (m). Never any Person lived in greater Simplicity than he [G]. But he knew very well how to couch the Spirit, the Heart, and the Religion of a Sovereign [H], under this

(m) Apul. in Apolog. pag. 282.

outside

(23) See the Remark [A] concerning the two first Mistakes.

(24) I do not believe that there was a City called Hierone, either in Boetia, or any where else.

(25) See the Remark [B].

(26) Plut. in Agell. pag. 503. C.

(27) Id. ib. pag. 606.

(28) He had done better to have said Aristodemus, as Plutarch did, for Agellus did not descend from Eurythene, but from Procles, the second Son of Aristodemus.

(29) Corn. Nepos, c. 7.

(30) Plut. in Agell. pag. 616.

(31) Corn. Nepos, ubi supra, cap. 8.

(32) Plut. in Apophth. pag. 210. See also Aristodemus, lib. 24. pag. 657.

Reign. Let us then place the beginning of it, with Heliclus, in the second Year of the Ninety third Olympiad, and the end in the third Year of the hundred and fourth.

[F] Mr Moretti has committed some Mistakes here. It is false; I. That Leotyche was the Natural Son of King Agis. II. That Lysander zealously maintained Leotyche's Pretensions (23). III. That Agellus ever encamped near the City of Hierone, in Boetia (24). IV. That he had a noble Prefence, and full of Majesty (25). V. That he said, That the Oracle which excluded the Lame from the Crown, ought to be understood of the Imperfections of the Mind, or of Birth. These two last Faults belong to the Supplement of Moretti. I pass over his giving the Egyptian a wrong Name, to whom Agellus did Service: His Name was not Naxosben.

[G] In greater Simplicity than he. He was the worst cloth'd of any Person in his whole Army (26). After his Asiatic Expedition, wherein he had acquir'd such an high Reputation, which had received an additional Lustre from the Battle of Coronea, he liv'd in Sparta, as a good Lacedemonian of the old Times would have done. He alter'd nothing in his Garments, in his Bathings, or in his Meals; and, what was perhaps more difficult, he would not suffer his Wife to be better dress'd than before, nor permit her to distinguish her Daughter, in Processions, by finer Cloaths than those of other young Ladies. He would not repair the Gates of his House, though they were so old and ruinous, that they seem'd to be the same, which Aristodemus had built in that place (27). Observe, That Aristodemus was one of the Heraclidae, to whose Share the City of Sparta fell, and from whom descended the Kings of Lacedemon, divided into two Families on account of the two Sons which he left. "In hoc (Agellus) illud in primis fuit admirabile, cum maxima munera ei ab regibus & dynastiis civitibusque conferretur, nihil unquam in domum suam contulit, nihil de victu, nihil de vestitu Laconum mutavit. Domo eadem fuit contentus, quae Eurythenes progenitor majorum suorum (28) fuerat usus, quam qui intrarat nullum signum libidinis, nullum luxuriae videre poterat; contra plurima patientiae atque abstinetiae. Sic enim erat instructa, ut nulla in re differret à cuiusvis inopis atque privati (29). —

"What was the most worthy of Admiration in him, (Agellus) was, that, though he receiv'd the most magnificent Presents from Kings, Dynasti, and Republics, he apply'd no Part of them to his own Family, made no Alteration in his manner of living, nor any change in his Lacedemonian Dress. He was content with the same House, in which Eurythenes, the Progenitor of his Ancestors, liv'd; which whoever enter'd, could perceive no Signs of Luxury or Excess, but many of Content and Frugality. For it was furnish'd in all respects like the House of an indigent and private Person." When it was known that Agellus was arriv'd in Egypt, they sent him all sorts of Provisions: He chose only the most common; and left the Perfumes, Comfits, and Delicacies (30) to his Servants. The Egyptians, instead of admiring this Behaviour, derided the Prince, and took him for a silly Fellow, who did not know what was good. "Ille praeter vitulina, & huiusmodi genera obsonii, quae praefens tempus desiderabat, nihil accepit, unguenta, coronas, secundumque mensam servis disperiit, caetera referri iussit. Quo facto eum barbari magis etiam contempserunt, quod cum ignorantia bonarum rerum illa potissimum suspensio arbitrabantur (31)." You will find in Plutarch, I. That this Prince behav'd in the same manner, when the Thracians sent him Presents. II. That he derided them, when they offer'd him divine Honours (32).

[H] The Spirit, the Heart, and the Religion of a Sovereign. Plutarch testifies, that those, who govern'd in Lacedemon, acknowledg'd no other Justice, than that which tended to the Advantage and aggrandizing of the State (33). It was among them the Rule and the Measure of Law and Honesty; if a thing was useful to the Public, it immediately pass'd for lawful. I believe Plutarch says the Truth; but he ought not to have confin'd his Observation to the City of Sparta alone. Those of Athens (34), and Thebes, had no better Principles; and, generally speaking, they are the Maxims of all States: The only Difference is in Degrees; some have Appearances better than others. However, Agellus was quite abandon'd to this iniquitous Morality. Being suspected to have induc'd Pheidias to surprise the Citadel of Thebes, in full Peace, and by a Fraud, which made all Greece exclaim, he represented, That they ought first to examine, whether the Action was of Advantage to the State; and that every Person ought, in his private Capacity, to do what tended to the Advantage of the State (35). He obtain'd, that Pheidias should be acquitted, and that a Garrison should be sent into the Citadel. In his Egyptian Expedition, did he not abandon Tachus, who had hired his Assistance, and embrace the Interests of Nectanebus, for this Reason alone, because it was more for the Interest of the Lacedemonians; to support the latter than the former? An Action, which under the Mask of public Good, was downright Treachery, as Plutarch himself observ'd. Αντίον και αλλοιωτον προφηματος παρακαλομεναι: τα ουκ οφειλοντι της πατριδος χρησθαι: ουκ αιτιον ην της προφησεως διαπειρασεις το δουλειαν του νομου της πατριδος ην προδοσις (36). Abjurdo & indigno facinori commodum praetextum patriae: quando hoc quidem velamentis detractis nomen istius facti verissimum erat proditio. In Conversation Agellus talk'd of nothing but Justice; his Discourses upon this Subject were the finest in the World (37). Hearing that a certain thing was pleasing to the great King (38), he demanded, How is he greater than I, if he is not more Just? Fine Theory! but his Practice did not answer it, when his Kingdom was in question. I am apt to believe, that, for private Views, he could not easily have acted against Conviction; and this is the Reason why I pretend, he had the Religion of a Sovereign. How many Kings and Princes are zealous for their Religion, Just and Honest in themselves; but if it be thought for the public Good to annoy their Enemies, most of them, if not all, follow the Maxims of Lacedemon? I believe a Book, entitled, The Religion of a Sovereign, would sell well; it would cause the Religio Medici to be forgotten.

Two Days ago I heard a Person of Merit say, that an Italian Prince, demanding two advantageous Conditions, in negotiating a Treaty of Peace with a powerful Monarch, who had taken most of his Dominions from him, the Envoy of that Monarch answer'd him, But what Security will you give the King my Master, if he complies with all your Demands? Answer him, reply'd the Prince, that I engage my Word to him, not in quality of a Sovereign, for, as such, I must sacrifice every thing to aggrandize myself, and lay bold of every Opportunity of contributing to the Glory and Advantage of my Dominions; tell him, then, that I engage my Word to him, not in this Quality (which would be to promise nothing) but as a Gentleman, and an honest Man. Though this Language does not answer the Ideas of those, who have introduc'd, in the Style of the Chancery, the set Form, We promise upon the Faith and Word of a King, yet it is very Sincere, and very Just.

Let us make two Remarks more. First, I distinguish between the Belief of Urban VIII, and that of Mapheus Barbarini. The Religion of a Sovereign, as such, and Religion, personally speaking, are two things. My other Remark is this. Agellus had a very great respect for his Gods; he would not suffer their Temple to be plundered nor prophand, neither in Greece, nor in the Country of the Barbarians; and he reckon'd those as sacrilegious, who treated an Enemy

(33) Plut. in Agell. pag. 617. Idem in Alcibiades.

(34) See the Remark [C] of the Article ARISTIDES.

(35) Idem in Agell. pag. 608.

(36) Id. ib. pag. 617.

(37) Id. ib. pag. 608.

(38) The Greeks gave this Appellation to the King of Persia. See the Remark [A] of the Article ARTABANUS IV.

outside of Regularity, and philosophical Frugality. He had such a great Tenderness for his Children, that he would amuse himself with them in the most childish Exercises [I], such as riding on a Hobby-horse.

It will not be useless to remark the small Account he made of those, who greatly prided themselves in feeding and dressing Horses for the Races of the Olympic Games. He would persuade them it was a trifling Ambition; and that it was an Affair of Excellence, not a Proof of Merit or of Virtue; and for this purpose he persuaded his Sister to dispute this Prize (n). This Lady having prepared her Horse for the Exercise, came into the Lists and gained the Victory. She was the first Woman who obtained this Honour (o). Her Name was Cynisca. I cannot think Dicæarchus was ignorant of this, tho' he complains that he could not find what the Name of Agésilæus's Daughter [K] was. He might have known it, if he had done what Plutarch did [L].

(n) Plut. in Agésil. pag. 606. D.

(o) Pausan. lib. 3. pag. 83. 96.

(39) Corn. Nepos, in Vit. Agésil. cap. 4.

Enemy ill that had taken Refuge in a Temple (39). During the March of his Troops, he lodg'd always in the most sacred Temples, that the Gods might be Witnesses of his most private, domestic, Actions. Ἐκὼν μὲν γὰρ ἀνοδημαῖν καὶ αὐτὸν ἐν τοῖς ἁγιοτάτοις ἱεροῖς: ἃ μὴ πολλοὶ καθόρουσιν ἄνθρωποι τράπτοντας ἡμάς, τούτων θεὸς ποιμὴνός ἐστιν καὶ μάγιστος. Tendebat enim, cum iter faceret, solus in sanctissimis delubris, ac quibus rebus paucos adhibemus arbitros, earum Deos faciebant inspectores (40). This was his Personal Religion; but when he considered himself in the Character of a King, the Good and Advantage of his Kingdom were his principal Divinity, to which he sacrificed Virtue and Justice, divine and human Laws. I cannot tell, whether all, who quote this Sentence of Euripides,

Nam si violandum est jus, regnandi gratia
Violandum est: aliis rebus pietatem colas (41).

(41) Cic. de Offic. lib. 3. cap. 21.

for if Justice be ever to be violated, it is to be violated for the Sake of a Kingdom: in other Cases follow Virtue; whether every one, I say, who cites this, comprehends the full Force of it. It represents the Sentiments of those, who acquire Kingdoms, and of those who govern States; they fall sometimes into Superstition. Consider Agésilæus's private Conduct; it was very regular, aliis rebus pietatem colas; he does not swerve from Equity; but in the Capacity of a King, regnandi gratia violandum est. As a Man, he will deal with you sincerely, amicus usque ad aras; but, as a Prince, if he speaks his real Sentiments, he will tell you, I will observe the Treaty of Peace, so long as the Good of my Kingdom requires it; I will despise my Oath, when Maximis of State will have it so. If he would rather have the Persians break the Truce, than begin to violate it himself, it is because he expected to find his Account in this Conduct of the Persians. "Multum in eo confuevi se dicebat, quod" Tisaphernes perjurio suo & homines suis rebus abstinere, & Deos sibi iratos redderet (42). — "This, he said, would be much for his Advantage; since Tisaphernes, by his Perjury, would lose the Favour of Men, and incur the Anger of the Gods." Our good Agésilæus, who would have thought it an Offence against good Morality, to be well clothed, and to live luxuriously, made no Scruple to usurp a Kingdom. Thus certain Casuists damn every Woman without Remission, who dresses too delicately: They cannot bear their Ribbons, or their Jewels; but at the same time they not only permit Men to revolt, and to engage in Civil Wars, but even exhort them to it.

(42) Corn. Nepos, ubi supra, c. 2.

[I] In the most childish Exercises. Being surprised one Day riding, among his Children, on a Hobby-horse, he only said to him, who saw him in that Posture, forbear to speak of it, till you are a Father (43). We must not, upon this Occasion, apply these Verses of Horace.

(43) Plut. in Agésil. pag. 610. Sic libens, Ælian. Var. Hist. lib. 12. cap. 5.

Ædificare casas, postello adjungere mures,
Ludere par impar, EQUITARE IN ARUNDINE
LONGA

(44) Horat. Sat. 3. lib. 2. ver. 247.

Si quem delectet barbatum, amentia verset (44).
If any, grown a Man, delights to raise
Diri-Pies, and, like a Child, at Push-pin plays,

Takes Rats and Mice unto a little Plough,
And RIDES UPON AN HOBBY-HORSE, or so
Sure he is Mad. CRÆECH.

For the Poet is not describing those, who, in Compliance to their own Children, amuse themselves at home in this Manner. La Motte le Vayer is not exact, when he says, that King Agésilæus, as well as Alcibiades, was surpris'd in playing boyish Tricks among Children, and that the Philosopher Socrates gloried in it (45). He cites Seneca in the last Chapter of the first Book de Tranquillitate. Here are many Errors: I. He ought to have specified, that Agésilæus play'd the Boy only with his own Children. II. The Treatise de Tranquillitate contains but one Book. III. Nothing is said either of Alcibiades, or of Agésilæus, in the Chapter cited. IV. It is not said there, that Socrates gloried in playing with Children; it is only said that he was not ashamed of it. Cum pueris Socrates ludens non erubescerebat. V. Valerius Maximus, and Ælian, who mention this Sport of Socrates, say that Alcibiades surpris'd him at it. "Non erubuit tunc, cum interposita arundine curibus suis cum parvulis filiis ludens ab Alcibiade risus est" (46). — He did not blush, when, riding upon a Hobby-horse among his little Sons, he was laugh'd at by Alcibiades. Σωκράτης δὲ κατανέμειν πρὸς τοὺς Ἀλκιβιάδου παῖδας καὶ τὰ Λαμπροκλέους ἔτι νεαῖς (47). Socrates was once surpris'd by Alcibiades, playing with Lamprocles, yet a Child. But I do not remember to have read that others surpris'd Alcibiades at it. VI. These two Authors observe that Socrates plaid with his own Children.

(45) La Motte le Vayer's Tom. 1. pag. 217. Edit. 12mo.

(46) Valer. Maximus, lib. 8. c. 8. fab fin.

(47) Ælian. ubi supra.

[K] I cannot think that Dicæarchus was ignorant of — the Name of Agésilæus's Daughter. Cynisca was not only the first Woman who obtain'd the Prize in the Chariot-Races of the Olympic Games, but the most illustrious of all those Ladies, who obtain'd the like Victory afterwards (48). The Poet Simonides honour'd her with an Epigram (49). She consecrated Horses of Brass as a Monument of her Victory, which were placed at the Entrance of the Temple of Jupiter Olympius (50). Her Statue, made by Apelles, and adorn'd with divers Inscriptions, was to be seen in the Temple of Juno at Elis (51). The Lacedemonians erected a Monument like that of a Hero, Agésilæus, to her (52). So that it is not likely that the Name of Agésilæus's Sister was unknown to any Greek Historian.

(48) Pausan. lib. 3. p. 83.

(49) Id. ib.

(50) Id. lib. 5. pag. 159.

(51) Id. lib. 6. pag. 178.

(52) Id. lib. 3. p. 96.

[L] He might have known it, if he had done what Plutarch did. This latter Historian informs us, that Dicæarchus was very angry, that neither the Name of Agésilæus's Daughter, nor of Epaminondas's Mother, was known. Ὁ Δικαίρχος ἐνεχύνεσθαι. Stomachabatur Dicæarchus, &c. As for myself, continues he, I have found in the Registers of the Lacedemonians, that Agésilæus's Wife's Name was Cleora, and that the Name of one of his two Daughters was Apola, and the Name of the other Proltya. I am not surpris'd, that Dicæarchus was vex'd at the Negligence of the Historians; for we are naturally desirous of knowing the Families of great Men. It was a little strange, that the Names of Agésilæus's Wife and Daughters were only to be met with in the Archives of Lacedæmon.

(53) Plut. ubi supra, pag. 606.

AGESIPOLIS, the first of the Name, King of Lacedæmon, succeeded his Father Pausanias, who had taken Refuge in a Temple, (a), when he found, that his Conduct, in concluding a Peace with the Thebans, was disapprov'd. They permitted him

(a) In that of Minerva at Tegea. Pausan. lib. 3. pag. 86.

(1) Xenoph. de Republ. Gr. lib. 5. pag. 329.

(m) Xenoph. ibid. p. 327. (n) E. A. mias ap. xovra, but it is probably a Fault of the Copier for E. A. mias.

(n) Id. ibid. pag. 329.

(o) Diod. Sic. cul. lib. 14. cap. 3. & lib. 15. cap. 23. pag. 674. ad ann. 1. Olymp. 100.

he put in practice upon this occasion is too curious to be omitted [B]. There is some Probability, that it was in this War, that Pelopidas and Epaminondas extricated themselves from a Danger [C], to which their Valour and Friendship exposed them. He was sent some years after [D] with a fine Army against the Olyntians (1). Amintas, King of Macedon, and Deidas, Prince of Elymea (m), gave him a powerful Assistance. He marched towards Olyntus, and, finding no Army to oppose him, he ravaged the Country, and made himself Master of Torona. But, as he fatigued himself extremely, notwithstanding the violent Summer-Heats, he was seized with a Continual Fever, which carried him off in seven days (n) in the fourteenth year of his Reign (o). See my Critical Remarks on Mr Moreri [E]. Agefilaus was not pleased with this Loss, as

The first is, that the Notions of the Gallican Church concerning the Council, and the Pope, tho' speaking ex cathedra, may be compared to those of Paganism concerning the Oracles of Jupiter, and of Delphi. The Olympian Jupiter, when he answered a Question, met with great Esteem in the Minds of the People; much Deference was paid to his Authority; but in short, his Opinion, tho' delivered ex cathedra or rather ex tripod, did not pass for Infallible. Behold the Pope of the Gallican Church! The Apollo of Delphi was the Judge without Appeal: Behold the Council! My second Observation is, That Agefilaus was in earnest in what he did; there was no Religious Banter in the Case. As for what concerns Hegeippus, I answer nothing for him. He was perhaps malicious enough to attempt ensnaring the Oracles, that he might insult them if they did not agree. He might have said, It is a shame for you to answer Yes, and No. Ἡγήεππος ἐν Δελφοῖς ἐπηρώτα τὸν θεόν, μηχανεύμενος προτέρου Ὀλύμπιεω, εἰ αὐτῷ ταῦτ' ἐδοξε ἀπερ τὰ πατρί, ὡς ἀλεχρὸν δὲ τὰν ἀνρία σίλειν (4). Hegeippus, having received an Answer from the God at Olympia, interrogated him at Delphi, whether he was of the same Opinion with his Father, as if it were scandalous for the Gods to disagree in their Answers. If our Agefilaus had had any ill Design against Apollo, in Imitation of that malicious Person, whose Story Esop relates (5), he would have been bit; for the Answer of Delphi was the same with that of Olympia.

(4) Aristot. Rhetor. lib. 2. cap. 23. pag. 445. F.

(5) Esop in his 16th Fable, whose Title is Kαταράγμων. The Mantician. He was one, who build a Sparrow in his Hand, and ask'd the Oracle, Is what I have in my hand alive or not? His Design was to have kill'd the Sparrow, if the Oracle had answer'd It is alive?

(6) Xenoph. lib. 5. pag. 323.

(7) Pausan. lib. 3. pag. 242, 243.

(8) Plut. in Vita Pelopid. p. 280.

(9) Pausan. lib. 3. pag. 242.

within the Walls of the City. And I add, that Xenophon himself remarks, that there were some Auxiliary Troops in the Army of Lacedemon (10). Note, that the Event mentioned by Plutarch, preceded the Stratagem, by which Phebidas made himself Master of the Fortrels of the Thebans (11). This Chronological Character agrees with the Expedition of Agefilaus against Mantineia.

[D] He was sent some Years after.] I only make this Remark, to censure Pausanias, who reports that Agefilaus, abandoning with regret the Argian War, turned his whole Repentment against the Olyntians. Οὐτω μὲν δὲ ἐκ τῆς Ἀργυολίδος ἀνίσταται ἀγων, ἐπὶ δὲ Ὀλύμπιεω ἐπὶ αὐτὸς ἐπρωτεύει (12). Invictissimus itaque ille ex Argivorum finibus castra movit, & contra Olyntios belli impetum convertit. Who would not believe, in reading this, that the Expedition of Olyntus succeeded immediately that of Argos? Who would not imagine, that Agefilaus, when he left the Territories of Argos, took the way of Macedonia; yet it is false. Some Years past between these two Expeditions. The War of Mantineia, of which the same Pausanias has taken some Notice, followed That of Argos, and preceded that of Olyntus six Years. Let us, upon this Occasion, remark a Fault of Calvisius. He has placed the War of Argos in the fourth Year of the Ninety sixth Olympiad, a little after the Death of Pausanias King of Macedonia (13). Now Agefilaus came to the Throne the same Year, in which this Pausanias died (14), and, being a Minor, was put under the Tutition of Aristodemus (15). So that if Calvisius was exact, the War of Argos must concur nearly with the first Year of the Reign of Agefilaus, and must have been conducted by Aristodemus; for it is certain, that, under the Minority of Agefilaus, his Tutor was placed at the Head of the Army, when this King was obliged to take the Field (16). Calvisius does not fail to observe, that Aristodemus went thither in the third Year of the Ninety sixth Olympiad, because Agefilaus was under Age (17). He is mistaken in placing the first Year of his Reign in the second Year of the Ninety sixth Olympiad, and the War of Argos too soon after the Death Pausanias King of Macedonia.

(10) Xenophon. lib. 5. pag. 323.

(11) Plut. ubi supra.

(12) Pausan. lib. 2. p. 36.

(13) Sethi Calvisi Chronol. ad ann. mundi 3557. pag. 162.

(14) Diod. Sicul. l. 14. cap. 90. pag. 637.

(15) Xenoph. de Reb. gest. Græcorum, l. 4. p. 301. Pausan. ubi supra.

(16) Xenophon. ubi supra.

(17) Calvisius, p. 160.

[E] See my Critical Remarks on Mr Moreri.] “Agefilaus was surprized with a burning Fever, and returned continually to the Coolness of the Waters of a certain Temple of Bacchus, which was at Aphitis, whither he caused himself to be carried; and died on the seventh Day of his Fever, after he was gone out of the Temple, that he might not defile it by his Death.” These are Mr Moreri's Words. It would be unjust to criticize on the Expression, returned continually to the Coolness, (revint toujours à la fraîcheur) for it is easy to see that the Printers have have put revint (returned) instead of révint (binking of, or raving after) (18). But two Observations may be made: One is, that he ought to have expressed himself thus; Remembering the Temple of Bacchus, which he had seen at Aphitis, he desired to enjoy it's Shade, and the Coolness of the clear Waters, which were there. He was carried thither alive, but died out of the Temple the seventh Day of his Fever (19). In the second Place, it is a chimerical Gloss to tell us, That out of a religious Respect for the Sanctity of the Temple, he would not die in it. Has Xenophon, or any other Author worthy of Credit, said so? To save myself the Trouble in another Place, I shall here remark an Error, which Mr Moreri has committed in his Article of AGESIPOLIS II. He assures us that That Prince, having been a Hostage in his Youth, answered those, who reproached him with it, that it was because Kings suffer for the Faults of their Kingdom. This Answer is as false, as it is contrary to the satirical Sentence, Quidquid

(18) They have put it révint in the Edition of Holland.

(19) See Xenophon. lib. 5. pag. 329, 330.

it was expected he wou'd have been [F]; but bewailed and regretted it a long time, as Xenophon informs us (p). Observe, that Agessipolis left no Posterity (q); and that Cleombrotus his Brother and Successor was the Father of AGESIPOLIS II. (r), who reigned but one Year (s), and whose Apophthegms were more memorable than his Actions: For we meet with no Account of the former, whereas Plutarch has preserved a small Collection of the latter (t).

(p) Diod. Sic. col. lib. 15. cap. 60.

(q) Plut. in Apophtheg. Lacon. pag. 215.

(20) Horat. Epist. 2. l. 1. ver. 14.

Quidquid delirant Reges, plestuntur Achivi (20).

The People suffer, when the Prince offends.

GREEK.

The Matter of Fact is this. It was said to him one Day, As great a King as you are, you have been an Hostage, with the chief of the Youths of Lacedemon; but your Wives and your Children were not. Because, replied he, it was just, that we should bear the Punishment of our own Faults ourselves (21).

(21) Plut. in Apophth. Laconic. pag. 215.

[F] Agessilaus was not pleased with this Loss, as it was expected he would have been. Xenophon inclines us to believe, that an Emulation reigned between those two Princes, very fit to produce Enmity. But Plutarch represents them to us as strictly united in Friendship. He observes that Agessipolis was mild and modest, and interested himself but little in public Affairs, and that he suffered himself to be gained by his Colleague Agessilaus (22), who knowing him to be of an amorous Complexion, was always talking to him of handsome Boys, and not only flattered his Passion for them, but even assisted him in the Gratification of it. Εἰδὼς ἰμερον ἔντα τοῖς ἱεραισὶν τῶν Ἀθηναίων, ὥστε ἢν αὐτὸς, ἀλ τινας ὑπάρχει λόγος περὶ τῶν ἐν ὅρῳ καὶ προήγῃ τὸν νεανίσκον εἰς ταῦτα, καὶ συνήρα καὶ συνήρατο (23). Qui autem teneri sciret Agessipolim, sicut se, amoribus, sermonem assidue de formosis adulescentibus inferbat, eodem il- lum impellibat, scilicetque erat ei in amore & adjuvator.

(22) Plut. in Agessil. pag. 607. A.

(23) Id. ibid.

He adds, that these kind of Amours were not looked upon as criminal in Lacedemon. The following Passage informs us, that Agessilaus regretted the Loss of this Colleague. Ἀγέσιλαος δὲ τὸ τοῦ ἀνδρός, ὃς καὶ αὐτὸν ἀνέρετο, ἀλλὰ καὶ ἰδόμενος καὶ ἐπὶ τοῖς τῶν νεανίσκων (24). Agessilaus, upon this News, did not rejoice, as was expected, at the Loss of a Rival, but shed Tears, and lamented the Death of a Friend.

(24) Xenophon. de Rebus gestis Græc. lib. 5. pag. 330.

(a) He was five Degrees removed from him. Plut. in Agide, p. 796.

AGIS, King of Lacedemon, descended from Agessilaus II. in a direct Line (a), met with a very unfortunate End. He intended to reform his Kingdom, by the re-establishing of Lycurgus's Laws; but he sunk under the weight of an Undertaking, which could not but be displeasing to those, who possessed great Estates, and who had so much accustomed themselves to the Sweetness of a voluptuous Life, that they were no longer capable of relishing the ancient Discipline of Lacedemon. Agis, in the Flower of his Age, conceived the Design of this Reformation, out of a refined Desire of Glory [A], and practised it first of all in his own Person: His Cloaths, and his Table, were according to the manner of the old times; which deserved so much the more Admiration, because his Mother Agessistrata, and his Grand-mother Archidamia, had brought him up effeminately (b). Upon founding the Disposition of his Subjects, he found the younger sort less averse to his Project, than those, who had enjoyed the Relaxation of Discipline for many Years. The greatest difficulty, he feared, was from the Women [B]. They were in more Credit at that time than ever; for they never reign more absolutely, than when Luxury is in Fashion. The Mother of Agessilaus did by no means find her account in this Reformation; she would have lost her great Wealth by it, which enabled her to be concerned in a thousand Intrigues; and therefore she immediately opposed the Design of Agis, and called it a chimerical Project. But her Brother Agessilaus, whom Agis had engaged in his Interests, knew how to manage her in such a manner, that she promised to second the Enterprize. She endeavoured to gain the Women; but, instead of suffering themselves to be persuaded, they addressed themselves to Leonidas, the other King of Lacedemon, and most humbly intreated him to frustrate the Designs of his Colleague. Leonidas durst not openly oppose it, for fear of exasperating the People, to whom the Reformation was pleasing, because it would be useful to them. He only crossed it by Intrigues, and spreading Suspensions, as if Agis aspired to the Tyranny by depressing the Rich, and raising the Poor. Nevertheless Agis propos'd his new Laws to the Senate, which contained the Abolishment of Debts, and a new Division of Lands. Leonidas, supported by

(b) Εὐτα- θραμίνος παλαιοῦ καὶ τρυφῆς γυναικῶν τῆς τε μη- τρὸς Ἀγ- αιδάρας καὶ τῆς πατρὸς Ἀρχιδάμιας, αἱ παλαι- αὶ κρηναὶ τῆς Λακε- δαιμονίαν ἐνεκτμήτο. Enutritus esset in opibus & deliciis mulieribus matris Agessistratæ & avie Archidamiae, quæ in Lacedæmonia erant pecuniosissimi. Id. p. 797.

(1) Plut. in Agide, pag. 798.

[A] Out of a refined desire of Glory. Plutarch's Narrative (1) insinuates plainly to us, that Agessistrata shewed her Son the Prejudice he would do himself by his Plan of Reformation, considering the great Estate he possessed; but he desired her to be willing to sacrifice her Riches to her Son's Glory. For, said he to her, I can never equal other Monarchs on the Score of Riches: The Servants of the Satrapæ, the Servants of the Financiers of Seleucus, and Ptolemy, are richer than all the Kings of Lacedemon; but if, by my Temperance, and the Greatness of my Soul, I can raise myself above the Luxury of those Princes, and if I can introduce an Equality of Goods in my Kingdom, I shall attain to true Grandeur; I shall pass for a great Prince. This is to refine upon Self-love: You will be surpassed, what Progress soever you make in a certain Road; take quite the contrary, wherein you shall have no Rivals: They, who make a Comparison between you and others, will maintain, that, in it's kind, your Merit is by no means inferior to that of others. But could this be said, if the Dispute turned on Qualities of the same kind, some manifestly Inferior, and others manifestly Superior, as the Opulency of Agis, and That of the King of Syria, would have been?

[B] From the Women. The Lacedæmonians were the best Husbands in the World; they communicated the Affairs of the Common-wealth to their Wives, much more than their Wives communicated their Domestic Affairs to them (2). At the time we are speaking of, almost all the Riches of Lacedemon were fallen to the Dismiss; they were at the disposal of the Female Sex, which frustrated the Designs of this Prince. The Ladies fear'd they should lose their Riches, their Pleasures, and their Credit, all at once; and perhaps they were not mistaken. But let us hear Plutarch himself. Now it must be observed, that most of the Riches of Lacedemon were at that time in the Hands of the Women, which made the Undertaking more difficult: For the Women not only were against it, because it would deprive them of their Pleasures, in which they plac'd their Happiness, for want of knowing the true Good, but also because they saw that the Honour, which was paid them, and the Power and Authority which they had, on account of their Riches, would be taken from them (3).

(2) Plut. ibid.

(3) Plut. ibid.

[C] Alluded

by the Rich, opposed this Project so powerfully, that there was one Voice more for throwing it out, than for carrying it. He paid dear for the Success of his Affair. Lyfander, one of the Epbori, who had been the great Promoter of the Reformation, brought an Action against him, alledged the Celestial Signs [C], and persuaded a Prince of the Blood Royal, whose Name was Cleombrotus, and who was Son-in-Law to Leonidas, to secure the Kingdom to himself. Leonidas, seized with Fear, took Refuge in a Temple, where his Daughter, the Wife of Cleombrotus, came to him. He was cited, and because he did not appear, he was declared degraded from his Dignity, which was conferred on Cleombrotus. He obtained leave to retire to Tegea. The New Epbori entered a Process of Innovation against Lyfander and Mandrochidas: These latter persuaded the two Kings to unite, and to make void the Election of these Epbori. Which was done, but not without raising great Commotions in the City. Agefilans, one of the Epbori, who succeeded those, who were turned out, would have caused Leonidas to have been killed on the Road to Tegea, if Agis had not escorted him with a sufficient Guard. The Reformation might have been established at that time, if Agefilans had not found Means to elude the good Intention of the Two Kings. During these Transactions, the Acheans desired assistance; it was granted them, and Agis had the command of the Troops. He acquired a great Reputation in That Campaign [D]. At his Return he found Affairs so embroiled by the ill Conduct of Agefilans, that it was impossible for him to support himself. Leonidas was recalled to Lacedemon; Agis retired into one Temple, and Cleombrotus into another. The Wife of the latter behaved in such a manner, as to gain an universal Applause (c). Leonidas was satisfied with the Exile of his Son-in-Law; after which he applied himself wholly to the Ruin of Agis. One of the Epbori, who was unwilling to restore what Agefistrata had lent him, was the chief Instrument of the Misfortunes of that Family. Agis did not come out of his Place of Refuge, but only to bathe himself: As he was returning one Day from the Bath to the Temple, this Epborus seized him, and dragged him to Prison. He was tried, condemned to Death, and delivered to the Executioner. His Mother and Grandmother earnestly solicited, that at least a King of Lacedemon might have leave to plead his Cause before the People. But it was feared his Words would make too great an Impression; and that very Hour they strangled Agis. The Epborus, who was Debtor to Agefistrata, suffered that Princess to enter into the Prison: He permitted the Grandmother to do the like; and then caused both of them to be strangled one after the other. Agefistrata died gloriously (d). The wife of Agis (e), a very rich Princess, and very wise, and one of the finest Women of Greece, was forced out of her House by King Leonidas, and constrained to marry that Prince's Son. He was a Youth as yet incapable of Marriage. He succeeded his Father; his Death was at least as tragical as that of Agis, whose Designs he had endeavoured to execute. His Name was Cleomenes (f). Mr Moreti misrepresents what Agis said [E] to those, who pitied his Fate. Other Dictionaries are very faulty on this Article [F]. Meursius ought not to have said that this Agis reigned Nine Years (g); for the Passage of Diodorus Siculus, which he appeals to, relates to another Agis. THE AGIS of this Article lost his Life in the CXXXVth Olympiad. Plutarch's Considerations on this King's Punishment may be seen under the Article AMPHARES.

(g) Meursius de Regno Lacedemon. pag. 87.

(c) Her Name was CHELONIS See her Article.

(d) See the Article AMPHARES.

(e) Her Name was Agiatis.

(f) Taken out of Plutarch, in Vita Agidis & Cleomenis.

[C] Alledged the Celestial Signs.] The Affair was this (4). Once in every nine Years the Epbori contemplated Heaven in a serene Night, and without a Moon; and if they saw a Star fall, they judg'd that the Kings had sinned against God; upon which they were suspended from their Dignity, 'till an Oracle from Delphi, or Olympia, re-establish'd them. Lyfander, pretending to have seen this Phenomenon, entered an Action against the King, and produc'd Witnesses, who declared that Leonidas had had two Children by an Asiatic Woman. Now there was an ancient Law, which forbade the Heraclides (5) to have Children by a foreign Woman. Is it not very odd, that such a Government as this, wherein the Fortune of Kings depended on the good Pleasure of an Epborus, who had seen a Star fall, should subsist so long?

(4) That is, the Descendants of Heraclides, of which Number were the Kings of Lacedemon.

[D] Acquired a great Reputation in that Campaign.] Having join'd Aratus, General of the Acheans, near Corinth, his Advice was to give the Enemy Battle on the other side of the Isthmus; but he submitted his Judgment to that General's Opinion, who thought it better not to come to an Engagement. Aratus own'd this himself in his Book. Yet one Baton of Sinope pretended, that Agis dissuaded the Fight, which Aratus had resolved upon (6). Is it not very strange, that an Historian should relate things concerning a General, which are contrary to the Relations of that General himself? Is it credible, that his Account should be false, to the prejudice of it's Author? This Bold-

(6) Plut. in Agide, pag. 301.

ness may be suffer'd for some Months, and for certain Reasons; but, when Events have pass'd that Term, the Actions of great Men ought no longer to be contradicted.

[E] Mr Moreti misrepresents what Agis said.] Agis seeing one of the Serjeants weep, said (7), Weep not, for since they put me to Death by such a crying Act of Injustice, my Merit is greater than that of the Authors of my Death. Instead of this, Mr Moreti makes him say, Weep not, for those who weep, are much more to be pitied than I am. This is not the only Fault of that Article. Mr Moreti says falsely, I. That in the beginning of Agis's Reign, an Epborus, whose Name was Epitadeus, caus'd an Order to be made, That Fathers might disinherit their Children. II. That Agis resisted the Words of that Order, which re-peopled the City in a little time. III. That the most Considerable lent a helping hand to the Design of Agis. Read Plutarch, and you will see, First, That Epitadeus had caus'd his Decree to be pass'd a long time before. Secondly, That Agis had not the good Fortune to procure the least Alteration. Thirdly, That the richer People oppos'd his Design. Is this to consult Originals? Is this to understand them?

(7) Ibid. pag. 4-8.

[F] Very faulty on this Article.] Charles Stephens confounds this Agis with another more ancient, and distinguishes him from him, whom the Lacedemonians hang'd. Mr Hofman is guilty only of the former of these two Mistakes; Lloyd corrects neither of them.

(a) She is commonly call'd so for brevity sake; but it is not her Family Name; it is only the name of the Town, where the Monastery was, of which she was Superior.

(b) The Profession of her Sister was deferred because she was not of age: Journal of the Learned of the 16th of Jan. 1696. pag. 51, 52. Edit. Holl.

(c) It is the Day of the Conception of the Virgin in the Kalender.

(d) Taken from the Journal of the Learned, ubi supra.

AGREDA (a) (MARY de) a Religious Visionary, and famous for a Work, which the Sorbonne censured, lived in the XVIIth Century. Francis Coronel, her Father, and Catherine d'Arena, her Mother, who lived at Agreda, a Town of Spain, founded a Convent in their House on the 19th of January, 1619. A Particular Revelation induced them to it. This Mary took the Nun's Habit in it, at the same time with her Mother and Sister; she professed, with her Mother, on the Second of February, 1620 (b). She was elected Superior, in the Year 1627. and during the first Ten Years of her Superiority, she received several Commands from God, and the Virgin Mary, to write the Life of the Holy Virgin. She resisted these Orders till the Year 1637: when she began to write it. Having finished it, she burnt it with several Writings, which she had composed on other Subjects: She followed in this the Counsel of a Confessor, who directed her in the absence of her Ordinary Confessor. Her Superiors, and the first Confessor, reprimanded her severely for it, and commanded her to write the Life of the Holy Virgin a second time. God and the Holy Virgin repeated the same Command to her. She began to obey on the 8th of December, 1655 (c). She divided the Work into three Parts; contained in eight Books, which have been printed at Lisbon, at Madrid, at Perpignan, and at Antwerp. The first was translated out of Spanish into French, from the Edition of Perpignan, by Father Croset, a Recollet. This Translation was printed at Marseilles in the Year 1696 (d). There are so many Absurdities in the Work [A]; and yet so capable of pleasing the passionate Votaries of the Holy Virgin, that the Faculty of Divinity of Paris judged it proper to censure it [B]. They attained their End, in

[A] There are so many Absurdities in the Work. We find there, "That, as soon as the Virgin was born, the Almighty order'd the Angels to carry the lovely Child into the Empyrean Heaven, which they did several times; that God appointed an hundred out of each of the nine Choirs of Angels, that is to say nine hundred, to serve her: And that he appointed twelve others to serve her in a visible and corporeal Form, and eighteen more of the highest Rank of those, who descended on Jacob's Ladder, to carry Embassies from the Queen to the great King: That, to regulate this invincible Squadron the better, Michael, Captain of the heavenly Militia, was plac'd at the Head of it: That the first Conception of the Body of the most Holy Virgin was on a Sunday, correspondent to that of the Creation of Angels: That if the Virgin did not speak as soon as she was born, it was not because she could not, but because she would not: That before she was three Years of Age, she swept the House, and the Angels assisted her, &c. There are I know not how many such like Extravagancies in it." This is the Extract, which a Protestant Journalist gave of it (1). Another Journalist, who is a good Catholic, assures us (2), that nothing is to be found in the six first Chapters, but Visions, by which Sister Mary of Jesus says, That God discover'd the Mysteries of the Holy Virgin to her, and the Decree he had made of creating all things. — That, in the twentieth Chapter (3), She gives an Account of what happen'd to the Holy Virgin in the Womb of St Anne; that she comes afterwards to the Birth of the Holy Virgin, to the Name which was given her, to the Angels, who were commission'd to guard her, to the Employments of the first eighteen Months of her Childhood, to the Conversation she had with God at the end of these eighteen Months, to her Conversations with St Joachim, and St Anne, and to the holy Exercise, wherein she employ'd herself, 'till she was carried to the Temple of Jerusalem. If any one imagines, that, among so many Visions, there is nothing relating to St John's Revelations, he will be greatly mistaken; for our Visionary, not satisfy'd with explaining the twelfth Chapter of the Revelations, has enlarg'd very much on the twenty first, which she expounds of the Conception of the Holy Virgin (4). It would be very surprizing indeed, if, in falling so long upon such a Sea, she should never dash upon this Rock. If you desire to know the Title of her Work, in the Translation of Thomas Croset, read what follows. The mystical City of God, Miracle of the Almighty, Abyss of Grace, divine History of the Life of the most holy Virgin Mary, Mother of God, our Queen and Mistress, manifested, in these last Ages, by the Holy Virgin to Sister Mary of Jesus, Abbess of the Convent of the Immaculate Conception of the City of Agreda, of the Order of St Francis, and written by the same Sister, by Order of her Superiors, and Confessors.

[B] The Faculty of Divinity at Paris, judg'd it proper to censure it: I have met with the Censure, which they published, only in the Journal of the Learned, wherein I find. I. That the sixth Proposition imports, That God gave the Holy Virgin all that he would, and would give her all that he could, and could give her all that was not of the Essence of God (5). II. That the seventh Proposition, is conceived in these Terms. "I declare, by the Force of Truth, and of the Light, in which I see all these incredible Mysteries, that all the Privileges, the Graces, the Prerogatives, the Favours, and the Gifts of the most pure Mary, comprehending the Dignity of the Mother of God in it, depend and take their Original from her having been Immaculate, and full of Grace, in her Conception, inasmuch that, without that Privilege, all the rest would appear faulty, or like a stately Building without a solid and proportionable Foundation (6). That the ninth Proposition applies literally to the Holy Virgin, the Words of the eighth Chapter of Proverbs, and insinuates, that by her Kings are raised and supported on the Throne, Princes command, and the Rulers of the Earth administer Justice (7). IV. That the thirteenth Proposition is, that if Mens Eyes were penetrating enough to see the Light of the Holy Virgin, it would suffice to conduct them to a blessed Eternity. V. That, besides these Propositions, several others are compriz'd under the fourteenth Article, and which are respectively condemn'd as rash, contrary to the Wisdom of the Rules, which the Church prescribes; to which is added, that most of them are like the Fables and Ravings of apocryphal Authors, and expose the Catholic Religion to the Contempt of impious Men and of Heretics (9). VI. That finally the Faculty declares, that it does not pretend to approve several other things contain'd in the Book, and chiefly the Passages, where the Author wreits the Text of Scripture, in applying it to her own Sense, and those wherein she affirms, that some Opinions, which are merely Scholastic, were reveal'd to her." Let us make a few Reflexions upon this.

In the first Place, the School-men unanimously teach, that the distinct Character of God, and of his Creatures is, that God has nothing which comes from without, and that the Creatures have nothing, but what proceeds from without. This is what they express by the barbarous Words aseitas, and abalienitas; from whence they conclude, that all the Attributes of God are communicable to the Creature, except the Aseitas; and, consequently, that it is possible for a Creature to be eternal, a parte ante, & a parte post (10), and infinite as to Knowledge, Power, local Presence, Goodness, Justice, &c. They commonly teach, that, by Power Obediential, Creatures are susceptible of the Faculty of working all sorts of Miracles, and also of creative Power. So that, if God did effectually confer on the Holy Virgin all that he could confer upon her, it follows, according to the Doctrines of the School, which Sister Mary of Jesus esteem'd much, that the Holy Virgin exist'd from Eternity, that she can do all things, that she knows all things, that she fills all Places, and that she is infinite

(5) Ibid. of Nov. 26. 1696. pag. 717.

(6) Ibid.

(7) Ibid. pag. 718.

(8) Ibid. pag. 719.

(9) Ibid. pag. 720.

(10) Th. uis. That it may neither have Beginning nor End.

(1) History of the Works of the Learned, Nov. 1696. pag. 140, 141.

(2) Journal of the Learned, of Jan. 16th 1696. pag. 52.

(3) Ibid. pag. 53.

(4) Ibid.

in spite of the Opposition, and terrible Outcry of some of the Doctors of that Society [C]. How just soever the Censure was, it gave Offence to a great Number of Persons. It is thought that the Apprehensions of the Scandal it might cause obliged the Company finite in every respect. I need not suppose, that our Abbess of Agreda followed the Doctrine of the Spanish Schoolmen; for I am not concern'd whether she knew, or was ignorant of it. She teaches plainly, that God gave the Holy Virgin all that he could give her, and that he could give her all his Attributes, except the divine Essence itself. This justifies the Conclusion, which I have drawn: Upon which, we may very well wonder, that the Sorbonne should only say, That this Proposition is false, rash, and contrary to the Doctrine of the Gospel (11). Is such a Censure severe enough? Ought they to have been contented with such weak Appellations? Is it enough to affirm, that it was a rash Mistake, to apply to the Virgin Mary, in a literal Sense, these Words of Solomon, By me Kings reign, and Princes decree Justice (12).

My second Reflexion is this. They who have carefully examin'd all that has been said of the Power of the Holy Virgin, and the Share which is given her in the Government of the Universe, have observed, that the last Comers, desirous to surpass those, who have gone before them, have been the Cause, that at last the utmost Bounds of Flattery have been found out. But, as the Reasons for continuing to proceed farther have never ceas'd (for when the Devotion of the People is to be a Maintenance for many Persons, who desire to live at their Ease, it must be quicken'd and reviv'd from time to time with new invented Incitements) I say, considering this, there is reason to wonder that the Barriers have not been broke, and that, among so many Monks and Nuns, who have been such great Refiners, no one has yet said, that the Holy Virgin governs the World alone. How comes it to pass, that Spain has not yet produc'd Writers, who have pretended to discover by Revelation, that a long Experience having convinc'd God the Father of the infinite Capacity of the Holy Virgin, and the good Use she has made of the Power, wherewith he had invest'd her, had resolv'd to abdicate the Empire of the World; and that God the Son, believing he could not follow a better Example, had embrac'd the same Resolution, and that the Holy Ghost, always obedient to the Will of the two Persons, from whom he proceeds, approving this fine Design, the whole Trinity had committed the Government of the World to the Hands of the Holy Virgin; and that the Ceremony of the Abdication, and That of the Translation of the Empire had been solemnly perform'd in the Presence of all the Angels; that an Act of it had been drawn up in the most authentic Form; that, since that Day, God concerns himself with nothing, and relies altogether on the Vigilancy of Mary; that Orders were given to several Angels, to notify this Alteration of Government upon Earth, that Men might know to whom, and in what Manner, they ought to have recourse for the future, in their Prayers; that it was no longer to God, since he had declar'd himself emeritus, & rude donatus, nor to the Holy Virgin, as to a Mediatress, or a subordinate Queen, but as the Sovereign and absolute Empress of all things? Once more: how comes it to pass, that such an Extravagancy is yet to be brought forth? I was ask'd once, if I had never heard of such a Conceit? No, reply'd I, but I would not swear, that this Thought has never appear'd, and yet less, that it will never be hatch'd in a Brain, sick with Devotion; and, perhaps, if Mary d'Agreda had liv'd ten Years longer, she would have brought forth this Monster (13), and given us a Copy of the Act of Abdication; wherein we should have seen, that the Trinity, willing to live henceforth a quiet Life, and acknowledge their Obligations to the Holy Virgin, who for many Ages has so wisely born a considerable Share of the Fatigues of the Regency of the World, thought they could do nothing more proper, nor pitch upon a Reward more suitable to her, than to divest themselves, in her Favour, of their absolute Authority over all things. Yet it must be confess'd, that the Idea of the unalienable Axiom of God is so clearly understood in all the Christian Communions, that there is no Reason to apprehend that this Monster of Abdication could live any time, supposing it could be produc'd. We ought not to fear it in our Days: Let this satisfy us; nor let us trouble ourselves with what may come to pass an hundred Years hence; nostros maneat ea cura nepotes. Let Posterity look to that.

I observe, in the third Place, that there is nothing more true, than the Remarks of the Sorbonne, that the Book of the Abbess of Agreda contains several things, which expose the Church of Rome to the Contempt of Impious Men, and of Heretics. It was well for the Christian Religion, that the Celsus's and Porphyry's of those times had it not in their Power to attack it with such Weapons, as these Books, infinite in Number, can furnish at present. What would not a Pagan Author have objected to the Church in those Times, who should have had the Heat and the Character of Arnobius? If Henry Stephens, and Philip de Mornay, were to return into the World, what Supplements would they not make, by the help of the Mystical City of our Mary of Agreda, the one to his Apology for Herodotus, and the other to his Description of the Differences in Matters of Religion?

IV. Lastly, I remark, that our pretended inspired Authors endeavour to impose upon Mankind. They give us for Revelation, what they have learn'd by reading. For does not the Abbess of Agreda affirm, That some Opinions, which are merely Scholastic, were taught her by Inspiration (14)?

[C] In spite of the Opposition — of some of the Doctors of that Society. The following are Extracts from a Printed Book, entituled, The Case of Mary d'Agreda, and the Manner how her Condemnation was plotted in the Sorbonne (15). It is a Letter from an anonymous Author, to an anonymous Person. "The Odour of Sanctity, in which this good Religious died, and the Canonization which is solicited at the Court of Rome, gave me such an high Idea of her Person, that I was surpris'd to hear that the Faculty of Divinity, at Paris, had met to condemn her Works." These are the Authors Words (16). Afterwards he supposes, "That they were some mercenary Souls, who at the Solicitation of three Prelates, to whom they were devoted, pursued the Condemnation of them (17). The whole Intrigue, continued he (18), is as follows. My Lord Bishop, being more addicted to the Opinions of St Thomas, than a young Jacobin, who ought only to swear in verba magistri, could not bear that the Faculty should, with so much Precipitation, give into the immaculate Conception of the Virgin. The hatred he bore to Brother Thomas Croiset, a Recollet, and Translator of that Book, occasion'd by the Report which was spread of what the Translator had said against him, upon his refusing him a Benefice in his Diocese, and the Desire of indemnifying A — the King's Printer, for the considerable Loss he had sustain'd by his Works, and who had made use of the Impression of this Book, printed by H —, at Marseilles, were the Foundation of the Comotions among the Faculty; for the ready way to make a Book sell well is to get it condemn'd. Every body runs to it, as to a House on fire, and the Book, which was worth but twenty Pence, A — sells for ten Livres, besides what is sold under hand of a pirated Impression. This Prelate, to succeed the better in his Design, prepos'd my Lord —, one of the most moderate Prelates in the Kingdom: both join'd with my Lord — a Man of a very mean Genius, who may be easily prejudic'd, and who is fond of Ceremonies and Trifles; you must know that these Lords go hand in hand. This Trumvirate influenc'd their Creatures, and gain'd Mr le Fevre, Syndic of the Sorbonne, who presented the Book of Mary d'Agreda to the Faculty, on the 20th of May. Deputies were appointed to examine it. They reported sixty eight Propositions (19), which they call'd heretical, rash, scandalous, and offensive to chaste Ears. They were printed, as qualified by the Deputies, and distributed among the Doctors (20), that they might give their Opinions of them, in the next Assembly (21). Father Meron, a Cordelier, of whom we have some fine Performances, both in Philosophy and Chronology, desired the Faculty not to be too hasty in

(14) Journal of the Learned, Nov. 1696. pag. 717.

(15) The it was said in the Title, that it was printed at Cologne, in 1597; I believe it was printed at Paris. It is a Book in 22mo of 40 Pages.

(16) Page 3.

(17) Page 12.

(18) Page 13, &c.

(19) In the Assembly of the 2d of July, ibid. pag. 28.

(20) Ibid. pag. 29.

(21) Which was to meet on the 12th of the same Month.

(11) Journal of the Learned, Nov. 1696. pag. 717.

(12) Ibid. pag. 718.

(13) As she constantly perverted the Scripture, (see the Journal of the Learned, ibid. p. 720), she would not have failed to take advantage of what is said in St John chap. v. vers. 22. The Father judgeth no man, but hath committed all judgment to the Son. And in 1 Cor. xv. 24. When Christ shall have delivered up the Kingdom to God even the Father.

Company to insert a Declaration in their Act [D], which otherwise would have been very superfluous; since the Question did not relate to the Things specified in the Declaration. We must not forget that the Father of Mary d'Agreda became a Monk in a Monastery of the Order of St Francis, wherein two of his Sons had already entered themselves Fryars, and that he lived there a very exemplary Life, and died a Saint (e). Much less ought we to forget, that great Interest has been made at Rome to procure the Canonization of Mary d'Agreda. See the beginning of the Remark [C].

(e) Journal of the Learned, Feb. 16. 1696. p. 51.

(22) Ibid. pag. 30. "condemning a Book, which the sovereign Pontiff had reserv'd the Cognizance of to himself, and had deputed Cardinals, who were at that time examining it (22). — The Cabal were enrag'd at him, and he was obliged to declare, that, if they proceeded, without regarding his Remonstrance, he appeal'd from all that was done against the Book to the Pope. He declares, however, That if this Appeal injur'd the Rights of the Gallican Church in any manner, he would desist from it (23). From that Day, 'till the meeting of the Assembly, there was nothing but caballing. The Day of the Assembly being come, Mess. du Saussay and Gobilion condemn'd the Book (24). — "But Mons. le Caron pretended there was nothing in it, which deserv'd to be censur'd; which he supported with good Reasons. Each of them had his Partizans, who appear'd in twenty nine successive Assemblies. The Syndic gave those of Mons. le Caron's Party the Name of Agredians, a Name which they still retain." The Affair was terminated the seventeenth of September. "There was such a Noise in the Hall of the Assembly, that it seem'd like a Market (25). — The next Day Mess. du Floi and du Mai, formerly Counsellors in the Parliament of Paris, protested against the Validity of the Censure, and caus'd their Protest to be notify'd to the Dean and Syndic of the Faculty, which is still in Force, they not having retract'd it by any Act (26). Some time after, the Syndic and the Deputies assembled again, and procur'd another Censure — which was read the first of October; but, before the reading, the Syndic declar'd to the Faculty the Opposition which was deny'd to him by those two Gentlemen. He said moreover, that my Lord of Paris having caus'd them to come to his Palace, had convinc'd them by such good Reasons, that the Abbot du Mai yielded to them, and that he was sure that when Mons. du Floi should hear the reading of the Censure, as it was drawn up, he would assent to it. The Work of the Syndic was read, and they were surpris'd that there were new and censur'd Propositions in it, which they had not heard of in the Faculty, and that they had retrench'd several of the condemn'd ones (27)." My Readers may judge as they please of these Extractions.

(25) Ibid. pag. 37. "Market (25). — The next Day Mess. du Floi and du Mai, formerly Counsellors in the Parliament of Paris, protested against the Validity of the Censure, and caus'd their Protest to be notify'd to the Dean and Syndic of the Faculty, which is still in Force, they not having retract'd it by any Act (26). Some time after, the Syndic and the Deputies assembled again, and procur'd another Censure — which was read the first of October; but, before the reading, the Syndic declar'd to the Faculty the Opposition which was deny'd to him by those two Gentlemen. He said moreover, that my Lord of Paris having caus'd them to come to his Palace, had convinc'd them by such good Reasons, that the Abbot du Mai yielded to them, and that he was sure that when Mons. du Floi should hear the reading of the Censure, as it was drawn up, he would assent to it. The Work of the Syndic was read, and they were surpris'd that there were new and censur'd Propositions in it, which they had not heard of in the Faculty, and that they had retrench'd several of the condemn'd ones (27)." My Readers may judge as they please of these Extractions.

(27) Ibid. pag. 39. "Market (25). — The next Day Mess. du Floi and du Mai, formerly Counsellors in the Parliament of Paris, protested against the Validity of the Censure, and caus'd their Protest to be notify'd to the Dean and Syndic of the Faculty, which is still in Force, they not having retract'd it by any Act (26). Some time after, the Syndic and the Deputies assembled again, and procur'd another Censure — which was read the first of October; but, before the reading, the Syndic declar'd to the Faculty the Opposition which was deny'd to him by those two Gentlemen. He said moreover, that my Lord of Paris having caus'd them to come to his Palace, had convinc'd them by such good Reasons, that the Abbot du Mai yielded to them, and that he was sure that when Mons. du Floi should hear the reading of the Censure, as it was drawn up, he would assent to it. The Work of the Syndic was read, and they were surpris'd that there were new and censur'd Propositions in it, which they had not heard of in the Faculty, and that they had retrench'd several of the condemn'd ones (27)." My Readers may judge as they please of these Extractions.

(28) Journal of the Learned, Nov. 1696. pag. 716, 717. "[D] That the Apprehensions of the Scandal it might cause oblig'd the Company to insert a Declaration in their Act." They protested in the most solemn manner, "That by this Censure they had no Design to diminish any thing of the lawful Worship, which the Catholic Church pays to the Holy Virgin; that they honour'd her as the Mother of God; that they had a particular Confidence in her Intercession; that they held the Sentiments of their Fathers, concerning the immaculate Conception, and that they believed her Assumption into Heaven, both in Body and in Soul (28)." The Author of the Letter, of which we have produc'd some Extractions in the foregoing Remark, says, That the Censure, wherein they acknowledge the Conception and the Assumption of the Virgin, was made by the Syndic and the Deputies, after the Body of the Faculty had finish'd the Judgment (29). This shews that they had not the Courage to publish the Censure of the Faculty, without qualifying it; and we may judge from thence, to what Dangers they expose themselves, who disapprove the most palpable Errors, which magnify the Honours of the Holy Virgin. They not only expose themselves to the Indignation of the People, but also to that of the Monks, and of many other Ecclesiastics: Whence they endeavour to ward off the Blow by studied Prefaces (30). What Servitude! and what a Proof that the Disease is incurable! What Livy said of the Republic of Rome, agrees at present with the Church of that Name. "Labente deinde paulatim disciplina, velut desidentes primo moris sequatur animo: deinde ut magis magisque

(29) Cafe of Mary d'Agreda, pag. 30. "that they honour'd her as the Mother of God; that they had a particular Confidence in her Intercession; that they held the Sentiments of their Fathers, concerning the immaculate Conception, and that they believed her Assumption into Heaven, both in Body and in Soul (28)." The Author of the Letter, of which we have produc'd some Extractions in the foregoing Remark, says, That the Censure, wherein they acknowledge the Conception and the Assumption of the Virgin, was made by the Syndic and the Deputies, after the Body of the Faculty had finish'd the Judgment (29). This shews that they had not the Courage to publish the Censure of the Faculty, without qualifying it; and we may judge from thence, to what Dangers they expose themselves, who disapprove the most palpable Errors, which magnify the Honours of the Holy Virgin. They not only expose themselves to the Indignation of the People, but also to that of the Monks, and of many other Ecclesiastics: Whence they endeavour to ward off the Blow by studied Prefaces (30). What Servitude! and what a Proof that the Disease is incurable! What Livy said of the Republic of Rome, agrees at present with the Church of that Name. "Labente deinde paulatim disciplina, velut desidentes primo moris sequatur animo: deinde ut magis magisque

(30) Note, that, in relation to the Prefaces, these two Prefaces of Boleau have been apply'd. Un Auteur à genoux dans une humble Préface, au Lecteur qu'il ennuie à beau demander grace. An Author on his Knees, in an humble Preface, does quell't, by pardon of the Reader, who m be it going to tor-ture.

"lapi sint, tum ire cæperint præcípites, donec ad hæc tempora, quibus nec vitia nostra nec remedia pati possumus, perventum est (31). — We may trace the Decay of their Morals, from the first Relaxation of Discipline, through the several Stages of Degeneracy, to the present times, in which we can neither bear our Vices, nor their Remedies." The Work of Mary d'Agreda, is evidently full of Fables, and absurd Doctrines; yet, because it favours the false Ideas which People will entertain of the high Dignity, and unlimited Power of the Holy Virgin, all kind of Machines must be set at work to get it censur'd at Paris. The Author of the Letter (32) does more harm to his Church and Nation than he apprehends, when he recounts the Cabals, which were made use of by those, who wanted to have the Mystical City of the Spanish Abbess censur'd. There would have been no need of caballing, if the Minds of the People had not been strangely obstinate: Nor need they have had recourse to Softenings. The Censure would have pass'd, and no one would have murmur'd at it. All the Courts of the Inquisition would have prevented the Faculty of Divinity of Paris; whereas they have all remain'd silent hitherto, if I am not mistaken; though they are so ready to condemn all Works, which oppose ever so little the most doubtful Traditions, if they favour the Worship of the Saints (33).

(31) Livius, lib. 1. init.

(32) The Title of it is at the beginning of the Remark [C].

Note, That there is a particular Reason, which may oblige the Sorbonne to be cautious, and expose them to the Oppositions of many Doctors: Which is, that so many Consequences have been drawn from the Epithet Mother of God, that there is scarce any extravagant Opinion concerning the Excellence and Power of the Virgin, but what may be maintained in some Measure by Arguments ad hominem, which those Consequences afford. Your Adversaries lead you by Degrees where they please; you are undone by the Subtilties of the Schoolmen: If you retreat, you stand convicted of denying Consequences; from whence it happens, that those, who pretend to argue consequentially, and to favour the popular Devotion at the same time, chuse rather to advance still farther, than to retreat. And yet their System is not regular. The Divinity of Mary, in the literal Sense, is wanting to it: since the Mother of God ought to be a Goddess of course, and of the self-same Nature with her Son. And she would be so, if they would adopt the Imagination of the Cavalier Borri (34), but it has been condemn'd. Perhaps a time will come when they will find the Necessity of it, and by that means square this irregular Figure. It is thought that many wish for it.

(33) The Acta Sanctorum of the Jesuits of Antwerp have been condemn'd by the Inquisition of Toledo.

(34) See the Article BORRI.

— O si Angulus ille
Proximus accedat, qui nunc deformat Agellum (35).

(35) Horat. Sat. 6. lib. 2. ver. 8.

— Ob! that the Gods would yield
That Nook, which spoils the Figure of my Field.

CREECH.

Such a thing might be done in certain Circumstances, if there was a Combination of temporal and spiritual Interests. Every thing passes, when Princes concur with the Heads of an Ecclesiastical Party, during certain Dispositions of general Affairs.

Let us conclude with observing, that, if the Faculty of Divinity of Paris were in hopes that their Censure would remove a Stumbling-Block out of the way of those, who are called the New Re-united, they were deceived; for the Opposition they were forced to encounter with in their own Body, and the Discontent which broke out after the Publication of the Censure, have much more scandalized the Re-united, than the Censure could have Edified them. Besides that, what gives them the greatest Offence remains entire in the Preface to the Censure; a Preface, which is a Signal of the Continuation of a Capital Capital Controversy, I mean, in relation to a Work, whose Excesses have excited some curious Persons to philosophize, in order to discover the Original of it (36).

(36) See the Remark [N] of the Article NESTORUS.

AGRICOLA almost an infinite number of Authors bear this Name, but as there are but three or four of considerable note, I shall only take Notice of them.

AGRICOLA (GEORGE) a German Physician, excelled in the Knowledge of Metals. He was born at Glauchba, in Misnia, on the Twenty fourth of March, 1494. The Discoveries he made in the Mountains of Bobemia, after his Travels in Italy, so strongly inclined him to go to the Bottom of the Metallic Science, that when, by the advice of his Friends, he had engaged himself in the Practice of Physic at Joachimsthal (a), he employed as much time as he could in the Study of Fossils. To satisfy this Passion the better, he retired to Chebnitz, where he gave himself up wholly to this Study. He spent there not only the Pension, which was obtained for him from Maurice Duke of Saxony, but also part of his own Estate; insomuch that he got much more Glory by his Labours, than Profit. He composed many Works on the Subject he had most at Heart, and some others on Miscellaneous Subjects [A]. He examined what Budæus, Leonard Portius, and Alciatus, had observed concerning Weights and Measures, and found them greatly mistaken. Alciatus undertook to defend himself, but he was foiled in the Argument. Bodin maintains, that, in Comparison of Agricola, Aristotle and Pliny saw very little into the Metallic Science (b). It must not be forgot, that, when Duke Maurice, and Duke Augustus marched to join the Army of Charles the Vth in Bobemia, Agricola followed them, to shew his Fidelity, though he was obliged to abandon the Care of his Estate, his Children, and his Wife, who was with Child (c). He died a very good Papist at Chebnitz on the Twenty first of November, 1555. The Zeal, with which he opposed the Protestant Doctrine in his latter Days, to which he seemed not much averse at first [B], rendered him so odious to the Lutherans, that they let him lie five days unburied [C].

They

(c) Uxore pregnante cum dulcissimi liberis domi relicta, fortassis etiam omnibus posthabitis, cum jurandum, quod eis erat devinctus, nullo modo negligendum putaret, in exercitum eorum penè senex militavit. Melch. Adam. Vit. Med. c. pag. 79.

(a) That is, The Valley of Joachim. It is a City of Misnia.

(b) Bodin, in Method. Histor. See in Sir Tho. Pope Blount his Censura celebr. Authorum, pag. 413. a great number of very honourable Elogies of Agricola.

[A] Many Works on the Subject he had most at Heart, and some others on miscellaneous Subjects.] The Titles of some of them are as follows. De ortu & causis subterraneorum (Of the Origin and Causes of Subterraneous Things). De natura eorum quæ effluunt ex terra (Of the Nature of those things, which flow out of the Earth). De natura fossilium (Of the Nature of Fossils). De medicatis fontibus (Of medicinal Springs). De subterraneis animantibus (Of Subterraneous Animals). De veteribus & novis metallis (Of old and new Metals). De Re metallica (Of the Metallic Science). I look upon his Speech De bello Turcis inferendo (1) (Of making War upon the Turks), to be a Political Work; his Treatise De traditionibus Apostolicis (Of Apostolical Traditions), a Controversial Piece; and his Treatise De Peste (Of the Plague), a Physical Dissertation. Melchior Adam does not know whether these two last Works were ever printed; I am also ignorant of it, as to the Treatise of Controversy, but I know that the other appeared at Basil in the Year 1554. and that it was since twice printed before Melchior Adam published his Book. See Marklinus in his Lindenis renovatus.

(1) Printed at Basil in 1538.

[B] Seemed not much averse to it at first.] He not only disapproved the sordid Traffic of Indulgences, but many other Practices likewise. The following four Verses of his making were affixed in the Year 1519. in the Streets of Zwickaw (2). They concern the Indulgences of Rome.

(2) He taught Greek there.

Si nos injecto salvabit cistula nummo,
Heu nimium infelix tu mihi pauper eris!
Si nos, Christe, tua servatos morte beasti,
Jam nihil infelix tu mihi pauper eris.

If without Gold Salvation can't be bought,
How curs'd the Wretch who is not worth a Great?
But if Christ's Death has purchas'd for us Peace,
Rejoice, ye Poor, and bid your Miseries cease.

Melchior Adam was of Opinion, that four things hindered the Conversion of Agricola. 1. Theraff Writings of some Divines. 2. The scandalous Lives of some Reformed Sectaries. 3. The breaking of the Images, and revolt of the Country People. 4. The Inclination he had for Pomp and Ceremony (3). The three first of these gave Erasmus an entire Dislike to the Protestant Party. A great Number of other Persons, who wished for a Reformation of the Church, fell into the same Snare with Erasmus.

(3) Melch. Adam in Vit. Medic. pag. 80.

Whence it was, that Theodore Beza encountered so many Persons, who had at first tasted of the good Seed, and afterwards returned: to their wallowing in the Mire (4). When we talk thus to Men of Sense and Reason, they tell us, that, considering the State of things at that time, it was impossible to support or propagate one's Cause by downright Meekness and Patience; and that therefore the Providence of God, whose ways are always Wise, permitted, that Men should appear, such as they are, in the great Work of Reformation, to attain more naturally to his Design, which was, as Experience teaches us, to hinder either of the two Religions from quite ruining each other. This is a good Plea. There are certain means, which, for this very Reason, that they are proper to bring about half the Work, are insufficient for the perfecting of it.

(4) See his History of the Church.

[C] They let him lie five Days unburied.] Scaliger condemned this Conduct with Reason; he says "Agricolam, quo nihil doctius, Lutherani mortuum sepelire noluerunt, quia manserant Pontificius. Ita quisquidam scripsit & hortatus est ut sepelirent hominem Christianum; barbaries magna. (5). — The Lutherans refused to bury the very learned Agricola, because he died a Papist. A certain Italian wrote to, and exhorted them, to bury a Man, who was a Christian: this was an Instance of Great Barbarity." I dare not maintain, that it is false, that an Italian exhorted the Lutherans to this Office of Humanity by Letter, but I see no probability of it; and it may be imputed to Forgetfulness in Scaliger, or his Boarders. There is a Letter of Matthiæus, wherein he complains, that such a venerable old Man, as George Agricola, could not find Earth enough in his own Country to cover his Body. Id. Matthiæus ad Caspar. Navium Mod. (lib. 2. Epist.) queritur, hunc præclarum problemque senem in patria tantum terræ non invenisse quo sum opiretur cadaver (6). From hence they might pretend, that an Italian exhorted by Letter those, who had the Body, to bury it. Let it not be thought strange, that I lay but small Stress upon what the great Scaliger says here; for how can I depend upon him in relation to Agricola, when he has told us, upon another Occasion, that he was a very impious Man, who scarce deserved to be buried? "Non minus eruditus & in censenda metallorum natura curiosus fuit quam vere impius, nulli addictus religioni, ut post mortem vix sepe liri meruerit (7). — He was as Learned and Curious in examining the Nature of Metals, as he was truly impious, and addicted to no Religion; insomuch that he scarce deserved funeral Rites after his Death."

(5) In Scaligeranis, pag. 5.

(6) Melch. Adam. ubi supra.

(7) Scaligerana prima, pag. 80.

They brought his Corps from Cbennits to Zeits, where he was interred in the principal Church (d). Such are the Fruits of a blind Zeal [D].

(d) Id. ibid.
pag. 77, &c.

[D] Such are the Fruits of a blind Zeal.] There is no Protestant at present, who does not condemn this Treatment of his Corps; and I do not question, but that, at that time, most of the Lutherans condemned it. Melchior Adam seems to lay all the Blame of it on the Minister of the Place. It is more easy, at present, to see the Mischief of this false Zeal; Time has calmed those Passions, which like impetuous Storms rob us of the Sight of Heaven:

Eripiunt subito nubes cœlumque diemque
Teucrorum ex oculis: ponto nox incubat atra (8).

(8) Virgil.
Æneid. lib.
1. ver. 28.

— sable Night involves the Skies,
And Heaven itself is raviſh'd from their Eyes.
D R Y D E N.

What will not Men do to make Reprifals, and when there is Reason to speak thus?

Res dura & regni novitas me talia cogunt Moliri (9).

— my Cruel Fate,
And Doubts attending an unfettled State,
Force me to guard my Coasts.

D R Y D E N.

Frederus remarks, that Agricola fell into so great a Passion in a Theological Dispute, that he contracted a violent Fever, of which he died (10). He cites only Melchior Adam, who says nothing of it. It is very likely, that Agricola had enraged the Lutherans by the Appearance of an excessive Aversion. Peter Albinus represents him (11) as an obdurate Roman Catholic. I desire you to compare this with the first Scaligerana.

(9) Dido apud Virgil.
Æn. lib. 1.
ver. 563.

(10) Paul. Freher. in Theatr. Vi-
ror. illustr.
pag. 1238.

(11) In the Chronicle of Misina.

(a) A Town in the County of Mansfeld. He was as well known by the Name of Melchior Adam as by that of Agricola.

(b) Melch. Adam. in Vita Theol. pag. 479.

(c) It was in relation to the Formula-ry of Ecclesiastical Visitation, drawn up by Melancthon.

(d) See the Article IS-LEBIANS.

(e) The 30th of March, 1540, during the Affair at Smalcalde.

(f) In 1540.

AGRICOLA (JOHN) a Saxon Divine, born at Islebe (a) on the Twentieth of April 1492 (b), was the Cause of great Troubles to the Protestant Religion, which he embraced. It has been said, that he followed the Elector of Saxony, in Quality of his Minister, to the Diet of Spire, in the Year 1526. and to that of Augsburg in the Year 1530. But it is certain, that he made those two Journeys, only in Quality of Minister of the Count of Mansfeld. It is true this Count accompanied the Elector of Saxony, and, during that time, his Minister preached sometimes before the Elector; and this is the Original of the Mistake. Agricola had tolerable Success in preaching, which made him fancy himself a great Man, and set himself up in competition with Melancthon. For this Reason he wrote against him in 1527 (c). His restless and ambitious Temper prompted him, in 1536, to ask leave to quit his Country, where he exercised the Ministry, and was Principal of the College. His Request was accompanied with Complaints; and seemed so unreasonable to the Count of Mansfeld, that he did not obtain his Dismissal without Reproaches of Ingratitude, Avarice, and Drunkenness; besides being charged with exercising his Function carelessly, and with having disputed more against the Protestants, than against the Catholics. He went to Wittenberg, where he obtained the Chair of Professor and Minister. He taught no very instructive Doctrine in relation to the use of the Law under the Gospel; in a word, he became the Founder of the Antinomian Sect (d). Luther, who had been his good Friend [A], attacked him very roughly, and obliged him to promise that he would recant his Errors; but while they were employed in drawing up the Formula, which he was to sign, Luther published some new Writings, at which Agricola was so piqued, that he presented (e) a very abusive Petition to the Elector against his Antagonist, wherein he complained, among other things, that they imputed Opinions to him, which were not his. Luther answered him with all his Fire, and, to clear himself from the Character of a Public Libeller, he sent for Attestations from Islebe, in relation to some particular Instances of Agricola's Behaviour. The Divines of Wittenberg ran to the Assistance of Luther, and said, That his Accusations were well-grounded. The Elector of Saxony, much embarrassed with the Affair, appointed Arbitrators between the Parties, and recommended to them to find out some means of an Accommodation; after which he made Agricola promise, that he would not retire, before the Process was ended. This Promise was broke: Agricola retired privately to Berlin (f), without waiting for an Answer to the Demand he had made for Leave to depart. The Elector of Brandenburg endeavoured to reconcile him with Luther; but there was nothing to be done in it, except upon one of these two Conditions, either that Agricola should return, and wait the decision of the Process, or that he should retract his Errors, and the abusive Language he had given Luther in writing. He chose the latter [B], and published a Book at Berlin, wherein

[A] Luther, who had been his good Friend. They were of the same City. We find that Agricola served Luther as Secretary in the Conference at Leipsic, in 1519 (1), and that he was sent to Frankfort in 1525 (2), with a Recommendatory Letter from Luther to the Magistrates, to be one of the Ministers of the Gospel there. The Author, whom I cite (3), censures Mr Varillas, who said, that Luther undertook nothing considerable without Agricola. This is to push things too far, and he cannot produce any Proof of it.

(1) See Hendorf, Hist. Luther. lib. 1. pag. 92. liter. r.

(2) Ibid. p. 243. lit. e.

(3) See Hendorf, ubi supra, lib. 3. pag. 126. n. 1.

[B] He chose the latter. There are probably two Reasons for this Piece of Condescension. First, He had no Hopes of finding his Account in the Decision of the Controversy; for he could not gain his Point without Luther's being declared a Slanderer of his Brethren. Now he must have been the most credulous of Men to entertain any Hopes of Success, at this Expence, in Saxony. The People would have stoned the Judges, who should have sullied the Reputation of a Reformer in this manner. They would have pretended, that the Church stood in need of the good Fame of Luther, and that the Papists would draw too great an Advantage from his Disgrace. Have we not seen some, who were but Pigmies in comparison of Luther, escape, by this means, the Canonical Punishments which they have deserved? Agricola's second Reason, probably, was, that by not submitting, he was in danger of losing the Quarter's Salary which was due to him. Read what follows: "Neque tamen hoc scripto sta-tim

wherein he asked Pardon of those, whom he might have offended by his Errors, and of Luther by Name, and professed that he would Live and Die in the Faith, which he had opposed. Luther did not depend upon these fine Proteftations; Agricola complained of this to the Elector of Saxony, and assured him, that nothing had ever given him greater uneasiness, than this Contest with the Man of God (g); and that, since his Offer of giving his Oath would not avail him, he referred his Cause to the Judge of the World; humbly entreating the Elector, at the same time, to order him the Payment of his Salary, which was due for Three Months, and which he stood in need of for the Maintenance of his Wife and Nine Children (b). I believe he never would have regained the Favour either of the Elector, or Martin Luther. No doubt he comforted himself with the Reputation, which his Office of Preacher at the Court of Berlin gave him, and with the Choice, which they made of him for composing a Work, which made a great Noise. I mean the Interim, which he drew up with Julius Pflug, and Michael Heldingus (i), in the Year 1548. It is pretended, that the Emperor rewarded Agricola largely for the Pains he had taken on this Occasion. The War, which arose some time after, in Germany, between the Protestant Divines (k), made it appear that this Minister was a Man of a dangerous Spirit, and a great Intermeddler. He was officious in composing Animosities, and did not spare the Gift of Elocution, which he was Master of, in the Conferences, which were held about these Matters; but he held no Differences. He died at Berlin in 1566. He had been Superintendent (l) of the March of Brandenburg (m). It is said that he would have revived the use of Holy Oyl for the Sick, and that he did not question, but that miraculous Cures would have attended, it as in former times (n). He wrote but few Books [C]. They carry Things too far, who say that he relapsed to Popery [D].

(g) See Remark [B].

(b) Taken out of Secken-dorf's Answer to the Lutheranism of Father Maimbourg, lib. 3. from pag. 306. to pag. 310.

(i) He is commonly called Michael Sidonius, because he was titular Bishop of Sidon.

(k) It was on the Question about things indifferent in Religion.

(l) So the Lutherans call those Ministers, who have the Inspection of several Churches.

(m) Micrael. Hist. Eccles. pag. 733. Edit. 1679.

(n) Melch. Adam. in Vitis Theol. pag. 411.

"tim, ut speraverat, Luthero de vera conversione sua fidem fecit; id quod ipse Agricola literis d. 19. Decemb. apud Electorem Saxonie queritur, nihil quae tota vita sibi gravius accidisset, quam simultatem illam cum viro Dei, quem ipse patris loco veneratus sit, & in cujus obsequio mori velit, apud quem tamen nihil proficiat ne juramenti quidem obligatione, ideo se Deo causam committere. Petit tamen ut sibi ad alendam uxorem novemque liberos trimesse, quod restare sibi dicit, salarium non denegetur, se enim id diligenti lectione promeritum (4). — Nor did he by this Writing presently convince Luther of his Conversion, as he expelled; which Agricola himself complained of in his Letters of the nineteenth of December to the Elector of Saxony; in which he declares, that nothing had happened so afflicting to him in his whole Life, as his Quarrel with the Man of God, whom he revered as a Father, and in whose Favour he desired to dye; with whom as his Offer of an Oath could not prevail, he committed his Cause to God. However he petitioned, that they would not deny him his Quarter's Salary, for the Maintenance of his Wife and nine Children, which he said was due to him, and which he had merited by his constant Attendance on Preaching."

[C] He wrote but few Books. The Explication of three hundred German Proverbs was one of the first. He abused Ulric Duke of Wirtemberg much in it (5). Complaints were made of it, which obliged the Author to acknowledge his Fault in a very submissive Letter. This did not hinder Duke Ulric from alledging, among other Grievances, at the Diet of Frankfort, in the Year 1536, that they protected John Agricola in the County of Mansfeld, by whom he had been publicly affronted (6). The Author increased his Work with above four hundred Proverbs more in the second Edition. He wrote a Commentary on St Luke; he refuted the Explication of the nineteenth Psalm, published in German, by Thomas Muncker, &c. (7).

[D] That he relapsed to Popery.] It is certain, that, leaving Saxony, he retired to the Court of Brandenburg, and that the Elector Joachim II. who had established the Reformation in his Dominions, in the Year 1539, (8) received him honourably, and made him his Preacher. It is as certain that he enjoyed that Prince's Favour all his Life-time; so that it is false to say, as Melchior Adam, and Paul Freberus do, that Agricola was a Papist, tunc Pontificiis sese adjunxerat, when Charles V. employed him in drawing up the Interim. I own he made great Concessions in that Piece; but did not Pflug, and the Bishop of Sidon, do the same? Were they therefore Lutherans? The Project of these three Persons was neither satisfactory to the Protestants, nor the Catholics; this is very certain: But there is a manifest Distinction to be made between those, who, for the sake of Peace, give up part of the Reformation, and those who actually forsake the Protestant Communion, to embrace the Communion of Rome. Agricola was doubtless one of the first Class, but, having never been of the second, he ought not to pass for a Papist. Censure therefore these Words of Micraelius; "Joh. Agricola ---- nollet primo, deinde suus, tandem Pontificiorum (9). — John Agricola ---- who was first of our Sect, then of no Party, and lastly a Convert to Popery." I cannot tell, whether, when he says three Lines after, "Homini Epicuræo similior quam pio Theologo, ut scribit Osiander ad annum 1566. quo obiit Agricola. — More of an Epicurean, than a pious Divine, as Osiander writes, at the Year 1566, in which Agricola died — He means a Voluptuary, or one indifferent to all Religions."

(4) Id. ibid. pag. 310. n. 26.

(5) Id. lib. 2. pag. 135.

(6) Ib. pag. 412. lit. b.

(7) Melch. Adam. in Vitis Theol. pag. 411.

(8) Secken-dorf, lib. 3. pag. 234, & seq.

(9) Micrael. Synagm. Histor. Eccles. p. 733.

AGRICOLA (MICHAEL) a Lutheran Minister at Abo in Finland, was the first who translated the New Testament into the Language of the Country, which contributed much to the Propagation of Lutheranism (a).

AGRICOLA (RODOLPHUS) was one of the most Learned Men of the XVth Century. Italy, which in those times called all beyond the Alps barbarous, produced nothing, to which Friesland could not compare her Agricola, without fearing to be overcome. This great Man was of mean Birth [A]; he was born about the Year

[A] Was of mean Birth.] I am aware, that, in the Life of Agricola, among those of the Professors of Groningen, it is affirmed, that he was one of the most considerable Families of Friesland; Ex Agricolarum familia, apud Frisos inter bonora-
VOL. I.

tiores semper habita, vir hic incomparabilis oriundus. — This incomparable Person sprung from the Agricolæ, a Family in Friesland, esteemed amongst the most honourable. But as this Life is the same with that, which we find in Melchior Adam, it cannot ba-N n

(a) Ex Micraelio, Hist. Ecclesiast. pag. 733.

Year 1442. in the Village of Baffon, two Miles from Groningen. He gave early proofs of his future Reputation; and he had scarce received the Degree of Master of Arts at Louvain, but he might have been advanced to a Professor's Chair, if he had desired it: but his Inclination was rather to travel. He went from Louvain to Paris, after having lived in the former of these Two Cities the Life of an Athletic, I mean with great Sobriety, Chastity, and Application to Labour [B]. From Paris he went to Italy, and staid Two Years at Ferrara [C], where the Duke conferred many Favours on him. Theodore Gaza explained Aristotle in that City. Agricola, who was one of his Auditors, was heard in his Turn, and admired no less for his Style, than his Elocution. The Italians regretted, that so great a Man was not born in their Country. It was his own fault, when he returned home, that he did not possess considerable Employ; but his love of Books hindered him from thinking of any Settlement of this kind, or at least made him soon quit it. He at last accepted a Post, in Groningen, and followed the Court of Maximilian the First Six Months, to take care of the Affairs of That City. He acquitted himself happily of this Commission, and had no great Reason to boast of the Gratitude of his Masters; therefore he left them, and went to travel again. He was such a Lover of Liberty, that he refused to accept the Headship of a College, which the Inhabitants of Antwerp offered him; and I know not how he could with Honour have accepted it, since he had refused to enter, under very advantageous Conditions, into the Service of the Emperor Maximilian. He preferred Quiet and Independency to every thing. After having led a very roving Life, he settled in the Palatinate, where the Bishop of Worms, whom he had instructed in the Greek Tongue, found means to engage his Stay. It was in the Year 1482, that he came into the Palatinate; where he spent the remainder of his Life [D], sometimes at Heidelberg, and sometimes at Worms. The Elector Palatine took lance the Testimony of Ubbo Emmius, who was best acquainted with Friesland, his own Country, of any Man: "Obiculis gaulibus apud Baffon ortus (Rodolphus Agricola) tantum sibi in literis nomen paravit per omnem Europam, ut, &c. (1) — RODOLPHUS " AGRICOLA born at Baffon, of obscure Parents, " gained such a Reputation for Learning over all " Europe, that, &c."

I have been shewed (2) two Proofs of Emmius's Opinion in Agricola's Letters. The one is, that his Twin-Sister was sent to Groningen to learn the Skinners Trade, pellicea opera & texturam pulviorum; the other is, that the Father of this Girl was Receiver of the Church of his Village. He was much grieved when one of his Sons robbed him of an hundred Florins of the Money of that Revenue. "Venit ad me pater tuus turbatus & gemitus, & prope cum lacrimis questus est mihi, Henricum fratrem nostrum pridie ejus diei clam sibi abduxisse centum florenos nostra moneta ex pecunia sacra cujus curam, ut his, ille gerit. — Your Father came to me greatly discomposed, and sighing, and complained to me almost with Tears, that Henry, our Brother, had the Day before stolen from him an hundred Florins, of that sacred Money, which, you know, he has the care of." Our Rodolphus, being at Groningen, wrote this to John his Twin-Brother.

[B] The Life of an Athletic, I mean with great Sobriety, Chastity, and Application to Labour. The Ancients remark, that the Athletics engaged themselves to Labour, and obtained from Wine and Women.

Qui studet optatam cursu contingere metam,
Multa tulit fœcique puer: sudavit & assit:
ABSTINUIT VENERIS ET VINO (3).

He, who, ambitious of the Victor's Place,
Courts the first Honours of the dusty Race,
Egures himself to Toil from childish Years,
And Cold and Heat's Excreams alternate bears;
Plies the strong Grape's intoxicating Joys,
And Veneris, which manly Strength destroys.

This Abstinence was remarkable in Agricola, and very uncommon in the Country where he lived, with regard to the first Particular. "Louvani vixit honestissime ab omni compositione ac commolatione contra gentis sue mores alienissimè. Tantus erat in eo bonarum literarum amor, tam indefessum studium, ut turpis Veneris fornicis & lustra ne noverit quidem (4). — He lived an exemplary Life at Louvain, not complying with his Country's Manners in revelling and feasting. So fond was he of good Literature, that he was wholly unacquainted with the scandalous Seats of Debauchery.

It was uncommon likewise every where, and is so still, with respect to the other Particular. For, to the shame of Christianity and of Learning be it said, there appears almost nothing in Scholars but shocking Inclinations to Debauchery. They were perhaps no better in ancient Times; for which reason I wonder why this did not become a Proverb, Sine Veneris & Baccho frigit Musæ, as well as this, Sine Cerere & Baccho frigit Venus. For this long time, the Youth, who study, have behaved as if the first of these Maxims was true.

[C] And staid two Years (5) at Ferrara. He learned Greek, and taught Latin there: He contended with Guarin which had the best Talent at writing in Prose, and disputed with the Strozza's the Praise of Poetry; as for Philosophy, he treated of it with Theodore Gaza (6).

[D] It was in the Year 1482. that he came into the Palatinate, where he spent the Remainder of his Life. Melchior Adam asserts this. "Cum hoc (Joanne) Camerario Dalburgio ab anno 1482, partim Heidelberg partim Wormatiae ad ultimum vitæ actum usque vixit conjunctissime (7). — He lived in a strict Friendship with this Person John Camerarius Dalburgius, partly at Heidelberg, and partly at Worms, from the Year 1482 to his Death." But Mr de la Moignon found fault with this Account; for this is his Remark: "Rodolphus Agricola, in a Letter, which he wrote to James Barbarianus, dated, by Mistake, XCII. instead of XXXII. and in another of the same date to his Brother John, says, that, upon taking a Journey the same Year to Heidelberg, he gave his Word to John of Alsbach, Chancellor of the Count Palatine, and Bishop of Worms, that he would return to him again the following Year. Yet we find, by his other Letters, that he did not return thither before the middle of the Year 1484. So that the Calculation of Vassius, pag. 566. De Histor. Lat. concerning the three Years of the Regency of Rodolphus at Heidelberg (8), is not right. Sigismond of Folign, otherwise Sigismondus Fulginas, is also mistaken, when he says, that Rodolphus died by the way in his return from Rome to his own Country. Rodolphus departed from Rome in 1480. and died five Years after at Heidelberg. It does not appear by the reading of his Works, that he exercised the Function of Professor at Worms. There is a Letter from Peter Scottus, dated the eighteenth of February, 1484, in which he says, That he was well pleased with Agricola's having began to read Lectures to the Youth at Heidelberg. "Argentinam reversus cum intellexissem te Heidelbergæ compelle purgare, & linguas Juvenum & aures, ut illæ nil sceleris albuginanti hæc vero, tuis tam peritis

(1) Ubbo Emmius, lib. 30. Histor. Frisland. ad ann. 1490. pag. 437.

(2) By Mr de la Moignon.

(5) In 1476 & 1477.

(6) Ex Vassierio Andre. Bibl. Belg. pag. 798.

(7) Melchior Adam. in Vitæ Philol. pag. 16.

(3) Horat. de Arte Poët. ver. 412, &c.

(4) Melchior Adam in Vitæ Philol. pag. 15.

(8) Note, that Melchior Adam does not say that Agricola ever taught Philosophy at Heidelberg. Vossius supposes that he taught it there three Years.

took a pleasure in hearing him discourse on Antiquity, and desired him to compile An Abridgement of ancient History, which Agricola performed with great Learning. He read public Lectures at Worms, but his Auditors, having a greater Taste for the Chianery of Logic, than for polite Literature, were not in the way of Thinking he desired. He began to study Divinity at Forty Years of Age; but despairing to succeed in it without the Knowledge of Hebrew, he apply'd himself to the Study of that Language, and, by the assistance of a Jew, he had made a considerable Progress in it [E]. Death, which seized him at Heidelberg, on the Twenty eighth of October 1485 (a), did not permit him to proceed. He submitted, with a Christian Resignation, to the Orders from above, and was buried, in a Cordelier's Habit, in the Church of the Minor Friars of that City. The Description, which is given, of his Character, may easily satisfy us, that he was a very good Man, plain, without Malice, moderate, and of a good Disposition. He was never married, tho' he had been in Love, or seemed to have been so. He had resolv'd to marry in his Youth; but, after having seriously examined what he was going to do, he laid aside his Design, not so much for fear of domestic Inconveniences, as out of a certain natural Indolence of Temper [F], which made him sink under the least Cares. One would scarce imagine, that a Person, who had div'd so far into the Study of Antiquity, as he had, should be capable of singing to Instruments Songs of his own Composition; yet in this manner he sometimes entertained the Ladies [G]. It is pretended, that, in the Affair of Religion, he had a Fore-taste of that Light [H], which appeared in the following Age. He left his Books to Adolphus Otto, a Native of Friesland, and Physician at Augsburg (b). Mr Morari had no foundation for saying, that Erasmus and Agricola became acquainted at Ferrara [I]. Paul Freberus did not understand all that

(a) Erasmus therefore was mistaken when he said that Agricola died before the Age of 40 Years. A. J. Chiff. 2. cent. 4. n. 39.

(b) Taken out of Melchior Adam in Vita Philof. pag. 13, & seq.

"peritis & dulcibus elegantis delibatz, omnes illas
"scilorum insulas & verbosas ineptias quasi magicas
"incantationes declinatz: tum ego vehementer lym
"gravius (9). — Returning to Argentina, when I un"derstood, that you had begun at Heidelberg to purge
"the Tongues and Ears of the Youth, that the sur-
"mer might not utter any thing senseless or wicked,
"and that the latter, by the infusion of your blissful
"and pleasing Elegancies, might avoid all the insipid
"and wordy Polities of Pretenders to Learning, as
"so many magical Incantations; when I understood
"this, I was greatly pleased."

[E] Had made a considerable Progress in it.] We learn from himself that at first this Study seemed very difficult to him; "Studia Hebraea --- primum
"ei plurimum negotii, ut scribit ipse, exhibuerunt,
"ut sibi videretur cum Antæo luctari (10). —
"The Study of the Hebrew Tongue, according to his "own Account, gave him at first a great deal of "Trouble, inasmuch that it seemed to him, as if he "was wrestling with Antæus." Meeting afterwards
"with a Jew who understood that Language indiffer-
"ently well, he made such a Progress in a few "Months, that he could translate some of David's "Psalms without Faults. Natus Judæum ejus lingue
"utcumque peritum paucis mensibus tantum profecit, ut
"aliquot Psalmos Davidicos in Latinam linguam citre
"culam transferret (11). This will not authorize us
"to say, with Vossius, that Agricola was very skilful
"in the Hebrew Tongue, Hebraicè doctissimus (12);
"we may degrade this Superlative, without any Inju"stice, and treat it like a Trooper, who is dismoun"ted, to be incorporated with the Infantry. Gesner
"distinguished better than Vossius; the latter has be"stowed a Superlative on Agricola's Latin, Greek, and "Hebrew, indifferently. But Gesner expresses himself
"thus: *Græci & Latini sermonis peritus, & Hebraicæ
"lingue non ignarus* (13). — Skilled in the Latin and "Greek Tongues, and not ignorant of the Hebrew. He "borrows these Words from Trithemius. König ou-
"does Vossius; for he makes use of the Superlative
"callentissimus, most knowing. See Parillas's third Mi"stake below. We may observe likewise, that Tri-"themius does not speak with Exactness, when he as"sures us, that Agricola had translated the Psalter from "the original Hebrew (14); for we do not reckon the "Exercises of an Author in learning a Language a"mong his Works; but it is plain, that the Transla"tion, which Agricola made of some of David's
"Psalms, was an Exercise, which his Jew corrected
"for him. This Jew was converted to the Christian "Religion. John Dalburg, Bishop of Worms (15), kept "him in his House only for the sake of Agricola, if "we may believe Valerius Andreas, "Primus ex-
"lantes è Germania Græcæ reliquias litteras, quibus
"etate profectionem etiam Hebraicæ adjectæ, præcep-
"tore usus Judæo quodam ad fidem converso, quem

"Wormatiensis Episcopus Johannes Dalburgus, solius
"Rodelphi causa, domi sue misit (16). — He "was the first who restored the called Greek Learn"ing in Germany; to which, in his ripe Years, he "added the Hebrew, by the Instruction of a certain "converted Jew, whom the Bishop of Worms, *John
"Dalburg*, entertained in his House, ably upon Ro-
"dolphus's Account."

[F] As out of a certain natural Indolence of Tem"per.] Because I cannot pretend to reach the Force
"of his Expressions. I shall set down the Greek Words,
"which he made use of. "Uxorem nunquam duxit:
"quamquam in priori ætate duxurum declinavit. Sed
"postquam incipit diligentius se ipse introspicere,
"aversus est ab eo consilio non incommotis rei oco-
"nomicz, sed deteruit ipsum genus vite sue, &
"animus levissimis etiam curis impar, nati φασγαν-
"τι τῆς φρονος (verba sunt ipsius epistola quadam ad
"Capnionem) ὅτι μάλλον ἀπορρηγνόντων καὶ ἰσχυρί-
"ων παρὰ τῆς αἰσῆς (17). — He never married:
"though formerly he had resolved to marry. But,
"after that he began to look more carefully into him"self, he gave up that Resolution, not in Considera"tion of the Inconveniences of a married State; but "his own manner of Life, and his natural Dispo"sition, unequal to the lightest Cares, deterred him
"from it."

[G] Sometimes entertained the Ladies.] See what "his Historian says: "Puellas amare se nonnunquam
"simulabat, verum nunquam deperibat. In eorum
"gratiam vernacula lingua quædam carmina scripsit
"elegantissimè: quæ virginibus primariisq; amicis
"præsentibus voce & testudine modulatissimè can-"bat (18). — He sometimes pretended to be an "Admirer of the Ladies; but was never desperately "in love with any of them. For their Sakes he "wrote some very elegant Latin Verses in his mother "Tongue." He understood all kinds of Music; "Ca-
"nebat voce, flatu, pulsu (19). — He performed
"with his Voice, his Breath, and his Fingers."

[H] A Foretaste of that Light.] Some one, who "heard Agricola and Mellissus discourse together, testi"fies, that they deplored the Darkness of the Church;
"and that they blamed the Mass, Calibacy, and the "Doctrine of the Monks concerning Justification by
"Works (20).

[I] Mr Morari had no Foundation for saying,
"that Erasmus and Agricola became acquainted at
"Ferrara.] This is easily proved. Erasmus was "born in the Year 1467. He studied at Desaver-
"at twelve or thirteen Years of Age. Agricola
"was at Ferrara in the Year 1476, and 1477. How "could he then have contracted an eternal Friendship "with Erasmus in that City? If Mr Morari had read
"Agricola's Prognostic concerning Erasmus, he would "not have said that they became acquainted at Fer-
"rara. Agricola was returned from Italy, when, ha-

(9) Centur. Epist. Philolog. à Golladto Editum, pag. 55, 56.

(10) Melch. Adam. ibid. pag. 18.

(11) Id. ibid. pag. 19.

(12) De Hist. Lat. pag. 566.

(13) Gesn. in Biblioth. fol. 353.

(14) Apud Valer. Andr. Bibl. Belg. pag. 768. Gesner affert it likewise.

(15) And not Heidelberg, as Bullart says in his Academiæ of Sciences, Tom. 1. pag. 2. 6.

(16) Valer. Andr. Bibl. Belg. 758.

(17) Melch. Adam. Vita Philof. p. 19. See also the Life of Agricola among those of the Professors of Groningen.

(18) Melch. Adam. Vita Philofoph. pag. 18.

(19) Id. ib.

(20) Id. ib. in Vita Profforum Groningens.

(c) Valer.
Andr. Bibl.
Belg. pag.
798.

that he transcribed out of Erasmus [K] in praise of Agricola. We understand from the same Erasmus, that Agricola died for want of timely Assistance from the Physicians [L]. Reuchlinus has taken notice of the Funeral Oration of this Learned Man (c). Varillas will supply us with many Faults here [M], and give us an occasion to relate what concerns the publication of one of Agricola's Books, entitled De Inventione Dialectica [N].

ving read the Themes of Hegius's Scholars at Deventer, he found I know not what in that of Erasmus, which made him desire to see the Child, and, having well observed him, he pronounced, that he would be a great Man. Erasmus was not twenty Years of Age, when Agricola died, and had not yet emerged from the Darkness, wherein impertinent Tutors had detained him; so that there could not be that Friendship between him and Agricola, which Mr Moreri speaks of. Here are some other Mistakes of that Author. Agricola, says he, was learned in all kind of Literature, and even in the Greek Language. This is, as if one should say, Such a one is learned in all Parts of Divinity, and even in the Questions about Grace. Is not the Greek Tongue one of the noblest Parts of Literature? I do not know where Mr Moreri has read, that Agricola was two Years Syndic of the City of Groningen.

(21) In his Theat. Vi-
ror. erudit.
pag. 1430.

[K] All that he transcribed out of Erasmus [21] He applies That to our Agricola, which Erasmus said of another. You must know, that Erasmus, having highly praised Agricola, confesses, that one of the Reasons, which made him so inclin'd to praise him, was, that he (Erasmus) had been instructed by one (22), who had been a Scholar of Agricola (23). Upon which he displays his Master's Merit; and says, among other Things, That Envy itself could not cavil at him, but for having too much despis'd Fame, for having had too little regard for Posterity, and for having wrote nothing but by way of Amusement. Freberus reports this Remark, as if it related to Agricola, wherein he attributes a Falshood to Erasmus; for Agricola's Works, collected in a Body (24), and printed at Cologne, in the Year 1539, prove, that he wrote many Things with Care, and with all his Industry.

(22) Alex-
and. Hegius

(23) Erasmus. Adag. chil.
1. cent. 4.
n. 39. pag.
145.

(24) By Allard of Amsterdam.
They are contained in two Volumes
in 4to.

[L] He died for want of timely Assistance from the Physicians. Let us see Erasmus's Account of this Matter: It will not be disagreeable to read it in his own Words. "Veluti si quis in morbo capitali Medicum operari infirmum aut procul accersendum; quæ res Hominem illum vere divinum extinxit Rodolphum Agricolaem; etenim, dum cunctatur Medicus, Mors anteverit (25). — As if any one, in a mortal Distemper, should wait for an eminent Physician, or one a great way off; which was the Occasion of the Death of the great Rodolphus Agricola; for Death was before-hand with the tardy Physician.

(25) Eras-
mus. Adag. Chil.
3. cent. 3.
n. 62.
pag. 703.

[M] Mr Varillas will supply us with many Faults here. I. He says (26), That Agricola had such a prodigious Memory, that he never forgot any thing that he had learned. This is an Hyperbole, for which I find no ground in that great Man's History, though they have very much enlarg'd on his Talents. Would they have forgot this, which is the most extraordinary that can be met with? II. He became learned to a Prodigy, by Books, which were borrowed, and without a Master. The Hyperbole here is accompany'd with a palpable Falshood; for we read in his Life, that he was sent very early to the College (27), and that after he had studied Grammar, he went to Louvain, where he lodg'd in the College of the Faulton, and perform'd all the Exercises of a Student in Philosophy, and became acquainted with several, who had a taste for good Latin. He was also a diligent Auditor of Theodore Geza at Ferrara. — Ibi Theodorum Gazam, Aristotelis Scripta enarrantem, diligenter audivit (28). It is very true, that he carried but few Books with him, in his Travels, and that, leaving the rest of his Library with his Friends, he made use of borrow'd Books, according as he wanted them: But, besides that there is no learned Man, who does not do the like in travelling; can it be said that Agricola gain'd all his Learning in his Travels? III. He began his Studies, where others use to end them; that is, with the Hebrew Tongue. He was not only desirous of understanding it in its Purity, but with all the Alterations, likewise, which Time, and the refining of the Rabbinis, have produc'd in it. He was equally industrious in acquainting himself with

(27) Puer
admodum in Iudum liter-arum mis-
sus. Mich.
Adam. Vit.
Philol. pag.
13.

(28) Id. ib.
pag. 15.

the Greek Tongue. — Lastly, he apply'd himself to Latin, without any regard to the Remonstrances of those, who pretended to dissuade him from it, because the Habit of writing and pronouncing the Hebrew seem'd to have introduc'd into his Mind an Incompatibility with the Roman Phrases and Expressions. Who can read this without Astonishment, when he is inform'd that our Rodolphus did not learn Hebrew till a few Years before his Death, and that the Progress he made in it was but small (29): I fancy Mr Varillas was deceiv'd by this Passage in Latin; — it is an Apostrophe to Agricola, "Transi enim Hebraicas, Græcæque literas, usque adeo stupenda celeritate, ut nequaquam Groningiz in ultima Frisia, sed Hierosolymis Athenique natus ac educatus à doctissimis crederere. Latinas porro tanta felicitate didicisti, docuisti ut, &c. (30) — You went through the Hebrew and Greek Learning with such a surprising Celerity, that you seem'd to have been born and educated, not at Groningen in farthest Friesland, but at Jerusalem and Athens. You attain'd likewise to the Latin, and taught it so successfully, that, &c." This seems to me to be the Reason, why Mr Varillas imagin'd, that Agricola first learnt the Hebrew, then the Greek, and last of all the Latin Tongues, and that he often compos'd, and spoke in Hebrew. IV. He made such a surprizing Progress in the Latin, that Erasmus, so little accusom'd to praise in others the Riches which himself posses'd, was never weary of commending him, especially after he had publish'd his Commentaries, so polite, and so worthy of the Age of Augustus, on Aristotle's Rhetoric and Logic. Erasmus was so inconsiderable a Man, when Agricola died; that the Progress of his Admiration must not be look'd for in the Years, which preceded the Death of Agricola. Besides, it is an Anachronism to say, that this illustrious Friesland liv'd till the Time when his own Possession of polite Literature hinder'd Erasmus from praising it in others. I have yet two Observations; The Commentaries on Aristotle's Logic did not appear till after the Death of the Author. Erasmus informs us of this, and says also, that they were mutilated. "Latitabant apud nescio quos commentarii Dialectices, nuper in publicum prodierunt, sed multis (31). — The logical Commentaries lay conceal'd in the Possession of I know not who; lately indeed they have come abroad, but imperfect." Certainly it is not in this Work, that Agricola's Latin, or the polite Manners of the Age of Augustus, are to be admir'd. V. The Elector Palatine — caus'd Agricola to come to Heidelberg — gave him the first Professorship of Eloquence in the University — and made him his Counsellor of State. Neither the Life of Agricola among those of the Professors of Groningen, nor that in Melchior Adam, say any thing like this. The Bishop of Worms is said to have invited Agricola into the Palatinate.

[N] Entitled, de Inventione Dialectica.] The following Remark was communicated to me since the first Edition. "Rodolphus Agricola compos'd no regular Commentaries on Aristotle's Logic or Rhetoric. We have only his three Books of Invention, Dialectica, which were first printed at Louvain, in the Year 1516, by the Care of Alard of Amsterdam, who published them confusedly, just as he could meet with them. Some time after, one James le Febvre, at Deventer, gave out that he had a Manuscript of the de Invention Dialectica, more ample, by three Books, than the Edition of Louvain; but this was false. Alard, who went on purpose to this le Febvre at Deventer, having seen his Manuscript, found it neither more ample, nor more correct than that, from whence the Edition of Louvain was publish'd. He reproach'd le Febvre for it, who excus'd himself as well as he could, though badly enough. Since the Year 1528, Pompey Occo, having obtain'd Agricola's own Manuscript by the Inheritance of his Uncle Adolphus, gave it to Alard, who, finding it very complete, and well preserv'd, caus'd it to be printed at Cologne.

(29) See the Remark [K] above, and add the Words of Erasmus 1. c. 3.
Extra mo vi-tem tempore ad literas Hebraicas totum animu in ap-plicat.

In his description of the Age of the Hebrew Learning,
Erasmus chil.
1. n. 39.
cent. 4.
pag. 145.

(30) Paul.
Juvius. Elog.
cap. 32.

(31) Erasmus supra.

"logue, in 4to, with long Commentaries, in the Year 1539. Some Years before, John Mattheus Præfemius, to whom Alard had communicated his Manuscript, had caused it to be printed in the same City, with his own Comments. This Work, which "is Rodalphus's Master-piece; was always universally esteem'd for the Exactness of the Style (32), and "of the Arguments." This comes from the same hand with the Observation, contain'd in the Remark [D] (33).

(32) All it's may be us, tho' this Work is very far from the polite Manners
de Monnoir.

of the Augustan Age, and less eloquent than some other Pieces of Agricola.

(33) Mr de

AGRIPPA (HENRY CORNELIUS), a great Magician, according to some [A], was a very Learned Man of the XVIth Century. He was born at Cologne, on the fourteenth of September, 1486 (a), of a Noble and Ancient Family [B]. Desiring to walk in the Steps of his Ancestors (b), who for many Generations had been employed by the Princes of the House of Austria, he entered early into the Service of the Emperor Maximilian. He had at first the Employ of Secretary; but as he was equally qualified for the Sword, as the Pen, he afterwards turned Soldier, and served the Emperor seven Years in his Italian Army [C]. He signalized himself on several Occasions, and, as a reward of his Brave Actions, obtained the Title of Knight. He had a mind to add the Academical Honours to the Military [D]; He therefore commenced Doctor of Law, and Physic. It cannot be denied, that he was a very great Genius, and had a very extensive Knowledge of Languages [E] and Things; but his too great Curiosity, his too free Pen, and his inconstant Temper, rendered him unhappy. He changed his Situation perpetually; he brought himself continually into Trouble; and, to compleat his Misfortunes, he drew upon himself the Hatred of the Clergy by his Writings. We find by his Letters, that he had been in France before the Year 1507 (c), that he travelled into Spain in the Year 1508 (d), and that he was at Dole in 1509 (e). He read Public Lectures there [F], which engaged him in a Contest with the Cordelier Catilinet. The Monks in those Times suspected, whatever they did not understand, of Error or Heresy; How then cou'd they suffer Agrippa to explain the mysterious Works of Reuchlinus de Verbo mirifico with Impunity? It was the Subject of the Lectures, which he read at Dole in the Year 1509, with great Reputation. The Counsellors of the Parliament themselves were his Auditors (f). To insinuate himself the better into the Favour of Margaret of Austria, Governess of the

(a) Agrippi, Epist. 2.
lib. 7. pag.
141. Edit.
8vo. Lugd.

(b) Id. Epist.
18. lib. 6.
pag. 970. &
Epist. 21.
lib. 7. pag.
1021. See also pag. 736.

(c) Epist. 1.
lib. 1.

(d) Ep. 10.
lib. 1.

(e) Epist. 17.
lib. 1.

(f) See A- grippa's Exposition with John Catilinet, Provincial Minister of the Francican Brethe, of Burgundy, Operum,
Tom. 2. pag.
508.

[A] A great Magician, according to some. Paul Jovius, Thevet, and Martin Del Rio are his principal Accusers. We shall see, in the Remark [P], the Mistakes, into which they fall; they are palpable; and yet a great number of Persons are still persuaded, on the Authority of these Writers, that Agrippa was perfect in the Art Magic.

[B] Of a noble and ancient Family. It's Name was de Nettebeym. Mr Teiffier assures us, in the 99th Page of the second Volume of his Additions to the Elogies taken out of Thuanus, that Agrippa was born at Nettebeym, in the Country of Cologne. Melchior Adam, whom he quotes, does not say so; he makes him to be born at Cologne itself (1), and refers us to a Letter of Agrippa, wherein we read these very Words, address'd to the Magistrates of Cologne: "Pol-sem vobis horum verissima exempla referre, nisi civium vestrorum pudori parendum, & patriæ meæ rationem habendam ducerem. Sum enim & ego, si forte necitis, civitate vestra oriundus, & prima pueritia apud vos nutritus (2). — I could give you undoubted Examples of these things, had I not a regard for your Citizens, and for the Place of my Birth. For I must tell you, if you are ignorant of it, that I was born in your City, and brought up from my Infancy in it." Thevet is still more mistaken in saying, That Agrippa was born in the City of Nestra (3). I know nothing of our Agrippa's Father, but that he serv'd the House of (4) Austria, and that he died about the Beginning of the Year 1518 (5).

[C] Serv'd the Emperor seven Years in his Italian Army. Freberus, who ventures but seldom to go beyond the Bounds of those, whom he transcribes, had a Mind here to play the Master, and to shew that he could tell us something, omitted by Melchior Adam. But he has been very unlucky in it; for he makes these seven Years commence in 1508, and end in 1515. If he had been well acquainted with the History of Agrippa, he would have known, that this Author was in Spain in the Year 1508, at Dole in the Year 1509, and in England in the Year 1510. This Week of Years must have begun in 1511, and Agrippa must necessarily have pretended that he serv'd under the Emperor, all the time he liv'd in Italy. But his own Letters would have betray'd him. We do not find, that he had any Employment in the Army, after he was made Professor at Pavia, in 1515. Freberus, in the rest of his Extract from Melchior Adam, contents himself with the Faults of That Author, and adds no other to them. See his Theatrum, pag. 1221.

V O L. I.

[D] Add the Academical Honours to the Military.]

It is proper to produce his own Words. "Utriusque Juris & Medicinarum Doctor evasi, antea etiam Auratus Eques; quam ordinem non precario mihi redemi, non à transmarina peregrinatione mutuavi, non in Regum inthronisatione impudenti insolentia furipui, sed in publicis præliis, media acie, bellica virtute commerui (6). — I went out Doctor of Laws and Physic, having before receiv'd the Honour of Knighthood; the conferring of which Order upon me was not the Effect of Solicitation, not borrowed from my Travels beyond Sea, nor impudently and insolently extorted from the Inauguration of Kings; but gloriously earn'd by Martial Bravery, and in the Field of Battle."

[E] Extensive Knowledge of Languages.] He understood eight, and there were but two, out of this great Number, which he did not understand to Perfection. He will give us this Account himself, without too much Modesty: We need not be afraid of injuring him, by esteeming him, according to the value he sets upon himself. "Octo linguarum medicritæ doctus, sed illarum sex adeo peritus, ut singulis non loqui modo & intelligere, sed & eleganter orare, dictare, & transferre noverim; tum præter multimodam etiam abstrusarum rerum cognitionem, utriusque Juris & Medicinarum Doctor evasi (7). — I was moderately vers'd in eight Languages; of which six were so familiar to me, that I not only understood and spoke them, but was able to play the Orator in them, dictate in them, and translate from them: then, besides an extensive Knowledge of the most abstruse things, I commenc'd Doctor of Laws and Physic." He was betimes in search of the Philosopher's Stone, and it appears that he had been recommended to some Princes, as very fit for the grand Projection, which made him run the Hazard of his Liberty sometimes (8). It is certain, that a Person thought capable of making Gold, might well be afraid, that some Prince would imprison him, in order to employ him for himself, exclusive of other Princes.

[F] He read public Lectures there.] He seems to contradict himself on this Subject; for sometimes he says that he did it without Reward, and sometimes that he was rewarded for it. "Publicis prælectionibus quas ad honorem Illustrissimæ Principis Margaretæ Dolani feci GRATIS. — Inter public Lectures, to which I read GRATIS at DOLE, in a hour of the most illustrious Prince's Margareta. Thus he speaks

(6) Id. Epist.
21. lib. 7.
pag. 1221.
See also pag.
737, 97.

(7) Id. Epist.
21. lib. 7.
pag. 1221.

(8) Id. Epist.
21. lib. 7.
pag. 1221.

(9) Id. Epist.
21. lib. 7.
pag. 1221.

(10) Id. Epist.
21. lib. 7.
pag. 1221.

(11) Id. Epist.
21. lib. 7.
pag. 1221.

(12) Id. Epist.
21. lib. 7.
pag. 1221.

(13) Id. Epist.
21. lib. 7.
pag. 1221.

(14) Id. Epist.
21. lib. 7.
pag. 1221.

(15) Id. Epist.
21. lib. 7.
pag. 1221.

(1) Melch.
Adam. in Vit. Medi-
cor. pag. 16.

(2) Agrippa,
Epist. 26.
lib. 7. pag.
1041.

(3) Thevet's History of Illustrious Men, Tom.
7. pag. 222.
Edit. Paris
1600, 1671.

(4) Agrippa,
Epist. 18.
lib. 6. pag.
970.

(5) Id. Epist.
10. lib. 2.
pag. 736.

(6) Id. Epist.
21. lib. 7.
pag. 1221.

(7) Id. Epist.
21. lib. 7.
pag. 1221.

(8) Id. Epist.
21. lib. 7.
pag. 1221.

(e) See the Epi. le Dedicatory of that Treatise, dated at Antwerp is the Month of April, 1529.

(f) His Expositiō is dated from London, 1530.

(g) Agrippa, Defectio Propositi. PG. 596.

(h) Id. ib.

(i) Operum, Tom. 2. p. 1073.

the Neiberlands, he composed at that Time a Treatise of the Excellency of Women (g); but the Persecution he suffered from the Monks hindered him from publishing it. He gave up the Cause, and went into England (h), where he wrote on the Epistles of St Paul (i), though he had another very private Affair in hand. Being returned to Cologne, he read Public Lectures there on the Questions of Divinity, which are called Quodlibetales; after which he went to the Emperor Maximilian's Army in Italy, and continued there, till Cardinal de Sainte Croix sent for him to Pisa. Agrippa would have displayed his Abilities there in quality of Theologist of the Council, if That Assembly had continued. This would not have been the way to please the Court of Rome, nor to deserve the obliging Letter he received from Leo X [G], and from whence we may conclude that he altered his Opinion. From that Time he taught Divinity publicly at Pavia, and at Turin (k). He read Lectures on Mercurius Trismegistus, at Pavia, in the Year 1515 (l). His leaving That City, the same, or the following Year, looked more like running away, than retiring. This appears by the 49th Letter of his first Book, compared with the 520th. He had a Wife and Children at that Time [H]. It appears by the Second Book of his Letters, that his Friends

(g) Operum Agrippæ, Tom. 2. p. 510.

(h) In Defectio. Propositi. pag. 596.

(i) It is the 38th Book among those of Agrippa.

(j) Operum Agrippæ, Tom. 2. p. 710.

(k) It was partly added to this Purpose, as apud Crenium Animad. Philol. & Histor. part. 2. p. 14, 15.

(l) Epist. 19. lib. 2. PG. 731.

in his Complaint against the Cordelier Catilinet (g). But he says elsewhere, That he was admitted into the Society of the Professors of Divinity, and gratified with a Pension (h). "In Dola Burgundie publ. leclura facras literas professus sum, ob quam ab hujus studii Doctoribus in Collegium receptus, insuper regentia & Stipendiis donatus sum. — At Dole, in Burgundy, I read public Lectures in Divinity; upon which Account I was admitted by the Doctors of that Faculty into the College, and was besides rewarded with the Place of Regent, and a Pension." The way to reconcile these two things, is to say, That at first he read gratis, and afterwards for Money.

[G] The obliging Letter he receiv'd from Leo X. (11) It is dated from Rome, the twelfth of July, 1513, and sign'd Petrus Bemus. He is there commended for his Zeal for the holy Apostolical See, on the good Character which the Nuncio had given of him. "Ex literis venerabilis fratris Eranii Episcopi Verulanii nuncii nostri, aliorumque sermonibus, de tua in sanctam sedem Apostolicam devotione, deque tuo in ejus libertate incolumitateque tuenda studio diligentique intelleximus: quod quidem nobis gratissimum fuit. Quapropter te in Domino magnopere commendamus, laudamusque istum animum atque virtutem (12). — We have been inform'd, by the Letters of our venerable Brother Eranius, Bishop of Verulan, our Nuncio, and from the Report of others, of your Devotion to the holy See, and your Care and Diligence in defending its Privileges and Safety; which gave us great Satisfaction. Wherefore we greatly commend you in the Lord, and praise this virtuous Disposition." Let me remark, that This Brief is of no use towards clearing Agrippa from the Imputation of Necromancy (13), for it preceded his ill Reputation several Years.

[H] He had a Wife and Children at that Time. Though I make use of the Plural Number, yet I know he had but one Son: "Quorū, quorū, in tam suscitata tempestate, una cum uxore filioque ac familia confugissem, relicta Domo ac supellestili, rebusque omnibus? — How could I leave my House, Furniture, and all my Effects; and whither, in such suspicious Times, could I fly with my Wife, my Son, and my Family?" Thus he speaks in the forty ninth Letter of the second Book. He was very happy in his Wife, whom he thus describes in another Place; "Ego quidem Deo omnipotenti innumeram habeo gratiam, qui uxorem mihi conjunxit secundum cor meum, virginem nobilem, bene moratam, adolecentulam, formosam, que ita ad meam vitam consuetudinem, ut ne contumeliosum verbum inter nos intercedat, atque, quo foelicissimum me dixerō, quorū res res vertunt, in prosperis & adversis, semper acque mihi benigna, affabilis, constant, integerrimi animi, sani consilii, semper apud se manens (14). — I give abundant Thanks to Almighty God, who bestow'd on me a Wife after my own Heart, a young Lady of a good Family, well bred, young, and handsome, who lives with me in so compliant a manner, that we never exchange an angry Word; and, to complement my Happiness, she joins both in Prosperity and Adversity; alike affectionate, affable, and constant; honest, prudent, and ever employ'd in the Care of her Family." One thing he forgot to tell us, I mean, whether she was rich or not; for otherwise he represents her as endow'd with all he could desire, handsome, young, virtuous, of a noble Family, and of a perpetual Compliance. He lost her in the Year 1521, and, for what Reason I know not, he would have her buried at Metz, where he no longer resided (15). He took Care to order, that all the Anniversaries should be performed, which he had founded for the Soul of the deceased (16). He married again at Genova, in the Year 1522 (17). He praises this second wife as much as the first, for he says, "Ante biennium hoc secunda uxorem duxi virginem nobilem pulcherrimamque, que adeo ad meam vitam consuetudinem ut nescias istane priorum, animum hanc illam alteram, in amando obsequendoque æquet, an superet (18). — Two Years ago, I married a second Wife, a young Lady of a good Family, and very beautiful; she behaves with so much Complaisance towards me, that you would be at a loss to determine which of the two equals, or exceeds, the other in Duty and Affection." The latter was more fruitful than the former; he had but one Son by the first; the second lay in three times in two Years, and a fourth time the Year following; "Duos ista mihi filios peperit, ambo superstitēs, filiamque unam quæ vita excessit (19). — Uxor mea jam partui proxima est (20). — She has already brought me two Sons, both alive, and one Daughter, who is dead. — My Wife is at this time near her Delivery." He does not say whether she was rich; but one of his Friends assures us, that she was. — Te nunc probi, nobili, formosa, ac locuplete ducta uxore, &c. (21). — Having now married a virtuous, noble, handsome, and rich Wife, &c. But this does not convince me; for Agrippa's Letters, after his second Marriage, breathe as much Poverty, as before. The Cardinal of Lorraine was Godfather to his third Son, by his second Wife (22). When he set out from Paris for Antwerp, in the Month of July, 1528, he left his Wife big with Child at Paris (23). She was brought to Bed of her fifth Son, at Antwerp, the thirteenth of March, 1529 (24), and died in August, 1529, at Antwerp, extremely lamented by her Husband, as appears by the eighty first Letter of the fifth Book; she was near twenty five Years of Age. I do not find that he makes mention of his third Marriage in his Letters; but we find that he divorc'd his Wife in the Year 1535. Ubi conjugem Mechliniensem Bonne repudiasset anno tricesimo quinto supra sequimur (25). This was what Jabū Wierus (25) informs us of, who had been his domestic Servant. If Thevet had known these Particulars, he would not have been satisfied with telling us that Agrippa married Mrs Louyse Tyllie, of a very noble Family, at twenty three Years of Age, and in the Year of our Lord 1509 (26); he would at least have mention'd the other two Marriages in general. Melchior Adam knew more of them than Thevet; for he was not ignorant that Agrippa had been twice married: Duum uxorum maritus nobilium, & liberorum aliquot parens; but, besides that he seems to know nothing of the third Marriage, he is guilty of several Chronological Errors, in speaking of the first. These are his Words, "Mortuo Maximiliano, sub diversis & principibus & civitatum magistratibus, per Italiam; Hispaniam, Angliam, Galliam egit, multaque egregia facinorosa deliquit. Tandem, laborum terra marique exaudiorum fatigatus, ac quietis & otii cupidus, ducta uxore

(15) Ibid. lib. 3. PG. 846.

(16) Ibid. 19. lib. 4. PG. 846.

(17) Ibid. 33. lib. 4. PG. 800. See likewise pag. 851.

(18) Ibid. 60. lib. 3. PG. 818.

(19) Ibid. 74. lib. 3. PG. 826.

(20) Ibid. 33. lib. 3. PG. 800.

(21) Ibid. 68. lib. 3. PG. 841.

(22) Ibid. 76. lib. 3. PG. 827.

(23) Ibid. 55. lib. 5. PG. 933.

(24) Ibid. 68. lib. 3. PG. 841.

(25) Wier. de Magic. cap. 5. PG. 112.

(26) Thevet, Histor. Illustr. p. 222, 223.

Friends endeavoured in several Places to procure him some Honourable Settlement, either at Grenoble, Geneva, Avignon, or Metz. He preferred the Post, which was offered him in this last City, and I find that, in the Year 1518 (m), he exercised there the Employment of Syndic, Advocate, and Orator of the Town (n). The Persecutions, which the Monks raised against him, as well upon the account of his having refused the common Opinion concerning the three Husbands of St Anne, as because he had protected a Country-Woman, who was accused of Witchcraft [I], made him leave the City of Metz. What induced him to treat of the Monogamy of St Anne, was his seeing, that James Faber Stapulensis, his Friend, was pull'd to pieces by the Preachers of Metz, for having maintained That Opinion (o). Agrippa retired to Cologne, his native City, in the Year 1520. willingly forsaking a City, which the Seditious Inquisitors had made an Enemy to Learning, and true Merit (p). It is indeed the Fate of all Countries, where such Persons grow powerful, of whatsoever Religion they are. He left his own City in the Year 1521, and went to Geneva (q); but his Fortunes did not much improve there; for he complained, that he was not rich enough to make a Journey to Chamberi (r), to solicit the Pension, which he was made to hope for from the Duke of Savoy. This Expectation came to nothing; upon which Agrippa went from Geneva to Friburg in Switzerland (s), in the Year 1523 (t), to practise Physic there, as he had done at Geneva. The Year following he went to Lyons, and obtained a Pension from Francis I. He was in the Service of That Prince's Mother, in Quality of her Physician, but made no great improvement of his Fortune there; neither did he follow That Princess (u), when she departed from Lyons, in the Month of August, 1525, to conduct her Daughter to the Frontiers of Spain. He was suffered to dance attendance at Lyons, and employ the Interest of his Friends in vain, to obtain the payment of his Pension: and, before he received it, he had the Vexation to be informed that he was struck out of the List (x). The Cause of his Disgrace was, that, having received Orders from his Mistress to inquire, by the Rules of Astrology, what Turn the Affairs of France would take, he expressed his Disapprobation too freely, that the Princess shou'd employ him in so vain a Curiosity, instead of making use of him in more important Matters. The Lady took this Lesson very ill (y); but she was yet more angry, when she heard, that Agrippa's Astrology promised the Constable of Bourbon new Triumphs [K]. Agrippa, finding himself discarded,

(m) Epist. 12. lib. 2.

(n) See his Op. Spect. Oper. T. III. 2. p. 1090.

(o) Epist. 25. lib. 2. pag. 743. See also pag. 745.

(p) Epist. 33. lib. 2. pag. 749.

(q) Epist. 1. lib. 3. pag. 724.

(r) Epist. 42. lib. 3. pag. 794.

(s) And not in Brigaw, as M. Ichior Adam says.

(t) Epist. 41. lib. 3. dec.

(u) Epist. 70. lib. 3. pag. 828.

(x) Epist. 52. lib. 4. pag. 869.

(y) Epist. 37. lib. 4. pag. 859. 870.

"uxore, virgine nobili, fidem in Allobrogibus fixit, ut procul negotiis sibi ac mullis viveret. Invitatus autem ab inclyta Mediomatrici repub. munus syndici, advocati & oratoris obivit (27). — After the Death of Maximilian, he liv'd successively under several Governments, in Italy, Spain, England, and France, and distinguish'd himself by many famous Actions. At length, tir'd with the Fatigues he had undergone both by Sea and Land, and desirous of Ease and Retirement, he married a Wife, a young Lady of Birth; and settled in the Country of the Allobroges, in order to retire from Business, and enjoy himself, and the Muses. But, upon the Invitation of the illustrious Republic of Metz, he was oblig'd to the Offices of Syndic, Advocate, and Orator." Observe, that the Emperor Maximilian died the 12th of January, 1550, and that Agrippa travell'd into Spain in 1538, and into England, in 1510. Here is already one Anachronism. After his return from England, he staid some time at Cologne, and afterwards went into Italy, where he still resided in the Year 1517 (28). He was at Metz in the Year 1518 (29). He did not return into Italy after his Departure from thence for Metz; here is, then, another Anachronism. Remark farther, that he was already married, in the Year 1515 (30). Where are then those great Fatigues, which he underwent both by Sea and by Land, after the Death of the Emperor Maximilian, which Matrimony was to free him from? How could he settle with his Wife in the Country of the Allobroges; he, who liv'd a roving Life with her in Italy? Add to this, that he did not settle in the Country of the Allobroges, before his Journey to Metz; and that he was Syndic of Metz before Maximilian died. Melchior Adam is full of the like Mistakes. Part of those, which I have observed, are so much the more excusable, as they are committed on the Authority of Agrippa himself, who, through Forgetfulness, or otherwise, told Margaret, Queen of Hungary, That he had travell'd to such and such Places, after the Death of Maximilian, &c. See the twenty first Letter of the seventh Book. I should be glad to see some one undertake to reconcile Melchior Adam with These. According to the latter, Agrippa married at twenty three Years of Age; according to the former, not 'till after an infinite Number of Travels, and a world of Affairs; when, being fatigued and worn out, he desir'd at last a retir'd Life.

[I] A Country-Woman, who was accused of Witchcraft.] The Dominican, Niccolai Savini, Inquisitor of the Faith at Metz, propos'd to put this Woman to the Torture, upon a meer Prejudice; grounded on her being the Daughter of a Witch, who had been burnt (31). Agrippa did what he could to prevent so irregular a Proceeding; but could not hinder the Woman from being put to the Question; however he was instrumental in proving her Innocence. Her Accusers were condemn'd in a Fine (32). The Penalty was too mild, and far from Retaliation. [This Country-Woman was of Vapry, a Town situated near the Gates of Metz, and belonging to the Chapter of the Cathedral. There appear'd in Melchior, the principal Accuser of this Woman, such sordid Passions, and such a total Ignorance of Literature, and Philosophy, that Agrippa, who, in his Letter of the second of June, 1519, treats the Town of Metz, as, "Omnium bonarum literarum virtutumque Novicia. — The Stepmother of Learning and Virtue." — Agrippa, I say, might, by this satirical Reflexion, give rise to the Proverb, "Metis avara, scientiarum novicia — Metz the Covetous, and Stepmother of Arts and Sciences." REM. CRIT.]

[K] Promis'd the Constable of Bourbon new Triumphs.] His Complaint of being employ'd in the Follies of Astrology might well give Offence. "Seneschallo, ut admeat illam, ne ad tam indignum artificium ingenio meo diutius abutatur, nec in has nugas ulterius impingere cogar, qui multo satioribus studiis illi inservire queam (33). I wrote to the Seneschal, desiring him to advise me not to misapply my Abilities any longer in so unworthy an Art; and that I might for the future avoid these Follies; since I had it in my Power to be of Service to her by much happier Studies." But the Misfortune was, these Follies predict'd Success to the opposite Party. "Rediit in mentem scripsisse me Seneschallo; comperisse me in Bourboni natalitii revolutionibus; illum frustatis vestris exercitiis etiam in hac annuum victorem fore — dixique intrinsece, o infelix propheta! hoc vaticinio jam omnem Principis tuæ gratiam concussisti: Hoc est ulcus, hic antrax, hic carbo, hic cancer ille, quem noli me tangere dixisti, quem tu imprudens retigisti etiam cauterio (34). — I remember I told the Seneschal, in a Letter, that in casting the Constable of Bourbon's Nativity, — I had

(31) Ibid. 33. lib. 2. pag. 754.

(32) Ibid. 40. lib. 2. pag. 757. See likewise pag. 763.

• Villa Vapry.

(33) Agrippa Epist. 20. lib. 4. pag. 854.

(34) Ibid. 62. lib. 4. pag. 880.

(27) Melchior Adam in Vit. Melchior. pag. 17.

(28) Agrippa Epist. 1. lib. 2. pag. 722.

(29) Ibid. 12. lib. 2. pag. 730.

(30) Ibid. 47. lib. 3. pag. 722.

(8) Epist.
ci. lib. 5.
pag. 932.

(aa) Conspiceo, five audito nomi-
ne meo, præcipiti ira repente cir-cipit pignum totum, inqui-ens, se nequaquam fig-nistrum in favorem divinatoris.
Epist. 30.
lib. 4. p. g.
920.

discarded, murmured, stormed, threatened [L], wrote, and did, all that his Impatient Humour suggested to him; but, in short, he was obliged to look out for another Settlement. He cast his Eyes on the Netherlands, and, having after long waiting obtained the necessary Passes, he arrived at Antwerp in the Month of July, 1528 (z). One of the Causes of these Delays was the rough Proceeding of the Duke of Vendôme, who, instead of signing the Pass, tore it, saying, He would not sign it for a Conjuror (aa). In the Year 1529, Agrippa found himself invited at once by the King of England, by the Emperor's Chancellor, by an Italian Marquis, and by Margaret of Austria, Governess of the Netherlands (bb). He accepted the Offers of the latter, and was made Historiographer to the Emperor, a Post procured him by That Prince. He published, by way of Prelude, The History of the Government of Charles V., and soon after he was obliged to compose That Prince's Funeral Oration, whose Death was in some manner the Life of our Agrippa; for She had been strangely prejudiced against him [M]. The same ill Office was done him with his Imperial Majesty (cc).

(bb) Epist.
84. lib. 5.
pag. 951.

(35) Id. ib.
pag. 881.

"I had discovered that he would this Year likewise gain the Victory over your Armies; upon which I exclaim'd within myself, O unhappy Prophet! By this Prediction, you have forfeited all the Favour of your Mistress: This is the Ulcer, the Quicksilver Earth, the Coal, the Cancer, which we must not touch; which yet, imprudent as thou art, thou hast ventur'd to touch even with a Burning iron." They, who are acquainted with the History of those Times, see plainly, that our Astrologer could not make his Court worse to the Mother of Francis I. than by promising good Success to the Constable. From that time Agrippa was look'd upon as a Bourbonist (35). To silence this Reproach, he represented the Service he had done to France, by dissuading four thousand foot Soldiers from following the Emperor's Party, and by engaging them in the Service of Francis I. He alleged his refusal of the great Advantages, which were promis'd him, when he left Fribourg, if he would enter into the Constable's Service. It appears by the fourth and sixth Letter of the fifth Book, that he held a first Correspondence with that Prince, in the Beginning of the Year 1527. He advis'd, and counsel'd him, yet refusing to go, and join him, and promis'd him Victory. He assur'd him, that the Walls of Rome would fall down, upon the first Attack; he only forgot the chief Point, which is, that the Constable would be kill'd there. "Jam fata illis propinquam stragem suamque perniciem denunciant: Mox illa superba moenia vix oppugnata corruere videbis. Eja ergo nunc, strenuissime Princeps, quem tantæ viæ floræ ducem fata constituunt, rumpe moras, perge intrepidè quò cæpisti prospere, aggredere fortiter, pugna constantè; habes electissimorum militum armatas acies: Adest colorum favor, aderit et justus belli vindex Deus; nihil formidaveris, ingens siquidem te manet gloriæ triumphus (36). — The Fates already denounce their approaching Ruin: You will soon see those proud Walls demolish'd, upon the slightest Attack. Go on, then, most valiant Prince, whom the Fates have plac'd at the Head of so signal a Victory; make no delay; go on, and prosper, as you have begun; attack vigorously; fight undauntedly; you have an arm'd Force of chosen Soldiers: Heaven assists you, and God himself will fight so righteous a Battle; fear nothing, for a glorious Triumph awaits you." The Death of the Constable, which happened before Agrippa went out of Lyons, puts me in mind of three Errors of Melchior Adam. He says, that Agrippa, being invited first by the Constable, and afterwards by the Chancellor, went to the Court of Burgundy, and a little while after was very unfortunate in the loss of these two Patrons. This is to fall into three Anachronisms. I. The Constable was dead, before Agrippa left France, and he never had any Design of inviting him to the Court of the Princess Margaret (37). II. The Chancellor Gattinara did indeed invite him, but it was to the Court of Charles V. and it was an Invitation which Agrippa distinguished very plainly from That, which was offer'd to him, in relation to the Court of Margaret (38). III. He was already in the Netherlands, when the Chancellor made Proposals to him.

[L] Agrippa, finding himself discarded, murmur'd, storm'd, threaten'd. He had used Menaces, before his Pensions were taken from him. Enrag'd at his Salary's being stopp'd, and seeing himself despis'd, he declar'd he was tempted to perpetrate some base Act. "Crede mihi (39) (say, be in a Letter to a Friend) (39) cō se incli-

"nant res meæ, atque animus, ni tuis precibus celerique adjuver auxilio, malo aliquo utar consilio, si quidem & malis artibus nonnunquam bona fortuna parata est. — Believe me, my Affairs, and my Mind, are in such a Posture, that, unless I am prevented by your Intreaties, and speedy Advice, I shall attempt something vile; since good Fortune is sometimes procur'd by base Arts." When he knew that he was cashier'd, he wrote several thundering Letters, and threaten'd to publish a Discovery of all the Intrigues of those Courtiers, who had ruin'd him (40). He was so brutish as to say, That for the future he should look upon the Princess, whose Counsellor and Physician he had been, as a cruel and perfidious Jezabel: Nec ultra illam ego pro principe mea (jam enim effugit) sed pro atrocissima & perfida quadam Jesabele mihi habendam deinceps (41). What would he not have done in such a Rage, and in such a thirst of Revenge, if he had had so much Credit with the Devil, as they pretend he had? No Author, I believe, has asserted, That this Indignation of Agrippa was fatal to any Person of the Court of France. This unfortunate Man was not better pleas'd with the Court of Charles V. He presented a Petition to That Prince's Privy Council, wherein he represented what Harm and Good he could do: His Menaces were the most intelligible in the World; but no ill Consequence attended the Council's disregard of them. "Cogeritis me acceptam ea repulsa injuriam ad novarum rerum licentiam transferre, & malo aliquo consilio (ceu quale Hermocles dedit Paulanæ) uti oportere — Quin & malis artibus sapientissime bona fortuna parata est — Sed interea memineritis inter Æsopi Apologos esse, murem aliquando, subvenisse leoni, & scarabeum expugnasse Aquilam (42). — You would drive me, by this unjust Repulse, to new Plots, and wicked Designs; such as Hermocles advis'd Paulanias to do. — Nay very often Success attends upon base Arts. — But remember, in the mean time, that, in Æsop's Fables, a Mouse once assisted a Lion, and a Beetle got the better of an Eagle.

[M] For she had been strangely prejudiced against him. He gives us the following Account of the Matter, after having complained that they suffered him to perish with Hunger. "Quod ad te scribam non habeo aliud nisi quod ego hic egregie esurio, ab istis sulcibus diis totus præteritus. Quid magnus ille Jupiter, suspicari nequeo. Ego quanto fuerim in periculo, jam primum relinqui; tantum enim dictum est mihi; prævaluerant cuculliones illi apud Dominam, sed muliebriter religiosam principem, ut nisi illa mox perisset, jam ego, quod maximum crimen est, monachalis majestatis sacraque cuculla reus, tanquam in religionem Christianam impius, periturus fuisset (43). — I have only to inform you, that I am here perishing with Hunger, being wholly neglected by your Deities of the Court. What the great Jupiter himself (44) intends, I cannot guess. I have just learned what great Danger I was in; for it has been hinted to me; that the Brethren of the Cow had so influenced this bigotted Princess, that, had not her Death interceded, I should have been convicted of Treason against the Majesty of Monks, and the sacred Cow, (a Crime of the most heinous Nature) and have suffered as a Blasphemer of the Christian Religion." Generally speaking, a Mistress is more to be feared than a Master, when any Person is accused of Irreligion.

(40) See the 52d and the 62d of the 4th Book.

(41) Ibid. 62. lib. 4. pag. 884. See the 52d Letter of the 5th Book, which is full of Indignation; and the 23d of the same Book, wherein he says, That that Princess would be very ill advis'd, if she took him into her Service again.

(42) Ibid. 22. lib. 6. pag. 979.

(43) Agrippa. Epist. 11. lib. 6. pag. 968.

(44) That is Charles V.

(39) Epist. 8. lib. 4. pag. 851.

(cc) Epist.
15. lib. 6.
pag. 969.

(dd) Ibid.
20. lib. 6.
pag. 974.

(ee) Ibid.
14. lib. 6.
pag. 968.

(ff) See the Remark [2].

(gg) Epist.
20. lib. 6.
pag. 975.
Ibid. 12.
lib. 7. pag.
1010.
Ibid. 21.
lib. 7. pag.
1022.

jeſty (cc). His Treatiſe of the Vanity of Sciences, which he cauſed to be printed in 1530, terribly exaſperated his Enemies (dd). That which he publiſhed ſoon after at Anwerp (ee), of the Occult Philoſophy (ff), afforded them a ſtill farther pretence to defame him. It was well for him that Cardinal Campegius, the Pope's Legate, and Cardinal of la Mark, Biſhop of Liege, were his Advocates (gg). But their good Offices could not procure him one Penny of his Penſion, as Hiſtoriographer, nor prevent his being imprifoned at Bruffels, in the Year 1531 (hh). But He was ſoon releaſed. The following Year he made a Viſit to the Archbiſhop of Cologne (ii), to whom he had dedicated his Occult Philoſophy, and from whom he had received a very obliging Letter (kk). The fear of his Creditors made him ſtay longer in the Country of Cologne, than he deſired (ll). He ſtrenuouſly oppoſed the Inquiſitors, who had put a ſtop to the printing of his Occult Philoſophy, when he was publiſhing a new Edition of it, corrected, and augmented, at Cologne. See the XXVith and the following Letters of his Seventh Book. In ſpite of them, the Impreſſion was finiſhed, which is That of the Year 1533. He continued at Bonn till the Year 1535, and was then deſirous of returning to Lyons. He was imprifoned in France for ſomething, which he had wrote againſt the Mother of Francis I, but was releaſed, at the Requeſt of certain Perſons, and went to Grenoble, where he died the ſame Year, 1535 (mm). Some ſay, That he died in the Hoſpital; but, according to Gabriel Naudé, it was at the Houſe of the Receiver General of the Province of Dauphiné, whoſe Son was firſt Preſident of Grenoble (nn). Mr Allard, at p. 4. of the Bibliothèque de Dauphiné, ſays that Agrippa died at Grenoble, in the Houſe, which belonged to the Family of Ferrand, in Clerks-ſtreet, and was then in the poſſeſſion of the Preſident Vachon, and that he was buried in the Convent of the Dominicans. He lived always in the Roman Communion; therefore it ought not to have been ſaid that he was a Lutheran [N]. I do not believe that

(bb) Ibid.
23. lib. 6.
pag. 980.

(ii) Ibid. 6.
lib. 7.

(kk) Ibid. 1.
lib. 7.

(ll) Ibid.
21. lib. 7.
pag. 1024.

(mm) John Wierus de
Magia, cap.
5. pag. 111.

(nn) Naudé's Apology for Great Men,
pag. 427.

[N] It ought not to have been ſaid that he was a Lutheran. I confeſs, I have not obſerved in his Letters, that, when he ſpeaks of Luther, or his Followers, he makes uſe of opprobrious Language, or injurious Reflexions. I own farther, that he inquired particularly into the Tenets of Luther, and his Followers, in controverſial Points; but this does not ſhew, that he approved of that Reformer's Doctrine. May not the moſt rigid Proteſtants of the Confeſſion of Geneva give orders to purchaſe for them all the Books, which the Seſtaries of Transilvania cauſe to be printed; and would it not be very ridiculous to pretend, that therefore they agree in Opinion with thoſe Heretics? They, who embraced the Reformation of Luther, did not treat That Doctör with That Indifference, which we meet with in Agrippa's Letters, I mean, without praifing, or blaming him. If Agrippa was the Author of the eighty ſecond Letter of the third Book, it could be no longer doubted, that he was a ſtanch Lutheran; but tho' That Letter is inſcribed, Agrippa ad amicum, it is certain that it was not written by Agrippa: which I thus demonſtrate. The Author of That Letter tells that his Wife was brought to bed of a Son, in the Month of November 1525. Now Agrippa's Wife was brought to bed of a Son in the foregoing Month of July; this is plain by the ſeventy ſixth Letter of the third Book, wherein it appears likewiſe that the Cardinal of Lorain was God-father to the Child. It is inconteſtable, then, that Agrippa did not write the Letter in queſtion. I omit that he was not at Strasburg, but at Lyons, at the time, when That Letter was written from Strasburg. So that they, who would produce this as a Proof in favour of Sixtus Sieneſis, who ſaid that Agrippa was a Lutheran (45), would ſupply him with an inſufficient Evidence. [The Truth is, Agrippa, in the nineteenth Chapter of his Apology, ſpeaks in ſuch lofty Terms of Luther, and with ſuch Contempt of the principal Adverſaries of that Reformer, that it is plain Sixtus Sieneſis was induced from thence to affirm, that Agrippa was a Lutheran. As this was a proper Place for producing this Piece, rather than certain of Agrippa's Letters, there is reaſon to believe Mr Bayle had not read it ſo careleſſly, as he had done the Letters. REM. CRIT.] Quenſtedt conſuted Sixtus Sieneſis by the ſixth Chapter of the Treatiſe of the Vanity of Sciences, wherein Agrippa calls Luther an Arch-Heretic. This Conſutation is infinitely more ſolid, than That which a Divine of Utrecht made uſe of, by alledging the Profeſſorſhip of Divinity, to which Agrippa was preferred at Dole and at Pavia, and the Poſt he enjoyed under the Cardinal of Sainte Croix, for the Council of Piſa (46). This proves nothing at all; becauſe all thoſe Honours of Agrippa preceded Luther's firſt preaching againſt the Pope. If any one asks me, why Agrippa ſpeaks in harſher Terms of Luther, in his Books of the Vanity of Sciences, than in his Letters, I ſhall not anſwer, that it is a Work, wherein he propoſed to cenſure the whole World: I chuſe to offer another Reaſon. When he compoſed this Treatiſe, it is likely he had given up the Hopes he at firſt conceived of Luther. I believe, that, at firſt, he, as well as Eraſmus, looked upon this Reformer as an Hero, who would put a ſtop to the Tyranny, which the mendicant Friars, and the reſt of the Clergy, exerciſed over the Minds and Conſciences of Men. Being ignorant and voluptuous, they encouraged a thouſand paſtury Superſtitions, and would not ſuffer, that any one ſhould ſtudy polite Literature; they would neither emerge from their Barbarity, nor ſuffers others to do it: Inſomuch that to be Witty, Learned, and Polite, was ſufficient to expoſe a Man to their Hate and Indignation. Agrippa, Eraſmus, and ſome other great Geniuses, were pleaſed, that Luther had broke the Ice; they expected the critical Hour of honeſt Mens Deliverance from Oppreſſion; but when they ſaw that things did not take the Turn they expected, they were the firſt to caſt a Stone at Luther. Let us obſerve, however, that Agrippa was very fluctuating in his Sentiments. He proteſted to Eraſmus, when he ſent him his Declaration on the Vanity of Sciences, that he held no other Opinions, than thoſe of the Catholic Church. Illud te admonitum volo, me de his quæ ad Religionem attinent nequaquam ſecus ſentire quam ſentis Eccleſia Catholica (47). He with-ed, in his Dedication of the Apology for this Declaration to the Pope's Legate, that God would purge his Church from the Impiety of Heretics (48); and a little after he wrote to Melancthon in a moſt obliging manner (49), and deſired him to compliment, in his Name, the invincible Heretic Martin Luther. "Salutatio mihi invidium illum hæreticum" Martinum Lutherum, qui, ut in Actibus ait Paulus, "ſervit Deo ſecundum ſectam quam hæreſim vocant" — "Pay my Compliments to the Invincible Heretic," Martin Luther, who, as St Paul ſays in the Acts, "worſhip God after the way, which they call Heresy;" and expreſſes at the ſame time his earneſt Deſire to come out of Babylon. For, ſpeaking of Charles V. he ſays, "Utinam hic Nabuchodonofor aliquando ex beſtia rediret in hominem, aut ego relinquere poſſem iſtud Ur Chaldeorum (50). — I wiſh this "Nabuchodonofor would return from the Beaſt to the Man, or that I could depart out of this Ur of the Chaldees." There was a time when the Brethren were recommended to him (51); thus, what we have ſeen that he wrote to Melancthon, was a return of certain former Emotions, which his Diſgraces, and the unjuſt Proceedings of the Catholic Divines, had inſpired him with. However, it is very

(47) Epist.
36. lib. 6.
pag. 999.

(48) Ibid.
22. lib. 7.
pag. 1013.

(49) See the 13th Letter of the 7th Bo.
pag. 1013.
He ſeems to favour the New Religion in the 18th and 52d Letters of the 3d Book.

(50) Ibid.
16. lib. 7.
pag. 1013.

(51) Ibid.
13. & 34.
lib. 7. See likewiſe E-piſt. 1. c. of the ſame Book.

(45) Sixtus Sieneſis. Biblioth.
Sanct. lib. 5.
annot. 73.
apud Quenſtedt de Pa-tris Illuſtr.
Viro. pag.
144.
Del Rio Diſ-
quiſit. lib. 2.
Queſt. 6. & Tannerus on the Treatiſe
De Potentia
Angelorum,
Queſt. 3.
make Agrippa
a Proteſtant.
See likewiſe
Voëtius,
Diſput. part.
3. pag. 616.

(46) Voëtius
ubi ſupra.

that he wrote in favour of the Divorce of Henry VIII [O]. As to Magic Art, of which he is accused, every one may judge as he pleases. One thing I assert; which is, that the Letters, which he wrote to his intimate Friends, without any apparent design of printing them, carry all the Marks of a Man used to religious Reflexions, and the Language of Christianity: His Accusers were not well informed of his Adventures [P]; which weakens their Testimony. We shall have Reason to be surprised at ry certain, that he lived, and died, in the Romish Communion. We shall touch upon some of his Opinions in the Remark [T].

[O] That he wrote in favour of the Divorce of Henry VIII. I have read, in the Work of a very learned Man (52), "That Crammer, going into Germany, where he became acquainted with the famous Cornelius Agrippa, discoursed with him concerning the Divorce, and so strongly represented to him the Necessity of it, that this great Man, warmly defending King Henry's Pursuits, was treated with great Rigour by the Emperor, and at last died in Prison." He, who criticised on this Work, answered among other things; I. That R. Wakefield, who wrote at that time for Henry VIII. said positively, that he answered the Book of the Bishop of Rochester, and another, which was believed to be wrote by Vives, or Agrippa. II. That Agrippa died in France, and was never Prisoner in Germany (53). I find some things in Agrippa's Letters, which convince me that he was not of Crammer's Opinion. His Imperial Majesty's Ambassador at London (54) wrote to Agrippa on the twenty sixth of June, 1531. to exhort him to maintain the Queen's Interest (55); and put him in mind of a Passage of the Vanity of Sciences, wherein Henry VIII. is censured. "Hodie adhuc nescio cui regi persuasum audio, ut liceat sibi jam plus viginti annorum uxorem dimittere, & nubere pellici (56). — I am informed, there is a certain King, at this time o' Day, who is persuaded, that it is lawful for him to divorce a Wife, to whom he has been married these twenty Years, and espouse an Harlot." Agrippa answered, that he would willingly engage in this Undertaking, provided the Emperor would send him his Orders, or his Permission. He shewed very strongly, that he detested those cowardly Divines, who approved of the Divorce. The following Passage relates to the Sorbonne. "Non est mihi incognitum quæsit artibus res hæc apud Parisiensem Sorbonam tractata est, quæ cæteris tanti sceleris auctum temerario porrexit exemplo. Vix me continere queo quin imitatus poetam illum exclamem, Dicite Sorbonici in Theologia quid valeat aurum? Quantum pietatis & fidei illorum pectore clausum putabimus, quorum venalis magis quam sincera conscientia est, qui extimescendas univerbo orbi Christiano determinationes auro venales fecerunt, ac servatam tot annis fidei & sinceritatis opinionem nunc tandem extrema avaritiae infamia corruerunt (57). — I am not to learn how awfully this Affair has been managed by the Sorbonne at Paris, which set the rest a rash Example of so vile an Attempt. I can scarce forbear exclaiming, in the Language of the Poet, Tell me, ye Sorbonists, the mighty Power of Gold in Divinity. What share of Piety and Fidelity can we think dwells in their Breasts, whose Conscience is rather mercenary than sincere; who have exposed to sale Decisions shocking to the whole Christian World, and have corrupted the Reputation of Fidelity and Sincerity, maintained by them for so many Years, by the utmost Infamy of Avarice?" Nevertheless he represents the Danger, to which he should expose himself, by writing against a Divorce, which so many Divines had approved, who, says he, bear me a Grudge on account of my Vanity of Sciences. The Ambassador returned to the Charge, and put him in Hopes, that the Queen of England would write to the Emperor, or to the Queen of Hungary, concerning the Method of writing on that Subject; and explained to him the reason, why Erasmus, Vives, and other good Pens of the times ought not to be preferred to him (58). Agrippa looked upon himself as engaged in the Work; for, in the Letter, which he wrote to the Queen of Hungary, after he retired to Bonn, he represented, how he had applied himself altogether to his Office of Historiographer, though he had not yet reaped any Profit by it. I collect Memoirs, says he, for the History of the War of Italy and Hungary; and I have still a greater Design in my Head, which is to write in favour of your Aunt, Queen Catherine. "Sed longe majus his negotium pro vestri sanguinis decore, pro tua, inquam, matera, Angliæ celebratissima Regina, meis humeris impositum suscepi, in quo licet multi hætenus operam suam collocarunt, nullus adhuc nodum rei dissecuit (59). — But I have undertaken a much greater Task than this, for the Honour of your Family, I mean, in favour of your Aunt, the most illustrious Queen of England; in which though many have employed their Pens, no one has hitherto solved the Difficulty." I believe this Design was never executed; for the Author, being in Disgrace at the Imperial Court, doubtless thought it not proper to expose himself to the Indignation of the King of England. If Crammer gained him over, he must have made a Convert of him at soonest in the Year 1532; and if Robert Wakefield published his Book before the Year 1532 (60) it is certain, that the Treatise, which he confutes, and which was ascribed to Vives, or to Agrippa, by no means belongs to Agrippa. Note, that Sanders, who mentions the Names of several Authors, who wrote against the Divorce (61), takes no notice of the latter. [Agrippa was not yet gained over, in the Year 1533, the time, in which, if I mistake not, he published his Apology against the Doctors of Louvain; and he could not do it afterwards, without the same scandalous Prevarication, which he charges the Sorbonne with. "Eadem, says he, speaking of that famous Body, his recentibus annis determinavit, Papam non posse dispensare, ut frater uxorem ducat fratris mortui fide liberis, atque propterea matrimonium inter Angliæ Regem & Cæsaris amitam, velut contra jus naturale & divinum, indispensabile, pro incestuoso, abominabile, & sacrilego adulterio damnarunt, magna Sorbonæ infamia: cum non multis annis ante pro Augustino Furnario Civi ac Patricio Genuensi determinasset oppositum." — The same Society determined lately, that the Pope could not dispense with a Brother's marrying the Wife of his Brother, dying without Children; for which Reason they condemned, for an incestuous, abominable, and sacrilegious Adultery, the Marriage between the King of England and Cæsar's Aunt, as being contrary to Laws Divine and Human, and not to be dispensed with, to the great Scandal of the Sorbonne; which not many Years before, had decreed the very reverse, in favour of Augustinus Furnarius, Citizen and Senator of Genoa." It is not only in the Edition of 1536, that I find this Passage, which Crenius tells us was omitted in the Treatise of the Vanity of Sciences in the Edition of Lyons. This Passage appeared again in the Edition of 1539; and it is to be met with in all the preceding Editions of that Treatise. REM. CRIT.]

[P] His Accusers were not well informed of his Adventures. I said in the first Remark, that Paul Jovius, Thevet and Martin del Rio are his chief Accusers, and I promised to shew their Faults; I will now be as good as my Word. I. Paul Jovius makes him die at Lyons in a Hedge Tavern, and charges him with the infamous Suspicion of Magic, for a Reason, which I am going to produce. Agrippa, says he (62), had always a Devil with him, in the Shape of a black Dog; as they pres'd him to repent at the Approach of Death, he took off a Collar from the Dog's Neck adorned with Studs, which formed some Necromantic Inscriptions, and said to him, Go unhappy Beast, who art the Cause of my everlasting Ruin. The Dog ran immediately to the Sæne, and, casting himself into the River, never came out again. This Author has greatly commended Agrippa for his Wit, and Learning, so far as to say that his Learning had procured him the Dignity of a Knight, which the Emperor had bestowed upon him. Vir educatus in literis,

(59) Ibid. 21. lib. 7. pag. 1024.

(60) Mr. le Grand, Tom. 1. p. 249. says, That the Title of that Work is Cotzer.

Now accord to the Catalogue of Oxford, p. 246. the Cotzer was printed at London in the Year 1527.

(61) Sanders Histor. Schism. Angl.

* Agrippa, Apolog. Eccl. cap. 2.

(62) Paulus Jovius, in Elog. c. 91.

(52) Burnet's History of the Reformation.

(53) Le Grand's History of the Divorce of Henry VIII. Tom. 2. pag. 116. See also Tom. 1. pag. 249.

(54) In Agrippa's Letters, he is called Eustochius Chapuis; and in those of Erasmus, Eustathius Chapuisius.

(55) Epist. 19. lib. 6. pag. 973.

(56) Agrippa de Vanit. Scientiarum, esp. 63. pag. 124.

(57) Agrippa. Epist. 20. lib. 6. pag. 974.

(58) Ibid. 29. lib. 6. pag. 986. See likewise Ibid. 33. pag. 996.

at their Overights, and the Effects they have produced, notwithstanding the Negligence, wherewith they enquired into those Facts. After all, if he was a Magician, he

(63) Id. ib. ſc à Cæſare eruditiois ergo Equeſtris ordinis dignitate cobonatus (63). Let us begin our Criticiſm with this.

(64) See above the Remark [D.] It is certain, from the Teſtimony of Agrippa, that his Order of Knighthood was the Reward of his Military Exploits (64). Beſides, he did not die at Lyons; and laſtly, John Wierus, his Domeſtic, teſtiſies, that the black Dog was a true Dog, and that he often led him with a hair String. "Silentio involvi,

(65) Jo. Wierus de Magicis, cap. 5. pag. 111. "ſays he (65), diutius ob veritatis prerogativam non patitur quod in diverſis aliquot ſcriptioribus legimus, Diabolum forma canis ad extremum Agrippæ halitum comitem ipſi fuiſſe, & poſtea neſcio quibus modis evanuiſſe. Satis equidem mirari hic nequeo tantæ exſtimationis viros tam inſulſe aliquando loqui, ſentire, & ſcribere, ex inaniffimo vulgi rumore. Canem hunc nigrum mediocriſ ſtatuz, gallico nomine Monſieur (quod Dominum ſonat) nuncupatum novi ego ſi quis alius familiariffime, quem nimirum non raro, ubi Agrippam ſciteret, loro ex pillis concinnato alligatum duxi; at verè naturalis erat canis mafculus, cui alias ſemel lam fere colore & reliqua corporis conſtitutione ſimilem, quam Gallicè Madamoifelle (Dominam) appellabat, me preſente, adjunxit. — In juſtice to Truth, I ſhall not conceal the Matter of Faſt of what I have read in ſeveral Authors, that a Devil, in the Shape of a Dog, attended Agrippa to his laſt Breath, and afterwards diſappeared I know not how. I cannot ſufficiently expreſs my wonder, that Men of ſuch Reputation ſpeak, think, and write ſo ſilly, upon no other Foundation than Common Fame. I was perfectly acquainted with this black Dog; who was of a middle Size, and called by the French Name of Monſieur; whom I have often lead after Agrippa by a String of twiſted Hair. He was a real Dog; and his Maſter, in my Preſence, gave him for a Companion a Bitcb of the ſame Colour, Size, and kind; which he called Madamoifelle." This Author adds, that Agrippa was very fond of this Dog; that he kiſſed him often; that he made him eat ſometimes at his Table; that he took him to bed with him; and that, when Wierus and Agrippa ſtudied at the ſame Table, the Dog always lay between them among a heap of Papers. Now, becauſe Agrippa continued whole Weeks without going out of his Stove, and yet was acquainted with almoſt every Tranſaction in ſeveral Countries of the World, ſome ſilly People gave out that his Dog was a Devil, from whom he had all his Information. It is not long, ſince a Soldier, who is a French Refuge, told me very ſeriouſly, that when Mr de Melac (66) had his Maſtiſſ with him, he always returned victorious. He aſſured me, that, in the general Opinion of the Soldiers, that Dog was a familiar Spirit, who revealed all the Enemies Poſts, their Numbers, Deſigns, &c. to his Maſter. Perhaps Mr de Melac was not diſpleaſed, that it was ſo believed. Such a Notion might make his Soldiers fear nothing under his Conduct (67). Thus you ſee, on what ſort of Reports Paul Jovius founded his Opinion.

(66) Lieutenant General of the Armies of France: He ſerved in the Armies of Germany, during the War, which was ended in the Year 1697. See the Remark [B] of the Article LANDAU, towards the End.

(67) See what Plutarch relates of Sertorius's Hind, in the Life of that General.

(68) Thevet's Hiſtory of Illuſtrious Men, Tom. 7. pag. 221. Edit. of Paris, 1671. in 8 Vols in 120

(69) Id. ib. pag. 223. "II. Let us go on to Thevet. "It cannot be denied, ſays he (68), "but that Agrippa was miſerably engaged to the moſt cunning and execrable Magic, that can be imagined, and of which he made ſuch evident Profeſſion, in the Sight, and to the Knowledge of every one (as the following Diſcourſe ſhall juſtify), that it is impoſſible to deny it by Palliations or Diſguiſes." Let us ſee what the Proofs, which this preſent Diſcourſe brings, are reduced to. In the firſt Place, "Antony de Leve was ſo fond of this Man, that, by his Council, Advice, and Prudence, he compaſſed his high Deſigns, and ambitious Undertakings; which made ſome Perſons, who were jealous of That Spaniard's Victories, ſay, That, by Magic Art, he griped his Enemies with his crooked and gouty Hands, in ſuch a Manner, that many valiant Captains could not do the like, with the claſhing of their Arms, and a furious Fight (69)." In the ſecond Place, "Agrippa's Inſtructions are ſo unreaſonable, that Dr John Wierus, though he praiſes and exalts him greatly in ſeveral Places of his Works, as his

"good Maſter, yet is ſometimes obliged to give him a kick o' the Breech, and diſown him (70)." He refers us to the forty fourth Chapter of the ſecond Book of the Illuſions and Apparitions of Spirits (71), as a Proof that John Wierus laughed (with Cardan in the eighteenth Book of Sabilyty) at Agrippa's wild Imaginations, which invented more than ridiculous Apparitions. In the third Place, "His Book of Occult Philoſophy was condemned and cenſured by the Chriſtians — — — and for that Reaſon Agrippa was forced to leave Flanders, where he was not ſuffered to profeſs Magic; ſo that he went to Italy, where he lived about three Years, and poured out his Poiſon in ſuch abundance, that ſeveral good Perſons, perceiving that he had infected the Air of Italy with it in ſo little a time, purſued him ſo cloſe, that he retired to Dole, where he publicly read upon the Book de verbo mirifico (72)." In the fourth Place, "He darken'd Burgundy in ſuch a manner with the Smoak and Miſt of his Black Art, that if he had not fled for it, it is to be feared, they would have enlightened him with Fire nearer than he would have deſired." In the fifth Place, "He went to Lyons in a wretched Condition, and deſtitute of Money; where he tried all the means he could to ſubſiſt; and got ſo little, that he died in a pitiful Tavern, abhorred by every body, who deteſted him as a curſed and execrable Magician, becauſe he always carried with him a Devil in the ſhape of a Dog." Thevet adds to this the remaining part of the Story, which Paul Jovius inſerted in his Elogia.

(70) Id. ib. pag. 225. (71) I have not met with this Title, or ſuch a Diſtinction, in the Works of John Wierus, printed at Amſterdam, 1660. in 4to.

(72) Thevet. ubi ſupra; p. 226.

It would be eaſy to ſhew the Inſufficiency of theſe five Proofs. It is not neceſſary to refute the firſt, ſince Thevet acknowledges that Antony de Leve did not apply to Agrippa for any necromantic and wicked Charm (73), but rather on account of his ſurprizing and uncommon Genius (74); and, that the Emperor did not take him into his Service at the Interceſſion of Antony de Leve, but upon the Assurance which was given him, that, by his mature and ſettled Judgment, he was capable of putting an end to the weighty Affairs he had then in hand. So that the accuſed Perſon is cleared by the very Confeſſion of the Accuſer himſelf: It will be much more difficult to clear the latter from the Imputation of very groſs Ignorance. I have not obſerved any Traces in Agrippa's Letters of his Correſpondence with Antony de Leve; and I wonder that ſo many learned Perſons have reported, on the Credit of ſuch an Author as Thevet, that Agrippa was a Favourite of Antony de Leve, and a Captain in his Troop (75). He was never in the Spaniſh Service; but ſerved only in the Troops of the Emperor Maximilian; and I believe he never bore Arms, after the Speech he made at Pavia in the Year 1515. Part of That Harangue is as follows: "Neque mireris, Marchio Illuſtriſ, Joannes Gonzaga ſtrenuiſſ. militum dux, quod cum me proximis his annis feliciffimis Cæſareis caſtris præſentum cognoscere, nunc me ſacramum literarum præpoſitum pulſito cernas (76). — Nor wonder, Illuſtrious Marquis, and moſt excellent Commander, John Gonzaga, that you now ſee me in the Roſtrum, at the Head of ſacred Literature, whom not long ſince you beheld a Leader in Cæſar's victorious Army." He continued likewiſe ſome time in Italy; his Patron there was William Paleologus Marquis of Monferrat, to whom he dedicated his Treatiſe De triplici Ratione cognoscendi Deum — of the three ways of knowing God, in the Year 1516 (77): He taught at Turin, and repaſſed the Alps about the beginning of the Year 1518 (78). Let any one ſhew me that Antony de Leve ſerved the Emperor Maximilian. But he is guilty of a ſtill more inexcuſable Ignorance. Agrippa did not obtain the Title of Counſellor and Hiſtoriographer to Charles V. but by the Interceſt of certain Friends, whom he met with at the Court of the Princeſs Margaret, Governeſs of the Netherlands. Charles V. was not at that time in the Low Countries, but came thither ſome time after, ſo prejudiced againſt Agrippa, that if it had not been for the good Offices of Cardinal Campegius, and Cardinal de la Mark, he would have cauſ'd him to have been impriſon'd. The Sieur Claviger of St Honorine, ſays, that

(73) Id. ib. pag. 223. (74) Id. ib. pag. 225.

(75) Naudé's Apology for Great Men, pag. 405. See alſo Teiſſier, Elog. taken out of Thuanus, Tom. 2. p. 1075. See, beſides, Citation (79).

(76) Agripp. Oper. Tom. 2. p. 1075.

(77) Ibid. p. 80. & 718.

(78) See his Letters, pag. 728, 730.

he is a strong Proof of the Impotency of Magic; for never any Man miscarried more frequently than he, nor was often in fear of wanting Bread. We shall have reason to think the Financers of Francis I. and those of Charles V. were very well satisfied of his Innocency in this respect; if we consider how they diverted themselves with him, when he apply'd for his Pension. There are some Errors of Fact in the manner of some that Agrippa's End would have been as tragical as that of Lucilius Vaninius, if Cardinal Campegius, and Anthony de Leve, his Protectors, had not prevail'd upon Charles V. not to punish him (79). He did not see Agrippa; neither did he order him his Salary; so far was he from making use of his Counsels to extricate himself from the great Affairs he had in hand. It is a pleasant Proof of Agrippa's great Abilities in the Civil Law, to allege, that Charles V. admitted him into the Number of his Counsellors. He had attain'd, says Thevet (80), to so great a Knowledge in the Civil Law, that (as I have observed above) Charles V. admitted him into the Number of his Counsellors. He had said in the foregoing Page, that Agrippa was so well receiv'd at the Emperor's Court, that he was one of his Counsellors. It is not well known, that the Title of King's Counsellor is given to many Persons, to Physicians, Historiographers, and Authors, who have as little share in the Councils of their Prince, as the meanest Citizen? Thevet's second Reason proves nothing. Agrippa had spoke of some Apparitions so ridiculous, that one of his best Friends laugh'd at them; therefore he was a Magician. What would become of Bodinus, Martin del Rio, le Loyer, and most of the Demonographers, if such a way of arguing was admitted? His third Reason swarms with Falshoods. If Agrippa had profess'd Magic, they would not have been satisfy'd with banishing him from Flanders. Such a Profession is not so mildly punish'd. He was never in Italy after the Censure of his Occult Philosophy. This Work did not appear 'till the Year 1531. If Agrippa had pour'd out the Poison of his Magic, in such abundance, in Italy, would Cardinal de Sainte Croix have chosen him for one of the Divines of the Council of Pisa? Would the Pope have address'd to complainant a Brief to him in the Year 1515 (81)? So far is it from being true, that Agrippa, upon his being expell'd Italy, retir'd to Dole, that he did not go into Italy, 'till after he had left Dole. The fourth Reason takes for granted what is false. Agrippa brought himself into a Scrape at Dole, by favouring the Hypothesis of Capnio, whose Book De verbo mirifico he explained. The long Quarrel between the Monks and Capnio is well known. The Cordelier Catilinet, choosing rather to preach against Agrippa before the Princess Margaret, than to enter the Lists with him at Dole, took occasion to vent his Spleen against him at Ghent, in the Pulpit of Truth. But he does not accuse him of Magic; he charges him only with adding himself to the Jewish Cabala, and perverting the Scripture by cabalistical Explications (82). The ill-tim'd Declarations of that Cordelier, who, instead of prejudicing the Court and the People against an absent Professor, ought to have accus'd him in Form before the Academical Judges, did not hinder the famous John Collet from lodging Agrippa in his House at London, nor the Emperor Maximilian, Grandfather of the Princess Margaret, from employing him in Italy (83). The fifth Reason of Thevet has already been refuted; he has only copied Paul Jovius, and both of them have been so imprudent as to take notice of Agrippa's Poverty. A fine means of convincing a judicious Reader that he was a great a Magician! A rare Way to persuade the People of it, when they know, on the contrary, that whenever Fortune smiles on a Prince or Lord, it is presently cast in his Dish, that he courts Agrippa (84).

III. As for Martin del Rio, he relates these three or four Particulars: I. When Agrippa travell'd, he paid his Reckonings in Money, seemingly good and lawful; but, after some Days, it was discover'd, that he had paid his Host with pieces of Horn, or Shells (85). II. Charles V. expell'd him from his Court and Dominions, and with him two other Persons of Quality, who had promis'd him great Treasures by the means of Magic (86). III. The same Emperor did not remit the Sentence of Death against Agrippa, but condemn'd him to Banishment, after he had heard that he was fled (87). IV. Agrippa had a Boarder in Louvain, who was very inquisitive. One Day, as he was going out of Town, he order'd his Wife not to let any body go into his Closet: Nevertheless this Boarder obtain'd the Key of it; he went in and read a Book of Conjurations; upon which there was a great knocking at his Door; which he heard two or three times, without leaving off his reading. It was the Devil who knock'd at the Closet-Door, and demanded, who it was that call'd him, and what he wanted; but, receiving no Answer, he strangled him. Agrippa, returning home, fees the Spirits dancing on the top of his House; he calls them, and they inform him of what had happen'd; he order'd the Homicide to enter into the Body, and to walk some Turns, in the Place, which the Scholars frequented most, and then quit it. This was done. The Boarder, having walk'd three or four turns, fell down dead; and it was believ'd a long while, that he died suddenly; but certain marks of Suffocation appearing, began to make the thing suspected. At length Time discover'd all, and Agrippa, being oblig'd to fly into Lorrain, begun to give vent to the Heresies, which he had conceiv'd in his Heart (88).

Agrippa's Poverty, and the frequent Fear he discovers, in his Epistles, of being starv'd for want of common Necessaries, are a sufficient Confutation of the first of these Stories. When a Man has so compendious a Method of discharging his Debts, he need not fear wanting Bread. It is not true that Charles V. ever expell'd Agrippa out of his Dominions; he was too great a Politician, to punish, in such a manner, a Magician, who was a distributor of Treasures; he would have fear'd, that other Princes might make use of the Secrets of such a considerable Exile to his detriment. Del Rio refutes the second Story by the third; for he pretends in the third, that his Imperial Majesty would have put Agrippa to Death, had it been in his Power, and that the Decree of Banishment came out after the Magician's Flight. These are mere Stories. Agrippa presented Petition upon Petition to the Emperor's Council, either for the payment of his Salary, or for his Dismission (89); and when he was tir'd with his ill Success, he went to Cologne, where he exclaim'd with great Freedom, before the Magistrates, against the Monks, who stop the printing of his Works (90). He liv'd quietly at Bonn, 'till he went from thence to France. Would Charles V. have permitted this in a Man whom he had banish'd his Dominions? Would he have suffer'd this in a Magician, who had avoided Death only by Flight? As to the fourth little Tale, I refer him to Gabriel Naudé, whose Words are these: *We have more Reason to deny it, as Ludwiguus * did, than Del Rio has to affirm it, since he translated it Word for Word out of a Book, entituled, The Theatre of Nature, published in Italian and in Latin, under the Name of Strozza Cicogna, and in French and Spanish, under the Name of Valderama* (91). We may refute it another Way: as thus, Del Rio observes, that the Wife, who lent the Key to the Boarder, was afterwards divorc'd by Agrippa. It must be, then, the third Wife of this Magician. Now the second did not die 'till the Year 1529. So that the Adventure of the Boarder must have happen'd after the Year 1529. Agrippa, must therefore, have fled towards Lorrain after the Year 1530, or thereabouts; he must have taken a House at Louvain, after he was install'd in the Office of Historiographer of Charles V. for Boarders; but nothing is more false than this. For, first, he did not go into Lorrain as a Fugitive; he went thither to exercise a noble Office at Metz, which was offer'd to him with all possible Advantages, at the same time that he was press'd to accept of honourable Employments elsewhere (92). II. He did not go into Lorrain 'till 1518, and at that time his first Wife was alive. III. The Doctrines he maintain'd in that Country, for which he was expos'd to the Persecution of the Monks, were neither Magical nor Heretical; they turn'd on this Question, Whether St Anne, the Mother of the Holy Virgin, had three Husbands, and a Child by each; or whether she had but one Husband, and one Daughter. Agrippa maintain'd the latter Opinion (93), which did infinitely more Honour to St Anne's Memory. IV. It does not

(88) Ibid. lib. 2. quest. 29. §. 11.

(89) See List Works, Tom. 2. from pag. 975. to 984. likewise pag. 1017, &c.

(90) Ibid. pag. 1033.

* Quest. 15. Demonomag. fol. 187.

(91) Naudé, Apolog. p. 423.

(92) Agrippa. Epist. 9. 10. lib. 2. But particularly see his Thanks to the Gentlemen of Metz, pag. 1092.

(93) See Agrippa's Works, T. 2. p. 583. 747.

(79) Of the Use of suspected Books, pag. 102.

(80) Thevet. p. 223.

(81) Agrippa. Epist. 38. lib. 1. pag. 716.

(82) See the Expofitulation of Agrippa, in the 2d. Tome of his Works, pag. 508.

(83) Agrippa. Opus. Tom. 2. pag. 596.

(84) Thevet. pag. 224.

(85) Del Rio Disquisit. Magicar. lib. 2. quest. 12. n. 10.

(86) Ibid.

(87) Id. ib. lib. 5. §. 2.

some Persons apologizing for him [2]. Moreri declared strongly in his favour; which

was

appear that he liv'd any where else, than at Antwerp, and at Mechlen, from the time of his being made the Emperor's Historiographer, 'till he retir'd to the Elector of Cologne; and I do not believe that ever he had any Boarders at Louvain: So that we might have been dispens'd with from answering Martin del Rio, and his Partizans, 'till they had rang'd their Circumstances of Time and Place in better order.

I wonder that the famous Naudé had not the precaution to object to the Accusers of Agrippa the great Number of Historical Falshoods, of which I have convicted them.

[2] There are some Errors of Fact in the manner of some Persons apologizing for him. I have Gabriel Naudé in view. He endeavours to justify Agrippa, among other Reasons, from the Favour of two Emperors, and as many Kings (94); which is to suppose, that Charles V. had a Kindness for Agrippa; but we need only read the Complaints of that Author, to discover the contrary (95). Farther, Naudé supposes, that they did not think of crying down the Occult Philosophy, 'till a long time after it was publish'd; he pretends that they exclaim'd against that Work, only in Revenge for the Injuries, they believ'd they had receiv'd in That of the Vanity of Science. It is true, this latter Book gave great Offence to many. The Monks, the Members of the Universities, the Preachers, and the Divines, saw themselves drawn to the Life in it: Agrippa was of too warm a Complexion. "Ex ejus Libri (de Vanitate Scientiarum) quacunq;uque gultu deprehendi hominem esse ardentia ingenii, variæ lectionis, & multæ memoriæ, alicubi tamen majore copia, quam delectat, ac dictione tumultuosâ verius quam composita. In omni genere rerum vituperat mala, laudat bona. Sed sunt, qui nihil aliud sufficit, quam laudari (96). — The least taste of his Book (of the Vanity of Sciences) convinc'd me, that he was an Author of a fiery Genius, extensive Reading, and great Memory; but sometimes more copious, than choice, in his Subject, and writing in a disorder'd, rather than a compos'd, Style. He lazes Vice, and commends Virtue, every where, and in every person; but there are some, with whom nothing but Panegyric will go down." His Paintings were too strong; his Shades too dark, and his Touches too lively. This gave them uneasiness, I confess; but it is not true that this Resentment spent itself on a Work, which had lain in Obscurity for many Years. Naudé would have done better to have reserv'd this Thought for another Application; he might have met with an Opportunity sooner or later, though he had not been a Man of such great Reading, as he was. To explain myself; It is no rare thing for Zealots to take no notice of a Book, or the Author of it, for a long time, whatever it be, provided it does not personally attack them. But, if after ten, fifteen, or twenty Years, they happen to quarrel with the Author; if some new Work comes out, containing Discoveries of what they carefully endeavour to conceal from the People; the former Work immediately becomes heretical, impious, and fit to be burnt. They begin then to be eaten up with the Zeal of God's House; and thereby impose upon honest People. But They, who are no Dapes, perceive plainly what shameful Passions they cover under the fair Mask of the Interest of Piety. Let us do Justice to the Divines of Louvain; they do not deserve the Reproach, which the Apologist of Agrippa throws on them, upon this Account. The Occult Philosophy was not printed, 'till after the Declaration of the Vanity of Sciences; and it is sufficient to charge them with having made use of a thousand Cavils, to discover some damnable Propositions in That Declaration. See the solid Answer, which was given them: It is in the second Volume of Agrippa, and begins at pag. 252.

(94) Naudé's Apology for Great Men, pag. 409.
(95) Agrippa. Epist. lib. 6. p. 8. 97. and elsewhere. See the 2d Volume of his Works, pag. 251, 447, 484. and the Passages cited below in Marginal Note (95).
(96) Grafius Epist. lib. 27. p. 1038.

AN INSTANCE of the unjust Behaviour of pretended Zealots.

Let us, in a few Words, describe the History of the Occult Philosophy. Agrippa compos'd this Work in his younger Days (97), and shew'd it to the Abbot Tritheimius, from whom he had learnt many things (98). Tritheimius was charm'd with it, as appears by the Letter which he wrote to him on the 8th of April, 1510 (99); but he advises him to communicate it only to those, whom he could confide in. I know not whether the Author communicated it to too many Persons, or whether the first, who had a Copy of it, was indiscreet. The Truth is, several Manuscript Co-

